122 h 8

A GENERAL DICTIONARY, Hiſtorical and Critical:

IN WHICH

A New and Accurate TRANSLATION of that of the Celebrated

Mr. BAYLE,

WITH THE

CORRECTIONS and OBSERVATIONS printed in the late Edition at Paris, is included; and interſperſed with ſeveral thouſand LIVES never before publiſhed.

The whole containing the Hiſtory of the moſt illuſtrious Perſons of all Ages and Nations, particularly thoſe of Great Britain and Ireland, diſtinguiſhed by their Rank, Actions, Learning and other Accompliſhments.

With Reflections on ſuch Paſſages of Mr. BAYLE, as ſeem to favour Scepticiſm and the Manichee Syſtem.

By the Reverend Mr. JOHN PETER BERNARD;
The Reverend Mr. THOMAS BIRCH, M.A. and F.R.S.
Mr. JOHN LOCKMAN;
And other HANDS.

And the Articles relating to ORIENTAL HISTORY
By GEORGE SALE, Gent.

VOLUME IV.

LONDON,
Printed by James Bettenham,
For G. STRAHAN, J. CLARKE, T. HATCHET in Cornhill; J. GRAY in the Poultry; J. BATLEY and J. WOOD in Pater-Noſter-Row; J. SHUCKBURGH in Fleetſtreet; J. WILCOX, A. MILLAR in the Strand; T. OSBORNE in Grays-Inn; J. BRINDLEY in New Bond-ſtreet; C. WARD and R. CHANDLER at the Ship without Temple Bar, and ſold at their Shop in SCARBOROUGH; J. BETTENHAM near, and E. CAVE at St. John's Gate.
MDCCXXXVI.

A NEW AND ACCURATE TRANSLATION OF THE

HISTORICAL AND CRITICAL

DICTIONARY

OF

TO

His GRACE

CHARLES,

DUKE of Queensberry and Dover, &c.

This FOURTH VOLUME of the

GENERAL DICTIONARY,

Hiſtorical and Critical,

Is dedicated by

His GRACE's moſt obliged and moſt

Obedient Humble Servants,

The Authors.

GENERAL DICTIONARY,

DUKE of Marlborough and Duke, &c.

CHARGE,

TO

A GENERAL DICTIONARY Hiſtorical and Critical.

C.

CÆSALPINUS (ANDREAS), was a man of very great ability, both in Philoſophy and Phyſick. He was of Arezzo; he was Profeſſor at Piſa a long time; after which he became firſt Phyſician to Pope Clement VIII. He died at Rome February the 23d 1603 (a), at the age of eighty four (b). He left the common road of the Peripateticks in many things [A]; and to ſay the truth, he was a very bad Chriſtian with regard to opinions. He is ſaid to have believed that the firſt men were formed after the manner, which many Philoſophers fancied, that frogs are ingendred [B]. We ſhall examine whether this opinion ought to be attributed to him. His

(a) Ex Thuano, lib. 129. pag. m. 1003.

(b) Witte, Diat. Biograph.

[A] He left the common road of the Peripateticks, in many things.] Do not imagine that he invented different principles from thoſe of Ariſtotle; for, on the contrary, he paſſes for an innovator, only becauſe he ſticks to the ſenſe of Ariſtotle. He has gone to the bottom of the Peripatetick Syſtem, and has maintained it according to the true ſenſe of the Founder, and not like the Schoolmen, who whilſt they profeſſed themſelves Diſciples of Ariſtotle, taught any thing but his opinions. The fault is, that Cæſalpinus ſet himſelf principally to unfold this ſyſtem, in the articles that were moſt oppoſite to Religion. As he unravels the doctrine of his Maſter relating to the Primum Mobile, he not only ſets aſide Providence, but alſo the true diſtinction between Creator and the creature: and yet, his book (1) was never cenſured by the Inquiſition. He had indeed the cunning to declare at the end of his Preface, that if Ariſtotle is in ſome things not conformable to the Scripture, he gives him up, and that there is a fallacy in his reaſonings, but that he leaves the examination of it to thoſe who profeſs a higher Divinity (2). One might quote againſt him the maxim of the Civilians, Proteſtatio facto contraria non valet; i. e. "A Proteſtation in contradiction to a "fact is of no force." Doctor Samuel Parker has very well explained the doctrines and artifices of Cæſalpinus: he ſays that he is the firſt and almoſt the laſt of the moderns that have underſtood the meaning of Ariſtotle: Quem quid velit recentiorum hic primus & pene poſtremus cepiſſe viſus (3). What we ſhall ſay in the remark [B] will confirm what I have elſewhere (4) related of the conformity of Spinoza to Ariſtotle.

(1) I mean his Quæſtiones Peripateticæ.

(2) Sicubi ab iis quæ in ſacris diviniori modo revelata nobis ſunt, diſcedat, minime cum illo ſentio, fateorque in rationibus deceptionem eſſe: non tamen in præſentia meum eſt hæc aperire, ſed iis qui altiorem Theologiam profitentur.

(3) Parkerus, Diſput. de Deo, Sect. 14. pag. 64.

(4) In the article ARISTOTLE, citation (k).

[B] He believed that the firſt men were formed after the manner . . . that frogs are engendred.] Read the following words of Mr. Saldenus: Referendus huc .. Andreas Cæſalpinus, Medicus Romanus qui primos & vetuſtiſſimos homines, inſtar murium & ranarum, ex putri materia factos eſſe, pronunciavit: adoptato procul dubio eo errore ex Democriti Abderitæ hypotheſibus, cui ex aqua limoque primum viſum eſt homines procreatos eſſe. Non multum abludente etiam Epicuro, qui credidit, limo calefacto uteros neſcio quos radicibus terræ increviſſe, & infantibus ex ſe editis ingenuum lactis humorem, naturâ miniſtrante, præbuiſſe, hoſque, ita educatos & adultos, hominum genus procreaſſe (5). i. e. "Hither may be "referred .... Andreas Cæſalpinus, a Roman Phyſi"cian, who pronounced that the firſt and original men "aroſe from putrefaction like mice and frogs: having without doubt adopted that error from the hypo"theſes of Democritus of Abdera, who imagined "that men were at firſt produced from water and mud. "And not much differing from Epicurus, who thought, "that upon the warming of the mud, I know not "what wombs grew to the roots of the earth, and with "the aſſiſtance of nature afforded milk to the new"born infants, and that theſe being ſo educated and "brought up procreated mankind." He might have added to Democritus and Epicurus two other great Philoſophers, Anaxagoras and Archelaus (6): which would have ſerved indeed to ſhew more reading, but no more juſtice. Honeſt Mr. Saldenus had not well conſulted the originals, and probably he had ſeen what related to Cæſalpinus far from the ſource. I have ſought in the writings of this Philoſopher what could have given room to impute this opinion to him, and have found a great miſrepreſentation. I have found that in reaſoning upon the principles of Ariſtotle, he lays down, that all that ariſe from ſeed may be produced without ſeed, quæcunque ex ſemine fiunt, eadem fieri poſſe ſine ſemine; this is the title of the firſt queſtion of the fifth book: but he declares at firſt that he does not believe that the ſoul either of man or beaſt can have a corrupted ſubſtance for its principle. A little after, he diſtinguiſhes between the firſt production of animals and other beings, and their ſucceſſion. He ſuppoſes that the firſt production flowed from the firſt cauſe at the beginning, and that afterwards the ſpecies preſerved themſelves by ſucceſſive generations, and that the production of the individuals, whether it comes from ſeed, or from a corrupted matter, belongs to this ſucceſſive preſervation of the ſpecies, and not to their primitive formation: ſo that if he has ſometimes ſaid that the perfect animals were ingendred from a worm at the beginning, we muſt not underſtand it of a firſt production properly ſo called; it is only a renovation of the individuals, as it may happen in the courſe of an infinite time that all the individuals of a ſpecies may die, in which caſe no new ones can ariſe by an univocal generation, we muſt ſeek therefore for a new beginning in ſome corrupted matter. This I take to be the true ſenſe of the following Latin Text. Præterea cum alia ſit prima omnium animalium & cæterorum entium creatio, quæ a primo ente in principio efluxit: alia eorundem ſucceſſio: dicimus ortum ex putredine ſimilem eſſe ei, qui fit ex ſemine, ad ſucceſſionem ſcilicet inſtitutum, non ad primam ſpecierum dependentiam atque productionem: Niſi enim hæc præceſſiſſet, nequequam

(5) Saldenus, in Otiis Theolog. pag. 64.

(6) See the remark [B] of the article ARCHELAUS the Philoſopher.

His principles did not differ much from thoſe of Spinoza [C]. You may ſee below the titles of his writings [D]. A modern Author has reckoned him among the greateſt genius's that ever lived (c).

(c) Bibliographia Curioſa, apud Teiſſier, Éloge. de Hommes Savans, tom. 2. pag. 330.

It would be robbing Cæſalpinus of a very great honour, to paſs over in ſilence that he knew the circulation of the blood [E]; the proofs of which are ſo quicquam neque ex ſemine neque ex putredine ortum eſſet. Quod ſi aliquando meminerim primam perfectorum animalium generationem ex verme fieri, ſic intelligimus primam, quia in tempore infinito, quod ſupponitur à Peripateticis, deficientibus in aliquo tempore omnibus ſingularibus alicujus ſpeciei, primum aliquod ex putredine oriri poteſt, ex cujus ſemine propagetur ſpecies, nec quibuſdam contingit ex putredine tantum propagari (7). And obſerve that Cæſalpinus not ſuppoſing that all men ever periſhed, one cannot impute to him the having pretended that the firſt men were engendred of a corrupted matter. He would have according to Ariſtotle's hypotheſis all ſpecies to be eternal (8), and their eternity to be a ſufficient cauſe of reſtoring the individuals, if there ſhould happen an interruption to their ordinary generations; if, I ſay, this interruption happened by the death of all the individuals. Non eſt timendum ne aliqua ſpecies unquam deficiat, quamvis omnia ſingularia contingat aliquando corrupta eſſe: remanet enim in agente æterno virtus æterna omnium ſpecierum (9). I acknowledge that he ſhews this interruption poſſible in the human ſpecies (10); but this is not ſaying what Saldenus imputes to him. Beſides it was the current opinion of antiquity, that all the ſpecies of animals might be renewed without the aid of male and female. Ovid, who has only reported the common tradition of the Greeks, ſuppoſes that after the deluge the ſtones were the matter from which new men were formed, and that the heat and moiſture of the earth reſtored the other animals, and formed even ſpecies unknown to the firſt world (11).

(7) Cæſalp. Quæſt. Peripateticar. lib. 5. cap. 1. folio 104. verſo edit. 1593.

(8) Species æternæ ſunt, generantur autem & corrumpuntur iſta ſingularia. Idem, ibid. folio 105.

(9) Idem, ibid. fol. 109.

(10) Ibid. folio 108.

(11) Ovid. Metam. lib. 1. ver. 400.

Cætera diverſis tellus animalia formis
Sponte ſua peperit; poſtquam vetus humor ab igne
Percaluit ſolis, cœnumque udæque paludes
Intumuere æſtu, fœcundaque ſemina rerum
Vivaci nutrita ſolo, ceu matris in alvo,
Creverunt, faciemque aliquam cepere morando (12).

That is,

" All other creatures took their numerous birth
" And figures, from the voluntary earth.
" When that old humour with the ſun did ſweat,
" And ſlimy mariſhes grew big with heat;
" The pregnant ſeeds, as from their mother's womb
" From quickning earth both growth and form aſ-
" ſume. Sandys.

(12) Ibid. ver. 416.

Ergo ubi diluvio tellus lutulenta recenti
Solibus æthereis altoque recanduit æſtu;
Edidit innumeras ſpecies, partimque figuras
Reddidit antiquas, partim nova monſtra creavit (13).

That is,

" So, earth by that late deluge muddy grown,
" When on her lap reflecting Titan ſhone,
" Produc'd a world of forms; reſtor'd the late;
" And other unknown monſters did create.
Sandys.

(13) Ibid. ver. 434.

A Commentator ſaid upon this, that Avicenna thought the human ſeeds, being reanimated by the ſun in the bodies of thoſe who had periſhed in deluges gave new men. Sed quis ferat Avicennam? qui lib. de Diluviis aſſerit ex reliquo cadaverum humanorum ſeminio a ſole animato, homines poſt immenſas terrarum inundationes natos (14).

(14) Farnab. in Ovid. ibid. ver. 416.

We muſt obſerve one thing more for the better underſtanding of Cæſalpinus's doctrine, founded upon the principles of Ariſtotle, as he pretends. He would have this maxim, man and the ſun engender man (15), to ſignify, not that the adjunction of the Sun is neceſſary to the production of man, but that the Sun without the aid of man is a ſufficient cauſe of the production of man. He pretends that the matter of all ſublunary beings is only a paſſive power, which acquires all its actuality by the motion of the heavens (16). He gives to the moving Intelligence of the heavens the firſt formation of beings as the principal cauſe, and to the heavens as the inſtrumental cauſe (17). All this might eaſily agree with the doctrine which the ſect of the learned in China has embraced, that there is no other first principle than the material heaven, or the moſt ſubtile of its parts, which are as its efficient vertue. See what Father Aleoneſſa (18) has repreſented to the Pope.

(15) Cæſalp. Quæſt. Peripateticar. folio 105.

(16) Ibid. folio 105.

(17) Ibid. folio 109 verſo.

[C] His principles did not differ much from thoſe of Spinoza.] He admitted with Ariſtotle moving intelligences in the celeſtial ſpheres; but he reduced them all to one only ſubſtance: he admitted alſo Angels, or Dæmons; but he ſaid they were only particles of God united to a very ſubtil matter. Further, he pretended that the ſoul of man, and the ſoul of beaſts were portions of the ſubſtance of God: ſo that he acknowledged ſeveral Dæmons, and ſeveral ſouls, it was only with regard to the matter; for without matter he did not admit the plural number. Therefore, according to him, there was but one ſoul, but one human intelligence, which multiplied itſelf in proportion as men multiplied (19). The unity, which the Scotiſts acknowledged in the genus's and ſpecies, is at the bottom the ſame chimæra with that of Cæſalpinus (20): and it requires but little of a methodical genius to form thereupon the ſyſtem of Spinoza. Beſides, if Cæſalpinus had been a perfect Spinoſiſt, and yet had admitted, Dæmons in the manner they commonly are admitted, I ſhould not have wondered. I do not think there is any ſyſtem, which by following only the ideas of reaſon, can leſs avoid owning what is ſaid of good and bad angels amongſt the people, than the ſyſtem of Spinoza. Perhaps I may make a diſſertation thereon, ſome time or other, wherein I ſhall ſhew that by reaſoning conſequentially the Spinoziſts muſt lean more towards the owning than the not owning rewards and puniſhments after this life.

(19) See Voſſius, de Origine & Prog. Idololatriæ, lib. 2. cap. 40. pag. 531. edit. Francof. 1675.

(20) See the remark [C] of the article ABELARD.

[D] You may ſee below the titles of his writings.] Κάτοπτρον, ſive Speculum Artis Medicæ Hippocraticum. De plantis Libr. XVI (*). De Metallicis Libr. III. Queſtionum Medicarum Libr. II. De Medicamentorum facultatibus Libr. II. Praxis Univerſæ Medicinæ. Dæmonum Inveſtigatio. Peripatetica. Quæſtionum Peripateticarum Libr. V. Nicholas Taurel a Phyſician of Montbeliard has written againſt this laſt work (21), and has intitled his Book, Alpes cæſæ, hoc eſt Andreæ Cæſalpini monſtroſa dogmata diſcuſſa & excuſſa (22).

(*) See the note [A] of the additional article.

(21) It was printed at Venice by the Juntas, in 4to, in 1571, and afterwards in 1593. The Epiſtle Dedicatory is dated at Piſa, June 1, 1569.

(22) Teiſſier, Elog. tom. 2. pag. 330.

[To this Catalogue of his writings we muſt add the Appendix to his Books de Plantis. This little piece was printed at Rome, in 1603. The Preface is dated; Romæ. Die 19. Januarii. 1603. It is exceeding ſcarce. Bocconi has reprinted it, without Dedication or Preface, in his Muſeo di Piante Rare, p. 125, & ſeq. But this Author has added a few remarks at the end, which are contained in a letter to Sig. Battiſta Scarella, and in Scarella's anſwer.] ADDIT. REM.

[E] He knew the circulation of the blood.] Thus he ſpeaks in a paſſage in his works. Idcirco pulmo per venam arteriis ſimilem ex dextro cordis ventriculo fervidum hauriens ſanguinem, eumque per anaſtomoſim arteriæ venali reddens, quæ in ſiniſtrum cordis ventriculum tendit, tranſmiſſo interim aere frigido per aſperæ arteriæ canales, qui juxta arteriam venalem protenduntur, non tamen oſculis communicantes, ut putavit Galenus, ſolo tactu temperat. Huic ſanguinis circulationi ex dextro cordis ventriculo per pulmones in ſiniſtrum ejuſdem ventriculum optimè reſpondent ea quæ ex diſſectione apparent. Nam duo ſunt vaſa in dextrum ventriculum deſinentia, duo etiam in ſiniſtrum: Duorum autem unum intromittit tantùm, alterum educit, membranis eo ingenio conſtitutis (23). i. e. " The lungs drawing the warm " blood thro' a vein [the Pulmonary Artery] like the " arteries out of the right ventricle of the heart, " and returning it by an anaſtomoſis to the venal ar- " tery, [the Pulmonary Vein] which goes to the left " ventricle of the heart, the cool air being in the " mean time let in thro' the canals of the aſpera ar- " teria, which are extended along the venal artery, " but do not cummunicate with it by inoſculations, as " Galen imagined, cools it only by touching. To " this circulation of the blood out of the right ven- " tricle of the heart thro' the lungs into its left ven- " tricle what appears upon diſſection anſwers very well. For ſo clear, that they cannot be eluded by any evaſion.

(23) Cæſalp. Quæſt. Peripatetic. lib. 4. cap. 7. folio 125 verſo.

" For there are two veſſels, which end in the right " ventricle, and two in the left: but one only carries " the blood in, the other ſends it out, the membranes " being contrived for that purpoſe." What he ſays elſewhere (24) and which I content my ſelf with referring to, is no leſs particular. [The curious reader may find what Cæſalpinus has ſaid on this ſubject brought together in Dr. Douglas's Bibliographiæ Anatomicæ Specimen, Printed at London, in 1715. See the Article HARVEY [WILLIAM]. ADD. REM.

(24) Idem, Quæſt. Medicar. lib. 2. cap. 17. folio 234. edit. 1593.

☞CÆSALPINUS. To this account of Cæſalpinus by Mr. Bayle may be added, that he was one of the capital writers in Botany [A], and carried that Science to a greater degree

[A] He was one of the capital writers in Botany.] His ſixteen Books de Plantis, printed at Florence in 1583, in one volume 4to, are ſo ſcarce, and ſo little underſtood, that it may not be improper to give the reader ſome account of them. In the firſt Book he treats of Plants in general, of the ſtructure of their parts, of their generation and nutrition. He compares the ſeed of a Plant to the egg of an animal (1), and obſerves, that, as in an egg there is contained a little part, in which is a ſort of delineation of the future animal, the reſt ſerving only for nouriſhment: ſo in the ſeeds of Plants that part is the principal, whence the root and ſhoot proceed; for it is a ſort of little heart, and the reſt of the ſeed ſerves only to furniſh it with nouriſhment (2). He very plainly deſcribes the ſeed-leaves in theſe words; Reliqua ſeminis corpulentia in plurimis ex ſuo cortice tamquam ex ovo in lucem prodit, quæ in duo foliola pulpoſa explicata particulam oſtendit, unde germen erupturum eſt. Dr. Blair (3) aſcribes the diſcovery of this part to Joſephus de Aromatriis, who wrote above forty years after Cæſalpinus (4).

To this Author we owe the diſtribution of Plants into a regular method: for I cannot reckon thoſe methods which were taken from the time of year in which the Plants flowered, or from the order of the alphabet to deſerve that name. Geſner indeed, who was contemporary with Cæſalpinus, gives ſome hints, that he choſe to diſtinguiſh Plants by their flowers and ſeeds. Si ramulum, (ſays he (5), ficcum habes cum floribus, aut fructum etiam, cum opportunum fuerit, mitte. In ſeminibus enim & floribus ἀκριβέστατα pingendis valde ſum curioſus. And again, Molucca vel Conſtantinopolitana herba videtur ad Lamium vel Urticam mortuam quodammodo accedere, ſeminis tamen (unde ego maximè cognationes ſtirpium judicare ſoleo) figura differt, utpote triquetri (6). But whatſoever Geſner's intentions were, it is certain he went no farther, ſo that we muſt look upon Cæſalpinus as the Author of method in Botany. " That method, ſays he (7), which is formed on the " natural ſimilitude of Plants, is the moſt eaſy, the " moſt ſafe, and the moſt uſeful, both to help the memory, and to diſcover the virtues of Plants. It is " the moſt eaſy, becauſe thoſe diſtinctions which ariſe " from nature, are the moſt ſenſible and manifeſt; " and do not fail, like accidental differences, which " are not perpetual. It is of uſe to the memory, " becauſe by this means the almoſt immenſe number " of Plants is contained in a ſhort compaſs under regular claſſes, ſo that even thoſe, which were never " ſeen before, may eaſily be reduced to their proper " claſſes, and if they have not been named already, " may be called by the proper name of their family. " Laſtly, even the vertues, about which Phyſicians " are moſt ſollicitous, are pointed out by the knowledge of their ſtructure: for thoſe, which are of " the ſame claſs, for the moſt part have the ſame vertues." Qui autem ſecundum naturarum ſocietatem aſſignatur, omnium facillimus reperitur, tutiſſimus, utiliſſimuſque tum ad memoriam, tum ad facultates contemplandas: facillimus quidem, quoniam differentiæ ex ipſamet natura prodeuntes maximè ſenſibiles ſunt, & unicuique manifeſtæ: neque fallunt, ut adventitiæ conditiones, quæ non ſunt perpetuæ. Ad memoriam autem pollet, quoniam in compendio ſub generibus ordinatis clauditur penè immenſus plantarum numerus, adeo ut, & quæ antea nunquam viſæ ſunt, unicuique liceat in ſuam claſſem redigere, &, ſi innominata ſit, nomine ſui generis appellare. Tandem & facultates, quas Medici maximè quæruntur, tamquam proprietates innoteſcunt ex naturarum cognitione: quæ enim generis ſocietate junguntur, plerumque & ſimiles poſſident facultates. Let us ſee now what ſort of method this learned Author propoſed. His principal diviſion is into trees and herbs: the ſhrubs being joined with the trees; and the under ſhrubs with the herbs. The ſecond book contains thoſe trees which have the heart in the upper part of the ſeed; and the third thoſe which have it at the bottom, that is, where the ſeed is joined either to the foot ſtalk, or to the ſeed-veſſel. Having explained the trees and ſhrubs, he proceeds to the under-ſhrubs and herbs, and in the fourth Book, treats of thoſe which have only one ſeed to each flower, and this ſeed is either naked or covered either with a pulp, or a membranaceous ſubſtance, which eaſily comes off; and theſe are ſubdivided according to the poſition of the heart of the ſeed. Then he ſpeaks of thoſe which have ſeveral ſeeds to each flower; and theſe ſeeds are contained in one ſingle veſſel, which is either pulpy or of a drier ſubſtance. The fifth book contains thoſe which have a pulpy veſſel, and theſe are ſubdivided according to the poſition of the flower, which in ſome grows at the top, in others at the bottom of the veſſel. In the ſixth Book he treats of thoſe which have dry veſſels, and firſt of thoſe whoſe ſeeds are diſpoſed in oblong, cartilaginous veſſels, called pods, and hang only to one ſide of the pod, being connected by that part where the heart is, theſe are called Pulſe: ſecondly of thoſe, whoſe ſeeds are placed in the middle of the veſſel. The ſeventh Book contains thoſe which have two ſeeds to each flower. The flowers of theſe ſit on the top of the ſeeds, and their heart is in the upper part. In the eighth Book he places thoſe which have two veſſels to each flower; and thoſe which have three veſſels in the ninth. The tenth Book contains thoſe which he calls Bulbaceous. Theſe have leaves proceeding only from the root, without any foot-ſtalk, and naked, ſimple ſtalks. To theſe he adds the Aſphodels, Lilies, Flags, Satyrions &c. In the eleventh Book he ſpeaks of thoſe which have four ſeeds to each flower, without any common covering, except that which before covered the flower; and theſe are ſubdivided according to the poſition of the heart: which is placed in the upper part in Bugloſs, Borage, &c. and in the lower part, in Sage, Clary, Betony &c. Then follow thoſe which have ſeveral ſeeds of an uncertain number adhering to one bottom, and not covered with any veſſel, except that which covers the flower. The twelfth Book contains the Anthemides, under which name he comprehends the Wormwood, Tanſy, Colts-foot, Chamomile, Elecampane, &c. In the thirteenth Book he places the Cichoraceous Tribe, ſuch as Succory, Endive, Lettuce &c. to which he adds the Thiſtle kind. Thoſe of the twelfth and thirteenth book have the flower on the top of the ſeed; but in the fourteenth are contained thoſe which have their flowers at the bottom of the ſeeds. In the fifteenth book he treats of thoſe which have ſeveral ſeeds incloſed in veſſels; and in the ſixteenth and laſt of thoſe which are ſuppoſed to have no ſeeds at all. Such was the method laid down by this great man, which he had not only conceived, but actually made uſe of in diſpoſing plants. And yet, which is very ſurprizing, it was not followed, or even underſtood for near a hundred years. The Reſtorer of Method was Robert Moriſon, the firſt Profeſſor of Botany at Oxford. But this title would not ſatisfy Moriſon; he would be accounted nothing leſs than the inventor of it. Methodum, ſays he (8), me obſervaſſe fateor. Eſtque omnium, quæ unquam adhuc fuerunt exhibitæ præſtantiſſima & certiſſima: eſt quippe a natura data, a me ſolummodo (citra jactantiam) primum obſervata. And again, Nunquam ego legi de tali methodo apud Authores: ergo non eſſet nova; etiamſi fuit ab incunabilis mundi; ſed nemini adhuc detecta ante me (9). And in the Preface to his Umbelliferæ, he ſays, Hic eſt ordo a natura ipſa ſtirpibus ab initio datus, à me

(1) Cæſalp. de Plantis, lib. 1. cap. 5.

(2) Idem, ibid. cap. 6.

(3) Botanick Eſſays, pag. 332.

(4) His book, according to Dr. Blair, was printed in 1625.

(5) Geſn. Epiſt. ad Occonem, pag. 64. edit. Wolph.

(6) Idem, ibid. pag. 65.

(7) Cæſalp. Præfat. ad Lib. de Plantis.

(8) Moriſ. Prælud. Bot. pag. 464.

(9) Ibid. pag. 485.

(c) Micheli, in Syllabo Auctorum Novis Plantarum Generibus, præfixo.

degree of perfection, than any who had gone before him. We are informed by Signior Micheli (c), that the Hortus Siccus of Cæſalpinus is ſtill in being, and that it conſiſts of 266 large pages, on which are paſted 768 dried ſpecimens.

a me primo jam obſervatus. Nay at the beginning of the Preface to his Plantarum Hiſtoria Univerſalis Oxonienſis, he places Cæſalpinus amongſt the Authores de Re Botanica confuſe & ſine ordine ac methodo ſcribentes. But it is very plain that Cæſalpinus invented the claſſing of Plants, and that Moriſon borrowed moſt of his claſſes, or (as he calls them) ſections from that Author, and that whereſoever he has varied from the rules laid down by Cæſalpinus it has been for the worſe. We are indeed obliged to Moriſon for having firſt diſtinguiſhed the ſubaltern Genera, or families, by characteriſtic notes. See the article MORISON [ROBERT].

CÆSAR (CAIUS JULIUS) firſt Emperor of Rome, was endowed with all the eminent qualities, which are requiſite in a great Conqueror, and it would be wrong to think his ſucceſs was owing to fortune rather than to his conduct. He did not gain battles only to give employment to the couriers, who were to carry the news of his victories, but he made the beſt advantage of them that was poſſible, and this diſtinguiſhes him from a great many warlike Princes, who knew how to vanquiſh, but not how to improve their victory [A]. I don't doubt but he met with ſome circumſtances at Rome, which favoured

[A] His conduct . . . . diſtinguiſhes him from thoſe Princes, who know how to vanquiſh, but not how to improve their victory.] Theſe Princes may comfort themſelves, by conſidering, that one of the greateſt Warriors in the world (1) laboured under the ſame defect. Another conſideration, which may afford them ſome conſolation, is, that there are a great many Warriors ſubject to the ſame fault; for few victories are, as to their conſequences, like that which Guſtavus gained near Leipſic. We meet with ſuch victories now and then ſcatter'd here and there thro' the hiſtories of all ages and nations. We muſt except the wars waged by the firſt ſucceſſors of Mohammed, as thoſe of a Tamerlan, a Cingis-Can, and ſuch other Founders of great Empires, who appear three or four times within the ſpace of a thouſand years or thereabouts. Theſe being excepted, no battles can, by the advantages they procure, decide the diſputes of News-Writers. Each party claims the whole victory, or at leaſt pretends to enjoy the fruits of it. When one party cannot diſown that they loſt the field, yet they maintain that they had but few people killed, and that the dead and wounded on the enemy's ſide are numberleſs. The party, who routed the enemy are not ſatisfied with what is thus left to their ſhare; the vanquiſhed yield to them indeed the ſinging of the Te Deum, the pomp of triumphs, and the glory of bonfires; but they pretend that after all, this is nothing but ſmoke and an empty noiſe, without any real advantage; that they have more cauſe to ſing the De profundis, than the Te Deum; and that if they gain another victory at the ſame rate, they are loſt without retrieve. I ſay it again, they who remained maſters of the field of battle are not in the leaſt ſatisfied with this ſhare allotted to them by the vanquiſhed; they pretend that the whole advantage is every way on their ſide. The true means to determine theſe diſputes between the News-Writers would be, to act as conquerors after the battle. If they who renounce the name, but claim the reality of the victory, went immediately with fire and ſword into the enemy's country, the queſtion would be decided in their favour; but it would be determined to their ſhame, if the party, who claim both the name and reality of the victory, fell like a torrent upon their country, and made themſelves maſters of ſeveral ſtrong holds. In a word, we muſt apply to this, what an Apoſtle (2) ſays upon another ſubject, Faith without works is dead. You believe, that you have gained the victory; but what does that faith profit without works? Shew your faith by your works. It muſt be obſerved that neither party can ſay to the other, Thou haſt faith, and I have works, ſhew me then thy faith without thy works, and I will ſhew thee my faith by my works. It would be making a very wretched apology for thoſe Generals, who gaining the honour of the day, and the field of battle, taking the enemies Artillery, and making a great many priſoners, yet do not improve theſe advantages; to ſay, that they act with a wonderful generoſity; that they are ſatisfied with the honeſtum, without caring for the utile; that they do not make war like Merchants, in order to grow rich, but like Heroes, to gain a reputation, præter laudem nullius avari (3); this I ſay, would be a wretched apology; for in theſe matters, the utile is not different from the honeſtum, nothing is honourable but what is uſeful; nor can any thing better advance the glory of a great Warrior, than the diligence, ſpeed, and ſkill, with which he knows how to make an advantage of the enemy's overthrow, and to perform ſome great action, whilſt the enemy is ſtill frighten'd and amazed at his defeat. At Rome, where they had a perfect knowledge of the qualities belonging to a Warrior, they made a great difference between thoſe who only gained victories, and thoſe who put an end to a war (4). They who enter'd the city in triumph with the effigies of ſeveral Provinces, or of ſeveral cities they had conquered, were much more honoured than they, who could only boaſt that they had killed a great many men. The policy of the Romans, tho' defective in ſome particulars, was yet very wiſe; they did not, generally ſpeaking, continue their Generals for two or three years in their poſt; but almoſt every year the new Conſul went to relieve the Conſul of the foregoing year; ſo that the General did all that lay in his power to put an end to the war, leſt his ſucceſſor ſhould have the honour of finiſhing the taſk (5); they all aimed at the glory of the debellare. But when a General is certain that he ſhall command the armies to the end of the war, he is not always diſpoſed to haſten the concluſion of it; he puts off the peace as long as he can, and regulates his conduct according to this maxim, viz. that one muſt make a golden bridge for a vanquiſh'd enemy. This is no proof of ſuch a General's generoſity, or that he does not care for the utile; on the contrary, it is his private intereſt that obliges him to give the vanquiſhed enemy an opportunity of retrieving their affairs, and continuing the war a great while longer (6). A King, who commands his own armies in perſon, and does not make the beſt advantage of his victories, has not the ſame reaſon; and it may be ſuppoſed, that he commonly does what lays in his power. But a Cæſar, an Alexander, a Prince, in a word, who knows how to improve his victories, is a very ſcarce thing; and ſuch Generals, who gain victories, the whole profit of which is for the dealers in crapes and black-cloth, are found in every country.

The great Captain, whom I mentioned at the beginning of this remark, is Hannibal. Here follows what Adherbal told him. Dubium deinde non erat, quin ultimum illum diem habitura fuerit Roma; quintumque intra diem epulari Annibal in Capitolio potuerit, ſi (quod Pœnum illum dixiſſe Adherbalem Bomilcaris ferunt) Annibal, quemadmodum ſciret vincere, ſic uti victoria ſciſſet (7). i. e. "This would, no doubt, have been the "laſt day of Rome, and Annibal would have ſupped "in the Capitol within five days, had he known "how to improve his victory, as he knew how to van-"quiſh, as is reported, that Adherbal, the Carthagi-"nian and ſon of Bomilcar, told him." In Livy it is Maherbal, who ſeeing that Hannibal would not go directly to Rome, as he was adviſed to do, and tho' they aſſured him, that within five days he would ſup in the Capitol, told him, non omnia nimirum eidem Dei dederunt, vincere ſcis, Annibal, victoriâ uti neſcis (8). i. e. "The Gods have not favoured the ſame "men with all kinds of eminent qualities; thou know-"eſt how to vanquiſh, Hannibal, but not how to make "the beſt of thy victory." Antigonus obſerved the ſame fault in Pyrrhus (9).

(1) Hannibal; ſee the end of this remark.

(2) St. James ii. 20.

(3) Horat. De Art. Poet. ver. 324.

(4) That is, between vincere, and debellare.

(5) Finis habet laudem, meta coronat opus.

(6) This is generally the reaſon why battles are uſeleſs. The General of the victorious army being afraid of a peace, will not put the enemy under a neceſſity of ſuing for it.

(7) Florus, lib. 2. cap. 6.

(8) Livius, lib. 23. cap. 51.

(9) Plutarch. in Pyrrho, pag. 400. A. I quote his own words below, quotation (14).

ed his ambitious views; yet ſuch were his natural qualities, that he could procure to himſelf the neceſſary opportunities to accompliſh his deſigns [B], I mean, that he was capable of making an advantage even of ſuch circumſtances, which did not naturally favour his undertakings, or would have made thoſe of any other miſcarry. That activity, that vigilance, and that kind of eagerneſs which does not permit a man to grow remiſs, as long as there remains the leaſt thing to be done, were natural to him, and very proper to raiſe him to that pitch of glory at which he arrived [C]. The battle of Pharſalia, which was a deciſive ſtroke, and if I may ſay ſo, a decree from heaven pronounced upon the [B] He could procure to himſelf the neceſſary opportunities to accompliſh his deſigns.] It would be a great error to think, that Alexander owed his conqueſts only to the circumſtances of time and place, in which he happened to be, and that a great many other men would not have done leſs than he did, had they been in the like circumſtances (10). Here follows what Pâquier thought upon this ſubject. "I believe, ſays he (11), that Pope "Nicholas I deſerved the title of very-great, not be- "cauſe he had more wit than the Popes Leo I and "Gregory I (12), but becauſe his qualities both na- "tural and acquired were as eminent as theirs, and he "could ſucceed as well as they in what he attempted. "And beſides, he found himſelf in ſuch opportunities "as favoured the execution of his deſigns, and it is "that, which makes us appear great in the eyes of "men. For we ought not to think, that Pyrrhus or "Hannibal had leſs bravery or conduct than Alexan- "der of Macedonia, or Julius Cæſar. But when the "two firſt attacked the Commonwealth of Rome, it "was not yet in a proper condition to be ſhaken by "the blow, for a great many reaſons, as it was in "Cæſar's time, and as the Kingdom of Aſia was, "when Alexander conquered it; nor do I doubt in "the leaſt, but if Leo and Gregory had lived in the "time of Pope Nicholas, when the affairs of the "Church were in a wretched condition, they had "done what he did; and he in their time had done "what they did, and nothing more." If Pâquier had treated only of the general theſis, what he ſays would have been as certain, as any mechanical aphoriſm. Suppoſe on the one hand two men endowed with the ſame qualities, and on the other the ſame circumſtances concurring, it is evident, that what will be the reſult on one ſide, will be the like on the other. When I ſay, the ſame qualities, and the ſame circumſtances, I do not mean, things, which are the ſame in number, but things, which all compenſations being allowed, are equivalent. This being ſuppoſed, it is as neceſſary for Pyrrhus to ſubdue Rome in the ſame manner Cæſar did, as it is, that two weights be in equilibrium, when the one being three times leſs than the other, is alſo three times more diſtant from the point which ſupports the ſcale, or leaver. The general theſis therefore is certainly true, but the hypotheſis or application of it to the caſe of Pyrrhus and Cæſar, and of Pope Leo and Pope Nicholas is doubtful; becauſe we do not exactly know the proportions there were between their natural qualities, and between the opportunities they had. The hints we meet with in Hiſtory will rather confute than confirm Pâquier's aſſertion. The compliment paid to Hannibal is well known, namely, that the Gods granted him the gift of gaining victories, but refuſed him that of making the beſt advantage of them (13). It is known alſo, that when this was ſaid to him, he had juſt neglected to improve the moſt favourable opportunity he could have of taking Rome. It is known, that Pyrrhus, in the opinion of a great Warrior, was like thoſe gameſters, who by chance have a fine game, but do not know how to play it (14). Here then we have two great Captains, who were both inferior to Alexander and Cæſar; theſe laſt knew perfectly well how to make the beſt advantage of the opportunities they met with; the event witneſſes for them; and we have in favour of the others nothing but bare conjectures, which even are greatly weakened by the faults they committed. We are not therefore to think, that Pâquier reaſoned well.

I believe that there are men unknown, who if they were in the place of a Prime-Miniſter, would perform greater actions than he does; and that a Prime-Miniſter, who does not ſucceed in one age, would have done wonders in another (15); and yet I am perſuaded, that if Pyrrhus or Hannibal had ventured to ſay, that Alexander would not have done in Italy, what he did in Aſia, the beſt anſwer that would have been made to them, is, that they would not have done in Aſia what he did there. A certain inhabitant of Seriphus told Themiſtocles once, You are become famous not by your ſelf, but by the glory of your Country. It is true, anſwered Themiſtocles, I had not become famous, had I been born at Seriphus, but you would not have become famous, tho' you had been born at Athens (16). Such an anſwer may be made to thoſe, who find no other difference between Cæſar or Alexander, and any Prince they may meet with in hiſtory, but that ſuch a Prince had not an opportunity of conquering a great Empire, as Cæſar or Alexander had. Theſe perſons muſt be told, Without ſuch an opportunity neither Cæſar nor Alexander had conquered an Empire; but the Prince you name would not have conquered one, even with ſuch an opportunity. See in the following remark ſome other of Cæſar's warlike qualities.

[C] Activity, vigilance and a kind of eagerneſs . . . were natural in him . . . and very proper to raiſe him to that pitch of glory to which he arrived.] Theſe great qualities occaſioned that great encomium, which we meet with in one of Tully's Orations. That encomium indeed is ſomewhat hyperbolical, but yet is not entirely ill-grounded. Here follows what that celebrated Orator ſaid to that great warrior. Soleo ſæpe ante oculos ponere, idque libenter crebris uſurpare ſermonibus, omnes noſtrorum imperatorum, omnes exterarum gentium, potentiſſimorumque populorum, omnes clariſſimorum Regum res geſtas, cum tuis nec contentionum magnitudine, nec numero prœliorum, nec varietate regionum, nec celeritate conficiendi, nec diſſimilitudine bellorum poſſe conferri; nec vero diſjunctiſſimas terras citius cujuſquam paſſibus potuiſſe peragrari, quam tuis non dicam curſibus, ſed victoriis illuſtratæ ſunt (17. i. e. "I often conſi- "der by myſelf, and even mention it with pleaſure "in my diſcourſes, that none of the actions of our "Generals, nor thoſe of foreign countries, nor of "the moſt powerful nations, nor thoſe of the moſt "famous Kings, can be compared to yours, either "conſidering the great wars in which you were en- "gaged, the number of battles you fought, the dif- "ferent countries in which you made war, the diſ- "patch with which you put an end to them, or the "different kinds of the wars themſelves. Nor could "any one travel over diſtant countries faſter than "you have, I do not ſay, run over them, but ren- "dered them famous by your victories." Never did any warrior underſtand better than Cæſar, how neceſſary it is for a General to be quick (18). How often did he owe his victories to his ſpeedy marches? He did not give the enemy time to come to themſelves, nor to take any meaſures againſt him; he run like lightning, prevented fame itſelf, and fell upon the enemy like thunder, before they knew his army had marched. Acie triplici inſtructa, & celeriter octo millium itinere confecto prius ad hoſtium caſtra pervenit, quam quid ageretur Germani ſentire poſſent. Qui omnibus rebus ſubito perterriti, & celeritate adventus noſtri, & diſceſſu ſuorum, neque conſilii habendi, neque arma capiendi, ſpatio dato, perturbantur, copiaſne adverſus hoſtem ducere, an caſtra defendere, an fugâ ſalutem petere præſtaret (19). i. e. "Having divided his army "into three bodies, and march'd eight miles in a very "ſhort time, he arrived at the enemy's camp, before "the Germans could know what paſſed; who being "terrified by all this, by our ſudden arrival, and by "the retreat of ſome of their party, and having no "time either to ſummon the Council, or to take up "arms, they did not know, whether they had better "march out againſt the enemy, or defend themſelves "in

(10) See the remark [B] in the article of MACEDONIA.

(11) Pâquier, Recherches de la France, lib. 3. chap. 11. pag. 198.

(12) Theſe two Popes had the ſirname of Great.

(13) See above, quotation (7).

(14) Ὅθεν ἀπίκαζε αὐτὸν ὁ Ἀντίγονος κυβευτῇ, πολλὰ βάλλοντι καὶ καλὰ, χρῆσθαι δὲ οὐκ ἐπισταμένῳ τοῖς πίσυσι. i. e. "Hence Antigonus compares him to a gameſter, who throws very good dice, but does not know how to make a good uſe of the throw." Plutarch. in Pyrrho, pag. 400.

(15) Quantum intereſt in quæ tempora, cujuſque virtus inciderit. i. e. "It is of great conſequence at what time a man's qualities do appear," this is what Metellus ſaid of Scipio Africanus.

(16) Plutarch. in Themiſt. pag. 121.

(17) Cicero Oratione pro Marcello.

(18) Ut celeritate reliquas res conficeret, quæ plerasque erat conſecutus. Cæſ. de Bell. Gall. lib. 7. cap. 15. Unum communi ſalutis auxilium in celeritate ponebat; venit magnis itineribus in Nerviorum fines. Idem, ibid. lib. 4.

(19) Idem, ibid.

the civil wars of Rome, did not fill him with joy to ſuch a degree, as to make him forget that Pompey, the head of the oppoſite party, was ſtill alive, and that there would not be ſo ſoon an end of the war, if he gave his enemy time to gather his diſperſed forces together again: his firſt care therefore was to purſue his flying enemy, which was the cauſe of Pompey's tragical death; for in all probability they would not have killed him, if they had not been certain that Cæſar purſued him. When we take a general view of the many

" in their camp, or fly to ſave their lives." Nothing could ſtop Cæſar's march; the mountains covered with ſnow deceived thoſe, who thought they would be a ſafe bulwark againſt his approaches. Etſi Mons Gebenna (α) Arvernos ab Helviis diſcludit, duriſſimo tempore anni altiſſima nive iter impediebat; tamen diſcuſſa nive ſex in altitudinem pedum, atque ita viis patefactis ſummo militum labore ad fines Arvernorum pervenit; quibus oppreſſis inopinantibus, quod ſe ſic Gebenna ut muro munitos exiſtimabant, ac ne ſingulari quidem unquam homini eo tempore anni ſemitæ patuerant &c. (20). i. e. " Tho' Mount Gebenna, which ſeparates the Arverni " (β) from the Helvii (γ), and was covered with ſnow " very deep, it being in the midſt of winter, ſtopt his " journey, yet he had the ſnow ſwept on both ſides, " tho' it was ſix foot high, and having thus made a " way with the utmoſt difficulty, he arrived upon the " borders of the Arverni, and falling unawares upon " them, he routed them entirely; for they thought " themſelves ſecure behind Mount Gebenna, over which " even a ſingle man could not paſs in that ſeaſon." Being thus arrived upon the borders of Auvergne, he continued there but two days, and went with the ſame ſpeed to another place, in order to prevent the deſigns of Vercingetorix from taking effect. His conſtitutis rebus, omnibus ſuis inopinantibus, quam maximis poteſt itineribus Viennam pervenit, ibi nactus recentem Equitatum, quem multis ante diebus ei præmiſerat, neque diurno, neque nocturno itinere intermiſſo, per fines Heduorum, in Lingones contendit, ubi duæ Legiones hyemabant, ut ſi quid etiam de ſua ſalute ab Heduis iniretur conſilii, celeritate præcurreret. Eò cum perveniſſet, ad reliquas Legiones mittit, priuſque in unum locum omnes cogit, quam de ejus adventu Arvernis nunciari poſſet (21). i. e. " Having given " theſe orders, he greatly ſurprized his army, by going with the utmoſt ſpeed to Vienne (δ), where " meeting a freſh body of horſe, which ſeveral days " before he had ſent there, he continued his march " thro' the borders of the country of Hedui (ι), reſting " neither day nor night, and came into the country " of the Lingones (ζ), where two legions were left in " winter quarters, that in caſe the Hedui had any " deſign againſt his life, he might prevent them by his " ſpeedy marches. Being arrived there, he ſent for " the other legions, and had them all aſſembled in " one place, before the Arverni could hear of his arrival." Plutarch relates a very ſurprizing circumſtance of Vercingetorix's defeat; the city of Alexia being beſieged by Cæſar, the inhabitants expected with the utmoſt impatience that Vercingetorix at the head of three hundred thouſand men would come to raiſe the ſiege; they did not know that Cæſar was in full march to engage that great army; nor did he hear any thing of it, but when from their walls they perceived him returning to the ſiege in triumph; and it was their loud cries and heavy complaints which firſt acquainted the ſoldiers, who were left to guard the intrenchments, with Cæſar's victory (22). This laſt circumſtance is ſtill more ſurprizing as Plutarch obſerves. He is alſo in the right, when he ſays, that Vercingetorix's (ν) great Army vaniſhed away like a dream and a ſhadow (23). This expreſſes extremely well the diſpatch, with which Cæſar performed the greateſt undertakings: he marched if there was occaſion, a hundred miles a day; he ſwam over rivers, or croſſed them upon leather budgets, and thus arrived before the enemy was acquainted with his march. Longiſſimas vias incredibili celeritate confecit expeditus, meritoriâ Rhedâ centena paſſuum millia in ſingulos dies: ſi flumina morarentur, nando trajiciens, vel innixus inflatis utribus, ut perſæpè nuncios de ſe præ-venire (24). If I have compared him to the lightning, it is after the example of Florus: Hunc (Pharnacem) Cæſar aggreſſus, ſays he (25), uno, & ut ſic dixerim, non toto prælio obtrivit, MORE FULMINIS, quod uno eodemque momento venit, percuſſit, abſceſſit. Nec vana de ſe prædicatio eſt Cæſaris, ante victum hoſtem eſſe quam viſum. i. e. " Cæſar having attacked him " (Pharnaces) ſlew him in one, and if I may ſay ſo, " even not compleat battle; and LIKE LIGHTNING, " in one and the ſame moment he came, routed, and " retired. So that what Cæſar ſaid of himſelf was " not ill grounded, viz. that the enemy was vanquiſhed " before he was ſeen." Suetonius ſpeaks thus of the quickneſs with which Pharnaces was defeated. Pontico triumpho inter pompæ fercula trium verborum prætulit titulum, VENI, VIDI, VICI, non acta belli ſignificantem ſicut cæteri, ſed celeriter confecti notam (26). i. e. " In his triumph over Pontus, there were carried a- " mongſt the triumphal ornaments a bill in which " theſe words were written, I CAME, I SAW, I VAN- " QUISHED; which did not expreſs the actions per- " formed in that war (the Pontic) but that it was fi- " niſhed with the utmoſt expedition." According to Plutarch, Cæſar wrote theſe three words, veni, vidi, vici, to a friend, to let him know in how ſhort a time that war was finiſhed (27). Cicero, even when he ſpoke of Cæſar like an enemy, yet conſidered him as a man of prodigious diſpatch and vigilance, ſed hoc τέρας horribili vigilantia, celeritate, & diligentia eſt (28). Let me beg leave to tranſcribe in this place the fine encomium he paſſed upon him in his Oration againſt Piſo. He ſays that Cæſar's great actions will for the future render uſeleſs and ſuperfluous thoſe bulwarks, with which nature had ſurrounded Italy. I wiſh he had rather ſaid this of Cæſar's courage and diſpatch: Dicam ex animo, Patres conſcripti, quod ſentio, & quod vobis audientibus ſæpè jam dixi, ſi mihi nunquam amicus C. Cæſar fuiſſet, ſemper iratus, ſi aſpernaretur amicitiam meam, ſeſeque mihi implacabilem inexpiabilemque præberet, tamen ei, cum tantas res geſſiſſet, gereretque quotidie, non amicus eſſe non poſſem: cujus ego imperio non Alpium vallum contra adſcenſum, tranſgreſſionemque Gallorum, non Rheni foſſam gurgitibus illis redundantem, Germanorum immaniſſimis gentibus objicio & oppono; perfecit ille, ut, ſi montes reſediſſent, amnes exaruiſſent, non naturæ præſidio, ſed victoria ſua, rebuſque geſtis Italiam munitam haberemus (29). i. e. " I ſhall ſay freely what I think, Conſcript Fathers, " and what I have often ſaid before you; tho' Cæſar " had never been my friend, tho' he had always been " exaſperated againſt me, tho' he had deſpiſed my " friendſhip, and ſhewed himſelf my implacable ene- " my, yet could I not forbear being his friend, for " the great actions he has done, and ſtill does every " day. Under his government I think we have no " occaſion for the Alps as a bulwark againſt the inva- " ſion of the Gauls; nor for the Rhine with all its " falls to prevent the incurſions of the fierce Ger- " mans. Though the mountains ſhould ſink to a le- " vel, and the rivers ſhould be dried up, Cæſar's vic- " tories and great actions are alone ſufficient to guard " Italy."

That great activity of Cæſar was not a fire which ſoon exhauſted his ſtrength; it was attended with a conſtant application. He reckoned for nothing what he had done, as long as there remained any thing to be done; he would not leave unfiniſhed the wars which he undertook, thinking it would be giving fortune an opportunity of deſtroying what he ſhould thus leave incomplete. This is nobly expreſſed in the following lines.

At nunquam patiens pacis, longæque quietis
Armorum, nequid fatis mutare liceret,
Aſſequitur, generique premit veſtigia Cæſar.
Sufficerent aliis primo tot mœnia curſu
Rapta, tot oppreſſæ dejectis hoſtibus Arces,
Ipſa caput mundi, bellorum maxima merces,
Roma capi facilis; ſed Cæſar in omnia præceps,
Nil actum credens, dum quid ſupereſſet agendum (30).

That is,

" But Cæſar never patient long in peace,
" Nor truſting in his fortune's preſent face,

" Cloſely

(α) In Grævius's edition of Cæſar's Commentaries it is written Cebenna. They are the Mountains of the Sevennes. CRIT. REM.

(20) Idem, ibid. lib. 7. cap. 8.

(β) The Averni lived in that part of France now called Auvergne. CRIT. REM.

(γ) The Helvii inhabited the country, were the Albigenſes afterwards lived; it is in the Upper-Languedoc. CRIT. REM.

(21) Idem, cap. 9.

(δ) In Dauphiné.

(ι) Their capital city was Anguſtodanum, now called Autun, in the Dutchy of Burgundy.

(ζ) Their capital city was Andomatrinum, now Langres in Champaign.

(22) Plutarch, in Cæſar. pag. 721.

(ν) Plutarch writes Veſcingentorix, but in Cæſar it is Vercingetorix.

(23) Ὄυτως ἐξέπεσε ἡ τοσαύτη δύναμις ὥσπερ ἔνδωλον, ἢ ὄνειρον ἠφάνισε καὶ διεσκέδασε.

(24) Suetonius in Cæſar, cap. 57.

(25) Florus, lib. 4. cap. 2. n. 63.

(26) Sueton. in Cæſare, cap. 37.

(27) Plutarch. in Cæſare, pag. 73, E.

(28) Cic. Epiſt. ad Attic. lib. 9. 8.

(29) Cicero, in Piſon. fol. 225, C.

(30) Lucan. Pharſ. lib. 2. ver. 650.

many wars which he gloriously finished, it is impossible not to admire him; but when we reflect upon the prodigious number of men, whose poverty, slavery, or death he occasioned, it is difficult not to abhor him [D]. The greatest crime there is in all this, is, that to be revenged of his private enemies, which nothing but his too ambitious conduct raised him, he oppressed his own country with those very arms, with which his superiors had intrusted him in order to subdue the enemies of his country. We cannot but regret, that a man, who was endowed with so many excellent qualities, should have been guilty of such an enormous attempt. He was not less qualified for intrigues than for the field [E], nor " Closely pursues his flying son behind,

" While yet his fate continued to be kind.
" Such towns, such fortresses, such hostile force,
" Swept in the torrent of one rapid course;
" Such trains of long success attending still,
" And Rome herself abandon'd to his will;
" Rome the contending party's noble prize,
" To every wish, but Cæsar's, might suffice.
" But he with Empire fired and vast desires,
" To all, and nothing less than all, aspires;
" To all, and nothing less than all, aspires;
" He reckons not the past, while ought remain'd
" Great to be done, or mighty to be gain'd.
ROWE.

He thought that the enemy was to be closely pressed in those happy moments, when fortune smiled upon him.

(31) Idem, lib. 7. ver. 34.

Dum fortuna calet, dum conficit omnia terror (31).
That is,
" —While his glowing fortune yet was warm,
" And scatt'ring terror spread the wild alarm.
ROWE.

Hence it happened, that he never gained a battle, but he made himself master of the enemy's camp; Nullum unquam hostem fudit, quin castris quoque exueret; ita nullum spatium perterritis dabat (32), never giving the enemy time to recover from their fright. He did not imitate Pompey, who to spare the blood of his soldiers, lost the opportunity of finishing the war (33). Nothing could stop him. An enemy half subdued did not less raise his courage, than one who still could fight with all his forces. The reader will see his character in the following verses.

(32) Suetonius, in Cæsare, cap. 40.

(33) Dolet tuus, semperque dolebit; Quod scelerum Cæsar prodest tibi summa tuorum, Cum genero pugnasse pio. Lucan. lib. 6. ver. 303.

. . . . Sed non in Cæsare tantum
Nomen erat, nec fama ducis; sed nescia virtus
Stare loco, solusque pudor non vincere bello.
Acer & indomitus; quò spes, quoque ira vocasset,
Ferre manum, & nunquam temerando parcere ferro.
Successus urgere suos: instare favori
Numinis: impellens quicquid sibi summa petenti
Obstaret: gaudensque viam fecisse ruina (34).
That is,
" But Cæsar's greatness, and his strength, was more
" Than past renown, and antiquated pow'r;
" 'Twas not the fame of what he once had been,
" Or tales in old Records and Annals seen.
" But 'twas a valour, restless, unconfin'd,
" Which no success could sate, nor limits bind;
" 'Twas shame, a soldier's shame, untaught to yield,
" That blush'd for nothing but an ill-fought field.
" Fierce in his hopes he was, nor knew to stay,
" Where vengeance or ambition led the way;
" Still prodigal of war whene'er withstood,
" Nor spar'd to stain the guilty sword with blood;
" Urging advantage he improv'd all odds,
" And made the most of fortune and the Gods;
" Pleas'd to o'erturn whate'er withheld his prize,
" And saw the ruin with rejoicing eyes. ROWE.

(34) Idem, lib. 1. ver. 143.

[D] When we reflect upon the prodigious number of men, whose . . . death he occasioned, it is difficult not to abhor him.] He fought in Gaul against three millions of men, of whom one million only escaped: for he killed a million of them, and took a million of prisoners, according to Plutarch's account (35). We meet with the same account in Appian, with regard to the number of the slain and of the prisoners, but not with regard to the number of the enemies; for they were four millions, according to him (36); he adds, that Cæsar took above eight hundred towns in Gaul. Plutarch says the same. But Cæsar, in the Oration, which Julian the Apostate makes him deliver (37), mentions but three hundred towns taken, and two millions of men vanquished. Velleius Paterculus, who designed to extol rather than to lessen this Conqueror's glory, reckons however but four hundred thousand men killed (38). It is true that in the foregoing chapter he had said, that the slain and the prisoners were innumerable. Cum deinde immanes res vix multis voluminibus explicandas C. Cæsar in Gallia ageret, nec contentus plurimis ac felicissimis victoriis, innumerabilibusque cæsis & captis hostium millibus (39). That is,
" Whilst Cæsar performed in Gaul such wonderful " Actions, that they could hardly be recorded in a " great many volumes, he being not satisfied with the " many and happy victories he had gained, nor with
" the innumerable thousands of men slain or taken " prisoners." Pliny goes beyond any another writer; for he makes the number of the slain to be one million one hundred ninety two thousand; but then he takes into the account all Cæsar's wars, except the civil war. Let us transcribe his own words, we find in them, that Cæsar fought fifty battles. Signis collatis quinquagesies dimicavit; solus M. Marcellum transgressus, qui undequadragesies dimicaverat. Nam præter civiles victorias undecies centena & XCII M. hominum occisa præliis ab eo non equidem in gloria posuerim, tantam etiam coactam humani generis injuriam, quod ita esse confessus est ipse, bellorum civilium stragem non prodendo (40). Salmasius pretends that these words are unintelligible, and that they must be thus corrected, tanta etiam coacta, in humani generis injuria (41); Pliny's meaning according to him is this; I am so far from thinking it is glorious for Cæsar, to have slain such a vast number of men, that I rather believe, it would have been a great prejudice to mankind, if such a number of persons had been gathered together from several parts of the world. F. Hardouin did not think proper to mention this piece of criticism; he only observed that there is no difficulty in the passage before us. " Pliny, says he, means, that " he did not think, that a slaughter so prejudicial to " mankind added any thing to the glory of Cæsar, " tho' it might seem perhaps, that the injuries Cæsar " received, obliged him to destroy such a multitude " of men (42)." It is plain that the Jesuit's explication is infinitely better than that of Salmasius. Yet I cannnot believe, that Pliny intended to hint the excuse, which Father Hardouin mentions in behalf of Cæsar. For Cæsar could not make use of that excuse but with regard to his war with Pompey, and to the other wars, which were the consequence of this. But Pliny says expressly, that the million and hundred ninety two thousand men, which Cæsar killed in his battles, were different from those he slew in the civil wars: it is not probable therefore, that Pliny hinted at what F. Hardouin supposes. I should rather think, that Pliny's sense is this. The slaughter of one million one hundred ninety two thousand men is so considerable a loss for mankind, that I could not think it glorious, even tho' it were done out of necessity, as it is in defensive wars. And since Cæsar suppressed the slaughter occasioned by the civil wars, he must have acknowledged the truth of my proposition. This thought is very much to the honour of Pliny, and I could name several great Warriors who upon their death-bed dreaded the judgment of God, when they considered how much blood had been spilt in the religious wars, which they thought very just, and of which they had the direction (43). The necessity under which Princes are of doing certain actions must make us think them unhappy rather than loaded with honour.

(35) Plutarch. in Cæsare, pag. 714, 715.
(36) Appian. in Celticis.

(37) Julian. in Cæsarib. See Spanheim's edit. 4to, pag. 172.

(38) Per hæc, insequentiaque & quæ prædiximus tempora, amplius quadringenta millia hostium a C. Cæsare cæsa sunt, plura capta. Velleius Paterc. lib. 2. cap. 47. Lipsius reads octingenta instead of quadringenta, and P. Hardouin in Plin. lib. 7. cap. 25. pretends that Paterculus spoke of forty thousand only. Amplius xl millium hominum a C. Cæsare cæsa esse.

(39) Paterc. lib. 2. cap. 46.

(40) Plin. lib. 7. cap. 25.

(41) Salmas. in Solinum, pag. 49.

[E] He was not less qualified for intrigues than for the field.] No man could on occasion make a better use of hypocrisy and flattery (44) than Cæsar. He knew so well how to make an interest for the Office of Pontifex Maximus, that he carried it against two very illustrious competitors (45), who were much older than he, and

(42) Quærit Salmasius, pag. 49. qui hæc verba sibi explanet; non opus est vate in re planissima. Ait Plinius minime se in laude aliqua positurum occisa tot hominum millia, ob tantam humani generis cladem: licet ad hanc inferendam coactus videri fortassis aliena injuria queat. Harduinus, in Plinium, lib. 7. cap. 25.

(43) See in the article of the Duke of Weimar what we shall say of William I Prince of Orange. N. B. Mr. Bayle has not given that article of the Duke of Weimar.

(44) Appian. lib. 2. Belli Civil. p. m. 227.

(45) Q. Lutatius Catulus, and P. Servilius Isauricus.

(a) Plutarch. in Cæſare, pag. 708. Sueton. in Cæſare, cap. 55.
(b) See the titles of them in Sueton. in Cæſare, cap. 55, 56.

nor had he leſs wit than courage [F]. He was very learned, and ſo eloquent, that nothing but the eager deſire he had of being the firſt in the government of the State, could prevent his diſputing the firſt rank amongſt the moſt famous Orators (a). Two of his works are ſtill extant [G]: the reſt, which were pretty numerous, are loſt (b). If he was an Epicurean, it was only in practice, for tho' he indulged himſelf in ſenſual pleaſures (c), yet he performed ſeveral religious acts, and it would be wronging of him to conſider him as an

(c) See Sueton. in Cæſare, cap. 49, & ſeq.

and more commendable for the good they had done their country. His high ſpirit and natural pride became ſo pliable, that he could ſtoop to the moſt unworthy flatteries towards thoſe, who were capable of ſerving him (46), and the better to compaſs his deſigns, he bethought himſelf of a very good expedient, which was to borrow large ſums of money, in order to buy the people's votes. By which means he won the poor as well as the rich; the former, becauſe they thought themſelves under an obligation to ſupport the intereſt of one, who had given them ſo much money; and the latter becauſe they feared, that they ſhould never be paid, if Cæſar's deſigns happen'd to miſcarry (47). And indeed he would have been obliged to leave the city, and to break, had he not been choſen Pontifex Maximus; wherefore he told his mother, when he went to the place of election, You ſhall ſee me to day either Pontifex Maximus or baniſhed (48). Can there be a more cunning device than that, which he made uſe of, in order that his abſence might not be prejudicial to him? He chained down, if I may ſay ſo, thoſe who were choſen to fill up the employments in the State; for by his intrigues and by his credit, he found means to have all them excluded, who would not promiſe to ſupport him in his abſence. So that the only means to obtain any poſt by his recommendation, was to eſpouſe his cauſe, and to promiſe him, in a manner, a blind ſubmiſſion. Nor was he always contented with a verbal promiſe; for he required from ſome an oath, and a promiſe in writing. Was it difficult to foretel, that a Commonwealth, in which ſuch diſorders reigned, could not ſubſiſt long? Ad ſecuritatem ergo poſteri temporis in magno negotio habuit, obligare ſemper annuos magiſtratus, & e petitoribus non alios adjuvare, aut ad honorem pati pervenire, quam qui ſibi recepiſſent propugnaturos abſentiam ſuam, cujus pacti non dubitavit a quibuſdam jusjurandum atque etiam ſyngraphum exigere (49). Sylla had a good foreſight, when yielding to the repeated ſollicitations of ſeveral perſons of quality, he repreſented to them, that they would one time or other repent, for having prevailed with him not to diſpatch that young man, who concealed in his breaſt a great many Marius's. Satis conſtat Syllam cum deprecantibus amicis & ornatiſſimis viris aliquamdiu denegaſſet, atque illi pertinaciter contenderent, expugnatumque tandem proclamaſſe, (ſive divinitus, ſive aliqua conjectura) vincerent, ac ſibi haberent; dummodo ſcirent eum, quem incolumem tanto opere cuperent, quandoque optimatium partibus, quas ſecum ſimul defendiſſent, exilio futurum; nam Cæſari multos Marios ineſſe (50).

(46) Dio, lib. 37.
(47) Appian. lib. 2. Bell. Civil.
(48) Plutarch. in Cæſare, pag. 710. D. Suetonius ſpeaks thus in Cæſar's Life, cap. 13. Pontificatum maximum petiit, non ſine profuſiſſima largitione, in quâ reputans magnitudinem æris alieni cum mane ad Comitia deſcenderet, prædixiſſe Matri oſculanti fertur, Domum ſe niſi Pontificem non reverſurum.
(49) Sueton. in Cæſare, cap. 23.
(50) Idem, ibid. cap. 1.

[F] Nor had he leſs wit than courage.] I ſhall quote Pliny's words to repreſent the vaſt extent and activity of that great genius. Animi vigore præſtantiſſimum arbitror genitum Cæſarem Dictatorem. Nec virtutem conſtantiamque nunc commemoro, nec ſublimitatem omnium capacem, quæ cœlo continentur; ſed proprium vigorem celeritatemque quodam igne volucrem. Scribere aut legere, ſimul dictare & audire ſolitum accepimus. Epiſtolas verò tantarum rerum quaternas pariter librariis dictare, aut ſi nihil aliud ageret, ſeptenas (51). That is, "In my opinion Cæſar the Dictator had a very great "ſtrength of mind: I do not ſpeak now of his cou"rage and conſtancy, nor of his exalted genius, which "could comprehend all heavenly things; but of his "extended and ſprightly genius quick like fire. He "was uſed, as we have been told, to write or read, "and at the ſame time to dictate to others or hear "them read: he alſo could dictate four different Let"ters at once upon the moſt important affairs, or even "ſeven, if he was not otherways buſy." With regard to his courage and intrepidity ſee Suetonius (52).

(51) Plinius, lib. 7. cap. 25.
(52) Sueton. in Cæſare, cap. 60, & ſeq. See alſo Val. Max. lib. 3. cap. 2. num. 19.

[G] Two of his works are ſtill extant.] Namely ſeven Books of the War in Gaul, and three Books of the civil War. They are properly only Memoirs; but they are written in a very clear ſtyle, and with all thoſe unaffected beauties, with which a man, of Cæſar's happy genius, could adorn a work of this kind; which he compoſed in haſte (53), and without much care. We might eaſily take for a flattering elogium, what Hirtius ſays of it, if we did not meet ſuch an elogium in a work, in which Cicero did not deſign to write a panegyric upon Cæſar, as he has done in ſome of his Orations (54). Conſtat inter omnes nihil tam operoſe ab aliis eſſe perfectum, quod non horum elegantia Commentariorum ſuperetur; qui ſunt editi ne ſcientia tantarum rerum geſtarum ſcriptoribus deſit, adeoque probantur omnium judicio, ut præcepta non præbita facultas ſcriptoribus videatur. i. e. "It is confeſſed that "the elegancy of theſe Commentaries is far beyond "all that others have written with the utmoſt care and "labour; they have been publiſhed, that other wri"ters may not be ignorant of ſo many glorious ac"tions; but they are ſo generally eſteemed, that they "ſeem calculated rather to deter other writers from "ſpending their labours upon the ſame ſubject, than "to afford them matter for their lucubrations." Theſe are Hirtius's words (55). Thoſe of Cicero are as follow. Commentarios quoſdam ſcripſit rerum ſuarum, valde ... probandos: nudi enim ſunt, recti, & venuſti, omni ornatu orationis tanquam veſte detracta: ſed dum voluit alios habere parata, unde ſumerent, qui vellent ſcribere hiſtoriam, ineptis gratum fortaſſe fecit, qui voluntillacalamiſtris inurere; ſanos quidem homines à ſcribendo deterruit: nihil enim eſt in hiſtoria pura & illuſtri brevitate dulcius (56). i. e. "He wrote ſome "Commentaries of his own actions, which are very "valuable; for they are plain, faithful, and elegant; "free from all the borrowed ornaments of eloquence; "but whilſt he would afford materials to thoſe, who "intended to write hiſtory, he has perhaps done a "kindneſs to ſuch impertinent authors, as would af"fect to write in a bombaſtic ſtyle; but at the ſame "time he has deterred men of ſenſe from writing; "for there is nothing more agreeable than a clear, no"ble, and conciſe ſtyle." The opinion of Cicero and Hirtius concerning Cæſar's Commentaries, has not been generally received; for we learn from Suetonius, that Aſinius Pollio found too great a careleſneſs, and ſeveral untruths in theſe Commentaries, either becauſe Cæſar believed the falſe accounts that were given him, or becauſe ſelf-love or want of memory made him relate ſeveral falſhoods with regard to thoſe actions, which he had performed himſelf. Pollio added, that he thought, Cæſar intended to correct his Commentaries. Pollio Aſinius parum diligenter parumque integra veritate, compoſitos putat; cum Cæſar pleraque & quæ per alios erant geſta temere crediderit, & quæ per ſe vel conſuliò vel etiam memoria lapſus, perperam ediderit, exiſtimatque reſcripturum & correcturum fuiſſe (57). A modern Critic (58) has found fault with Pollio's opinion. But the Author of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres declared himſelf againſt that Critic. It would be difficult, ſays he (59), to convince Aſinius Pollio of having falſly aſſerted that Cæſar's Commentaries contained ſeveral untruths: for why ſhould we not believe, that a contemporary Author, and who every way was of Cæſar's own profeſſion, being a Captain, an Hiſtorian, and an Orator as well as he, was acquainted with a thouſand things, which ſhewed that Cæſar related a great many falſe fables. For the reſt it is certain that this Conqueror's Memoirs are written too careleſly; and if the Prince of Condé has ever a mind to write an account of the wars in which he commanded, after the ſame manner, he may be ſure, that men of taſte will not admire his performance; but we may be certain, that he would write much better than Cæſar. I am perſuaded, that few of the greateſt admirers of antiquity are prepoſſeſſed in its favour to ſuch a degree, as to maintain, that the Duke de la Rochefoucault's Memoirs are not preferable to Cæſar's. See Voſſius (60), who ſhews, 1, that Cæſar is really the author of the Commentaries, which go under his name; 2, that they contain a great many falſhoods (61). See below the remark [S].

(53) Cæteri quam benè atque emendatè, nos etiam quam facilè atque celeriter eos confecerit ſcimus. Hirtius, Præf. in lib. 8. de Bello Gallico.
(54) In thoſe pro Marcello, pro Ligario, pro Dejotaro Rege.
(55) In Præf. lib. 8. de Bello Gall.
(56) Cicero in Bruto, cap. 74.
(57) Suet. in Cæſare, cap. 56.
(58) Morhofius, de Patavinitate Liviana, pag. 45.
(59) June 1685, pag. 629.
(60) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 62, 63.
(61) See the remark [D] of the article METELLUS (Lucius.)

an Epicurean in ſpeculation, with regard to Providence [H], from a paſſage in Salluſt, and another in Lucan. We muſt not believe that he was the firſt who leaped from his ſhip upon the ſhore of Britain; he is repreſented as ſaying that in an Oration (d), but he ſays quite the contrary in his writings. He might probably have enjoyed the ſovereign power, (d) Julianus, in Cæſaribus, p. m. 170.

[H] It would be wronging him to conſider him as an Epicurean in ſpeculation, with regard to Providence.] This is liable to three objections. The Iſt from this paſſage in Salluſt: De pœna, poſſum equidem dicere id, quod res habet, in luctu atque miſeriis mortem ærumnarum requiem, non cruciatum eſſe, eam cuncta mortalium mala diſſolvere, ultra neque curæ neque gaudio locum eſſe (62). Cæſar ſpoke thoſe words in the Senate, when he delivered his opinion concerning the puniſhment, which Catiline's accomplices were to ſuffer. He declared plainly, and without the leaſt exception, that death puts an end to all our happineſs and our miſery; which is a flat denial of the immortality of the ſoul: We may juſtly wonder that a Senator durſt venture to ſpeak thus before that auguſt aſſembly: Cato did not fail to make ſome reflections upon this doctrine of Cæſar; but he did it indirectly, and with a great deal of moderation. Bene, & compoſite C. Cæſar paulo ante in hoc ordine de vita & morte diſſeruit, credo falſa exiſtimans, quæ de inferis memorantur, diverſo itinere malos a bonis loca tetra, inculta, fœda, atque formidoloſa habere (63). i. e. "Cæſar ſpoke very well and elegantly in this "aſſembly, concerning life and death; thinking, I "believe, that what is ſaid concerning hell, is falſe; "namely that good men go to a place different from "that, which is deſigned for the wicked, and which "is a horrid and frightful habitation." The IId objection is grounded on a paſſage in Lucan; The Poet relates, that Cæſar, having beſieged Maſſilia (a) commanded his ſoldiers to cut down a wood, which was conſecrated to a certain Divinity, whom the inhabitants dreaded ſo much the more, as they knew it leſs (64). The ſoldiers durſt not obey; each feared that the ax would rebound againſt himſelf; at laſt Cæſar himſelf was forced to begin the work, and to encourage them not only by giving the firſt ſtroke to theſe conſecrated trees, but alſo by declaring, that he took upon his own head the whole crime and impiety, they would be guilty of by that action. At laſt they obeyed him; not ſo much becauſe they feared no more, as becauſe after all they choſe rather to expoſe themſelves to the wrath of heaven than to Cæſar's.

(62) Saluſt. De Bell. Catilin. cap. 51.

(63) Idem, ibid. cap. 52.

(a) Now Marſeille.

(64) Non vulgatis ſacrata figuris
Numina ſic metuunt: tantum terroribus addit
Quos timeant non eſſe Deos. Lucan. Pharſ. lib. 3. ver. 415.

Sed fortes tremuere manus, motique verenda
Majeſtate loci, ſi robora ſacra ferirent,
In ſua credebant redituras membra ſecures.
Implicitas magno Cæſar terrore cohortes
Ut vidit, primus raptam vibrare bipennem
Auſus, & aëriam ferro proſcindere Quercum,
Effatur merſo violata in robora ferro:
Jam ne quis veſtrum dubitet ſubvertere ſilvam,
Credite me feciſſe nefas? Tum paruit omnis
Imperiis non ſublato ſecura pavore,
Turba, ſed expenſa Superorum & Cæſaris Ira (65).

That is,

"But lo! the bolder hands, that ſhould have ſtruck,
"With ſome unuſual horror trembling ſhook;
"With ſilent dread and rev'rence they ſurvey'd
"The gloom majeſtic of the ſacred ſhade:
"None dares with impious ſteel the bark to rend,
"Leſt on himſelf the deſtin'd ſtroke deſcend.
"Cæſar perceiv'd the ſpreading fear to grow,
"Then eager, caught an ax, and aim'd a blow.
"Deep ſunk within a violated oak
"The wounding edge, and thus the warrior ſpoke.
"Now let no doubting hand the taſk decline,
"Cut you the wood, and let the guilt be mine.
"The trembling bands unwillingly obey'd,
"Two various ills were in the ballance laid,
"And Cæſar's wrath againſt the Gods was weigh'd. ROWE.

(65) Idem, ibid. ver. 429.

If all that I want from Lucan's narration did not conclude here, I would add that he obſerves, that the habitants of Marſeilles, far from lamenting the loſs of their ſacred wood, rejoiced extremely at it, imagining that ſo great a ſacrilege ſhould not be long unpuniſhed. But, adds Lucan, they found that —"Too oft ſucceſs to guilt is given,

"And wretches only ſtand the mark of heaven (66). ROWE.

(66) Muris ſed clauſa Juventus
Exultat: quis enim læſos impune putarret
Eſſe Deos? Servat multos fortuna nocentes,
Et tantum miſeris iraſci numina poſſunt. Ibid. ver. 446.

This is too profane a manner of ſpeaking; it is charging Providence with a fault, with which the earthly judges are charged when we ſay, that the gallows is made only for the unfortunate. The IIId objection is grounded on a paſſage in Suetonius, who ſays that Religion, that is the bad omens from the victims, or ſuch other heavenly warnings, never deterred Cæſar from beginning or continuing his undertakings. Ne religione quidem ulla a quoquam incepto abſterritus unquam vel retardatus eſt. Cum immolanti aufugiſſet hoſtia, profectionem adverſus Scipionem & Jubam non diſtulit (67). He gave a good proof of this the day he was killed, for he went to the Senate, tho' the victims, which he offered, portended nothing but evil (68): Here then we have three objections againſt what I aſſert in the text of this Remark, I ſhall endeavour to anſwer them.

(67) Sueton. in Cæſare, cap. 59.

(68) Dein pluribus hoſtiis cæſis cum litare non poſſet, introiit Curiam ſpreta Religione. Ibid. cap. 81.

I ſay with regard to the firſt objection, that it is of no force, becauſe it proves too much. If the paſſage in Salluſt is a good argument that Cæſar did not believe the Providence of the Gods, we muſt alſo ſay, that Cicero did not believe it, ſince he aſſerted as clearly as Cæſar and in a full Senate, that death puts an end to all our miſeries, and ſince he mentions whatever was ſaid of Hell-torments, as ſo many fables and wild fancies. Huic mortem maturabat inimicus, quod illi unum in malis perfugium erat calamitatis? Qui ſi quid animi ac virtutis habuiſſet, (ut multi ſæpe fortes viri in ejuſmodi dolore) mortem ſibiipſi conſciſſet: huic quamobrem id vellet inimicus offerre, quod ipſe ſibi optare deberet? Nam nunc quidem, quid tandem illi mali mors attulit? Niſi forte ineptiis ac fabulis ducimur, ut exiſtimemus, illum apud inferos impiorum ſupplicia perferre, ac plures illic offendiſſe inimicos, quam hic reliquiſſe: à Socrus, ab uxorum, à fratris, à liberorum pœnis actum eſſe præcipitem in ſceleratorum ſedem atque regionem. Quæ ſi falſa ſunt, id quod omnes intelligunt, quid ei tandem aliud mors eripuit, præter ſenſum doloris (69). i. e. "His enemy haſtened his death, which "was the only remedy left him in his misfortunes. "And if he had had the leaſt courage (as ſeveral "brave men often had under ſuch afflictions) he would "himſelf have put an end to his life; ſince an ene"my intended what he himſelf ſhould have wiſhed "for. And now, what evil has death brought upon "him? Unleſs by giving credit to nonſenſical fables, "we ſhould believe that he ſuffers now in hell the "puniſhment of the wicked, and that he met with "more enemies there, than he left here, and that being "delivered of what he ſuffered from his mother-in-law, "from his wives, from his brother, and from his chil"dren, he only exchanged thoſe miſeries for the tor"ments which fill the place deſigned for profligate "men? But if all this be falſe, as it is by all be"lieved to be, what elſe has he been deprived of "by death, but the ſenſe of evil?" It would be very wrong to infer from this paſſage that Cicero believed neither another life, nor the Providence of the Gods, ſince the contrary appears evidently from his writings. Beſides, all men do not agree, that there is a neceſſary connection between the immortality of the ſoul, and the Providence of God; the Sadduces denied the former of thoſe doctrines, and admitted the latter. I make much the ſame anſwer to the ſecond objection. Sylla was as far as any man from being an Atheiſt; he thought that a great regard was to be paid to ſuch orders as God conveys to man by the means of dreams; he aſcribed his victories to the favours of fortune, much more than to his own conduct (70); he put a great faith in preſages (71): he conſecrated part of his eſtate to the Gods; and performed very exactly all the ceremonies preſcribed to him by the Prieſts (72). And yet when he wanted timber and money at the ſiege of Athens, he did not ſcruple to have the ſacred trees cut down,

(69) Cicero pro Cluentio, cap. 61. Obſerve that Cicero ſpeaks quite in another ſtrain in his Orat. pro C. Rabirio.

(70) Plutarch. in ejus vita, pag. 454.
(71) Ibid.
(72) Ibid. pag. 474.

power, which he uſurped, for a longer time, could he have renounced the name and pomp of a Sovereign. His friends, who ought to have ſupported him in ſo dangerous a circumſtance, ruined him, by the eagerneſs with which they would procure him the royal ornaments. He and they ſhould have conſidered, that a free people do eaſily ſubmit to ſlavery, provided it be not named ſlavery, and that having ſuffered without concern the loſs of their real privileges, they are frightened at a title, and will revolt rather than ſuffer an unuſual ornament upon the head of him, who ſubdued them. If any thing could oblige the conſpirators to haſten the execution of their deſign, it was the fear they had that Cæſar would openly take upon him the title of King; nor was their fear ill grounded [I]. Obſerve, that though he had always been very couragious, and fortune had down, nor to take all the riches he found in the temples, and even in that of Delphi (73), and was very merry with his meſſenger's ſcruples. Let us ſay therefore, that Cæſar's bold attempt againſt the ſacred wood of Marſeilles does not prove, that he denied a Providence; it proves only, either that he laughed at this particular ſuperſtition of the inhabitants of Marſeilles, or that he had no regard for religious duties, when they obſtructed his moſt important deſigns. The Chriſtian Princes, who in caſe of neceſſity ſeize upon the eſtate of the Church, know very well that they do wrong, but they chooſe rather to commit that crime, than to be vanquiſhed by the enemy, juſt as they chooſe to break through the laws of chaſtity againſt their own conſcience, rather than to ſubdue their paſſions. The third objection has no more ſtrength in it than the two former; it ſhews only, that we muſt ſay of Cæſar, what we ſay of the Chriſtians, who have faith and not charity, who believe the Goſpel and do not practiſe the Chriſtian duties, in a word, who have faith without works. Cæſar believed what his Religion taught of omens, but did not regulate his conduct according to what was portended, when his prudence or his paſſions adviſed him to the contrary. Thus Chriſtians behave themſelves with regard to their ghoſtly-fathers, who have the direction of their conſcience; they conſult them, but do not follow their advice. But as the care they take to conſult them, ſhews that they are perſuaded of the doctrines of Religion, ſo it muſt be ſaid, that Cæſar's conſulting the entrails of victims (74), and the other oracles depending upon augury, is a good argument of his faith in that reſpect. The day he was killed, he was in a ſuſpence whether he ſhould go out or not, tho' ſeveral affairs of the utmoſt importance were to come before the Senate that day. His irreſolution was occaſioned by an ominous dream his wife had had; that dream raiſed doubts in his mind, yet not ſo far as to make him take a firm reſolution to ſtay at home: he did not take that reſolution becauſe the victims which had been ſacrificed by his orders, portended no good. This determined him not to go to the Senate (75); nor would he have been there, had not one of the conſpirators known how to take him by his blind-ſide; he told him amongſt other things, what will your enemies ſay, when they ſhall hear that you defer ſettling the moſt weighty affairs of the ſtate till your wife has a lucky dream? Ἐι δὲ φράζοι τίς αὐτῆς καθεμένοις, νῦν μὲν ἀπαλλάττεσθε, παρῆναι δὲ ἄνθις ὅταν ἐντύχοι Βελτίοσιν ὀνείροις Καλπυρνία, τίνας ἴσεσθε λόγους παρὰ τῶν φθονούντων (76). " If now " they are ſitting, ſome body was to tell them (from " you) that they may riſe, and that they will be ſummoned to meet again, when Calpurnia ſhall have " had a fine dream, what would be the diſcourſes of " thoſe who envy you?" Here then we ſee that Cæſar believed preſages: we know alſo that he wrote ſeveral Books upon the auſpices (77), and it was a prodigy, which encouraged him to paſs the Rubicon. Eatur, ſaid he (78), ubi Deorum oſtenta & inimicorum iniquitas vocat; jacta eſt alea. i. e. " Let us go where " the ſigns of the Gods and the wickedneſs of our " enemies call us; the die is caſt." We know that he offered up prayers to the Gods, before he began the deciſive battle againſt Pompey: περιχαρὴς γενόμενος ἐ ἐυξάμενος τοῖς Θεοῖς παρίταττε τὴν φάλαγγα (79). i. e. " Being become cheerful, and having prayed to " the Gods, he drew out his army in order of battle." We know that he put a great confidence in his good fortune, as appears by what he ſaid to his pilot; Quid times? Cæſarem vehis. i. e. " Why are you afraid? " you carry Cæſar (80)." His expreſſions in Plutarch are ſtronger (81). We know, that he thought fortune preſided over every thing, but more particularly over the affairs of war. Multum cum in omnibus rebus, tum in re militari fortuna poteſt (82). Fortuna, quæ plurimum poteſt tum in reliquis rebus, tum præcipue in bello, parvis momentis magnas rerum commutationes efficit, ut tum accidit (83); i. e. " Fortune, who governs all " kind of affairs, but eſpecially the affairs of war, " employs ſometimes very inconſiderable circumſtances, " to procure a great alteration in publick affairs, as " it then happened." There is no occaſion to obſerve that nothing is more inconſiſtent with Epicurus's ſyſtem, than the doctrine of preſages and the influence of fortune. Speak as ill of fortune as you pleaſe, ſuppoſe her blind, inconſtant, unjuſt, whimſical, you do nevertheleſs admit a principle different from mere atoms, capable of will and conduct, and which takes cognizance of our affairs (84).

I forgot to mention a religious action of Cæſar, which is remarkable. The Arverni boaſted that they had Cæſar's ſword; and ſhewed it ſtill hung up in one of their temples, in Plutarch's time. Cæſar ſaw it, and only laughed at it; and yet he forbad his men to take it again, becauſe he conſidered it as a ſacred thing (85).

I don't mention as a ſcruple of conſcience the regard he had for a certain monument. He durſt not deſtroy a trophy, which Mithridates had raiſed after the defeat of Triarius (86). He durſt not, I ſay, throw it down, conſidering it was a monument conſecrated to the Gods of War (87); but he raiſed another trophy oppoſite to that, when he had vanquiſhed Pharnaces. He contented himſelf with raiſing trophy againſt trophy, yet ſo that his trophy darkened, and in a manner, deſtroyed the other. Καθέλειν μὲν γὰρ τὸ τοῦ βαρβάρου οὐκ ἐτόλμησεν, ὡς ἐ οἷς ἐμπολεμίοις θεοῖς ἱερώμενον· τῇ ὃ ὀὴ τοῦ ἰδίου παφασάσι, ἐ ἐκείνῳ συνεσκίασε, καὶ τρόπον τινὰ καὶ κατέστρεψε (88). He may indeed have been afraid of provoking the Gods of War; but perhaps alſo he laughed in his ſleeve at this article of Religion; let us not therefore lay any ſtreſs upon this argument; let us give any one leave to think, that without having had any regard from his heart for Mars, Bellona, or Minerva, &c. he like a true Politician, forbore offending the vulgar. But here follows a fact, which muſt perſuade us that he was ſuperſtitious. He had a form of prayers, which he uſed to repeat three times as ſoon as he was got into his Chariot, in hopes that this would procure him a good journey: he did not begin to make uſe of this kind of devotion, till he eſcaped being overturned in his Chariot. Cæſarem Dictatorem poſt unum anciſitem vehiculi caſum, ferunt ſemper, ut primum conſediſſet, id quod pleroſque nunc facere ſcimus, carmine ter repetito ſecuritatem itinerum aucupari ſolitum (89). I conclude from all this that he could not be an Epicurean but in practice (90).

[I] The fear they had that Cæſar would openly take upon him the title of King . . . . was not ill grounded.] Cæſar's moſt intimate friends were more eager and unſatiable in proportion than himſelf: they laboured to procure him the title of King, only becauſe they hoped to have a greater ſhare of power under that new conſtitution of the Government. The firſt device they employed was a religious pretence. In order to diſcover the inclination of the people, they ſpread abroad, that it was expreſly declared in the Sibylline Oracles, that if the Romans ſent an army commanded by a King againſt the Parthians, they would certainly vanquiſh them, but that otherwiſe they would always prove invincible. After this Cæſar's friends tried whether the people were ſufficiently prepared for a King; for as Cæſar was one day returning to town, they complimented him with the title of King. But the peo-

(73) Ibid. pag. 459.

(74) Dein pluribus hoſtiis cæſis, cum litare non poſſet. Sueton. in Cæſare, cap. 81.

(75) Ὡς δὲ καὶ πολλὰ καταθύσαντες οἱ μάντεις ἔφασαν αὐτῷ δυσιερεῖν, ἔγνω πέμψας Ἀντώνιον ἀφεῖναι τὴν σύγκλητον. Plutarch. in ejus vita, pag. 738. B.

(76) Idem, ibid. C.

(77) Macrobius, Saturn. lib. 1. cap. 16. p. m. 267. quotes book the 16th.

(78) Sueton. in Cæſar. cap. 32.

(79) Plutarch. in Cæſare, pag. 728. E.

(80) Florus, lib. 4. cap 2. n. 37.

(81) Πιςεύων τῇ τύχῃ γνὺς ὅτι Καίσαρα κομίζεις, i. e. " Truſt to " fortune ſince " you know that " you carry Cæſar."

(82) Cæſar. de Bell. Gall. lib. 6.

(83) Idem, de Bell. Civ. lib. 3.

(84) See the article TIMOLEON. Remark [I] and [K].

(85) Plutarch. in Apoph. p. 720, E.

(86) Dio, lib. 42. p m. 234.

(87) See above, the article of AURELIANUS, remark [D].

(88) Dio, lib. 42. pag. 234.

(89) Plin. lib. 18. cap. 2.

(90) We muſt even except the pleaſures of the table. See Suet. in ejus vita, cap. 53. where he relates what Cato ſaid. Unum ex omnibus Cæſarem ad evertendam Rempublicam, Sobrium acceſſiſſe. i. e. " Of all " thoſe who " have attempted to over- " throw the " Common- " wealth, Cæſar " alone was a " temperate " man" See alſo Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 41.

had always been favourable to him, yet he became at last very cautious, as though he had been afraid that the inconstant Goddess should take him for an insatiable and troublesome petitioner, who deserved to suffer some mortification (e). The last victory he gained (f) cost him dearer than any of the former [K]; he saw himself upon the point of losing it, and began already to think of killing himself, that he might not fall into the hands of his enemies; however he gained the day during the Feast of the Bacchanalia (g), which circumstance calls to my mind four verses, which the reader will find in the Remark [K].

(e) Nec nisi tempore extremo ad dimicandum cunctantior factus est. Quo sæpius vicisset, hoc minus experiendos casus obstinatæ: nihilque se tantum acquisiturum victoria, quantum auferre calamitas posset. Suet. in Cæsare, cap. 60. i. e. "It was only in the latter part of his life that he began to decline fighting. The more victories he had gained, the more did he think it improper to venture again; being of opinion, that he could not gain so much by a victory, as he could lose by being vanquished." See below the words of Florus, in the remark [K] quotation (96).

(f) That of Munda in Spain, against the sons of Pompey.

(g) Plut. in Cæsare, pag. 734. A.

Sallust is perhaps the Author who succeeded best in drawing the Character of Cæsar, which he opposed to that of Cato of Utica. He says among other things, that Cæsar was fond of high employments, and great undertakings, and loved to command armies, that he might have opportunities of displaying his shining qualities; but that Cato was content to distinguish himself by his modesty and his eminent virtues, choosing rather to be than to appear an honest man [L], gaining thus a true reputation so much the more infallibly, (91) Compare this with what is related of Cromwell in the Histoire des Ouvrages de Savans. Jan. 1699. pag. 7. in the account of Ludlow's Memoirs.

ple murmuring at this, Cæsar had policy enough to reject the title (91), but he went home being extremely vexed, that the people had not contradicted him, when he refused the title with which his flatterers saluted him. Yet these were not discouraged at this; for during the Lupercalia, Mark Anthony, who was Consul, came to him, and would put the crown on his head; a few men, hired on purpose, clapt their hands, but the rest of the people did not follow their example: whereupon Cæsar repulsed Mark Anthony, and then only the people's loud acclamations were heard on every side. The same attempt was made some time after, but with the same success. What did not succeed in Cæsar's person, was tried upon his statues; his friends put crowns upon the heads of these statues; but two Tribunes had them taken away, informed against those, who had given the title of King to Cæsar, and imprisoned them; for which the people blessed the Tribunes, and followed them with loud acclamations; Cæsar on the contrary deprived them of their office (92); so that all those who had still a drop of Roman blood remaining in their veins (93) thought that they had no more time to lose, and entreated Brutus to remember he bore the name of him, who expelled Tarquin. See in Suetonius how low Cæsar had brought the liberty of the Commonwealth (94): It is certain that liberty was then nothing but an empty sound, a dead corps, a skeleton; as some pretend that Cæsar himself said. Nec minoris impotentiæ voces propalam edebat, ut T. Ampius scribit, nihil esse Rempublicam, appellationem modo, sine corpore ac specie. Syllam nesciisse litteras, qui Dictaturam deposuerit, debere homines consideratius jam loqui secum, ac pro legibus habere, quæ dicat (95). i. e. "Nor was he less arrogant in his "discourses, as T. Ampius writes; for he said publickly, that the Commonwealth was no more, that "it was only an empty name without any reality, a "mere shadow; that Sylla was a dunce for having "abdicated the Dictatorship; that men ought now to "speak to him more respectfully, and take all that he "said for law."

(92) Plutarch. in Cæsare, pag. 736.

(93) It may be suppos'd that they ask'd one another, Hæc fierent si testiculi vena ulla paterni Viveret in nobis? Persius, Sat. 1. ver. 103.

(94) Sueton. in Cæsare, cap. 76.

(95) Idem, cap. 77.

[K] His last victory cost him dearer than any of the former.] Fortune seemed wavering in his conduct, one would have thought, that she was consulting, whether she would except Cæsar from the general rule she is used to follow, and which is, to forsake her friends, after she has raised them, and to make them pay dear in one day, for all the happiness she made them enjoy for a great many years. Let us quote Florus. Omnium postrema certaminum Munda. Hic non pro cætera felicitate, sed anceps & diu triste prælium; ut plane videretur nescio quid deliberare fortuna. Sane & ipse ante aciem mœstior non ex more Cæsar, sive respectu fragilitatis humanæ, sive nimiam prosperorum suspectam habens continuationem; vel eadem timens, postquam idem esse cœperat, quod Pompeius (96). i. e. "The last battle was fought near Munda (a); here Cæsar did not "meet at first with his wonted happiness; for the "battle was doubtful, and for a long while he had "the worst; so that fortune seemed plainly to deliberate something. Nay, Cæsar himself appeared "more sad before the battle, than he used to be either "out of that weakness, which is natural to man, or "because he thought that prosperity had till then too "constantly attended him, not to forsake him at last; "or perhaps he feared that he should meet with the "same fate as Pompey did, after he had been raised "as high as he." Florus relates afterwards how Cæsar's troops began to lose ground. Novissime illud inusitatum Cæsaris oculis (nefas) post quatuordecim annos, probata veteranorum manus gradum retro dedit. Quod etsi nondum fugerat, apparebat tamen pudore magis quàm virtute resistere. Itaque ablegato equo, similis furenti, primam in aciem procurrit. Ibi prensare fugientes, confirmare; per totum denique agmen oculis, manibus, clamore, volitare. Dicitur in illa perturbatione & de extremis agitâsse secum, & ita manifesto vultu fuisse, quasi occupare manu mortem vellet (97). i. e. "Lastly, Cæsar's eyes beheld, (it is dreadful to mention it) what "he never saw before; after fourteen years service his "old experienced band of soldiers began to lose ground; "and tho' they did not yet fly away, it appeared "that shame rather than courage made them still resist. Therefore Cæsar, leaping off his horse, run "furiously into the first rank, took hold of those who "ran away, raised their spirit, and with his eyes, "hands and voice, was in a manner present thro' the "whole army. It is said, that in this perplexity he "began already to take the most desperate resolution, "and that it plainly appeared by his looks, that he "was determined to kill himself."

(96) Florus, lib. 4. cap. 2. num. 78.

(a) Now Monda, a town of the Kingdom of Granada in Spain.

(97) Florus, ubi supra, n. 88.

The four verses I promised to quote were written by Monsieur Pelisson. I take them from his Dialogue with Pegasus; they are as follow:

Mais ce fameux Cesar, qui presque sans combattre,
Venoit, voyoit, vainquoit, ne le suivois tu pas?
Jamais il n'eut quitté la belle Cleopatre,
Pour aller prendre Dole un jour de mardigras.

That is,

"But that famous Cæsar, who almost without striking "a blow, came, saw, and vanquished, did you not "imitate him? He would never have left the beautiful Cleopatra, to go and take Dole on a Shrove-"Tuesday."

Why should he not have left her on such a day to take a town, since on such a day he fought a battle, which was a thousand times more dangerous, than the siege of any city whatsoever would have been.

[L] Sallust . . . opposed Cæsar's character to that of Cato . . ., who chose rather to be than to appear an honest man.] I shall transcribe the words of that Historian. His, (Cæsari & Catoni) genus, ætas, eloquentia prope æqualia fuere: magnitudo animi par, item gloria; sed alia, alii; Cæsar beneficiis, ac munificentia magnus habebatur; integritate vitæ Cato. Ille mansuetudine & misericordia clarus factus; huic severitas dignitatem addiderat. Cæsar dando, sublevando, ignoscendo; Cato nihil largiendo gloriam adeptus est; in altero miseris perfugium, in altero malis pernicies; illius facilitas, hujus constantia laudabatur. Postremo Cæsar in animum induxerat, laborare, vigilare, negotiis amicorum intentus sua negligere, nihil denegare, quod dono dignum esset, sibi magnum imperium, exercitum, bellum novum exoptabat, ubi virtus enitescere posset. At Catoni studium modestiæ, decoris, sed maxumæ severitatis erat. Non divitiis cum divite, nec factione cum factioso; sed cum strenuo virtute, cum modesto pudore, cum innocente abstinentia certabat; esse, quam videor, bonus malebat; ita, quo minus gloriam petebat, eo magis assequebatur (98) i. e. "They (Cæsar and Cato) were almost equal as to "their extraction, age and eloquence: they had both "an exalted mind, and they acquired equally a great "glory, infallibly, as he leſs appeared to hunt after it. I muſt not omit an obſervation, which I met with in an ancient Hiſtorian; it relates to Cæſar's exceſſive care of heaping up riches, and of procuring money at any rate, and under any pretence whatſoever [M]. The Senate decreed ſuch exorbitant honours to him (b), that we cannot be too much aſtoniſhed, when we conſider the ſpirit of ſlavery, which at firſt view appears to be in that conduct. But we muſt obſerve that it was very much owing to a Republican policy; for when the Senators had found that he exceedingly delighted in theſe honourable and glorious marks of diſtinction which they conferred upon him, they invented an infinite number of new ones, in order to render him the more odious, and to haſten his downfall (i). This was the view of the greateſt part of the Senators: ſome other perſons acted really from a ſpirit of flattery; nor were there wanting thoſe, who intended only to ridicule Cæſar. Some propoſed to give him leave to enjoy all the women he pleaſed, ſince he ſtill enjoyed many, tho' he was above fifty years old (k). He did not diſcover the bait, and ſuffered himſelf to be enſnared by the honourable decrees of the Senate: he forgot himſelf too much, and even once he did not vouchſafe to riſe when the Senate brought him the decree, by which they greatly increaſed his honour; this incivility was one of the chief cauſes of his ruin [N]. All the world knows

(98) Sallust. de Bell. Catilin. cap. 54.

(b) See Dion Caſſius, lib. 44. circa initium.

(i) Idem, ibid. pag. 176. See the remark [N] quotation (110), and Plutarch. in Cæſ. pag. 734. where he obſerves, that Cæſar's enemies were not leſs than his flatterers the promoters of the Senate's decree. Οἷς οὐδὲν ἧττον ὄντας συναγωνίσασθαι σὺν πελαπυόντων Καίσαρα τὸς μισόντας.

(k) Plutarch. in Cæſare, pag. 754.

" glory, tho' by different ways. Cæſar was eſteemed " for his generoſity, Cato for his integrity: the former made himſelf famous by his ſweet and compaſſionate temper, the latter gained authority by " his ſtrictneſs. Cæſar gained a great reputation " by his gifts and preſents, and by forgiving his " enemies; but Cato without making any preſents. The former was a ſupport to the miſerable, the latter a terror to the wicked; as the " eaſy temper of the one was praiſed, ſo was the reſolution of the other. Laſtly, Cæſar was determined to employ the utmoſt application and vigilance, to neglect his own affairs, in order to mind " thoſe of others, never to deny what was worth granting; he loved to command, to be at the head of " an army, to wage war, that he might have an " opportunity to diſplay his ſhining qualities. But " Cato laboured to be modeſt, honeſt, and auſtere. " He did not ſtrive to outdo the rich by the ſplendor " of his eſtate, nor the factious by a ſpirit of contention; but to ſurpaſs the couragious in his ſtrength " of mind, the modeſt in moderation, and the honeſt " in temperance. He choſe rather to be than to appear good, acquiring thus ſo much the more glory, " that he did leſs ſeek after it." Any man, who amongſt theſe different kinds of elogies, ſhould chooſe Cæſar's ſhare rather than Cato's, would diſcover a very bad taſte. There is no good judge, but who, all compenſations made, would preſer before a thouſand other good qualities, that which Cato had, who took a greater delight in the real poſſeſſion of virtue, than in the reputation of being virtuous (99). This was alſo the character of Ariſtides, and the encomium which an excellent Poet paſt upon Amphiaraus the Soothſayer. I have made ſome reflections upon this in another article of this Dictionary (100), and I have there examined a maxim aſcribed to Socrates, and which agrees pretty well with the following words of a Latin Poet,

Tu recte vivis, ſi curas eſſe quod audis (101).

That is,

" Live well, if you take care to be what you paſs for."

Poſtellus has made a very good reflection upon that verſe in one of his Dedications (102) which for the reſt is full of nonſenſical bombaſt.

[M] Cæſar's exceſſive care of procuring money under any pretence whatſoever.] Sometimes he demanded ſums of money, under pretence that they had been promiſed to Pompey. He ſeized upon the treaſure in the Temple of Hercules at Tyre, pretending that the Tyrians had received Pompey's wife and ſon into their city. He as conqueror procured golden crowns to be given to Kings and Princes (103); in a word, when one reaſon or pretence would not do, he knew very well how to invent another. This conduct and theſe extortions were not owing to ill-nature, if we may believe Dion Caſſius (104), but to the exorbitant expence he was obliged to be at. The only reaſon why he laboured to get money was, that he was ſenſible, that in order to acquire power, to maintain it, and to encreaſe it, two things were requiſite, which ſupport each other, money and an army. Armies are kept together when they are provided with all neceſſaries, and it is not difficult for one at the head of an army to procure money; but if either of theſe two things fails the other is loſt of courſe. If Dion thought this was a good excuſe for Cæſar, he reaſoned more like a Warrior, and a Politician, than like a good Citizen. Here follow his own words: Τό, τε σύμπαν εἰπεῖν, χρηματοπειὸς ἀνὴρ ἐγένετο, ὀὺο τε εἶναι λέγων τὰ τὰς δυναστίας παρασκευάζοντα, καὶ φυλάσσοντα, καὶ ὑπάυξοντα, στρατιώτας καὶ χρήματα. καὶ ταῦτα δ' ἀλλήλων συνεχόντοιν. τῇ τε γὰρ τροφῇ τὰ στρατεύματα συνέχεται, καὶ ἐκείνη ἐκ τῶν ὅπλων συλλέγεται· καὶ θάτερον ὁποτερουοῦν αὐτῶν ἐυδὺς ἢ καὶ τὸ ἕτερον συσκαταλυθήσεται (105). This Hiſtorian obſerves, that Cæſar being returned into Italy, after Pharnaces's defeat, continued his extortions, ſometimes by way of preſents, ſometimes by way of loan. He borrowed from private men and from cities, never intending to return the money, and forced them to reckon as tho' he required from them the payment of a debt (106).

(105) Idem, ibid.

(106) Idem, ibid. pag. 235.

[N] Once he did not vouchſafe to riſe before the Senate . . . which was one of the chief cauſes of his ruin.] Two paſſages, one from Suetonius, and the other from Dion Caſſius will prove this. Præcipuam & inexpiabilem ſibi invidiam hinc maxime movit: adeuntes ſe cum pluribus honorificatiſſimiſque decretis univerſos patres conſcriptos ſedens pro æde Veneris genetricis excepit. Quidam putant retentum a Cornelio Balbo cum conaretur aſſurgere, alii ne conatum quidam omnino, ſed etiam admonentem Cajum Trebatium, ut aſſurgeret minus familiari vultu reſpexiſſe (107). i. e. " He drew upon him " an implacable hatred chiefly by the following action. " When the Senate went in a body to carry him the " moſt humble Decrees they had lately paſt in his favour, he received them ſitting before the temple of " Venus. Some think that he intended to riſe up, " but was prevented by Cornelius Balbus; others pre- " tend that he did not ſo much as offer to riſe, and that " he look'd coldly upon Caius Trebatius, who adviſed " him to do it." Dion Caſſius relates the whole affair, with all its circumſtances. The Senate, ſays he (108), conſulting one day concerning ſeveral of the greateſt honours, which were propoſed to be decreed to Cæſar, all the votes of the Senators, except thoſe of Caſſius and a few others, were for the Decree; after which the houſe roſe to go in a body to acquaint the Emperor with it; he was ſitting in the porch of the temple of Venus, where he had ſtaid, that nobody might ſay his preſence in the Senate had deprived the members of the liberty of voting. He did not riſe when the Senate came, and heard ſitting what they had to ſay. This exaſperated not only the Senators, but alſo the other Romans to ſuch a degree, that it became one of the chief pretences of them, who conſpired againſt his life. The Hiſtorian does not know, whether this piece of incivility was a fatal ſtroke of Providence, an abſence of mind procured from above, or an effect of Cæſar's being overjoyed. Καθήμενος σφᾶς εἴτε ὑπ' ὀλιγωρίας τινὶ, εἴτε καὶ περιχαρείᾳ προσεδέξατο (109). But he obſerves, that no credit was given to thoſe who endeavoured to excuſe Cæſar, by ſaying, that he had at that time a loſeneſs, which made him fear that by riſing he ſhould put the retentive faculty to a non-plus. This excuſe was not admitted for good, becauſe it was known that ſoon after he returned home on foot. The poſture in which he received the Senate was therefore imputed to his pride. They themſelves had made

(107) Sueton. in Cæſare, cap. 77.

(108) Dion. Caſſ. lib. 42. pag. 255.

(109) Idem, ibid.

(99) See Lucan. Pharſ. lib. 2. ver. 380, &c. I have read in the Mercure volant, printed in 1705, pag. 93. that it has been ſaid of Cato, Nunquam rectè fecit, ut facere videretur, ſed quia aliter facere non poterat. i. e. " Cato never " did good, that " he might appear doing it, " but becauſe he " could not do " otherwiſe.

(100) Remark [H] of the article AMPHIARAUS.

(101) Horat. Epiſt. 16. lib. 1. ver. 17.

(102) That of his Hiſtoires Orientales, printed at Paris in 1575, and dedicated to the Duke of Alençon brother of Henry III.

(103) See Dion Caſſ. lib. 42. pag. 234.

(104) Τοῦτο δὴ ἐχ' ὑπὸ κακίας ποιῶν. Idem, ibid.

knows that he was murdered in the Senate March the 15th, in the year 710 [O], ſince the building of Rome. I have obſerved in another place (l), that though we ſhould grant that there was ſome juſtice in this murder, yet it muſt be confeſſed, that it was very ill-him proud, by the honours they conferred upon him, and then they hated him becauſe he was proud. Here follow Dion's words: Ἔλεγον μὲν γὰρ ἀπολογούμενοί τινες ὑπὲρ αὐτοῦ μετὰ ταῦτα, ὅτι τῆς τε κοιλίας ἀκρατὴς ὑπὸ διαῤῥοίας ἐγεγόνει, καὶ διὰ τοῦτο, ἵνα μὴ ἐξοιδήσῃ κατίμησιν, ὃ μέντοι καὶ πιθανὸν τὸν πολλοὺς ἐδύνατο, διὰ τὸ μετ' ὀλίγον ἐξεγερθέντα αὐτὸν αὐτοπροαίρετον οἰκεῖόν κομισθῆναι. ἀλλ' ὑπετόπουν γὲ αὐτὸν ὑπερφυχεῖν, καὶ διεμίσουν ὡς ὑπερήφανον ὃν αὐτοὶ ταῖς ὑπερβολαῖς τῶν τιμῶν ὑπερήφανον ἐπεποιήκεσαν (110). The Hiſtorian ſhews in theſe laſt words the ſame inclination for cenſuring the Senate, which he had already diſcovered before. He had ſaid, that with regard to thoſe things, which drew upon Cæſar that hatred and cruel envy, which ruined him at laſt, the fault of the Senators was greater than even Cæſar's (111). They decreed new and exorbitant honours to him, and then they cenſured him for being pleaſed with them, and becauſe they encreaſed his pride. He was certainly to blame for not refuſing ſome of theſe honours, and for believing that the Senate was really perſuaded he deſerved them (112). But then the Senators were ſtill more to blame, ſince by conferring theſe honours upon him, they opened a precipice before him: for if he had declined theſe honours, it would have been taken for ſcorn; and by accepting of them he expoſed himſelf to the temptation of vanity, ſince the moſt humble perſons are eaſily ſpoiled by that poiſon, and fancy they really are, what they are ſaid to be (113). Τὸ γὰρ ὑπερβαλλειν τῶν τε τιμῶν καὶ τῶν ἐπαίνων χαυνοτέρους πὼς καὶ τοὺς πάνυ σώφρονας, ὥστε καὶ' ὧν ἐπαίνων ἀληθῶς γίγνεσθαι δοκῶσι, ποιεῖ (114).

(l) Above Rem. [F] of the article BRUTUS (Marcus Junius).

(110) Dion Caſſ. lib. 42. pag. 277.

(111) Idem, ibid. pag. 274.

(112) Idem, ibid.

(113) See the Nouv. de la Rep. des Lett. June 1686, Art. 1. pag. 631. You will find there the following words of Juvenal's 4th Sat. Nihil eſt, quod credere de ſe Non poſſit, cum laudatur Diis æqua poteſtas See alſo Horat. Ep. 16. lib. 1. Sed vereor ne cui dote pluſquam tibi credas &c.

(114) Dion, lib. 44. pag. 274.

Let us examine the reaſon, why ſome will not believe, that Cæſar continued ſitting for fear his looſeneſs ſhould play him ſome foul trick. That reaſon does not appear to me to be well grounded; for does it follow from his going home on foot, that he could not have been taken with a violent cholic the very moment the Senate approached? A looſeneſs is not always equally troubleſome. But if this excuſe was well grounded, it would afford us matter to admire, how fantaſtically things will ſometimes happen; we might ſay that the moſt important and moſt fatal events are linked to mere trifles, and that the moſt inconſiderable ſprings bring them about. Cæſar would have haſtened his ruin by not being able to put himſelf in a civil poſture, becauſe of a little diſorder in his bowels, which in any other circumſtance would have been a trifle, was at that time of the greateſt importance. The accident, which Cæſar feared in caſe he ſtood up, would have had terrible conſequences. It would have expoſed him to ridicule from the whole people at Rome, and his enemies would have put the worſt conſtruction upon it; what a contempt of Religion and of the whole Senate is this! would they have cried: What! do ſuch an action in the very temple of Venus, and before the moſt auguſt Aſſembly in the world! Such an accident could be miſrepreſented in an odious manner ſo many different ways, that it was ſufficient to determine any perſon not to riſe, tho' he ſhould have had the moſt lively ſenſe of all the ill conſequences, which might attend his incivility. Was not Conſtantine ſurnamed Copronymus branded with that odious and deſpicable title, which ſtill purſues his memory? did he not become the object of a thouſand invectives, and injurious reflections, becauſe he happened to ſoil the baptiſmal font, tho' innocently and without his knowledge? Impio patri ſceleſtiſſima ſucceſſit proles Conſtantinus cognomento Copronymi, quod infans baptiſmi lavacro admotus, mediis ſacris alimonii excrementis aquam polluerat (115). i. e. "The impious father was ſucceeded "ed by the moſt profligate ſon Conſtantine, ſurnamed "Copronymus, becauſe in his infancy, being brought "to the baptiſmal font, he defiled the water during the "holy ſervice." It would have been much worſe, if ſuch an accident had happened to him in a Church, when he oppoſed the protectors of images. An accident like that has always been conſidered as a proof of the utmoſt ſcorn, or as a ſubject for banter and rallery (116). However, they who pretended to excuſe Cæſar might be confuted by a better reaſon, than that, which Dion gives. They might be told, that if ſuch a bodily infirmity had been the cauſe of Cæſar's not riſing, he would have declared it, to excuſe himſelf before the Senators; and ſince he did not mention it, it ſhews that he very little cared whether people thought or not, that he was guilty of a great incivility towards that venerable body. We may eaſily imagine, that the Senators would have admitted the excuſe. Laban, tho' he was in a great paſſion, was ſatisfied with an excuſe of much the ſame nature, when his daughter received him without riſing up (117). Here follows another manner of excuſing one's ſelf (118). "It "happened once that Cardinal Du Perron was in a "great perplexity, when he was to ſpeak at the head "of the Clergy to the late Queen, the King's mother. "For being troubled with the gout, he was obliged to "ſit in a chair before a Queen, ſo full of Majeſty, "and intending to excuſe himſelf by a compliment, for "which he was not prepared beforehand, Madam, "ſays he, I am upon my knees in my heart, tho' you "ſee me ſitting . . . Here obſerving that it was not "reſpectful to name that part upon which he was ſit"ting, he was a good while a thinking, how he "might find ſome more modeſt expreſſion, but finding "none, he added at laſt upon my legs (119)."

(115) Jo. Bapt. Egnatius, in Ro. Principibus.

(116) Καὶ βύλομαι ἀντωπουρήσαι τοῖς βρόντας. i. e. "I will . . . "againſt your "thunders." Ariſt. in Nubib. Act. 1. Sc. 4. Vin' tu curtis Judæis oppedere? Horat. Sat. 4. lib. 1. See the Catholicon d'Eſpagne, where it mentions the Sittings of the Deputies from the States, pag. 37. edit. 1699.

(117) Rachel ſaid to her father, let it not diſpleaſe my Lord, that I cannot riſe before thee; for the cuſtom of women is upon me. Gen. xxxi. 35.

(118) Cæſar might have ſaid, I am ſtanding in my heart, tho' I ſit &c.

(119) Coſtar, Suite de la Défenſe de Voiture, pag. 189.

I have juſt now read ſomething, which may make us queſtion Dion's judgment. Plutarch obſerves, that Cæſar was extremely vexed at his uncivil behaviour towards the Senate, and at which the people was very much diſpleaſed (120). "However, adds Plutarch "(121), it is ſaid, that he ſince pretended to have "laboured under a kind of ſickneſs, (epilepſy) in "which a man has not the full uſe of his ſenſes, when "he is to ſpeak ſtanding in publick, but is eaſily "diſturbed and confounded by a giddineſs and ſwim"ming in his head, which comes upon him; but "this was a falſe pretence." Dion had read Plutarch, we muſt at leaſt believe it for his credit; why then does he not ſay a word of this excuſe, and yet mentions one which is much leſs probable, and even in a manner ridiculous?

(120) Plutarch. in Cæſare, pag. 736.

(121) Ibid.

[O] He was murthered in the Senate March the 15th 710.] Authors do not agree in this point of Chronology, concerning the year of Cæſar's death, ſome, as Sigonius, Calviſius, &c. ſay that Cæſar was killed in the year 709. I have followed their opinion in the article of Brutus (122) and perhaps alſo in ſome other places. But I think that Petavius's opinion is better grounded; he maintains that Cæſar was killed in the year 710, and this is now the common opinion. Cæſar was then about fifty ſix years old: he received twenty three blows (123); each of the conſpirators making haſte to wound him, in the hurry they wounded one another (124). They had imagined that the people would approve their action, but the very next day they had reaſon to queſtion it; for when they gave an account of what they had done, the people kept a deep ſilence: the Senate however encouraged them; for if on the one hand they decreed divine honours to Cæſar; on the other hand they alſo granted great favours to the conſpirators. But the funeral pomp of Cæſar confounded all again. Mark Anthony made a diſcourſe, which exaſperated the people to ſuch a degree, that they went immediately to ſet fire to the conſpirators houſes; and ſearched for them thro' the whole city in order to tear them in pieces. What affected the audience moſt was, that Anthony diſplay'd before them Cæſar's veſt pierced thro' and bloody (125). Plutarch and Appian, who copy after him, tell us this circumſtance, but the other Hiſtorians do not mention it. Cicero, who upbraided Mark Anthony with the whole proceeding of that day, ſays not a word of that particular. Etſi tum, cum optimum te putabant, me quidem diſſentiente, funeri tyranni, ſi illud fucus fuit, ſceleratiſſime præfuiſſe. Tua illa pulcra laudatio, tua miſeratio, tua cohortatio, tu illas faſces incendiſti, & eas, quibus ſemiuſtulatus ille, & eas, quibus incenſa L. Bellieni domus deflagravit. Tu illos impetus perditorum hominum, & ex maxima parte ſervorum, quos nos vi manuque repulimus, in domus noſtras immiſiſti (126). i. e.

(122) See the Article of BRUTUS (Marcus Junius) in the text, where I fix the battle of Philippi in the year 711.

(123) Sueton. in Cæſare, cap. 83.

(124) Plutarch. in Cæſare, pag. 739.

(125) From Plutarch, ibid. pag. 740.

(126) Cicero, Philip. 2. cap. 36.

ill-timed. Seneca ſeems to have had ſome very ſtrong reaſons to condemn the Uſurper, ſince there were amongſt his enemies two men, who were the greateſt ornament to the Stoick Sect (m); yet he blames the murderers, and cenſures them for having been ſo blind, as not to perceive, that conſidering the circumſtances of affairs (n) the cauſe of liberty was irretrievably loſt. It was ſo long ſince ambition and luxury had rendered Rome a ſcene of confuſion and violence (o), that a monarchical Government was become a neceſſary evil. The wiſeſt men amongſt the Romans had foreſeen, that ſuch a corruption of the morals of the people, and ſuch a contempt of the Laws would end at laſt in a total overthrow of the Commonwealth. Seneca alſo obſerves, that Cæſar had ſo cloſely united, and if I may ſay ſo, incorporated himſelf with the Commonwealth, that they could not be ſeparated, without deſtroying both [P]. It is certain that he only was capable of retrieving the State from the misfortunes it had ſuffered; and if any one would maintain that Cicero did not believe what he ſaid, when he affirmed this, it muſt be owned, that he ought to have believed it on this occaſion [Q]. We ſhall ſay ſomething of Cæſar's family, and againſt thoſe who did not well know why he was called thus [R]; we

(m) Cato Uticenſis, who died before Cæſar, and Brutus who killed him, and died ſoon after in defence of his party.

(n) See the Article of BRUTUS (Marcus Junius) quotation (14).

(o) See the deſcription of it in Lucan. Pharſal. lib. 1. ver. 160. and compare with this the quotation (35) in the article of CATULLUS.

i. e. "Tho' when men had the beſt opinion of you, "(I was not of the ſame mind,) you preſided, moſt "wickedly over the Tyrant's funeral, if it was not "all affectation (a). It is your fine panegyric, your "lamentations, your exhortations, it is your ſelf, who "lighted thoſe firebrands, by which he was half burnt, "and which burnt down L. Bellienus's houſe. It is "you, who ſent into our houſes that gang of profli"gate men, moſt of them ſlaves, whom we ourſelves "have repelled by main force." Obſerve that Suetonius is ſo far from mentioning the circumſtance of the veſt, that he even hints, that Mark Anthony made no funeral Oration. Laudationis loco Conſul Antonius per præconem pronunciavit S. C. quo omnia ei divina ſimul atque humana decreverat; item jusjurandum, quo ſe cuncti pro ſalute unius adſtrinxerant; quibus perpauca a ſe verba addidit (127). i. e. "Inſtead of a panegyric, "he notified by the public Crier the Senate's Decree, "by which all honours divine and human were de"creed to Cæſar; and the oath, by which they had "all bound themſelves for the ſecurity of one; to all "which he added a few words of himſelf." Is it not ſtrange that Suetonius ſhould ſeem to doubt of a fact, which Cicero affirmed before the whole Senate, when the thing was ſtill freſh in every one's memory? One might make a thouſand obſervations upon the different accounts we meet with in ſeveral Hiſtorians. I wonder very much, that Caſaubon (128) pretended to confirm Suetonius's account by the teſtimony of Appian, who affirms that Mark Anthony made a very long ſpeech (129).

(a) Perhaps the Latin words ſhould be, ſi illud funus fuit. i. e. If this may be called funeral. Obſerve that theſe words are wanted in Freigius's edit. of Cicero's Oration, printed at Francfort, in 1592, 8vo.

(127) Sueton. in Cæſare, cap. 84.

(128) Caſaub. de Suet. in Cæſare, cap. 84.

(129) Appian. de Bell. Civil. lib. 2. p. m. 285.

[P] Seneca obſerves that Cæſar had ſo cloſely united and incorporated himſelf with the commonwealth, that they could not be ſeparated, without deſtroying both.] Here follow his own words. Olim ita ſe induit Reip. Cæſar, ut ſeduci alterum non poſſit, ſine utriuſque pernicie: nam ut illi viribus opus, ita & huic capite (130). He obſerves here, that as Cæſar had occaſion for forces, ſo the Commonwealth wanted a head. Theſe words are the concluſion of ſeveral very good maxims, which he had propoſed, concerning the obedience which the ſubjects owe to thoſe, who govern. Theſe maxims were quoted in a Book, which a Royaliſt publiſhed in France againſt the leaguers in the year 1593. Non ſolum propter iram, id eſt, metu pœnæ illis obediendum eſt, ſed propter conſcientiam, quia nimirum omnes ſcire oportet, id ex divina voluntate, & conſtitutione fieri debere. Quod etiam Ethnici agnoverunt; inter quos illo ſæculo, quo Paulus ſcripſit, hæc ſapiens Philoſophus dicebat. "Principes Regeſque, & quocunque alio nomine "ſunt, tutores Status publici amandos etiam ultra pri"vatas neceſſitudines, & olim, inquit, ita ſe induit "Reip. Cæſar .... (131). Ille enim eſt vinculum, "per quod Reſpubl. cohæret, ille ſpiritus vitalis, quem "hæc tot millia trahunt, nihil ipſa per ſe futura, niſi "onus & præda, ſi mens illa imperii ſubtrahatur." i. e. "They muſt be obeyed not only for wrath, but "alſo for conſcience ſake; for all muſt know, "that this muſt be done according to the divine will "and appointment. This has been acknowledged "even by the Heathens themſelves, amongſt whom "an eminent Philoſopher, who was contemporary with "St. Paul, has the following words. Princes and "Kings, and they who govern under any title whatſoever, being the guardians of the State, muſt be beloved, "even before our particular relations. Formerly, adds

(130) Seneca, de Clementia, lib. 1. cap. 4.

(131) Obſerve that in Seneca this precedes what is ſaid of Cæſar.

"he, Cæſar had ſo cloſely united himſelf &c. .... "For he (the Sovereign) is the knot which keeps the "whole State together, he is the enlivening air, which "ſo many thouſands breath, who would be nothing by "themſelves, but a burthen and a prey, if that ſoul "of the Empire was taken away." Theſe words are found in page 75 of a work, intitled, Vindiciæ ſecundum libertatem Eccleſiæ Gallicanæ, & Regii Status Gallo-Francorum, ſub Henrico IV Rege Francorum & Navarræ. L. S. A. R. It is thought, that theſe four letters ſignify Ludovicus Servinus Advocatus Regius.

[Q] He only was capable of retrieving the State. Cicero .... who affirmed it, ... ought to have believed it on this occaſion.] Let us quote ſome paſſages from his oration for Marcellus. Quis eſt omnium tam ignarus rerum, tam rudis in republica, tam nihil unquam nec de ſua, nec de communi ſalute cogitans, qui non intelligat tua ſalute contineri ſuam, & ex unius tuâ, vitam pendere omnium? .... Si ad humanos caſus, incertoſque eventus valetudinis, ſceleris etiam accedat inſidiarumque conſenſio; quem Deum, etiamſi cupiat, opitulari poſſe Reip. credamus? Omnia ſunt excitanda tibi, C. Cæſar, uni, quæ jacere ſentis, belli ipſius impetu, quod neceſſe fuit, perculſa, atque proſtrata, conſtituenda judicia, revocanda fides, comprimendæ libidines, propaganda ſoboles; omnia, quæ dilapſa jam defluxerunt, ſeveris legibus vincienda ſunt. Non fuit recuſandum in tanto civili bello, tantoque animorum ardore, & armorum, quin quaſſata Reſp. quicunque belli eventus fuiſſet, multa perderet & ornamenta dignitatis, & præſidia ſtabilitatis ſuæ, muttaque uterque Dux faceret armatus, quæ idem togatus fieri prohibuiſſet. Quæ quidem nunc tibi omnia belli vulnera ſananda ſunt, QUIBUS PRAETER TE MEDERI NEMO POTEST. i. e. "Who is there, "ſo ignorant of every thing, ſo little acquainted with "the Commonwealth, or ſo unconcerned for his own "preſervation and for that of the State, but muſt "know, that his ſafety is connected with yours, and "the lives of all depend upon yours alone? .... "And if to the dangers which men may run, and "the natural uncertainty of health and life, be added "the fear of conſpiracies, what God, tho' he were "willing, could protect the State? You, Cæſar, muſt "retrieve, whatever the war, tho' neceſſary has de"ſtroyed; you muſt make juſtice flouriſh again, re"ſtore fidelity, reſtrain lewdneſs, and promote mar"riages; in a word, the licentiouſneſs, which is now "come to a head, muſt be repreſſed by ſevere laws. "It cannot be denied, but that the Commonwealth, "after ſuch a confuſion occaſioned by ſo great a civil "war, and ſuch an animoſity of the citizens againſt "one another, muſt have loſt a great deal of her dig"nity and ſtrength; and that both the heads of the "parties have connived at or permitted a great many "things during the war, which they would have for"bidden in time of peace. All theſe wounds occaſi"oned by the wars you muſt now heal, NOR CAN "THEY BE CURED BUT BY YOU." If Cæſar had lived ten years longer, he would in all likelihood have done the greateſt things in the world, for the glory and happineſs of the Romans: he was ſnatched away in the midſt of the moſt noble projects, which an exalted genius and heroic mind could form (132).

(132) See Sueton. in Cæſare, cap. 44. and Plutarch. in Cæſare, pag. 735.

[R] We ſhall ſay ſomething concerning Cæſar's family and againſt thoſe, who did not well know, why he was called thus (133).] He was of the family of the Julii, who we ſhall alſo add a ſupplement concerning his Commentaries [S]; we have mentioned who pretended they were deſcended from Venus, by Æneas the ſon of Anchiſes and of that Goddeſs. We ſhall ſee in another place (134), with how much care that tradition of Cæſar's origin was maintained. The deſcendants of Aſcanius, ſon of Æneas and Creuſa, and ſirnamed Iulus, lived at Alba, till that city was ruined by Tullus Hoſtilius King of Rome, who carried them to Rome, where they flouriſhed. We do not find that they produced more than two principal branches; the firſt bore the ſurname of Tullus, the other that of Cæſar. The perſons of the firſt branch, who begin to make ſome figure in Hiſtory, are Caius Julius Tullus, and Vopiſcus Julius Tullus: The former was Conſul in the year 265 ſince the building of Rome, and Decemvir in the year 300. The latter was Conſul in the year 271. The moſt ancient of the Cæſars we meet with, are thoſe who were in public employments the eleventh year of the firſt Punic war, that is, A. U. 546. Since that time we find that there was almoſt always ſome of that family who enjoyed public offices in the Commonwealth, till the time of Caius Julius Cæſar the Emperor's father. He was the ſon of another Caius Julius Cæſar, whoſe Hiſtory is unknown: We know only that he was married to Morcia, who was deſcended from King Ancus Marcius's family (135). He had two ſons, and one daughter, who was married to Marius. The two ſons, Caius Julius Cæſar and Lucius Julius Cæſar were not raiſed to a higher poſt than that of Prætor, for they died in the prime of their age, and in a very ſingular manner: for they both expired whilſt they were putting on their ſtockings in the morning, Caius at Piſa, and Lucius at Rome, where he was then a Prætor. Nullis evidentibus cauſis obiere, dum calciantur matutino, duo Cæſares, Prætor, & præturâ perfunctus Dictatoris Cæſaris Pater, hic Piſis exanimatus, ille Romæ (136). Caius was married to Aurelius, by whom he had a ſon, and ſome daughters. The ſon is he, who is the ſubject of this Article. He was born at Rome, the 12th of the month Quintilis (137). A. U. 653, and loſt his father in the year 669. I have borrowed this from a book, which contains a great many particulars relating to the family of the Julii (138). You will not meet there with the paſſage in Suetonius, which ſhews, how much they of that family valued themſelves upon their noble extraction, and how elegantly Cæſar could expreſs this. The paſſage is as follows. Quæſtor Juliam amitam, uxoremque Corneliam defunctas laudavit e more pro Roſtris. Sed in amitæ quidem laudatione, de ejus ac patris ſui utraque origine ſic refert. Amitæ meæ Juliæ maternum genus ab Regibus ortum, paternum cum Diis immortalibus conjunctum eſt. Nam ab Anco Marcio ſunt Marcii Reges, quo nomine fuit Mater. A Venere Julii, cujus gentis familia eſt noſtra. Eſt ergo in genere, & Sanctitas Regum, qui plurimum inter homines pollunt, & ceremonia Deorum, quorum ipſi in poteſtate ſunt Reges (139). i. e. "When he was Quæſtor he delivered "publickly a funeral Oration in praiſe of Julia his "aunt by his father's ſide, and of Cornelia his wife, "who were both dead. In the panegyric of his aunt "he ſpoke of her and his father's extraction on both "ſides in the following manner. My aunt Julia is "by her mother's ſide deſcended from Kings, and "by her father's from the immortal Gods, for from "Ancus Marcius came the Kings ſirnamed Marcii, "of whoſe family was my aunt's mother. From Ve"nus are deſcended the Julii, of whom our family is "a branch. We unite therefore in our family the "Majeſty of Kings, who are in a great eſteem amongſt "men, and the ſanctity of the Gods, in whoſe power "the Kings themſelves are." Suetonius mentions here Cornelia Cæſar's wife. Let us take this opportunity, to ſay ſomething of this Emperor's marriages. He had been betrothed to a very rich virgin, called Coſſutia. He wore ſtill the Prætexta of child's gown (a), and it was not long, before he diſmiſſed this bride. He married afterwards Cornelia, daughter of Lucius Cornelius Cinna, nor would he ever divorce her, notwithſtanding the great danger he run by refuſing to comply with Sylla's repeated intreaties (140). He had a daughter by her, who was married to Pompey. His third wife was Pompeia (141), who revenged upon him the injuries he did to a great many huſbands. Clodius fell in love with her, and ſhe loved him; But Cæſar, and Aurelia his mother, a woman of eminent virtue, obſerved her ſo cloſely, that Clodius was obliged to take the opportunity of the myſteries of the Good Goddeſs (Ceres) which were celebrated in Cæſar's houſe, to meet with Pompeia. He diſguiſed himſelf in women's apparel, and mixing with the crowd, he entered Cæſar's houſe, but was diſcovered. This affair made a great noiſe. Cæſar divorced his wife, becauſe, as he was pleaſed to ſay (142), he would not have his family ſo much as ſuſpected; yet after all, he did not doubt but ſhe went the utmoſt length with Clodius (143). Ὅυτος (Κλώδιος) ἦρα Πομπηίας τῆς Καίσαρος γυναικος, οὐδὲ αὐτῆς ἀκούσης. ἀλλὰ φυλακαὶ τε τῆς γυναικωνίτιδος ἀχριβεῖς ἦσαν, ἥ τε μήτηρ τοῦ Καίσαρος, Αὐρηλία, γυνὴ σώφρων, περιέλυσε τὴν νύμφην ἀεὶ, χαλεπὴν, καὶ παρακινδυνεύσαι ἀνάγκην αὐτοῖς ἐποίησε τὴν ἔντευξιν (144). i. e. "He (Clodius) loved Aurelia, Cæſar's wife, and not againſt her will. But Cæſar "guarded her ſo cloſely, and Aurelia his mother, a "woman of great ſenſe, kept always by her ſide, ſo "that it was difficult, and even dangerous for them "to meet." Cæſar married afterwards Calpurnia Piſo's daughter, and died before her.

(133) Theſe words of Pliny, lib. 7. cap. 9. have miſled them. Auſpicatius enecta parente gignuntur: ſicut Scipio Africanus prior natus, primuſque Cæſarum à cæſo matris utero dictus. i. e. "They are born "to greater "luck, who are "born after their "mother's death, "as was Scipio "Africanus, the "firſt of that "ſurname: and "the firſt of the "Cæſars was "called thus, "becauſe he had "been cut out of "his mother's "womb." They applied to Cæſar the Dictator, what Pliny only meant of the firſt, who was ſurnamed Cæſar. Obſerve that Solinus did not well underſtand all this; he thought that Pliny ſaid, that Scipio Africanus was the firſt who was called Cæſar.

Servius has been guilty of a great miſtake in his Commentary upon the following verſes of Virgil. Naſcetur (145) pulchra Trojanus origine Cæſar. . . . Julius a magno demiſſum nomen Iulo (146). He thought, that the ſirname of Cæſar was given to Caius Julius the Dictator, either becauſe he had been cut out of his mother's womb, by a Chirurgical operation, or becauſe his grandfather had killed an Elephant in Africa which is called Cæſar in the Punic language. Vel quod avus ejus in Africa manu propria occidit Elephantem, qui Cæſar dicitur Pœnorum lingua (147). Neither of theſe reaſons can be admitted, ſince there was a family ſurnamed Cæſar, and the anceſtors of the Dictator, at Rome as ſoon as the firſt Punic War. Obſerve that Cedrenus, the Author of the Alexandrine Chronicle, Malala, Suidas, Glycas, and Conſtantinus Manaſſe, aſſert, that to get Cæſar out of his mother's womb, it was neceſſary to cut her open. Zonaras has confuted that falſhood (148). How was it poſſible for them not to know, that Cæſar's mother was ſtill alive, when he was married to Pompeia? Had they not read what he told her the day, on which the High-Prieſt was choſen (149)? Did they not know that ſhe took a great care of his education (150)? for ſhe was a learned and eloquent woman (151). She died when her ſon was in the war againſt the Gauls (152). I have pointed out the origin of that blunder (153).

[S] A ſupplement concerning his Commentaries.] In the firſt edition of this Dictionary I had only obſerved (154), that Voſſius has proved that Julius Cæſar, is the true Author of the Commentaries, which are aſcribed to him, but now I will enlarge a little more upon that ſubject. Francis Floridus maintained, that the three books of the civil war were not written by Cæſar (155). Another maintained the ſame concerning the ſeven Books of the Gallic War (156). Voſſius obſerves that Lewis Caduccus (157) aſcribed them to Suetonius. But theſe are all ill-grounded opinions, which we can entirely confute by the authority of the ancient Authors, without being obliged to the anſwer that could be made, namely that theſe books of Cæſar have been loſt, ſince the ancient writers quoted them. They who think, that beſides his Commentaries, which are extant, Cæſar alſo wrote Ephemerides, which are loſt, are much more in the right; they contained a journal of his life. Servius has quoted from them a very remarkable circumſtance. Cujus Cæſar, ſays he (158), cum dimicaret in Gallia, & ab hoſte raptus equo ejus portaretur armatus, occurrit quidam ex hoſtibus, qui eum noſſet, & inſultans ait, Cecos Cæſar, quod Gallorum lingua, dimitte ſignificat; at ita factum eſt ut dimitteretur. Hoc autem ipſe Cæſar in Ephemeride ſua dicit, ubi propriam commemorat felicitatem. i. e. "When Cæſar was waging war in Gaul, "it happened that he was taken by the enemy, and "being carried on horſeback, armed, he was met by "one of the enemies, who knew him, and ſaid in "an inſulting manner, Cecos Cæſar; that word ſigni"fying

(134) In one of the remarks of the article TROY. N. B. Mr. Bayle has not given that article.

(135) See below a paſſage from Suetonius, quotation (139).

(136) Plinius, lib. 7. cap. 53. pag. 88.

(137) Which was afterwards called Julius (July) in honour to Cæſar.

(138) It was written by Joannes Glandorpius, and is intitled, Familiæ gentis Juliæ . . . concinnatæ, it was printed at Baſil in 1576, 8vo, by the care of Ambroſe Glandorpius, the Author's ſon. It was afterwards inſerted in 1589, into the Onomaſticon Hiſtoriæ Romanæ of the ſame Author.

(139) Suetonius in Cæſare, cap. 6.

(a) A long Gown which children wore till they were ſeventeen years old.

(140) Suetonius, ubi ſupra, cap. 1.

(141) Daughter of Quintus Pompeius Rufus.

(142) Plutarch. in Cæſare, pag. 712.

(143) Sueton. in Cæſare, cap. 6.

(144) Plut. in Cæſ. pag. 711. D. See alſo, in Ciceron. pag. 874.

(145) Virg. Æn. lib. 1. ver. 286.

(146) That is, Aſcanius, Æneas's ſon. For Virgil has ſaid (ibid. ver. 267.) At puer Aſcanius, cui nunc cognomen Iulo Additur.

(147) Servius, in An. lib. 1. ver. 286.

(148) See Dr. Bentley's Notes upon the Chronicle of Malala; See alſo Grævius's Suetonius, the 2d edit. 4to.

(149) See the remark [E] quotation (48).

(150) Tacit. de Orat. cap. 20.

(151) Glandorp. Onomaſt. pag. 426.

(152) Suetonius in Cæſ. cap. 26.

(153) In the marginal notes, num. (133).

(154) See the cloſe of the remark [G].

(155) Fr. Floridus Sabinus, Subciſivar. Lect. lib. 1. cap. 3. & lib. 2. apud Voſſium, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 62.

(156) Ludov. Carrio, apud Voſſium, ibid.

(157) He ſhould have ſaid Caduceus. See below quotation (165).

(158) Servius in Æn. lib. 11. ver. 743.

tioned in another place (p) ſomething concerning his Apotheoſis.

(p) See the remark [D] of the article DOLABELLA, and the Penſées diverſes ſur les Comètes, num. 82, 83.

" fying in the language of the Gauls, let him go, Cæ-
" ſar was thereupon diſmiſſed. This is what Cæſar
" himſelf relates in his journal, when he gives an ac" count of his good luck." It is very probable that when Plutarch quoted Cæſar's Ephemerides (159), he did not mean the Commentaries, but the ſame work, to which Servius refers us. I know that what he relates in that paſſage, is to be found in the fourth book of Cæſar's Commentaries. But that warrior muſt needs have mentioned often the ſame things, both in his Journal, and in his Commentaries. We may therefore affirm, that Plutarch meant the Ephemerides, and that if he had quoted the Commentaries, he would have made uſe of the word ὑπομνήματα, as Strabo has done (160). Let us remark alſo, that Appian has quoted the ſame Ephemerides, in the following words. Καίσαρ ἐν ταῖς ἰδίαις ἀναγραφαῖς τῶν ἰφημερίων ἔργων φησὶ (161). It is beſides very probable that Polyænus had peruſed them, for he relates ſeveral of Cæſar's ſtratagems, which are not mentioned in the Commentaries. The ſame may be ſaid of Frontinus. See Dionyſius Voſſius's remarks (162), printed in 1697, with Cæſar's Commentaries, and with a book, to which they have given the title of Julius Celſus de Vita & Rebus geſtis C. Julii Cæſaris (a), and which had been printed in the year 1473. It was grown ſo ſcarce, that the Author, who wrote the Commentary upon Julius Cæſar's work for the Dauphin could not find one at Paris. Grævius is of opinion, that this Author lived in the twelfth or even in the thirteenth Century (163). Obſerve, that there are ſome perſons, who imagine, that Oroſius aſcribes Cæſar's Commentaries to Suetonius, when he makes uſe of theſe expreſſions. Hanc hiſtoriam (De Cæſaris bello Gallico) Suetonius tranquillus pleniſſime explicuit, cujus nos competentes portiunculas decerpſimus (164). i. e. " Suetonius Tranquillus has given a full " account of this Hiſtory (of Cæſar's wars in Gaul), " of which we have tranſcribed the neceſſary paſſages." This was Savaro's opinion, as appears by the manner in which he explains thoſe words of Sidonius Apollinaris. Quis opera Suetonii, id eſt, ſays Savaro (165), Vitam Julii Cæſaris, & Libros de Bello Gallico, quos Suetonio aſſerit Oroſius, lib. 6, cap. 7, & ex eo, Hiſt. Miſcella. l. 6. ita viſum eſt Ludovico Caduceo, mihi propter eruditionem, & humanitatem amiciſſimo, in cujus commilitio multum me profeciſſe libere fateor. It would perhaps be better to ſay, that Suetonius had wrote a particular work concerning Cæſar's wars in Gaul, and that it was from ſuch a work Oroſius made his collections. Honeſt Mr. de Marolles has quoted wrong what he had read in Voſſius, from whom however he tranſcribes faithfully the blunder which I have obſerved (166). Lewis Caduceus . . . . maintains that the ſeven Books of the Gallic War were written by Suetonius, which he proves by theſe words in the ſeventh Chapter of his ſixth Book; Suetonius, ſays he, has related this at length in his Hiſtory of Cæſar's Wars in Gaul (167). Does he not inſinuate hereby that his pretended Lewis Caduceus publiſhed a work, which contains at leaſt ſix books? Is not this the way to put Bibliographers a hunting to no purpoſe?

I am acquainted with only three French tranſlations of Cæſar's Commentaries, that of Stephen de l'Aique, that of Blaiſe de Vigenere, and that of Mr. d'Ablancourt. The firſt was printed in 1531 (168), the ſecond in 1575, with a learned Commentary, it was reprinted in 1609, with ſome marginal Notes of Anthony de Bandole, who added alſo to it his Compariſon between Cæſar and Henry IV. Mr. d'Ablancourt's Tranſlation was printed for the firſt time about the year 1651, if I am not miſtaken.

(159) Plutarch. in Cæſare, pag. 718, D.

(160) Strabo, lib. 4. init.

(161) Appian. in Excerpt. Legat. pag. 159.

(162) pag. 3.

(a) See the new Menagiana, tom. 3. pag. 137, &c. CRIT. REM.

(163) See the Preface to Cæſar's Commentaries, edit. 1697.

(164) Oroſius, lib. 6. cap. 7. folio m. 246. verſo.

(164) Oroſius, lib. 6. cap. 7. folio m. 246, verſo.

(165) Savaro, in Epiſt. 14. lib. 9. Sidonii Apollin. pag. 606.

(166) Above, quotation (157).

(167) Mr. De Marolles, in his Life of J. Cæſar, prefixed to the 2d vol. of his Augmentation de l'Hiſtoire Romaine, pag. 289, &c.

(168) See the remark [B] of the article AQUÆUS.

CÆSARIUS (JOHN) a Phyſician and Philoſopher born at Juliers, lived in the ſixteenth Century. He read Lectures at Cologne (a), and publiſhed ſeveral Authors. He was very zealous, and ſpared no pains for the advancement of learning; but he was ſo far from getting any pecuniary advantage by his labours, that he fell into the utmoſt poverty in his old age, and would have died for want, had not his friends aſſiſted him [A]. Being ſuſpected of favouring the Lutheran Religion he was baniſhed from Cologne in 1543 (b), and retired into the houſe of the Count of Nuwenar and Meurs, where he died in 1550, being above fourſcore and ten years old. Some ſay, that he returned at laſt to the Roman Catholic Religion, and that dying at Cologne in 1551, he was buried in the church of the Convent of the Hieronymites near the great altar (c); they put a long epitaph (d) upon his tomb, in which it was ſaid among other things, that he had never been married. Alexander Hegius, whoſe ſcholar he had been at Deventer, having refuſed, on account of his great age, to take upon him the direction of the ſchool, which was founded at Munſter (e) towards the latter end of the fifteenth Century, propoſed Cæſarius for that employment (f). He propoſed alſo ſome other learned men, and amongſt them Timanus Camener, who was choſen.

(a) See the remark [A].

(b) Chytræus in Saxoniâ, lib. 16. initio.

(c) Valer. Andreas, Bibl. Belg. pag. 479.

(d) It is to be ſeen in Valer. Andreas, Bibl. Belg. pag. 479.

(e) Chytræus in Saxonia, pag. 80.

(f) Idem, ibid.

[A] He would have died for want, had not his friends aſſiſted him.] This is no doubt the ſenſe, which we may put upon the following Latin words of John Sturmius. Floruerunt aliquando in hac civitate (Coloniæ) literæ, cum in ea Sobius, & Cæſarius, & Phryſemius docerent, . . ſimulque cum Magiſtris atque Doctoribus vetus frequentia diſcipulorum ſublata eſt. Sobium vis morbi nobis abſtulit: Phryſemius, quoniam nullum refugium in noſtris ſtudiis eſſe videbat, ad Juriſprudentiæ portum confugit, & juris quam ſapientiæ conſultus eſſe maluit. Senex adhuc ibi eſt, atque omnium noſtrûm tanquam parens Cæſarius: qui in hâc affectâ ætate, poſt tot tantorumque laborum defunctionem, niſi ab amicis ſuſtentaretur, viderent eum literæ egentem, quas ipſe ſemper ornavit, ſemperque maximi fecit (1). i. e. " The ſciences flouriſhed for ſome " time in this city (Cologne), when Sobius, Cæſa-
" rius, and Phryſemius taught there. . . . But the an" cient concourſe of Scholars vaniſhed away with the " Maſters and Doctors. Sobius died of ſickneſs:
" Phryſemius finding that there was nothing to do
" in our way of learning, applied himſelf to the ſtu-
" dy of the Law, and choſe to be verſed in that ra" ther than in Philoſophy. There is ſtill an old " man living there, I mean, Cæſarius, who is as the " father of us all; but who in his old age, after ſo
" many and ſo great labours, and notwithſtanding his " application to the ſciences, which he always im" proved and highly eſteemed, would want the neceſ-
" ſaries of life, were he not aſſiſted by his friends."

(1) Joannes Sturmius, Epiſt. Dedicat. tom. 2. Orationum Ciceronis. It is not dated; but we muſt ſuppoſe, it was written in 1540.

CAIN, the eldeſt ſon of Adam and Eve, was an Huſband-man. He offered to God the fruits of the earth, at the ſame time that his brother Abel, who was a Shepherd, offered up the firſtlings of his flock. God was well-pleaſed with the offerings of Abel, but had no regard for thoſe of Cain; upon which the latter was ſo highly exaſperated, that without having the leaſt reſpect for the remonſtrance, which God made to him, he killed his brother. By the ſentence, which God pronounced againſt him, he was condemned to baniſhment and a vagabond ſtate of life; which made him apprehenſive, that every one who found him ſhould kill him [A]. But to calm this fear, God had the goodneſs to ſet a mark on him, to prevent thoſe who ſhould find him from killing him [B]. Cain retired to the land of Nod on the Eaſt of Eden, and built a city, to which he gave the name of his ſon Enoch. This is all that can be ſaid of him with any certainty, there being no more concerning him in the Book of Geneſis (a). The other things which are related of him in abundance are no other than conjectures, or imaginary fancies, or traditions of the utmoſt uncertainty. We have elſewhere (b) mentioned ſeveral things of this nature which relate to him; but we ſhould never have (a) In the 4th Chapter.

(b) In the articles of ABEL, ADAM and EVE.

EXAMINATION of ſome difficulties concerning PRÆADAMITES.

[A] He was afraid leſt every one who found him ſhould kill him.] This language ſeems to ſuppoſe, that Cain was perſuaded there were inhabitants throughout the whole earth; for a man who believed that the human ſpecies was wholly comprehended in the family of Adam, would have found no better means of avoiding being killed, than to remove far off from that family: but on the contrary, here is Cain, who ſeems to fear no murtherer, provided he removes not from them; he is afraid of being ſlain only in caſe he be a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth (1). I own this difficulty is not a very great one; but we ought not to take it amiſs that libertines make the moſt of it, ſince it is certain that there is no ſect of Chriſtians, who would not urge it vigorouſly againſt the others, if they differed from the others in that point. I hardly meet with one, who, to refute this objection of the Præ-Adamites, has not recourſe to the fecundity of Eve, and does not calculate how many children might come as well from her as from her daughters in the ſpace of a hundred years; but methinks this is not going to the point, becauſe it is to ſuppoſe that Cain was afraid of his brothers and nephews. But this was not what he was afraid of; for, as I have already ſaid, if it had been the foundation of his fear, he would have deſired no better than to baniſh himſelf, and he would not have looked on the exile to which God condemned him as a puniſhment greater than he could bear (2). They were the inhabitants of diſtant countries, therefore, whom he was afraid of; unknown people, and engaged by no tie of kindred to him. I ſhould therefore be apt to ſay, that the remorſe of his conſcience, and the fearful idea he had formed to himſelf of his baniſhment, made him forget what his father had, without doubt, ſeveral times told him concerning the origin of mankind. And perhaps he only feigned an apprehenſion of meeting with aſſaſſins every where in far countries: perhaps, I ſay, he only feigned it, in order to obtain a revocation, or commutation, of the puniſhment which God had inflicted on him. Men act in the ſame manner every day towards their Judges: they ſtrive to move their compaſſion, and to obtain ſome favour by exaggerating the rigour of their ſentence: they ſay more of it than they believe. And let me not be told that Cain was not ignorant enough to think he could conceal the bottom of his heart from God; for why ſhould we think him incapable of imitating his father, who had endeavoured to eſcape the eye of God, by hiding himſelf among the trees of the garden? Nay more; what means this anſwer of Cain's to God, I know not; am I my brother's keeper? Is it not the language of a man who thinks he is ſpeaking to another man, and that he may hide from him what he does not confeſs? Was it not an errant lie? God at that time made uſe of the behaviour of man, to accommodate himſelf to our weakneſs, and they anſwered that behaviour in ſuch a manner, that they ſeem to have taken him for a man in reality. But a ſtronger objection may be made me, which is to ſay that God, very far from diſabuſing Cain of the falſe ſuppoſition that there were men every where, ſeems to have confirmed him in it. And indeed, he does not give him this anſwer, Thou haſt no need to fear murderers in diſtant countries, for there is no body at all in thoſe places: he quiets his apprehenſions by giving him a mark to hinder thoſe who ſhould find him from killing him; which plainly ſuppoſes, that Cain might find people wherever his vagabond and fugitive life ſhould conduct his ſteps. I anſwer, that God contented himſelf with remedying what was moſt preſſing, that is the fear which this fratricide ſhewed of being ſlain by the firſt that met him. Now the ſhorteſt way to quiet the fear of a trembling ſoul who believes his life will become the prey of the firſt who can lay hands on him, is not to tell him that his relations are the only men in the world; it is to tell him in general, that none of thoſe who ſhall find him ſhall kill him. It is not my intention, however, to omit backing the foregoing anſwers by this other conſideration. Men in thoſe days lived ſeveral Centuries, and multiplied exceedingly. Cain without doubt had already ſeen proofs of this fecundity: there muſt neceſſarily therefore be a great number of people on the earth before he died: ſo that the mark which God gave him, when he ſent him into a country as yet uninhabited, was no ſuperfluous thing. I ſay nothing of the age he might be of when he made away with his brother; having ſpoken of it elſewhere: thoſe who ſuppoſe him to be no more than thirty or forty years old (3), and who ſay that neither he nor Abel were yet married (4), are not perhaps much miſtaken; but, according to this hypotheſis, it would be more ſurprizing that Cain ſhould ground his apprehenſions on the men whom he knew. Adam was not a man to put one of his ſons to death, to revenge the death of another of his children; and it was not to be preſumed that the other children of Adam would kill one brother, to revenge the death of another brother. There is no conſiderate family in which they would act in that manner; and this ſeems to be the reaſon why God would take immediate cognizance of this cauſe, and content himſelf with baniſhing the criminal. He thereby accommodated himſelf to our nature: in ſuch a caſe, families chuſe to be neither judges nor proſecutors, and content themſelves with not ſeeing the murderer. The children of Abel only, if he had any, could inſpire any fear; but, once more, it was not his relations that Cain was afraid of: he was afraid of the firſt who ſhould meet him in a ſtrange country: he would appear there deſtitute of all ſupport, without relations, without friends, without knowing the roads or places: he imagined that ſuch a ſtate would inſpire every one with the boldneſs to attack him, and the hopes of killing him with impunity. He ſaw not the ſame reaſons of fear in a country which he knew, and in the midſt of his kindred. There lies the knot of the affair.

(1) Gen. iv. 14.

(2) Ibid. ver. 13.

(3) Cunæus, de Republic. Hebræor. lib. 1. cap. 1. puts 100 years between the death of Abel and the birth of Seth, which happened in the 130th year of Adam's life.

(4) See Remark [F] of the Article ABEL.

[B] God ſet a mark on him, to prevent thoſe who ſhould find him from killing him.] Opinions differ vaſtly on this head. Some imagine that God imprinted a letter on Cain's forehead, and that this print was the paſſport by means of which that vagabond might go through the whole earth, without fear of being ſlain. This letter was taken either from the name of Abel (5), or from the ineffable name of God (6), the Tetragrammaton which was of ſo great efficacy. But others will have it to have been taken from the word Repentance, that every one might ſee that Cain had repented. Others ſuppoſe that this mark conſiſted in the three letters which compoſe the name of the Sabbath day, or in the ſign of the Croſs (7). Others ſay that the dog which guarded Abel's flock was given to Cain, for a conſtant companion in his travels (8); either that every one might know by that ſign that he muſt not attack Cain, or elſe that by following ſuch a guide Cain might never take any dangerous road (9). Others ſay that the leproſy covered all his forehead, and his whole face (10). Others imagine that this mark was no other than a wild aſpect, with bloody eyes, which rolled in a horrid manner (11). Others ſay that he became ſubject to ſuch a trembling of body, that he could ſcarce get his meat and drink to his mouth (12). The Verſion of the Septuagint favours this opinion; for they have tranſlated, not thou ſhalt be a fugitive and a vagabond, but thou ſhalt be lamenting and trembling, στένων καὶ τρέμων. There are ſome, who ſay, that wherever

(5) Veteres Hebræi, apud Genebrardum.

(6) Vide Salden. Ot. Theol. pag. 345.

(7) Ibid.

(8) Ibid.

(9) Cornel. a Lapide, in Geneſ. cap. 4.

(10) Salden. Ot. Theol. pag. 345.

(11) Apud Salian. tom. 1. pag. 192.

(12) Procopius, in Geneſ. cap. 4. See likewiſe St. Jerom, Epiſt. 125. ad Damaſum.

have done, if we were to ſet down the reſt. What has there not been ſaid as to the reaſons for which it is pretended his offering was rejected by God [C]? Who would believe Joſephus capable of giving this reaſon, viz. that Cain offered not, as his brother did, things which are produced naturally, that is to ſay animals, but things which the labour and avarice of man cauſe to be produced forcibly, that is to ſay grain and fruits (c)? Does not a Jew, who reaſons in this manner, ſeem to have forgotten the grounds of his Religion? Were not the offerings of the firſt-fruits ordained by the Law of Moſes? If the reaſons alledged by Philo (d) were a fact well ſupported, they would be preferable to the reaſon given by Joſephus. This laſt Author tells one thing which is very probable; that Cain did not amend his life in his exile, but on the contrary grew more wicked (e): he ſatisfied his paſſions at the expence of others, and enriched himſelf by the ſpoil of his neighbour with a thouſand acts of violence. Joſephus attributes to him the invention of meaſures, weights, and boundaries. All this was very ſeaſonable among people whom Cain's example accuſtomed to all ſorts of injuſtice [D]. We cannot tell preciſely how many brothers and ſiſters he had, when he killed Abel; however it is not to be doubted but thoſe who ſay there were then no more than four perſons in the world, are miſtaken [E]; for though it were true, ever he ſtopped, there was an earthquake all around him (13). What ſtrange fancies! To conclude, there are ſome who ſay he had a horn grew on his forehead (14), not of the nature of thoſe metaphorical horns, which ſucceeding Ages have attributed to huſbands diſhonoured by their wives infidelity, but a horn properly ſo called, which ſerved as a ſignal to other men, that they ſhould not come near him: Fœnum habet in cornu, longè fuge (15). Metaphorical horns could only have aggravated his puniſhment; they were anciently wiſhed to malefactors, as appears from a paſſage of Job (16); but Cain's mark was given him as a benefit; it was to ſerve him for a ſafe-guard.

(c) Joſeph. Antiquit. lib. 1. cap. 2.

(d) See the Remark [C].

(e) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 1. cap. 2.

(13) Apud Saldenum, Ot. Theol. pag. 345.
(14) Apud Salianum, tom. 1. pag. 192.
(15) Horat. Sat. 4. lib. 1.
(16) Cap. 31. ver. 10. Vide Druſium, Quæſt. Ebraic. 38. lib. 2. See the Remark [B] of the Article ÆGIALEA.

[C] What has there not been ſaid as to the reaſons for which it is pretended that his offering was rejected by God?] It is gueſs-work only, and beating the air, to ſpend one's time in ſeeking after the outward defects which might be in the offerings of Cain. Perhaps nothing was wanting in them in that reſpect (17): perhaps he forgot only the good diſpoſitions of the heart, which are principally regarded by God. We ſee that St. Paul attributes to the faith of Abel alone the ſuperiority which he had over his brother (18). However it be, three great defects have been reckoned up in Cain's oblation. I, That he was very ſlow in making it; II, That he offered not the firſt fruits; III, That he choſe not the beſt. It is Philo who has given this cenſure. The ancient Fathers have had a good deal of regard to it; for to ſay nothing of St. Ambroſe, who has been a great follower of Philo, I obſerve that St. Cyrill (19) accuſes Cain of having reſerved for his own eating and pleaſures all the fineſt fruits which the earth yielded him, and having deſigned the worſt only for God, ſuch as the thinneſt ears of corn, and the moſt worm-eaten apples (20); for our Author has deſcended to theſe minute particulars. How many times in books and ſermons have they been compared to Cain, who ſend to the Nunneries only the ugliеſt and ſtupideſt girls, and keep thoſe who have any wit and beauty for the world? And yet, is there any thing leſs certain than what St. Cyril advances? Is it not evident that Philo is miſtaken in reſpect to the firſt defect, ſince the Scripture takes notice that Abel did not offer the firſtlings of his flock, but at the ſame time that Cain preſented of the fruits of the earth? I ſhall obſerve, by the way, that this retrograde Latin verſe,

(17) See Fagius in Geneſ. cap. 4.
(18) Heb. xi. 4.
(19) Apud Salianum, pag. 186.
(20) Biſſelius, Illuſt. Ruin. Decad. 1. pag. 220.

Sacrum pingue dabo, nec macrum ſacrificabo, is Politian's. Theſe words are to be ſeen in a picture which repreſents the ſacrifice offered by theſe two brothers to God; they are to be ſeen, I ſay, in that picture in the firſt cloiſter of Madonna la Novella at Florence. The two brothers are ſituated, in reſpect to the Inſcription as they ſhould be, that each may find his proper ſenſe (21).

(21) Mabillon, Muſeum Ital. tom. 1. pag. 162.

[D] The example of Cain accuſtomed people to all kinds of injuſtice.] Joſephus aſſerts that Cain was a voluptuous man, and a robber, and that his deſcendants only grew worſe and worſe. Add to what he has ſaid of them the deſcription which Methodius has left of the manners of that race of mortals (22), and you will find it was not without reaſon that the city of Enochia, built by Cain, has been compared to that which a King of Macedon cauſed to be built for the reception of all ſorts of profligate people: on which account he gave it the name of Poneropolis, or the City of wickedneſs. Lewdneſs made ſo horrid a progreſs among the deſcendants of Cain, that not contented with robbing one another of their matrimonial rights, and enjoying their miſtreſſes in public, and in the ſight of every one who had a mind to be witneſs of it, they leaped over all the bounds of nature, and abandoned themſelves, as well men as women, to the ſin of Non-Conformity. Furere mortales ac ruere lymphatis ſimiles in quicquid dictu ſcriptuque fœdum eſt, ac non ſufficientibus ad probra noctium tenebris aut cubiculorum ſolitudinibus, connectere turpitudini dierum ſpatia, populique præſentiam & oculos infandâ conſuetudine fœdare . . . . Sed illius temporis longius adhuc multò ſunt abrepta dedecora, quam quæ finibus limitibuſque naturæ continerentur. Superaret fidem, niſi Methodius affirmaret, auctor ſanè gravis ac ſanctus, cœpiſſe jam tum quod poſtea divinus Paulus deploravit in idololatris, ut in maſculos maſculi turpitudinem exercerent, & in fœminas fœminæ, Leſbiis flammis exardeſcerent (23). All theſe things were done before the world had laſted more than ſix hundred years. The Author whom I have juſt quoted gives us (24) the very words of Methodius, as he found them in the notes of his brother Jeſuit Raderus on the Alexandrian Chronicle. I ſhall here take notice of a thing which is but too common: no ſooner has a man rendered himſelf infamous by his ill actions, but even the good things which he has done are condemned. Cain is an example of this. Nothing was more neceſſary in ſo diſorderly a city as his, than the uſe of weights and meaſures; yet is not Joſephus inconſiderate enough to make it a crime in him to have introduced the uſe of them? He has confounded things which it was eaſy to diſtinguiſh. He thought, becauſe weights and meaſures ſavour not of ſimplicity or honeſty, that he who had invented them had corrupted the ancient candour of mankind, and had taught them cunning, and new methods of cheating. But who ſees not, on the contrary, that corruption had preceded the uſe of weights and meaſures, and that their introduction was neceſſary as a remedy for fraud? Cain acted herein as thoſe tyrants do, who having occaſioned a thouſand diſorders, do for all that make good laws to ſtop the progreſs of them. In a word, Joſephus minded nothing leſs than what he was ſaying.

(22) The book which goes about under his name concerning theſe matters, is ſuppoſititious.
(23) Biſſelius, Ruin. illuſtr. Dec. 1. pag. 258.
(24) Idem, ibid. pag. 277.

[E] Thoſe who ſay there were . . . . but four perſons in the world, when he killed Abel, ... are in a miſtake.] This miſtake is a very old one: St. Auguſtin refutes it in the VIIIth chapter of the XVth book of the City of God, and in the firſt Queſtion on Geneſis. But St. Ambroſe, far from refuting it, runs into it headlong, in this apoſtrophe which he makes to Cain. Cur neſcis ubi eſt frater tuus? Soli eratis cum duobus parentibus, inter paucos frater te latere non debuit (25). i. e. "Why knoweſt thou not where thy brother is? "Ye were alone with your two parents; among "ſo few thy brother could not well be concealed from "thee." A figure of Rhetoric void of all truth. Several moderns have fallen into the ſame miſtake.

(25) Ambroſius, lib. 2. de Abele, cap. 9.

true, as ſome ſuppoſe (f), that Cain was but thirty years old when he committed that murder, there would be no room to doubt but that Eve had already lain in ſeveral times. I ſhall conclude with an old tradition concerning Cain's death. Being decrepit and blind, ſay they, he ſate down one day among ſome very thick buſhes (g); Lamech (b), who was then hunting, having notice that ſomething ſtirred in that place, ran thither, and thinking that a wild beaſt was lying there, let fly an arrow, and ſlew Cain. Some (i) place this event about the year of the world 701; and others in the year 875. Salianus the Jeſuit (k) embraces this laſt opinion, which he ſays is that of Pererius and Torniellus; whence we conclude, by the way, that Moreri is in the wrong to ſay, that according to Torniellus and Salianus, the murder of Cain by Lamech happened in the 688th year of the world. Toſtatus (l) makes Cain to have lived near eight hundred years. There are ſome who place his death under the year 931, and pretend that he was buried under the ruins of a houſe (m). Paulus Burgenſis (n), who makes him periſh in the deluge, did not mind what he was ſaying: this is to make him live almoſt 1656 years. There are ſome alſo who ſay he ſlew himſelf (o); and have the impertinence to conclude from thence, that God did not keep his word with him; becauſe he had promiſed him, ſay they, that no man ſhould kill him. It is falſe that God's promiſe was ſo expreſſed; it regarded only thoſe whom Cain ſeemed to be ſo much afraid of, that is to ſay, the men who ſhould light on him in his baniſhment.

(f) Cunæus, de Republ. Hebr. lib. 3. cap. 1.

(g) Rabbi Gedaliah in Shalſh. pag. 92. apud Heidegger. tom. 1. pag. 211.

(b) We ſhall ſpeak of this more amply under the word LAMECH.

(i) Apud Salianum, pag. 214.

(k) Pag. 216.

(l) Apud Salianum, pag. 214.

(m) St. Romuald, Abregé Chronol. citing Cedrenus.

(n) Apud Pererium, in Geneſ. cap. 4. ver. 23, 24.

(o) Armeni apud Guidonem Carmelitam, citante Prateolo in Elencho Hæreſ. pag. m. 63.

(26) Eccleſiæ primæ incunabula mundus vidit recens natus, cum in quatuor capitibus ſtaret humanum genus. Confeſtim enim impurus genius cui ex malis noſtris jucunda voluptas eſt, Caïnum a recta pietatis ſemita tranſverſum egit in omne nefas. . . . Gregem oppido exiguum hoc eſt quatuor oves in tantâ mundi vaſtitate agebat magnus ille paſtor: unum ex his lupus hic abſtulit. That is, "The new born "world ſaw the infancy of the firſt Church, when mankind conſiſted of four "perſons. For immediately the impure Spirit, who takes high delight in "our miſeries, drove Cain aſide out of the ſtrait path of piety into all ſorts of "wickedneſs. . . . . The great ſhepherd, when there was ſuch vaſt room in "the world, drove an exceeding ſmall flock, of four ſheep only: and one of them "this wolf carried off." Cunæus, de Rep. Hebr. l. 3. cap. 1.

(27) In Comment. Belgico ad Geneſ. cap. 4. pag. 65. apud Saldenum, Ot. Theol. pag. 339.

Cunæus (26), and Burman are of that number. It is true, the laſt ſeems to have kept a back-door open, having ſaid (27) that Cain, by ſlaying Abel, had killed the fourth part of mankind who had a name in the world. If he is preſſed, he will ſay, that he has not excluded thoſe people whom the Scripture does not name. The ſubterfuge would be a weak one, and much leſs worthy of an ingenious man than this reflection of the ſame Author: As vaſt, ſays he, as the world was, it was too little for theſe two brothers. The following verſe of Juvenal might be applied here.

Unus Pellæo juveni non ſufficit orbis,
That is,
"One world ſuffic'd not the Pellæan youth," and ſeveral ſuch thoughts; but they will be more properly in their place in the article of ALEXANDER. The French Poet Malherbe ought to make his appearance on this occaſion: he has alſo been caught in the error I am refuting. He had, ſays his Hiſtorian, a great contempt for all men in general; and after relating the ſtory of Cain's ſin, and the death of Abel his brother, he ſaid to this effect; Behold a fine beginning, there were but three or four in the world, and one of them goes and kills his brother. What hopes could God entertain of mankind after this? Would he not have done better to have extirpated the race of them for ever from that very hour?

CAINITES [A], a Sect of Heretics which appeared in the ſecond Century, and had this name by reaſon of their great reſpect for Cain (a) [B]. Theſe people had drawn their abominable dogms out of the ſinks of the Gnoſtics (b), and were the ſpawn of Valentinus, of Nicolaus, and of Carpocrates. They admitted a great number of Genii, which they called Virtues, and which they ſaid were ſome of them more and others leſs powerful. They pretended that the Virtue which had produced Abel was of an Order much inferior to that which had produced Cain (c), and that this was the reaſon why Cain had the victory over Abel, and killed him [C]. They made profeſſion of honouring all thoſe

(a) Auguſt. de Hæreſ. cap. 18.

(b) Epiphan. Hæreſ. xxxviii.

(c) Tertul. de Præſcr. cap. 47.

[A] CAINITES.] They may alſo be called Cainians. Tertullian calls them Caïnæos (1), and Caïanam hæreſim (2). Several of the Fathers called them Caïanos (3), before St. Epiphanius made uſe of the word Καϊανοὶ. Wherefore Danæus (4) is in the wrong to think that St. Auguſtin, by calling them Caïanos, has retained the fault which the Copiers have ſuffered to ſlip into St. Epiphanius. Danæus, finding no analogy in the formation of Καϊανοὶ, ſuppoſes that St. Epiphanius had made uſe of the term Καϊνιανοὶ, or Καϊνοὶ, of which the tranſcribers, ſays he, have by miſtake made Καϊανοὶ. But all this criticiſm falls to the ground, ſo ſoon as one conſiders that the term Caïani was current before St. Auguſtin and St. Epiphanius wrote. I here, therefore, give my reader notice, that theſe heretics are alſo named Caïans.

(1) De Præſcript. cap. 47.
(2) Ibid. cap. 33.
(3) See Voſſius, Harmon. Evangel. pag. 218.
(4) In Auguſt. de Hæreſ. cap. 18.

[B] A Sect . . which had this name by reaſon of their great reſpect for Cain.] Theſe people were mad enough to believe that the Divinity, which commands in heaven and earth, having reſolved to puniſh Cain for the murder of Abel, could never catch him; and had neither ſtrength nor ſwiftneſs ſufficient for that purpoſe: at length, there were ſome etherial Powers, which protected him from the purſuit of this avenging God, and tranſported him to the firmament, hiding him in a place of ſafety in the age above, in ſuperno ſæculo (5). This was their language. The Author whom I cite, cites nobody.

(5) Biſſelius, Ruin. Illuſt. Dec. 1. pag. 269.

[C] They pretended that the Genius . . . of Abel was . . . inferior to that . . . of Cain, and that this was the reaſon why Cain had the victory over Abel.] This is conformable enough to the Pagan Doctrine concerning the particular Genius of each man. This ſort of genii were chiefly called Dæmons (6). It was pretended that the happineſs and fortune of a man depended on his tutelary Genius. A man was fortunate when his Genius had a very great power: on the contrary, a man was unfortunate when his Genius was weak, and incapable of withſtanding the Genius of other men. Every Genius did his beſt for the intereſts of his client; and if a man was beaten, it was a ſign that the ſtrength of his Genius had been forced to yield to that of the conqueror's Genius. One of theſe Genii proved to be of an order inferior to the other; and this was governed by chance: for as lots were appointed to be caſt for the ſouls which were ſent into the world, ſo the tutelary Genii of each perſon were to be drawn by lot (7). There were Genii whoſe aſcendant over others were ſuch, that they entirely diſconcerted them by their preſence. This is what the Genius of Auguſtus did to that of Mark Antony (8); and hence it comes to paſs that we ſee certain perſons have wit, ſpeak well, and rally genteely, in the abſence of ſome others, and appear much confounded when they have thoſe others to engage. People were perſuaded, no doubt, that thoſe) who attained the Empire, had a Genius of an eminent order; and from thence the great honours which were paid to ſuch Genii had their riſe (9). Nations

(6) See Dodwell, Prælect. 2. ad Spart. Hadrian. pag. 175.

(7) Idem, ibid. pag. 176.

(8) Ὁ σὸς δαίμων τὸν τούτου φοβεῖται, καὶ γαυρὸς ὢν καὶ ὑψηλὸς ὅταν ᾖ καθ' αὐτὸν, ὑπ' ἐκείνου γίνεται ταπεινότερος ἐγγίσαντος καὶ ἀγενέστερος. Hujus genium formidat genius tuus, qui erectus & celſus ubi ſolus eſt, illo appropinquante demiſſior redditur & ignavior. Aſtrologus Ægyptius ad M. Antonium, apud Plutarch. in Antonio, pag. 930.

(9) Dodwell. Prælect. II. ad Spartiani Hadrian. pag. 175, & ſeq.

thoſe who carry in Scripture the moſt viſible marks of reprobation; as the inhabitants of Sodom, Eſau, Corah, Dathan, and Abiram. They had in particular a very great veneration for the traytor Judas, under colour that the death of Jeſus Chriſt had ſaved mankind: for they imagined I know not what powers, enemies of our ſalvation, who would have hindred Jeſus Chriſt from ſuffering, if Judas had not prevented the effects of their malice, by delivering up his maſter to the Jews, who condemned him to death, whence proceeded the ſalvation of mankind (d). They carried their boldneſs ſo far as to condemn the Law of Moſes, and to regard the God of the Old Teſtament as a Being who had ſown tares in the world, and ſubjected our nature to a thouſand diſaſters; ſo that, to revenge themſelves, they did the direct contrary of what he had preſcribed. There was no carnal uncleanneſs into which they did not plunge themſelves, no crime wherein they did not believe they had a right to participate; for, according to their abominable principles, the way of ſalvation was diametrically oppoſite to the precepts of Scripture. They imagined that every ſenſual pleaſure was preſided over by ſome Genius: for which reaſon they failed not, when they prepared themſelves for any ill action, to invoke by name the Genius who had the ſuperintendance over the pleaſure they were going to taſte. When one reads theſe things in the Fathers of the Church, one can ſcarce help thinking that the ſame thing happened to them with regard to Heretics, as happened to the Pagans with regard to the Chriſtian Religion. The Pagans have imputed to them a hundred extravagances, and a hundred abominations, which had not the leaſt foundation. The firſt who forged theſe calumnies were without doubt guilty of the blackeſt malice; but the greater part of thoſe who related them after they had been maliciouſly ſpread abroad, were only guilty of too much credulity: they believed the common report, without being willing to take the pains to examine it. Is it more credible that the Fathers had all the patience which was neceſſary to inform themſelves exactly of the real ſentiments of a Sect, than it is credible that the ſame people, who taught that the death of Jeſus Chriſt had ſaved mankind, ſhould have taught that the moſt filthy pleaſures are the way to Paradiſe? Let who will decide this; I ſhall here act the relator only. But it muſt be remembred, that there is no abſurdity of which the mind of man is not ſuſceptible; and that in particular the dogm of a number of Genii, good and evil, ſome ſuperior to others, and ſet over divers charges, is ſufficiently within the reach of reaſon [D]. I add that the Cainites had forged a pretended Scripture (e): they tions and Cities had alſo their Genii (10). Now as theſe tutelary Dæmons were ſaid to preſide at the birth of him who was to be under their direction, there was no need to go far to paſs from this opinion to that of the Cainites. The latter added only, that the Genius formed the body of him whoſe protector he was to be. The Platoniſts, I think, might eaſily have been brought to believe this article, if it had been ſtrongly repreſented to them that the formation of a human body requires the direction of a very ſkilful intelligence. Concerning theſe tutelary Genii ſee Barthius's Notes on Rutilius Numatianus (11). If this hypotheſis is not abſolutely neceſſary to account for an infinite number of hiſtorical phænomena (give me leave to call human events by that name) it is at leaſt the moſt convenient, and the eaſieſt to comprehend. The reader will be leſs ſurprized to find here a Remark which ſavours too much of digreſſion, and a foreign ſoil; he will, I ſay, be leſs ſurprized, if he examines attentively the drift of the following Remark.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) Vide Baronium, ad ann. 145. num. 16. & Danæum in Auguſtin. de Hæreſib. cap. 18.

(10) Ibid. pag. 180.

(11) Ad lib. 1. Itinerarii, ver. 328. pag. m. 238, & ſeq.

[D] The dogm of a number of Genii . . . . is ſufficiently within the reach of reaſon.] We turn to ridicule the ſyſtem of the old Pagans, their Naiads, their Oreads, their Hamadryads, &c. and we go upon very ſure grounds when we condemn the worſhip which was paid to thoſe beings; for we know from Scripture, that God forbad all religious worſhip which was not directed immediately and ſolely to himſelf. But when we conſider human reaſon left to itſelf, and deprived of the aſſiſtance of the Scriptures, we may eaſily comprehend, methinks, that it ought to conceive this vaſt univerſe as penetrated throughout by a moſt active power, which knew what it did. Now to account for ſo many effects differing from one another, and even contrary to one another, which are ſeen in nature, it was neceſſary to imagine either a ſingle Being which diverſifies its operation according to the diverſity of bodies, or elſe a great number of Souls and Intelligences, each of them provided with a certain employment, and appointed to preſide ſome over the ſprings of rivers, others over mountains, others over woods &c. There were ſome people among the Pagans, who in the worſhip of Ceres and Bacchus profeſſed to honour the Supreme Being only, as the producer of corn and wine. Others profeſſed to worſhip the particular Intelligence which, in the diſtribution of the charges of the great Univerſe, had been intruſted with the ſuperintendance of the corn fields and vineyards. This foundation once laid, one knows not where to ſtop: the number of Gods becomes multiplied without end and without ceaſing; ſacrifices are offered to ſear, and to the ſeaver, to favourable winds, and to ſtorms (12): A Hierarchy ariſes, the degrees of which are innumerable; the combinations of intereſts are diverſified infinitely among theſe Intelligences which are not ſeen, and yet are admitted as cauſes exceedingly active. If I am aſked what I intend by this far fetched reflection, I anſwer, that I am clearing the way for thoſe who have a mind to defend the Fathers, accuſed of having imputed to heretics a hundred extravagant notions which no body ever taught. It is much more probable than one imagines, that people who think they reaſon well, may have admitted ſeveral principles, ſome good, and others bad, and a perpetual contraſt among Beings of unequal power, and ſubject to different inclinations. It is a great error, I own; but it preſents itſelf in ſeveral views, and it is very poſſible to fall into it. I am willing to believe that the Gnoſtics, and thoſe who reſemble them, explained themſelves ſo confuſedly, that one might happen to impute to them very candidly what they had not admitted as an article of their belief: yet I make no difficulty to believe that they did in the main admit thoſe Virtues and Principles which are attributed to them. By reaſoning conſequently, after having eſtabliſhed the agency of ſeveral Virtues, they might lay it down in particular that the Jewiſh nation had been directed by a miſchievous Being, and thence paſs into all the abominable impieties which are attributed to them with reſpect to the God of Abraham, of Iſaac, and of Jacob. Since I am got ſo far, I may as well make an end. The belief of Intelligences preſiding over divers charges in the univerſe, is of as great an extent as the belief of God: for I do not think that ever any people had a religion, without acknowledging ſome intermediate Intelligences. The moſt ſubtle Philoſophers, he who is called the Genius of nature (13), the Carteſians of the greateſt penetration, have acknowledged them. The followers

(12) Taurum Neptuno, taurum tibi, pulcher Apollo, Nigram hiemi pecudem, Zephyris felicibus album. Virg. Æneid. lib. 3. ver. 119.

(13) Ariſtotle.

they had, among other books, a Goſpel of Judas, and an Aſcenſion of St. Paul. They pretended to have in this Book the unſpeakable things, which that great Apoſtle had ſeen and heard, when he was rapt into the third Heaven.

REFLECTION on the ſubſtantial form of the Peripatetics.

EXPLICATION of the doctrine of ſome Carteſians concerning the formation of bodies.

of Ariſtotle place ſome of them every where, even at this day, without well perceiving it; for they place in all bodies a ſubſtantial form, which has for its portion a certain number of qualities, with which it accompliſhes its deſires (14), repels the enemy, and preſerves itſelf in the beſt manner it is able in its natural ſtate. Is not this to admit an intelligence in plants appointed to make a part of the univerſe vegetate, and acting for that end under the directions of the Supreme Being? So far are thoſe who deny the creation, ſo far are the Spinoziſts, from being able to deny theſe intelligences, that there is no ſyſtem, which introduces them more neceſſarily or more unavoidably than theirs. It would not be difficult to prove it to them; but this is not a matter proper for ſuch a book as this. In the ſyſtem of the creation, it is a great difficulty to admit intelligences which love evil, or which according to the idle imaginations of our Cainites, have the ſuperintendance of ſenſual pleaſures, as the Pagan Venus had the ſuperintendance of the pleaſures of love, even by the confeſſion of an Epicurean Poet (15). But in the ſyſtem, which denies the creation, it is a neceſſary conſequence, that there muſt be evil in the univerſe, altogether as ſoon as good, and miſchievous Genii, altogether as ſoon as beneficent.

(14) The term appetitus, exigentia, and the like, are of the ordinary ſtyle of the Peripatetics, when they ſpeak of the natural effects of bodies, either animate, or inanimate.

(15) See the Invocations of Venus at the beginning of Lucretius's Poem.

Leſt I ſhould be ſuſpected of having raſhly advanced what I have ſaid concerning the moſt able Carteſians, I deſire it may be obſerved, that the perſon among them, who has attributed the moſt to the ſimple and general volitions of God (16), very plainly inſinuates in ſeveral paſſages of his books, that there are a great number of occaſional cauſes, which we are ignorant of. Now theſe occaſional cauſes are nothing elſe but the wills and deſires of certain intelligences. They muſt neceſſarily be admitted wherever the laws of the communication of motion are not capable of producing certain effects. This goes a great way; one cannot conceive them ſufficient for the building of a ſhip; no man makes a difficulty of acknowledging that motion would never produce a clock, without the direction of a particular intelligence. Conſequently, thoſe laws are incapable of producing the leaſt plant, or the leaſt fruit: for there goes more artifice to the conſtruction of a tree, or of pomegranate, than to that of a ſhip. We muſt have recourſe therefore to the particular direction of an intelligence for the formation of vegetables, and much more for the formation of animals. As much of the laws of motion, figure, reſt, ſituation of particles, as you pleaſe. This will do ſo long as we have not ſeen forty: after which you find the moſt excellent Carteſians boldly acknowledge, that they begin to doubt of the ſufficiency of their principles. They then underſtand their Categories (17) as they ſhould do. It is true, ſay they, this is ſufficient to make a tree, or a clock, be what they are: but as motion alone by the general laws has not made, nor can make the pieces of a clock acquire the figure and ſituation which they have, never believe that the parts of a tree have acquired their ſituation and figure by the mere laws of motion. Once more, this goes a great way, and leads us to a Genius who preſides over the formation of animated machines. But are minerals and meteors very eaſy to produce? Is there not a great deal of artifice in their conſtruction? More than is imagined. The ſchool-men, inſtead of genius, or intelligence, make uſe of the words ſubſtantial form, plaſtic virtue, &c. but words do nothing.

(16) The Author of la Recherche de la Verité.

Bodinus has ſaid a thing, which ſhews that he admitted preſiding Genii, not only to preſerve, but alſo to produce all ſublunary Beings. There is ſome conſequence in this ſuppoſition: for the beſt means of intereſting an intelligence in the protection of a corporeal creature, is to give that intelligence the office of forming it, I mean of applying motion according to the ideas, which it has of the form of that creature, as Clock-makers and Architects do. Let us ſet down the words of Bodinus. Quemadmodum in republicâ benè conſtitutâ non minus ſunt neceſſarii Carnifices, Lictores, Veſpillones quam Magiſtratus, ac Judices, & Curatores, ſic in hac republicâ mundanâ Deus ipſe ad rerum generationem, procurationem, ac tutelam, Angelos locis omnibus cœleſtibus, elementaribus, animantibus, ſtirpibus, foſſibilibus, civitatibus, provinciis, familiis, ſingulis hominibus principes ac moderatores collocavit; neque hoc tantum, ſed etiam miniſtros, lictores, vindices, ultores locis omnibus diſpoſuit, qui nihil injuſſi faciunt nec pœnas ullas de hominibus conſceleratis ſumunt, niſi rebus judicatis & plenè cognitis (18). i. e. "As in a "well ordered Commonwealth, Executioners, Serjeants, and Carriers out of the dead, are no leſs neceſſary than Magiſtrates, Judges, and Guardians; "ſo in this mundane republic God himſelf for the "generation, converſation, and defence of things, has "appointed Angels as Princes and Governors in all "places cœleſtial and elementary, over animals, vegetables, foſſils, cities, provinces, families, and "ſingle men: nor this only, but he has alſo conſtituted inferior Miniſters, Serjeants, Vindicators, and "Avengers in all places, who do nothing without "bidding, nor puniſh wicked men, till things are "judged and fully examined."

(17) They are comprized in theſe two verſes. Mens, menſura, quies, motus, poſitura, figura, Sunt cum materiâ cunctarum exordia rerum. i. e. "Mind, meaſure, reſt, motion, poſition, figure, and matter, are the principles of all things." You ſee the ſpiritual nature, Mens, at the head of all. It muſt be conſidered as a tranſcendental nature, which runs thro' all the categories, quæ vagatur per omnes categorias.

(18) Bodin. in Univerſ. Naturæ Theatro, lib. 5. pag. 631, 632.

CAIUS or KAYE (JOHN), a learned Phyſician in the XVIth Century, and famous for his writings [A], eſpecially his Book upon the Antiquity of the Univerſity of Cambridge, was born in the city of Norwich in the year 1510 (a). His father, Robert Caius, was born in Yorkſhire, as we are informed by Dr. Fuller in his Hiſtory of the Univerſity of Cambridge ſince the Conqueſt (b). He began his ſtudies at Norwich, and then went to Cambridge to continue them, where he ſtudied Phyſic (c), and took the degree of (a) Bale, Illuſt. Scriptor. Major. Brytanniæ, Catal. p. 715. and Pits, de illuſtrib. Angliæ Scriptor. pag. 755. edit. Paris 1619; and Niceron, Memoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſt. des Hommes Illuſt. tom. 11. pag. 12. edit. Paris 1730.

(b) Pag. 133. §. 45. edit. London 1655, in fol.

(c) Pits, ubi ſupra.

[A] Famous for his writings.] We ſhall give a catalogue of them. I. De medendi Methodo ex Cl. Galeni, & Joannis Baptiſtæ Montani Veronenſis, principum Medicorum ſententiâ Libri duo. Baſileæ 1544 in 8vo. Lovanii 1556 in 8vo. Baſileæ 1558 in 8vo, with the Opuſcula of Montanus. Caius wrote this work in 1542, while he reſided in Italy. He follows in it entirely the principles of Galen and John Baptiſta Montanus, Profeſſor of Phyſic at Padua, under whom he had ſtudied for ſome time (1). II. Cl. Galeni Pergameni Libri aliquot Græci, partim hactenus non viſi, partim a mendis, quibus ſcatebant, innumeris ad vetuſtiſſimos codices repurgati, & integritati ſuæ reſtituti, annotationibuſque illuſtrati. Baſil 1544, in 4to. He reviſed theſe treatiſes in Italy, and publiſhed them after his return to England. Our Author in his Tract de Libris propriis applauds himſelf on account of the corrections, which he had made in Galen, and the edition which he had publiſhed of ſome of his works, and tells us, that it was extremely ſought after, and that his obſervations were tranſcribed almoſt word for word in the edition at Lyons 1551 (2). III. Galeni Liber de Sanitate tuendâ. Baſil 1549 in 12mo. There is no Commentary in this edition. Our Author wrote one afterwards, which he ſent to Baſil in 1563, to be printed there, but this edition never appeared. IV. De Ephemerâ Britannicâ Liber. London 1551 in 12mo. This is a Treatiſe upon the Engliſh Sweating-Sickneſs, which proved fatal to a great number of Perſons in this year 1551. Our Author call'd it Ephemera, becauſe the diſeaſe continued but for one day. He wrote this book ex tempore, but he afterwards made conſiderable additions to it, and divided it into two books. It was printed in that form at London 1721 in 8vo, and in the following collection of his Tracts. V. Opera aliquot & Verſiones, videlicet, de Medendi Methodo Libri

(1) Niceron, Memoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſt. des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 11. pag. 13. edit. Paris 1730.

(2) Idem, pag. 13, 14.

of Doctor in that Faculty (d), and wrote ſeveral pieces, while he was young. He afwards travelled into Italy in order to perfect himſelf in his ſtudies, and at Padua attended the lectures of John Baptiſta Montanus of Verona, a very celebrated Phyſician of that time; and by means of an uncommon application added to the ſtrength and vivacity of his genius, he made ſo great a progreſs in the ſtudy of Phyſic, that he might juſtly be ranked with the greateſt Phyſicians of that age. The greateſt part of thoſe Tracts, which he had written in his youth, were loſt in England, during his reſidence in Italy; but he makes ſome mention of them in his Book de Ephemerâ Britannicâ (e). He ſearched a great number of Libraries, and diſcovered the writings of ſeveral Authors, which were almoſt deſtroyed, and publiſhed them with his emendations (f). Upon his return to England, he was made ſucceſſively Phyſician to King Edward the VIth (g), Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth (h). He had ſo great zeal for the intereſts of learning, that he improved the ancient Hall of Gonvil into a new College, which was afterwards called Gonvil and Caius College, and gave a perpetual allowance for twenty three ſtudents (i). Pits informs us (k), that he was not conſtant in his ſentiments of Religion, but that in the ſeveral revolutions, which happened in his time in England, he always conformed himſelf to the Religion of the reigning Prince. Dr. Fuller obſerves that he was reported by ſome perſons to have continued a Papiſt in his heart; which that Writer obſerves to be no crime in him, conſidering the time when he was born, and the foreign places, wherein he was educated. However, he never mentions Proteſtants but with due reſpect, and ſometimes occaſionally condemns the ſuperſtitious credulity of Popiſh Miracles (l). Beſides, after he had reſigned the Maſterſhip of his College to Dr. Thomas Legg, he lived as a Fellow-Commoner there, and having built himſelf a little ſeat in the Chapel, was conſtantly preſent at Proteſtant Prayers (m). However Mr. Strype aſſures, that his Religion was very juſtly ſuſpected [B]. He died in the

(d) Niceron, ubi ſupra.

(e) Pits, ubi ſupra.
(f) Idem, ibid.

(g) Niceron, ubi ſupra.
(h) Fuller, pag. 133, 134.

(i) Camden's Annals of Elizabeth, ad ann. 1573.

(k) Pag. 756.

(l) Hiſt. Cantabrig. Academ. lib. 1. pag. 8. Quanquam illius ævi Cæcitas admirationem, &c.

(m) Fuller, pag. 134.

Libri duo. De Ephemerâ Britannicâ. Galenus de Libris ſuis & Librorum Ordine Libri duo. De Ratione Victûs Hippocratis in morbis acutis. De Placitis Hippocratis & Platonis. Lovain 1556 in 8vo. VI. Galeni Libri de Oſſibus, de Ptyſſanâ &c. Baſil 1557 in 8vo. VII. De Canibus Britannicis Liber unus, De rariorum Animalium & Stirpium Hiſtoria Liber unus. De Libris propriis Liber unus. London 1570 in 12mo. The Treatiſe de Canibus Britannicis has been reprinted with Chriſtian Francis Paullinus's Cynographia curioſa ſeu Canis deſcriptio, at Nuremberg 1685 in 4to, and in the Collection of Authors, which have written upon Hunting, publiſhed at Leyden 1728 in 4to (3). And the Tracts mentioned in this and the following number were publiſhed by Samuel Jebb M. D. at London 1728 in 8vo. VIII. De Pronuntiatione Græcæ & Latinæ Linguæ cum Scriptione novâ. London 1574 (4) in 4to. IX. De Antiquitate Academiæ Cantabrigienſis Libri duo. London 1568 in 8vo, and 1574 in 4to. When Queen Elizabeth viſited the Univerſity of Cambridge in 1560, the public Orator made a ſpeech to her, in which among other things he aſſerted, that this Univerſity was more ancient than that of Oxford. This Speech made a great deal of noiſe at Oxford, and Mr. Thomas Key, Maſter of Univerſity-College there, wrote a Tract againſt it, intitled, Aſſertio Antiquitatis Oxonienſis Academiæ, printed at London 1568 in 8vo. Upon this our Author Caius reſolved to confute Mr. Key's Book, and publiſhed the firſt edition of the Treatiſe abovementioned under the feigned name of Londinenſis. This provoked Mr. Key to write a Reply, which he communicated to ſeveral of his friends under the title, as Biſhop Nicholſon tells us (5), of Examen Judicii Cantabrigienſis cujuſdam, qui ſe Londinenſem dicit, nuper de Origine utriuſque Academiæ lati; or, as Father Niceron obſerves (6), under the title of Animadverſiones aliquot in Londinenſis de Antiquitate Cantabrigienſis Academiæ Libros duos. But Mr. Key did not live to publiſh this Tract, he dying in 1572; however this manuſcript having paſſed thro' ſeveral hands, came at laſt into thoſe of Mr. Thomas Hearne, who publiſhed it at Oxford 1731 8vo, with ſeveral other pieces. Our Author Caius put his name to the ſecond edition of his Book in 1574 in 4to; in which he endeavours to eſtabliſh the aſſertion of the Antiquity of the Univerſity of Cambridge, from the Charters of King Arthur and King Cadwallader, together with thoſe of the Popes Honorius and Sergius. He then proceeds to confute the arguments urged in favour of the Seniority of the Univerſity of Oxford (7). Biſhop Nicholſon (8) tells us, that he ſeems to have intended a much larger Hiſtory of the Univerſity of Cambridge, than is given in this Book; for ſpeaking of the frequent depopulations and miſeries of the town during the wars between the Saxons and Danes he concludes thus; De quibus in Libris noſtris de Hiſtoria Cantabrigienſis Academiæ explicatius egimus: i. e. "Of which we have treated "more amply and particularly in our Treatiſe con- "cerning the Hiſtory of the Univerſity of Cambridge." And Biſhop Nicholſon is very confident, that a good part of the Collections, which he made for this purpoſe, are ſtill in Sir John Cotton's Library, where we are told of a volume of Collectanea ex Antiquis Rotulis & variis Auctoribus de Academiâ Cantabrigienſi, ejus Antiquitate & Privilegiis, cum multis Literis Originalibus ejuſdem Academiæ ad Regem Henricum VIII, Thomam Cromwellum, &c. i. e. "Collections from the "antient Rolls and various Authors concerning the U- "niverſity of Cambridge, its Antiquity and Privileges, "with many original Letters of that Univerſity to "King Henry VIII, Thomas Cromwell, &c." From this paſſage it appears, that Biſhop Nicholſon did not know, that our Author's Hiſtory of the Univerſity of Cambridge was ever actually printed, as it was at London 1574 in 4to under the following title (10); Hiſtoria Cantabrigienſis Academiæ ab urbe conditâ, duobus Libris. He wrote a great many other books, which are either loſt, or have never been publiſh'd; and Pits in his book de illuſtribus Angliæ Scriptoribus (11) informs us, that he corrected Cornelius Celſus's works in many places, where they were corrupt, and added Notes and Arguments to them, and tranſlated all Galen's Works from the Greek into Latin; and wrote a Treatiſe de Thermis Bathonienſibus. Mr. Gibſon, now Biſhop of London, in his edition of Cambden's Britannia, publiſhed at London in 1695 tells us, that Dr. Fuller reports, that our Author wrote the Antiquities of Norwich. "But I ſuſpect, ſays Biſhop Nicholſon (12), "there is ſome miſtake in that matter, ſince Fuller "in the (e) place, where he ſhould eſpecially have "noted ſuch a thing, ſays nothing of it."

[B] However Mr. Strype aſſures us, that his Religion was very juſtly ſuſpected.] That Hiſtorian in the Life and Acts of Matthew Parker, Archbiſhop of Canterbury (13), informs us that in December 1565 there was a caſe referred to the Archbiſhop between Dr. Caius and the Fellows of the College, of which he was both Maſter and Founder; and that the Maſter had in a fit of anger taken ſome advantage againſt three of the Fellows, Dethike, Spencer, and Clerk, for ſome breach of the Statutes, and expelled them, charging them alſo with perjury. They appealed to the Archbiſhop, but not in ſo regular a manner as they ought to have done. His Grace ſaw that Dr. Caius had been to blame as well as the Fellows; upon which he reprimanded them both, but the Maſter moſt ſeverely, who was however willing to commit the final iſſue to the Archbiſhop's deciſion. But the Fellows refuſed,

(3) Idem, pag. 14, 15.

(4) Niceron, pag. 15. erroneouſly ſays 1674.

(5) Engliſh Hiſtorical Library, Part 2. pag. 211. edit. London 1697, in 8vo.
(6) Tom. 20. pag. 7. edit. Paris 1732.

(7) Nicholſon, pag. 220.
(8) pag. 220, 221.

(9) Bibl. Cotton. Fauſtina, cap. 3.

(10) See Niceron, tom. 11. p. 16.

(11) Pag. 756. edit. Paris 1619, in 4to.

(12) Engliſh Hiſtorical Library, Part 1. pag. 50.
(e) Worthies in Norwich, pag. 275.

(13) Book 3. cap. 4. pag. 199, & ſeqq. edit. London 1711, in fol.

(n) Camden's Annals of Elizabeth, ad ann. 1573.

the year 1573 aged ſixty three years (n), and lies buried in the Chapel of his College under a plain tomb, with this inſcription, Fui Caius (o). Pits tells us (p), that he deſerved extremely well of Phyſic and the Profeſſors of that Faculty, and procured himſelf an immortal honour by his learned Writings.

(o) Idem, ibid. and Fuller, ubi ſupra.

(p) pag. 756.

and appealed to the Lord Burleigh, Chancellor of the Univerſity. The Fellows therefore drew up Articles againſt the Maſter, ſome of which made a great impreſſion upon the Archbiſhop, as not ſounding to a favouring Atheiſm, ſays Mr. Strype, but plainly expreſſing the ſame, with further ſhew of a perverſe ſtomach to the profeſſors of the Goſpel. Upon this the Archbiſhop declared, that if he were credibly perſuaded of theſe things, he would conſider Dr. Caius tanquam Ethnicum & Publicanum, and would not vouchſafe him within his houſe, whither he reſorted. And he aſſured the Chancellor of the Univerſity, that if the Articles could be well teſtified, he could wiſh a better Maſter in his place, and that Dr. Caius might hold himſelf in his Founderſhip, if he would; for he liked not, as he ſaid, ſtones builded by ſuch impiety. Mr. Strype obſerves upon this, that it is probable, that our Author thought proper to cover his former inſtability in Religion, by throwing out expreſſions occaſionally, whereby he would pretend to have had little zeal for any Religion; or that his aim might be to conceal his ſecret affection for the old Popiſh Religion. "For that he "had a kindneſs for it, ſays Mr. Strype, appeared in "his private reſervation of abundance of Popiſh trum-"pery, which he might think would come in play "again; and ſo out of good huſbandry preſerved them "to ſave the College the charge of buying new fur-"niture for the chapel." But in 1572 the whole affair was diſcovered; for the report of it coming to the ears of Dr. Edwin Sandys Biſhop of London, he wrote to Dr. Byng, Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity, to ſee that thoſe ſuperſtitious monuments might be aboliſhed. Dr. Byng could ſcarce be perſuaded that ſuch things had been reſerved by Dr. Caius. However cauſing Dr. Caius's own company to make ſearch in that College, he received an inventory of much Popiſh ware, as veſtments, albes, tunicles, ſtoles, manicles, &c. with ſuch other ſtuff as might have furniſhed divers Maſters at one inſtant. It was thought proper, with the conſent of all the Heads of the Houſes, to burn the books and ſuch other things, as ſerved moſt for idolatrous uſes, and to cauſe the reſt to be defaced; which was done on December 13th 1572. "But however Dr. "Caius ſtood affected this way, ſays the Hiſtorian a-"bove quoted, he laboured to diſſemble his good will "to it, and would be thought a good Proteſtant." This appeared from the following inſtance. There was one Depup, a ſcholar of his College in his time, who was greatly ſuſpected to be inclined to the Popiſh Religion, and well known to be extremely vicious. The Founder therefore at his death gave orders, that this ſcholar ſhould never be elected a Fellow, though Dr. Legg, his ſucceſſor, ſoon after he came to the College, brought Depup into a Fellowſhip. Theſe, concludes Mr. Strype, were ſome of Dr. Caius's defects, and others might be named; as that he too much affected ſuperiority over his Fellows, and was obſerved to be the firſt, that made the innovation of preferring a junior Fellow to be Preſident; whereas before, in that College the Senior Fellow was always Preſident; and that only in the Maſter's abſence. This was the cauſe of much ſtrife and contention afterwards in the College. . . . But the ſaid perſon having merited ſo much of that College by his noble benefactions, and of the whole commonwealth of learning, 'tis pity that theſe or any other frailties in him ſhould now, after ſo long a time, riſe up in judgment againſt him. T.

☞CALAMY (EDMUND), an eminent Preſbyterian Divine in the XVIIth Century, was born at London in February $1\frac{599}{600}$, and admitted into Pembroke Hall in Cambridge July the 4th 1616, in which Univerſity he took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1619, and of Bachelor of Divinity in 1632 (a). His inclination to the Anti-Arminian Party, hindered his preferment there at that time, tho' he was at laſt choſen Tanquam Socius of the College [A], and Dr. Felton Biſhop of Ely afterwards took notice of him, and made him his Chaplain (b). In this ſtation he purſued his ſtudies with great vigour [B]. He was firſt preſented to the Vicarage of St. Mary's in Swaffham-Prior in Cambridgeſhire by the Biſhop (c), after whoſe death in 1626 he was choſen Lecturer at St. Edmund's Bury in Suffolk (d), where he had Mr. Burroughs for his Collegue (e). Here he continued ten years (f), and is ſaid by ſome Writers to have been a very ſtrict Conformiſt [C]; but his grandſon, Dr. Calamy, aſſures us, that Biſhop Wren's ARTICLES and the Book of Sports obliged him and thirty other Miniſters to leave the Dioceſe. After Mr. Fenner's death he was preſented by Robert Earl of Warwick to the Rectory of Rochford in Eſſex (g); but

(a) From the Regiſter of the Univerſity of Cambridge.

(b) An Account of the Miniſters, &c. who were rejected or ſilenced after the Reſtoration in 1660, by or before the Act for Uniformity. By Edmund Calamy, D. D. vol. 2. pag. 5. 2d edit. London 1713, in 8vo.

(c) Continuat. of the Account, &c. vol. 1. pag. 8.

(d) Dr. Calamy's Account, ubi ſupra, and Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 281. 2d edit. London 1721.

(e) Dr. Calamy's Account, ubi ſupra.

(f) Idem, ibid. and Wood, ubi ſupra.

(g) Dr. Calamy's Account, pag. 5. and Wood, ubi ſupra.

[A] Tho' he was at laſt choſen Tanquam Socius of the College.] Dr. Henry Sampſon in a MS. relating to the Hiſtory of the Non-Conformiſts, in the hands of the late Dr. Edmund Calamy, informs us of this particular, and obſerves, that this was a place peculiar to that College, and firſt erected upon a competition between thoſe two great perſons, who afterwards proved ſo eminent in the Church, Biſhop Andrews and Biſhop Dove (1); where the former carried the Fellowſhip, but the Society being unwilling to part with the latter, and yet having no Fellowſhip vacant, founded this place of Tanquam Socius, who was to hold it for three years only, unleſs re-elected. His privileges were, beſides the Society of the Fellows, to have poma, pupilli, pileus; that is, his dividend in the Garden, leave to take pupils, and the honour of capping; but he was not allowed any ſhare of the government of the College, nor any other profits except a certain ſtipend.

(1) See the article of Biſhop ANDREWS, note [A], vol. 1. pag. 695.

[B] In this ſtation he purſued his ſtudies with great vigour.] He ſtudied at the rate of ſixteen hours a day; by which means he read over the controverſial writings of Bellarmin, with all his anſwerers, viz. Chamier, Whitaker, Reynolds and others, who by parts had undertaken to confute that Champion of the Church of Rome. He read likewiſe many of the ſchoolmen; and eſpecially St. Thomas Aquinas, in whom he was exactly verſed, being able to manage moſt of his numerous diſtinctions. He read over St. Auguſtin's works five times, and many other eminent Authors ancient and modern, beſides his daily ſtudy of the Scriptures, and peruſal of the Commentators on them (2).

(2) Dr. Calamy's Account of the Miniſters, &c. who were ejected or ſilenced after the Reſtoration in 1660, by or before the Act for Uniformity, vol. 2. pag. 5. edit. London 1713, in 8vo.

[C] Where he is ſaid to have been a very ſtrict conformiſt.] The Author of a piece, intitled, Sober Sadneſs, or Hiſtorical Obſervations upon the Proceedings, Pretences, and Deſign, of a prevailing party in both Houſes of Parliament, &c. printed at Oxford 1643 in 4to tells us (3), "that he complied with Biſhop Wren the "Dioceſan, preached frequently in his ſurplice and "hood, read prayers at the rails; bowed at the name "of Jeſus, and undertook to ſatisfy and reduce ſuch "as ſcrupled at thoſe ceremonies." But Mr. Calamy himſelf in his Juſt and neceſſary Apology againſt an unjuſt invective publiſhed by Mr. Henry Burton in a late book of his, intitled, Truth ſtill Truth, though ſhut out of doors, &c. printed at London 1646 in 4to, aſſures us (4), that while he continued at St. Edmund'sbury, "he never bowed to or towards the altar, "to or towards the Eaſt, never read that wicked "Book of Sports upon the Lord's Day, never read "prayers at the high altar placed at the upper end of "the

(3) Pag. 32. See Wood's Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 281. 2d edit. London 1721.

(4) Pag. 8.

but the unwholſomneſs of the air had a very ill effect upon his health, and occaſioned a dizzineſs in his head, which he complained of all his life after (b). Upon the death of Dr. Stoughton, he was choſen Miniſter of St. Mary Aldermary in London in 1639 (i), and was followed by his Patron the Earl of Warwick to London. In July the ſame year he was incorporated into the Univerſity of Oxford (k). Upon the opening the long Parliament in November 1640, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf in defence of the Preſbyterian Cauſe [D], and had a principal hand in writing the celebrated Smectymnuus [E]; and in 1641 was appointed one of the Divines, who met by order of Parliament in the Jeruſalem-Chamber with ſeveral Biſhops and Doctors for the accommodation of Eccleſiaſtical Affairs; "in which, ſays Dr. Calamy (l), things were brought into a very hopeful "poſture; but the whole deſign was ſpoiled by bringing into the houſe the bill againſt "Biſhops &c." He was afterwards an active Member of the Aſſembly of Divines (m), and preached ſeveral times before the Parliament [F]. He was likewiſe one of the Lecturers

(b) Dr. Calamy's Account, ibid.

(i) Idem, ibid. and Newcourt's Rupertorium Eccleſiaſticum Parochiale Londinenſe, vol. 1. pag. 918. edit. London 1708, in fol.

(k) Wood, col. 281.

(l) Pag. 6. Account.

(m) Idem, ibid.

"the church, where the people could not hear. I "have often, continues he, preached againſt In- "novations, and once I did it at a publick viſi- "tation, and was called in queſtion for my la- "bour, &c. I never juſtified the oath ex officio, "nor ever proſecuted any man or woman at the "High-Commiſſion. I never (to my beſt re- "membrance) at any time preached for the juſtifi- "cation of any of the innovations. In ſome few "things I did, I confeſs, conform, according to the "light I then had, out of the uprightneſs of my "heart, not to avoid ſufferings for the truth, &c." However Mr. Wood (5) affirms that he complied in the manner abovementioned, and that Robert, the Puritanical Earl of Eſſex, uſually ſaid, He would be loſt, if he were not taken off, and ſo removed him to Rochford in Eſſex. Mr. Calamy tells us in his Juſt and neceſſary Apology quoted above, that he went to Bury, and there made in a Sermon a Recantation and Retractation of what he had done, in the hearing of thouſands; "and this, ſays he, I did before the times turned a- "gainſt Epiſcopacy, not out of diſcontent; nor be- "cauſe I was diſappointed of my expected preferment "at Court."

(5) Ubi ſupra.

[D] He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the Presbyterian party.] In his Juſt and neceſſary Apology he obſerves, that his houſe was a receptacle for godly Miniſters in the worſt of times. Here, ſays he, was the remonſtrance framed againſt the Prelates; here were all Meetings. I was the firſt, that openly before a Committee of Parliament did defend, that Biſhops were not only not an order diſtinct from Preſbyters, but that in Scripture a Biſhop and Preſbyter were all one.

[E] Had a principal hand in writing the celebrated Smectymnuus.] The Authors of this Tract were five, the firſt Letters of whoſe Chriſtian and Surnames compoſe the word Smectymnuus. viz. Stephen Marſhal, Edmund Calamy, Thomas Young, Matthew Newcomen, and William Spurſtow. It was publiſhed at London 1641 in 4to, and intitled, An Anſwer to a book, intitled, An Humble Remonſtrance; in which the Originall of Liturgy and Epiſcopacy is diſcuſſed, and Queries propounded concerning both; the parity of Biſhops and Preſbyters in Scripture demonſtrated; the occaſion of their Imparitie in Antiquitie diſcovered; the Diſparitie of the ancient and our moderne Biſhops manifeſted; the Antiquitie of Ruling Elders in the Church vindicated; the Prelatical Church bounded. Written by Smectymnuus. It is addreſſed to the moſt honorable Lords and to the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes of the Honorable Houſe of Commons. The Humble Remonſtrance, to which this was deſigned as an Anſwer, was written by Dr. Joſeph Hall, Biſhop of Exeter, who publiſhed a Vindication, to which the Authors of Smectymnuus wrote a Rejoinder. Smectymnuus is written, as moſt of the polemical works of the laſt age are, with great vehemence and acrimony of ſtyle, and full of the ſtrongeſt exaggerations to inflame the paſſions of the Reader, as will appear from the following inſtance. Biſhop Hall in his Humble Remonſtrance (6), had uſed theſe words; Certainly, except all Hiſtories, all Authors fail us, nothing can be more certain than this truth. Upon which the Authors of Smectymnuus make the following animadverſion (7): "Os durum! Nothing more cer- "tain! What is it not more certain that there is a "God? Is it not more certain, that Chriſt is "God and Man? Is it not more certain that Chriſt "is the only Saviour of the world? Nothing more "certain? Muſt this then be an article of our Creed, "the corner-ſtone of our Religion? Muſt this be of "neceſſity to ſalvation? Nothing more certain! O "that men ſhould not only forget themſelves, but God "alſo; and in their zeal for their own honour utter "words bordering upon blaſphemy?" In the Poſtſcript the Authors give us an hiſtorical Narration of thoſe bitter fruits, pride, rebellion, treaſon, unthankfulneſs, &c. which, ſay they (8), have iſſued from Epiſcopacy, while it ſtood under the continued influences of ſovereign goodneſs; and particularly mention (9) the deficiency of zeal and courage even in thoſe Biſhops, who afterwards proved martyrs, and the ſharp contention of Ridley againſt Hooper for the ceremonies; and the importunate ſuit of Cranmer and Ridley for a toleration of the Maſs for the King's ſiſter, which was rejected by the King's, not only reaſons, but tears, whereby the young King ſhewed more zeal than his beſt Biſhops. They conclude with theſe words, "What the practices of "the Prelates have been ever ſince from the beginning "of Queen Elizabeth to this preſent day, would fill a "volume, like Ezekiel's roll, with lamentation, "mourning, and woe to record. For it had been their "great deſign to hinder all further Reformation; to "bring in doctrines of Popery, Arminianiſm, and Li- "bertiniſm; to maintain, propagate, and much en- "creaſe the burden of human ceremonies; to keep "out, and beat down the preaching of the word; to "ſilence the faithful Preachers of it; to oppoſe and "perſecute the moſt zealous Profeſſors; and to turn "all Religion into a pompous outſide; and to tread "down the power of Godlineſs. Inſomuch as it is "come to an ordinary proverb, that when any thing "is ſpoiled, we uſe to ſay, The Biſhop's foot hath been "in it. And in all this (and much more which might "be ſaid) fulfilling Biſhop Bonner's Prophecy, who "when he ſaw, that in King Edward's Reformation "there was a reſervation of Ceremonies and Hierar- "chy, is credibly reported to have uſed theſe words: "Since they have begun to taſte of our broth, it will "not be long e'er they will eat of our beef.." Mr. Calamy in his Juſt and neceſſary Apology having obſerved, that after his coming to London at the beginning of the Parliament of 1640 he was one, who joined in making Smectymnuus, tells us, that this was the firſt deadly blow to Epiſcopacy in England of late years.

(6) Pag. 21.

(7) Sect. 3. pag. 18.

(8) Pag. 85.

(9) Pag. 93.

[F] And preached ſeveral times before the Parliament.] Mr. Wood (10) tells us that he was a frequent Preacher before them; and Mr. Echard in his Hiſtory of England (11) aſſerts, that he was ſo much an incendiary and promoter of the grand rebellion, that his actions cannot be vindicated, but only palliated, under the venerable name of an Houſe of Commons; and "that the Houſe of Commons either miſled him, "or were miſled by him, he being a frequent "Preacher before them, and one of the Authors "of the celebrated Smectymnuus." This paſſage was animadverted upon in A Letter to Mr. Archdeacon Echard, upon occaſion of his Hiſtory of England, wherein the true principles of the Revolution are defended; the Whigs and Diſſenters vindicated; ſeveral perſons of diſtinction cleared from aſperſions; and a number of hiſtorical miſtakes rectify'd. By Edward Calamy, D. D. 3d ed. London 1718 in 8vo. In this Letter Dr. Calamy obſerves (12), that Mr. Calamy was no Chaplain in the army, no enemy to a Liturgy freed from paſſages liable to juſt objections; and was rather for reforming Epiſcopacy according to Archbiſhop Uſher's platform, than eradicating it; and was a bitter enemy to all mobs. "And if he had, continues he, a reſpect to "the

(10) Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 281.

(11) Vol. 3. pag. 178.

(12) Pag. 85.

turers at Cornhill. He was a great enemy to the Sectaries, who afterwards gained so great an ascendant, but of known moderation to those of different sentiments. No Minister in the city was more followed, and his week-day Lecture was attended not only by his own parish, but by other eminent Citizens, and many persons of the highest quality (n). At the time when the King was brought from the Isle of Wight, he endeavoured to the utmost of his power to prevent his Majesty's ruin [G]. In Oliver's time he kept himself as private as possible (o), but had a considerable hand in causing things afterwards to return into their proper channel [H]. He preached before the Parliament the day they voted the King's Restoration (p), and was one of those Divines, who were sent over to him into Holland (q). He was made one of his Majesty's Chaplains (r) in June 1660, and offered the Bishoprick of Coventry and Lichfield, which he refused [I]. He was likewise one of the Commissioners for the Conference at the Savoy. He was ejected out of his Cure of St. Mary Aldermanbury on St. Bartholomew's day in 1662 for Non-Conformity, and imprisoned for preaching afterwards occasionally in that Church, but soon released [K]. He lived to see London reduced to ashes by the great fire; and the sight of that dreadful desolation struck him with so keen a sorrow, that he died within (n) Idem, ibid.

(o) Idem, ibid.

(p) Reliquiæ Baxterianæ, or Mr. Richard Baxter's Narrative of the most memorable passages of his Life and Times, Part II. pag. 217. edit. London 1696, in fol.

(q) Idem, ibid. pag. 218.

(r) Ibid. pag. 229

" the House of Commons at their first setting out, for " a good while after, before they were so modelled as " no longer to be the Representatives of the Commons " of England, he did but therein concur with all that " part of the Nation, that were unwilling to make a " sacrifice of the liberty of the subject to the prerogative of the Prince." He tells us then (13), that it is true that he preached before the House of Commons, but not that he was a frequent Preacher before them, since there are but three Sermons of his preached before that House. The first is entitled, England's Looking-Glass on Jerom xviii. 7, 8, 9, 10. Preached on a solemn Fast December 22d 1641. Printed at London 1642 in 4to. The design of which Sermon is to shew, that national repentance will divert, and national sins draw down national judgments. The second was intitled, God's Free Mercy to England on Ezek. xxxvi. 32. at a solemn Fast Febr. 23d 1641. Printed at London 1642 in 4to. The intent of which is to represent England's Mercies as a motive and means of England's Humiliation and Reformation. His third was intitled, England's Antidote against the Plague of civil War, on Acts xvii. 30. Preached October 22d 1644, and printed at London 1645 in 4to (14). Mr. Wood (15) mentions two other public Sermons of his, one, intitled, The Nobleman's Pattern of true and real Thankfulness. Preached at a solemn Thanksgiving June 15th 1643 on Joshua xxiv. 15. and printed at London 1643 in 4to; and the other intitled, An Indictment against England because of her self-murdering divisions. Preached before the House of Lords at their Fast, December 25th 1644 on Matth. xii. 25 latter part; printed at London 1645 in 4to. Dr. Calamy stiles the three Sermons mentioned by him plain practical Sermons, by which it does not appear, that our Author could be justly charged with misleading the House of Commons. " For tho', says he (16), there are some complaints in- " termingled of several hardships, which many worthy persons met with before this Parliament, and " motions made for further rectifying things, that " were amiss; yet there is nothing tending to inflame " and widen the differences between King and Parliament; no pushing them on to rigour and severity; " no inclination discovered to have the constitution altered, or any of our foundations overthrown."

(13) pag. 87.

(14) Idem, ibid. and Wood, ubi supra, col. 282.

(15) Col. 282.

(16) pag. 87.

[G] At the time when King Charles I was brought from the Isle of Wight, he endeavoured to the utmost of his power to prevent his Majesty's ruin.] Dr. Sampson in the manuscript above quoted, tells us, " that not a " man more detested the unlawfulness of those pro- " ceedings than himself. He prayed, he preached, " he travailled to persuade the ringleaders of those " wicked designs to desist, almost to his own ruin. " He was a principal man in the petition and declara- " tion to the army from the London-Ministers to have " dissuaded them from their attempts on his Majesty's " life; which stands as an impregnable and irrefragable " testimony of the loyalty of the then London-Ministry.

[H] Had a considerable hand in causing things afterwards to return into their proper channel.] This we are informed of by Dr. Calamy (17): and Mr. Baxter tells us in the Narrative of his Life and Times (18), that our Author, with the Earl of Manchester, and other Presbyterians, encouraged and persuaded General Monk to bring in King Charles II; and in another place (19) he observes, that the chief men, who turned the General's resolution to restore his Majesty, were Mr. Clarges, and Sir William Morrice, his kinsman; and the petitions and affections of the city principally moved by Mr. Calamy and Mr. Ash, two ancient, leading, able Ministers, with Dr. Bates, Dr. Manton, Dr. Jacomb, and other Ministers of London, who concurred; and these were encouraged by the Earl of Manchester, the Lord Hollis, the late Earl of Anglesey, and many of the then Council of State.

(17) Account, &c. pag. 6.

(18) Part 1. pag. 105.

(19) Part 2. pag. 214.

[I] Offered the Bishopric of Coventry and Lichfield, which he refused.] Mr. Baxter (20) informs us of this, and tells us, that the Bishopric of Hereford was offered to himself, and that of Norwich to Dr. Edward Reynolds, which he afterwards accepted (21). The rumour of this affair came abroad, " and the voice " of the City, says Mr. Baxter, made a difference; " for though they wished that none of us should be " Bishops, yet they said, Dr. Reynolds and Mr. Bax- " ter being known to be for moderate Episcopacy, " their acceptance would be less scandalous. But if " Mr. Calamy should accept it, who had preached, " and written, and done so much against it (which " were then at large recited) never Presbyterian would " be trusted for his sake; so that the clamour was very " loud against his acceptance of it; and Mr. Matthew " Newcomen, his brother-in-law, wrote to me ear- " nestly to dissuade him, and many more." Dr. Calamy tells us (22), that he had been credibly informed, that Bishop Wilkins had such an opinion of our Author's insight into the controversy about Church-Government, that he heartily wish'd, that he could have conformed, that he might have confronted the bold and confident assentors of the Jus Divinum of Episcopacy in the Convocation, in which he was not allowed to sit, tho' he was chosen one of the Clerks for the City.

(20) Ibid. pag. 281. See likewise Bishop Burnet's History of his own Times vol. 1. pag. 185. and Wood, ubi supra, col. 282.

(21) Baxter, pag. 283.

(22) Account, &c. pag. 6.

[K] Imprisoned for preaching afterwards occasionally in that Church, but soon released.] Mr. Wood informs us (23), that he preached there on the 28th of December following, " when, says he, among other danger- " ous passages, he said the Ark of God was lost, and " the Glory was departed from Israel. For which con- " tempt of the then late Act of Parliament for Uni- " formity he was by virtue of the Lord Mayor's Mit- " timus committed prisoner to Newgate on the 6th of " January 1662, where continuing for some time, Dr. " Robert Wild the Presbyterian Poet made and pub- " lished a Poem on his Imprisonment, as did the Au- " thor called Hudibras." Mr. Baxter relates the affair in the following manner (24): It fell out one day in Mr. Calamy's Church in Aldermanbury, that the Preacher failed, and the people desired Mr. Calamy to preach; which he did upon confidence, that the Act did not extend to such an occasional Sermon; some Lawyers had told him so. But for this he was sent to Newgate Jail, where he continued in the Keeper's lodgings, many daily flocking to visit him, till the Lord Bridgman (as is said) had given it as his judgment, that his Sermon was not within the penalty of the Act. And O! what insulting there was by that party in the News-Book, and in their Discourses, that Calamy, that would not be a Bishop, was in jail. And when his Sermon was printed, an invective came out in language like an inquisitor, that in a month after in October 1666 (s). We ſhall give an account of his writings in the note [L]. He was twice married, and by his firſt wife he had a ſon and a daughter, and by his ſecond ſeven children. Dr. Henry Sampſon, a Phyſician, in a Manuſcript Hiſtory of the Aſſembly of Divines at Weſtminſter, tells us, that his preaching was plain and ſeemingly unlearned, as moſt adapted to the capacities of the common people; but that his converſation ſhewed him to be a man of profound learning, and that he was thoroughly verſed in controverſial and caſuiſtical Divinity.

(23) Ubi supra, col. 282.

(24) Ubi supra, pag. 386.

(1) Dr. Calamy's Account, pag. 7. Wood, ubi ſupra, col. 182.

that ſhewed a vehement thirſt of blood. In a marginal note upon that paſſage we are informed, that he was impriſoned January 4th, not the 6th, as Mr. Wood ſays; and releaſed January 15th. Biſhop Kennet in his Complete Hiſtory of England (25) repreſents his preaching as ſeditious; but Dr. Calamy (26) tells us, that it was purely occaſioned by a diſappointment as to the Preacher expected; that the diſcourſe was unpremeditated; and that he was ſoon releaſed from his confinement, when it was ſeen what a reſort of perſons of all qualities there was to him in Newgate, and how generally the ſeverity was reſented.

(25) Vol. 3. pag. 243.
(26) Account, &c. pag. 7.

[L] We ſhall give an account of his writings in the note.] Beſides thoſe already mentioned, he publiſhed a Sermon intitled, The great Danger of Covenant-refuſing and Covenant-breaking &c. preached before the Lord Mayor, Sheriffs, Aldermen, Miniſters &c. of London, on 2 Tim. iii. 3. printed at London 1646 in 4to; another preached before the Lord Mayor, intitled, The Monſter of ſelf-ſeeking anatomized; Sermon at St. Giles's Morning Exerciſe, on Acts xxvi. 8. Funeral Sermons upon Dr. Samuel Bolton, Robert Earl of Warwick in 1658; Mr. Simeon Aſhe in 1662; a Sermon to the native Citizens of London, intitled, The City Remembrancer; a Farewell-Sermon on 2 Sam. xxiv. 14. to his Pariſh of St. Mary Aldermanbury, Auguſt the 17th in 1662; and five Sermons, intitled, The Godly Man's Ark; or a City of Refuge in the Day of his Diſtreſs, the 8th edition of which was printed at London 1683 in 12mo (27). He had a hand in drawing up the Vindication of the Preſbyterial Government and Miniſtry, printed at London 1650, and the Jus Divinum Miniſterii Evangelici Anglicani, printed in 1654. Since his death there was a Treatiſe of Meditation printed in a clandeſtine way, not by his ſon, nor from his manuſcript, but from ſome imperfect Notes taken by an Auditor (28). H.

(27) Wood, col. 282. and Dr. Calamy's Account, pag. 7.

(28) Dr. Calamy's Account, ibid.

☞CALAMY (EDMUND) eldeſt ſon of the preceding, was born at St. Edmund's-Bury in Suffolk about the year 1635, and admitted into Sidney College in Cambridge March the 28th 1651 (a), where he took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts in 165⅘ (b), and afterwards removed to Pembroke-Hall in that Univerſity, and took the Degree of Maſter of Arts in 1658 (c). He was likewiſe Fellow of Pembroke-Hall, and ejected out of his Living of Moreton in Eſſex, (to which he had been preſented April the 20th 1659) on St. Bartholomew's Day, after which he retired to London, where he preached amongſt the Non-Conformiſts, and died of a conſumption in May 1685 (d) at Totteridge. He had one ſon and four daughters, two of which are ſtill living. It is remarkable, that he never took the Covenant. H.

(a) From the Regiſter of that College.
(b) From the Regiſter of the Univerſity.
(c) From the ſame Regiſter.

(d) Dr. Edmund Calamy's Account of the Miniſters, Lecturers, &c. who were ejected or ſilenced after the Reſtoration in 1660, by or before the Act for Uniformity, vol. 2. pag. 301.

☞CALAMY (BENJAMIN) a very eminent Divine and excellent Preacher in the ſeventeenth Century, was ſon of Mr. Edmund Calamy, B. D. and Miniſter of St. Mary Aldermanbury, by a ſecond venter. He was educated at St. Paul's School in London (a), and afterwards ſent to Katherine Hall in the Univerſity of Cambridge, where he took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts in 166⅘, of Maſter of Arts in 1668, and Doctor of Divinity in 1680 (b). He was Fellow of that Hall (c), and an eminent Tutor there; and we are informed in the Life of James Bonnel Eſq; (d), that that Gentleman was one of our Author's pupils. April the 25th 1677 he was choſen Miniſter of St. Mary Aldermanbury in the room of Dr. Simon Ford (e); which Living he reſigned upon his admiſſion to the Vicarage of St. Laurence Jewry with St. Mary Magdalen Miſk-ſtreet annex'd, to which he was collated in July 1683, by the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, as Patrons of the latter, in the room of Dr. Benjamin Whichcot (f). June the 8th 1685, he was inſtalled into the Prebend of Harleſton in the Cathedral of St. Paul's upon the deceaſe of Dr. John Wells (g). His Diſcourſe about a ſcrupulous Conſcience [A] preached at St. Mary Aldermanbury on Luke xi. 41. and dedicated to Sir George Jefferies, was ſoon after

(a) Life of Dr. John Colet, Dean of St. Paul's, by Samuel Knight, D. D. Appendix, pag. 412. and Echard's Appendix to the three volumes of his Hiſtory of England, pag. 21. edit. London in fol. 1720.

(b) From the Univerſity Regiſter.
(c) Echard, ubi ſupra.
(d) Pag. 10.
(e) Newcourt's Repertorium Eccleſiaſticum Parochiale Londinenſe, vol. 1. pag. 919. edit. London 1708.
(f) Idem, pag. 388.
(g) Idem, ibid. pag. 155.

[A] His Diſcourſe about a ſcrupulous conſcience.] In this diſcourſe he endeavours by ſeveral arguments to reduce the Diſſenters to the Communion of the Church of England, and offers ſeveral Chriſtian Rules and Directions for that purpoſe; amongſt which are the following (1). When any private Chriſtian is troubled and perplexed with fears and ſcruples, that concern his duty in the worſhip of God, he ought in the firſt place to have recourſe to the public Guides and Miniſters of Religion, who are appointed by God, and are beſt ſuited to direct and conduct him; I ſay, to come to them, not only to diſpute and argue with them, and partly to oppoſe them, but with all modeſty to propound their doubts, meekly to hearken and receive inſtruction, humbly begging of God to open their underſtanding, that they may ſee and embrace the truth, taking great care that no evil affection, love of party, or carnal intereſt, influence or biaſs their judgment. We do not by this deſire men to pin their faith upon the Prieſt's ſleeve, or to put out their own eyes, that they might be better guided and managed by them; but only diligently to attend to their reaſon and arguments, and give ſome due regard and deference to their authority; for it may not be ſo abſurd, as may by ſome be imagined for the common people to take upon truſt from their lawful teachers, what they are not competent judges of themſelves. But the difficulty here is, how ſhall a private Chriſtian govern himſelf, when the very Guides and Miniſters of Religion determine differently concerning theſe matters in queſtion amongſt us, ſome warranting and allowing them, others as much diſapproving them? By what rule ſhall he chooſe his Guide? " As for thoſe, who ſcruple at con" formity, and are tolerably able to judge for them-
" ſelves, let not ſuch rely barely upon the authority ei" ther of one or the other: all we deſire of them is, that " they would equally hear both ſides; that they would " think the Miniſters of the Church of England have
" ſome ſenſe and conſcience too, as well as other " men, and are able to ſay ſomewhat for what they " do themſelves, or require of others; and laying a-
" ſide all prejudices, favour to, or admiration of men's " perſons, they would weigh and conſider the argu" ments, that may be propounded to them, being dif-
" fident of their own apprehenſions, and indifferent
" to either part of the queſtion; that they would think
" it no ſhame to change their mind, when they ſee
" good reaſon for it. Could we thus prevail with the " people diligently to examine the merits of the cauſe,

(1) pag. 24, 25.

after the publication of it attacked by Mr. Thomas De Laune, in his Plea for the Non-Conformists [B], for which he was impriſoned, though Dr. Calamy endeavoured to procure his releaſement, but in vain. Notwithſtanding our Author had very high notions with reſpect to the doctrine of Non-Reſiſtance, yet the death of Alderman Corniſh, who was his pariſhioner at St. Laurence Jewry, and with whom he had a ſtrict friendſhip, affected him in a very ſenſible manner [C], and he did not long ſurvive it; for he died of a pleuriſy in the beginning of January 168⅘ [D], and was interred in the Church of St. Laurence Jewry. Dr. William Sherlock preached his Funeral Sermon, in which he has drawn an excellent character of him [E]. There are in print ſeveral Sermons of his

" our Church would every day gain more ground " amongſt all wiſe men; for we care not how much " knowledge and underſtanding our people have, ſo " they be but humble and modeſt with it; nor do we " deſire men to become our Proſelytes any further " than we give them good Scripture and reaſon for " it."

[B] In his Plea for the Non-Conformiſts.] The whole title of the 2d Edition of it printed at London 1704 in 4to, is as follows: De Laune's Plea for the Non-Conformiſts; ſhewing the true ſtate of their caſe, and how far the Conformiſt's ſeparation from the Church of Rome for their Popiſh Superſtitions, &c. introduced into the ſervice of God, juſtifies the Non-Conformiſt's ſeparation from them for the ſame. In a Letter to Dr. Benjamin Calamy, upon the Sermon, called, Scrupulous Conſcience, inviting hereto. To which is added, A Parallel Scheme of the Pagan, Papal, and Chriſtian Rites and Ceremonies. With a Narrative of the remarkable tryal and ſufferings underwent for writing, printing, and publiſhing hereof. By Thomas de Laune, who died in Newgate during his impriſonment for this Book. Printed twenty years ago; but being ſeized by the Meſſenger of the Preſs, was afterwards burnt by the common hang-man; and is now reprinted from the Author's original copy, and publiſhed by a Proteſtant Diſſenter, who was the Author's fellow-priſoner at the time of his death, for the cauſe of Non-Conformity. The Narrative ſubjoined to the Plea is intitled, A Narrative of the Tryal and Sufferings of Thomas de Laune for writing, printing, and publiſhing a late Book, called, A Plea for the Non-Conformiſts, with ſome modeſt Reflections thereon. Directed to Dr. Calamy; in obedience to whoſe call that work was undertaken. By Thomas de Laune. Printed for the Author 1683; and reprinted 1704. In this Narrative he informs us, that he was apprehended by Mr. Robert Stephens, a Meſſenger of the Preſs, November the 29th 1683, and carried before Sir Thomas Jenner, Recorder of London, who committed him to the Compter in Wood-ſtreet, and the day following he was ſent to Newgate, from whence he wrote a letter to Sir Thomas Jenner, and another to Dr. Calamy dated December the 8th 1683, who returned this anſwer, that if Mr. De Laune had been impriſoned upon the account of anſwering his Book, he would do him any kindneſs, that became him. January the 9th, Mr. de Laune wrote another letter in Latin to Dr. Calamy, who anſwered, that he looked upon himſelf as unconcerned, ſince he was not mentioned in the ſheet, which he ſaw with the Recorder. To ſatisfy this doubt Mr. de Laune ſent him a third letter, dated January the 14th, with the firſt ſheet of the Book, for which he was impriſoned; but he tells us, that tho' he had reaſon to expect ſome returns to theſe applications, he had none to any purpoſe, and that too but in a few words by his wife. " I had ſome thoughts, ſays he " to the Dr. that you would have performed the office of " a Divine in viſiting me in my place of confinement, " either to argue me out of my doubts, which your " promiſed Scripture and Reaſon, not a Mittimus and " Newgate, could eaſily do. To the former I can " yield, to the latter, it ſeems, I muſt." On the 10th of December a bill was found againſt him by the Grand-Jury, and on the 17th of the ſame month he was tried at the Seſſions-Houſe in the Old-Baily, and the day following received ſentence, to be fined 100 marks, and to be kept priſoner till he had paid his fine, and to find ſecurity for his good behaviour for one whole year afterwards; and that the Books and ſeditious Libels by him publiſhed ſhould be burnt at the Royal Exchange. We are informed in the Preface of the Publiſher of his Plea, and in the Obſervator (z), that he not being able to pay his fine, himſelf with his wife and children all died in Newgate; and no body thought fit, ſays the Obſervator, to raiſe ſo ſmall a ſum for one of the beſt ſcholars in Europe. However we are aſſured by good authority, that tho' Dr. Calamy was at firſt zealous for conformity, and very intimate with Sir George Jefferies, when common Serjeant and Recorder of London, and dedicated to him his diſcourſe about a Scrupulous Conſcience, aſcribing to him his ſettlement and encouragement in the pariſh of Aldermanbury, of which Sir George was an inhabitant; yet he took all imaginable pains with Sir George to procure the diſcharge of Mr. De Laune, and was extremely troubled, that his ſollicitations proved ineffectual.

(2) Vol. 2. num. 95.

[C] The death of Alderman Corniſh, who was his pariſhioner at St. Laurence Jewry, and with whom he had a ſtrict friendſhip, affected him in a very ſenſible manner.] He appeared in the Court for that Gentleman at his trial, and viſited him at Newgate; and being earneſtly preſſed to attend him to the place of execution, was not able to do it, but freely told Mr. Corniſh, that he could as well die with him, as bear the ſight of his death in ſuch circumſtances as he was in, tho' he waited upon him the very morning of his death. He uſed all his intereſt with Sir George Jefferies, that the Alderman's life might be ſpared, and often renewing his application, he received an anſwer in theſe words, Dear Doctor, ſet your heart at reſt, and give yourſelf no further trouble, for I can aſſure you, that if you could offer a mine of gold as deep as the Monument is high, and a bunch of pearls as big as the flames at the top of it, it would not purchaſe his life.

[D] Died of a pleuriſy in the beginning of January 168⅘.] We have no certain account of the day, on which he died; but Newcourt in his Repertorium (3), mentions his being ſucceeded in his Prebend of Harleſton by Zach. Iſham January the 28th 1685, according to the computation of the Church of England, and in the Vicarage of St. Laurence-Jewry by Dr. John Mapletoft Jan. 28, 1686 (4), by which it is to be preſumed he means according to common computation. But what will help to fix the time nearer is the date of the Sermon, which was preached at his funeral by Dr. William Sherlock, viz. January the 7th 168⅘.

(3) Vol. 1. pag. 155.

(4) Vol. 1. pag. 388.

[E] Dr. William Sherlock preached his Funeral Sermon, in which he has drawn an excellent character of him.] He tells us (5), that he took care to inform himſelf, and to furniſh his own mind with all uſeful knowledge; and that his conſtant way of preaching, though without any vain affectation of learning, which ſerves only to amuſe, not to inſtruct, ſufficiently diſcover'd both his natural and acquired abilities. That he had a clear and diſtinct apprehenſion of things, an eaſy and manly rhetoric, ſtrong ſenſe conveyed to the mind in familiar words, good reaſons inſpired with a decent paſſion, which did not only teach, but move and tranſport the hearers, and at the ſame time gave both light and heat. For indeed he was a good man, which is neceſſary to make a good Preacher. He had an inward vital ſenſe of Religion, and that animated his diſcourſes with the ſame divine paſſions, which he felt in himſelf. Dr. Sherlock then obſerves (6), that he did not entertain his hearers with ſchool-ſubtilties or a conjectural Divinity, with ſuch thin and airy ſpeculations, as can neither be ſeen, nor felt, nor underſtood; but his chief care was to explain the great Articles of Faith and Rules of Life, what we muſt believe, and how we muſt live, that we may be eternally happy. And he did, as a faithful ſervant ought to do, as he declared a little before his death, that he never preached any thing, but what he himſelf firmly believed to be true. Dr. Sherlock afterwards tells us (7), that at a time, " when a prevailing faction threatned both " Church and State, and the fears of Popery were " thought a ſufficient juſtification of the moſt illegal " and irreligious methods to keep it out; when it was " ſcandalous

(5) pag. 29.

(6) pag. 29, 30.

(7) pag. 30.

his [F], and two Cases againſt the Diſſenters, publiſhed in the Collection of them, viz. Caſe IX. The Diſcourſe about a ſcrupulous Conſcience abovementioned, and Caſe X. intitled, Conſiderations about the Caſe of Scandal, or giving offence to weak brethren. The Sermons, which he left in manuſcript, fell into the hands of his brother Mr. James Calamy M. A. who ordered them, together with his own, to be burnt after his deceaſe. Mr. Wood (b) ſtiles him a loyal Perſon, an excellent Preacher, and a zealous Man for the Church of England. The Editor of the Critical Works of Father Rapin, ſpeaking in his Preface of the Preachers, who have been celebrated ſince the Reſtoration, takes particularly notice of the clear vein of Argument and excellent Spirit of Dr. Calamy. Biſhop Burnet in the Hiſtory of his own Time (i) ranks him among thoſe, whom he repreſents as an honour both to the Church and to the Age, in which he lived. And Archdeacon Echard (k) tells us, that "his Sermons ſeemed to have been compoſed for the generality of "mankind, in which there is both ſtrength and perſpicuity, and diſcover a Genius able "to penetrate into the ſecret receſſes of human nature; for which he was particularly ob-"ſerved by King Charles's Court, when he preached at Newmarket. Wherefore it is "pity, that we have no more of them in print."

(b) Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 282. 2d edit. London 1721.

(i) Vol. 1. pag. 462.

(k) Ubi ſupra.

"ſcandalous to ſpeak a word either for the King or "the Church; when cunning men were ſilent, and "thoſe, who affected popularity, ſwam with the "ſtream; then this great and good man durſt reform "ſchiſm and faction, durſt teach men to conform to "the Church, and to obey and honour the King, "durſt vindicate the deſpiſed Church of England, and "the hated doctrine of Paſſive Obedience, tho' one "was thought to favour Popery, and the other to in-"troduce ſlavery. But he was above the powerful "charms of names, and liked truth never the worſe, "becauſe it was miſcalled. His publick Sermons "preached in thoſe days, and printed by publick Au-"thority, are laſting proofs of this; and yet he was "no Papiſt neither, but durſt reprove the errors of "Popery, when ſome others, who made the greateſt "noiſe and outcry about it, grew wiſe and cautious. "This was like a truly honeſt and faithful ſervant, to "oppoſe the growing diſtempers of the Age, with-"out any regard either to unjuſt cenſures, or apparent "danger." And yet he did not needleſſy provoke any man; he gave no hard words, but thought it ſevere enough to confute men's errors without upbraiding or reproaching their perſons. His converſation was courteous and affable to all men, ſoft and eaſy, as his principles were ſtubborn. He could yield any thing but the truth, and bear with any thing but the vices of men. He would indeed have been the wonder of his Age, had he not lived in ſuch an Age, as, thanks be to God, can ſhew many ſuch wonders; and yet in ſuch an Age as this he made an illuſtrious figure. Though he had his equals, he had not many ſuperiours. Thus he lived, and thus this good man died, for thus was he found doing when his Lord came.

[F] There are in print ſeveral Sermons of his. I. A Sermon preached at Guild-Hall on Tit. iii. 8, 9. London 1673 in 4to. II. A Sermon preached at Guild-Hall on John v. 14. before the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, May 29th. London 1682 in 4to. III. A Diſcourſe about a ſcrupulous Conſcience, preached at St. Mary Aldermanbury on Luke xi. 41. London 1683 in 4to, 2d edit. IV. A Sermon preached before the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen at Guild-Hall Chapel, September 30th 1683 on Rom. iii. 8. London 1683 in 4to. V. A Sermon preached at St. Mary le Bow before the Artillery Company on Matt. xxvi. 52. London 1684 in 4to. VI. A Sermon preached at St. Mary le Bow before the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen Sept. 2d 1684, being the Anniverſary Faſt for the Fire of London, on Iſa. lvii. 21. VII. A Thankſgiving-Sermon on Eccleſ. x. 20. Beſides theſe Sermons, publiſhed by himſelf, we have a volume of poſthumous Sermons, in number thirteen, publiſhed by his brother James Calamy M. A. together with Dr. Sherlock's Funeral Sermon upon him. This volume has paſt thro' at leaſt ſix editions. H.

☞CALAMY (JAMES), younger brother of the preceding, was educated at Katherine-Hall in the Univerſity of Cambridge, where he took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1672, and of Maſter in 1676 (a). He ſucceeded Dr. Edward Fowler, afterwards Biſhop of Gloceſter, in the Rectory of Northill in Bedfordſhire, in which he continued till Dr. Offspring Blackall, his intimate friend, being made Biſhop of Exeter in 1707, preſented him to the Living of Cheriton-Biſhops in Devonſhire, and made him Prebendary of the Cathedral of Exeter. He was never married; and died ſuddenly December 14, 1714 (b). We have nothing of his writing in print except the Dedication of his brother Dr. Calamy's Sermons. H.

(a) From the Univerſity Regiſter.

(b) From Memoirs communicated to us.

☞CALAMY (EDMUND) D. D. grandſon of Mr. Edmund Calamy, B. D. and ſon of Mr. Edmund Calamy, formerly Miniſter of Moreton in Eſſex, was born in Aldermanbury in the City of London April 5th 1671, and having made conſiderable progreſs in Grammar-learning at ſeveral private Schools, and at Merchant-Taylors School [A] under Mr. Hartcliffe, Author of the Compleat Treatiſe of Moral and Intellectual Virtues, who favoured him with particular helps in private, and offered him his aſſiſtance in the Univerſity, if his inclination had led him that way; he removed to a private Academy at Wickam-Brook in Suffolk [B], where he went through a courſe of Logic, Natural Philoſophy, and Metaphyſics, under the tuition of Mr. Samuel Cradock, who had been Fellow of Emanuel College in Cambridge, and an eminent Tutor there (a). In March 1688 he went over to Utrecht in Holland [C], and paſſed thro' a courſe of Philoſophy under the celebrated Profeſſor De Vries,

(a) Funeral Sermon upon the Death of Edmund Calamy, D. D. by Daniel Mayo, M. A. With ſome Account of his Life and Character, pag. 20, 21. edit. London 1732, in 8vo.

[A] At Merchant-Taylors School.] He was here in the ſame form with Mr. Hugh Boulter, the preſent Archbiſhop of Armagh in Ireland, and Mr. Dawes, afterwards Archbiſhop of York, with whom he was very intimately acquainted, and whom he frequently viſited at Dr. Kidder's, then Rector of St. Martin's Outwich, and afterwards Biſhop of Bath and Wells.

[B] Removed to a private Academy at Wickam-Brook in Suffolk.] Here he contracted an acquaintance with Mr. Timothy Goodwin, who was eminent for his ſkill in the Greek language, and then deſigned for the ſtudy of Phyſic, but afterwards advanced to the Archbiſhopric of Caſhels in Ireland. Their former friendſhip ſubſiſted during the life of the Archbiſhop, and they maintained a conſtant correſpondence by letters.

[C] Went over to Utrecht in Holland.] In this Univerſity he became very intimate with the Lord Spencer, afterwards

Vries, and ſtudied Civil Law under Vander Muyden, and attended Grævius's Lectures upon Sophocles and Puffendorf's Introduction to his Hiſtory. At this Univerſity he purſued his ſtudies with great vigour, and devoted one whole night every week to them. While he reſided here he was invited to a Profeſſorſhip in one of the Univerſities in Scotland by Mr. William Carſtairs, who came over to Holland, in order to procure a perſon qualified for that ſtation. Upon his return to England in May 1691 he reſolved to ſpend ſome time at Oxford, and carried Letters thither from Grævius to Dr. Pocock, Canon of Chriſt Church, and Regius Profeſſor of Hebrew, and to Dr. Edward Bernard, Savilian Profeſſor of Aſtronomy, who received him with great civility, and procured leave for him to ſtudy in the Bodleian Library (b). Here he likewiſe applied himſelf very cloſely to his ſtudies, and had frequent opportunities of improving by the converſation of the learned Mr. Henry Dodwell. As he was reſolved to make Divinity his principal ſtudy, he examined the Controverſy between the Conformiſts and Non-Conformiſts [D], and determining on the ſide of the latter, he preach'd ſometimes at Oxford, and in other places in the country. Upon his return to London in 1692 he was unanimouſly invited to be Aſſiſtant to Mr. Matthew Silveſter at Black-Fryars, where he preached ſtatedly for about two years without Ordination, which he at laſt received June 22d 1694 at Dr. Anneſly's meeting-houſe in Little St. Hellen's London. Soon after this he was invited to be Aſſiſtant to Mr. Daniel Williams in Hand-Alley, where he continued till upon the deceaſe of Mr. Vincent Alſop in 1703, he was unanimouſly choſen to ſucceed him at Weſtminſter, having been appointed October the 20th the year before one of the Lecturers of Salter's-Hall (c). In 1702 he publiſhed his Abridgment of Mr. Baxter's Hiſtory of his Life and Times [E], in the tenth chapter of which having ſtated the grounds of the Non-Conformity of the Miniſters, who were ejected by the Act for Uniformity in 1662, he was engaged in a controverſy with Mr. Ollyffe and Mr. Benjamin Hoadly M. A. [F], both Miniſters of the eſtabliſhed Church, and the latter now Lord Biſhop of Wincheſter. Mr. Locke is ſaid to have ſent to him a meſſage to let him know, that he had read his Defence of moderate Non-Conformity, and thought ſuch a defence of it could not be anſwered, and that by adhering to the principles there laid down, he had no reaſon to fear any antagoniſt. In 1709 he took a journey into Scotland, where he was entertained with great reſpect, and had the degree of Doctor of Divinity conferred on him by the Univerſities of Edinburgh, Aberdeen, and Glaſgow (d). He publiſhed ſeveral works, which we afterwards Earl of Sunderland, and Mr. Charles Trimnel, his tutor, afterwards ſucceſſively Biſhop of Norwich and Wincheſter; with both of whom he kept up his acquaintance as long as they lived.

(b) Funeral Sermon, pag. 21.

(c) Ibid. pag. 23, 24.

(d) Idem, ibid. pag. 26.

[D] He examined the Controverſy between the Conformiſts and Non-Conformiſts.] With this view he ſtudied the Scriptures, and particularly the New Teſtament, and read the Hiſtory of the Church, the ſix Epiſtles of Ignatius, with what Mr. Dodwell and Biſhop Pearſon had written on the one ſide, and Monſr. Daillé and L'Arroque on the other. He read over likewiſe Chillingworth's Religion of Proteſtants a ſafe way to ſalvation, and Hooker's Eight Books of Eccleſiaſtical Polity, and the Articles, Liturgy, Homilies, and Canons of the Church of England (1).

(1) Funeral Sermon upon the Death of Edmund Calamy, D. D. by Daniel Mayo, M. A. With ſome Account of his Life and Character, pag. 21, 22.

[E] He publiſhed his Abridgment of Mr. Baxter's Hiſtory of his Life and Times.] When Mr. Baxter's Narrative of his Life and Times was to be committed to the preſs in 1696, our Author read it over, and made ſeveral remarks, and drew up the Contents prefixed, and the Index at the end of it. This prepared him for making the Abridgment of it, which he publiſhed under the following title; An Abridgment of Mr. Baxter's Hiſtory of his Life and Times. With an account of many others of thoſe worthy Miniſters, who were ejected after the Reſtauration of King Charles the IId; their apology for themſelves and their adherents, containing the grounds of their Non-Conformity, and practice as to ſtated and occaſional Communion with the Church of England; and a Continuation of their Hiſtory till the year 1691. By Edmund Calamy, Edm. Fil. & Nepos. London 1702 in 8vo. It was dedicated to the Right Honourable the Lord Marquis of Hartington. It was animadverted upon in a Tract publiſhed at London 1704, and intitled, Animadverſions on ſome Paſſages of Mr. Edmund Calamy's Abridgment of Mr. Baxter's Hiſtory of his Life and Times; in a Dialogue between a Church-man and a peaceable Diſſenter; in which are ſhewn the affection of him and his Worthies to the eſtabliſhment of the Church and State, and the tendency of their principles. By a Lover of his Country, and a friend to peace.

[F] Engaged in a Controverſy with Mr. Ollyffe and Mr. Benjamin Hoadly.] In 1703 Mr. Ollyffe publiſhed at London in 8vo pagg. 147. his Defenſe of Miniſterial Conformity to the Church of England: in anſwer to the miſrepreſentations of the terms thereof by Mr. Calamy in the tenth chapter of his Abridgment of the Hiſtory of Mr. Baxter's Life and Times. And the ſame year Mr. Hoadly publiſhed his Reaſonableneſs of Conformity to the Church of England, repreſented to the diſſenting Miniſters: in anſwer to the tenth chapter of Mr. Calamy's Abridgment of Mr. Baxter's Hiſtory of his Life and Times. London 1703 in 8vo pagg. 160. And ſoon after appeared the Second Part of his Reaſonableneſs of Conformity, London 1703 in 8vo. pagg. 232. In anſwer to theſe Treatiſes, Mr. Calamy publiſhed the ſame year A Defence of moderate Non-Conformity: in anſwer to the Reflections of Mr. Ollyffe and Mr. Hoadly, on the tenth chapter of the Abridgment of the Life of the Reverend Mr. Richard Baxter, Part I. With a Poſtſcript containing ſome remarks on a Tract of Mr. Dorrington's, intituled, The Diſſenting Miniſtry in Religion cenſured and condemned from the Holy Scriptures. London 1703 in 8vo pagg. 261. Some paſſages in this book relating to Re-ordination were animadverted upon in a Preſervative againſt ſeparation from the Church of England, wherein the unlawfulneſs of it is proved, and the chief Objections of the Diſſenters anſwered. Directed to his Pariſhioners. By Solomon Pagis, Rector of Farnborow in Somerſetſhire. London 1704 in 8vo. Soon after appeared Mr. Hoadly's Serious Admonition to Mr. Calamy, occaſioned by the firſt part of his Defence of Moderate Non-Conformity. London 1703 in 8vo pagg. 54. The year following Mr. Calamy publiſhed the ſecond part of his Defence of Moderate Non-Conformity, &c. with an Introduction about the true ſtate of the preſent Controverſy between the Church and Diſſenters; and a Poſtſcript containing an anſwer to Mr. Hoadly's Serious Admonition, and ſome Remarks on a Letter of a nameleſs Author ſaid to be A Congregational Miniſter in the Country. London 1704 in 8vo pagg. 414. and afterwards the third part of his Defence; to which are added three Letters, one to Mr. Ollyffe, in anſwer to his Second Defence of Miniſterial Conformity; another to Mr. Hoadly, we ſhall give an account of in the note [G]. He lived in great eſteem not only with the Diſſenters, but likewiſe with ſeveral perſons of Quality and Diſtinction, and ſome among the Clergy, and other members of the eſtabliſhed Church. Mr. Mayo in his Funeral Sermon tells us (e), that he was a man of ſound judgment, extenſive learning, ſincere piety, of a candid and benevolent temper, and great moderation with regard to differences in points of Religion. He died at Weſtminſter June the 3d 1732. He was twice married, and had thirteen children, ſix whereof are ſtill living.

(e) Ibid. pag. 28, 29.

ly, in anſwer to his Defence of the Reaſonableneſs of Conformity; and a third to the Author from Mr. Raſtrick of Lynn in Norfolk, giving an account of his Non-Conformity. London 1705 in 8vo. In 1707 Mr. Hoadly publiſhed his Defence of Epiſcopal Ordination in 8vo. To which Dr. Calamy wrote a Reply, but forbore publiſhing it for reaſons mentioned in the ſecond Edition of his Abridgment, Vol. I. p. 715.

[G] He publiſhed ſeveral works, which we ſhall give an account of in the Note.] Beſides thoſe abovementioned and ſeveral others, printed without his name, he publiſhed the following, I. A Funeral Sermon preached at the interment of Mr. Samuel Stevens, for ſome time employed in the work of the Miniſtry in this City. London 1694 in 4to. II. A Practical Diſcourſe concerning Vows, with a ſpecial Reference to Baptiſm and the Lord's Supper. 1694. in 8vo. Reprinted in a ſmaller Volume in 1704. III. A Funeral Sermon preached upon occaſion of the deceaſe of the eminently pious Mrs. Eliz. Williams, late wife of the Reverend Mr. Daniel Williams. With ſome account of her exemplary character. 1698 in 8vo. IV. A Sermon to the Societies for Reformation of Manners in London and Middleſex. 12mo 1699. V. Divine Mercy exalted, or Free Grace in its Glory, A Sermon on Rom. ix. 16. preached at the Merchant's Lecture in Salter's Hall, October the 20th. 1702. VI. A Caveat againſt New Prophets, in two Sermons at the Merchant's Lecture in Salter's Hall on Jan. the 6th and Jan. the 20th 170⅞. With a ſingle ſheet in anſwer to Sir Richard Bulkeley's Remarks on the ſame. VII. A Funeral Sermon, occaſioned by the ſudden death of the Reverend Mr. Matthew Sylveſter, preached at his Meeting-Houſe in Black-Fryars, on Feb. 1. 170⅞. VIII. A Funeral Sermon occaſioned by the much lamented death of Mrs. Frances Lewis, wife of Thomas Lewis Eſq; who departed this Life on Febr. the 9th 170⅞. preached at Weſtminſter on the Lord's Day following. IX. A Funeral Sermon, occaſioned by the deceaſe of Mr. Michael Watts, Citizen and Haberdaſher of London, who departed this Life on Feb. the 3d 170⅞. ann. ætat. LXXII. Preached at the Meeting-Houſe in Silver-ſtreet the next Lord's Day after his interment. X. A Sermon at the Merchant's Lecture in Salter's Hall upon occaſion of the many late Bankrupts. Preached Dec. 7th 1708. XI. The Inſpiration of the Holy Writings of the Old and New Teſtament conſidered and improved; in fourteen Sermons preached at the Merchants Lecture in Salter's-Hall. To which is added a ſingle Sermon in Vindication of the Divine Inſtitution of the Office of the Miniſtry, preached at the ſame Lecture in 1710. XII. Comfort and Counſel to Proteſtant Diſſenters; with ſome ſerious Queries to ſuch as hate and caſt them out; and a friendly admonition to ſuch as deſert them; in two Sermons, preached firſt at Weſtminſter on March the 30th and afterwards at the Merchants Lecture in Salters-Hall on May the 20th and June the 3d 1712. XIII. The Prudence of the Serpent, and Innocence of the Dove: A Sermon preached at Exon May the 6th 1713. before a numerous aſſembly of the Diſſenting Miniſters of Devon and Cornwal. XIV. Obadiah's Character, a Sermon to young people, preached in the Old Jewry, Dec. the 28th 1713. XV. Abridgment of Mr. Baxter's Hiſtory of his Life and Times. The Second Edition. Together with, XVI. An Account of the Miniſters, Lecturers, Maſters and Fellows of Colleges, and School-maſters, who were ejected or ſilenced after the Reſtoration in 1660, by or before the Act for Uniformity. London 1713, in 8vo. XVII. The ſeaſonableneſs of Religious Societies. A Sermon preached to the Supporters of the Lecture on Lord's Day Mornings at Little St. Hellen's upon April the 23d 1714. XVIII. God's Concern for his Glory in the Britiſh Iſles; and the Security of Chriſt's Church from the Gates of Hell: in three Sermons at the Merchants Lecture in Salter's-Hall. 1715 in 8vo. XIX. The Principles and Practice of Moderate Non-Conformiſts with reſpect to Ordination exemplified; in a Sermon preached at the Ordination of Mr. John Munckley Jan. the 19th 1717; and a charge given to Mr. James Read, Mr. Henry Read, Mr. Richard Biſcoe, Mr. George Smyth, and Mr. Samuel Chandler, after their being ordained, Dec. the 19th 1716. To which is added A Letter to a Divine in Germany, giving a brief but true account of the Diſſenters in England. 8vo. XX. Sober-mindedneſs recommended: in a Sermon preached to a Society of Catechumens in Jewen-ſtreet on April the 22d 1717. XXI. The Repeal of the Act againſt Occaſional Conformity conſidered, in a Letter to a Member of the Honourable Houſe of Commons, Octob. 1717. XXII. A Letter to Mr. Archdeacon Echard, upon occaſion of his Hiſtory of England; wherein the true Principles of the Revolution are defended; the Whigs and Diſſenters vindicated; ſeveral perſons of diſtinction cleared from aſperſions; and a number of Hiſtorical Miſtakes rectified. London 1718 in 8vo. 3d Edition. XXIII. The Church and Diſſenters compared as to perſecution, in ſome Remarks on Dr. Walker's Attempt to recover the Names and Sufferings of the Clergy, that were ſequeſtered &c. between 1640 and 1660. London 1719 in 8vo. XXIV. Diſcontented Complaints of the preſent Times proved unreaſonable; in a Sermon preached at Rotherhith on the Anniverſary of King George's Coronation, Octob. the 20th 1720. XXV. A Charge given to Mr. Obadiah Hughes, Mr. Clerk Oldiſworth, Mr. Thomas Newman, and Mr. John Smith, after their Ordination in the Old Jewry, Jan. the 11th 172⅞. XXVI. Thirteen Sermons concerning the Doctrine of the Trinity, preached at the Merchants Lecture in Salter's-Hall: together with a Vindication of that celebrated text, 1 John v. 7. from being ſpurious, and an Explication of it, upon the ſuppoſition of its being genuine; in four Sermons, preached at the ſame Lecture, ann. 1719 and 1720. London 1722 in 8vo. XXVII. The Miniſtry of the Diſſenters vindicated, in an Ordination Sermon preached at Ailſbury in the County of Bucks on June the 11th 1724. To which is added in the ſecond Edition a Letter to the Author of a Pamphlet, intitled, The Miniſtry of the Diſſenters proved to be null and void, from Scripture and Antiquity. XXVIII. Memoirs of the Life of the late Reverend Mr. John Howe. London 1724 8vo. XXIX. The Word of God the Young Man's beſt Directory; A Sermon preached to a Society of Young Men in Silver-ſtreet on May the 28th 1725, the Birth Day of his Majeſty King George. XXX. A Charge given to Mr. William Hunt, after his Ordination at Newport-Pagnel in the County of Bucks on Sept. the 15th 1725. XXXI. A Funeral Sermon for the late Reverend Mr. John Sheffield, Miniſter of the Goſpel in Southwark, who departed this Life, Jan. the 24th 172⅝. ann. ætat. LXXIII. XXXII. A Funeral Sermon for the late Reverend Mr. Joſeph Bennet, Miniſter of the Goſpel in the Old Jewry, who departed this Life, Feb. the 2d 162⅞, ann. ætat. LXI. XXXIII. A Continuation of the Account of the Miniſters, Lecturers, Maſters and Fellows of the Colleges, and School-maſters, who were ejected and ſilenced, after the Reſtoration in 1660, by or before the Act for Uniformity. London 1727 in 8vo. 2 Volumes. XXXIV. A Funeral Sermon for the late Reverend Mr. John Motterſhed, Miniſter of the Goſpel in Ratcliffe, who departed this Life Octob. the 13th 1728. an. ætat. LXIII. H.

CALCHAS, ſon of Theſtor (a), followed the Greek army to Troy in the function of a great Diviner, or Prophet; for in thoſe days ſuch an officer was not leſs neceſſary in an army, than a General. All the world knows how he foretold that the ſiege of Troy would laſt ten years, and that the fleet, which was detained in the Port of Aulis by contrary winds, would not ſet ſail till Agamemnon's daughter had been ſacrificed to Diana. Homer

(a) See the Hiſtory of this Theſtor in Hyginus, cap. 190.

Homer mentions him often, and particularly on account of the diſpute which aroſe between Agamemnon and Achilles. It is ſaid, that after the taking of Troy Calchas retired to Colophon, where he died with grief, becauſe he could not divine what another man of his own profeſſion, called Mopſus, diſcovered. We ſhall ſpeak at large of this diſpute in the article of MOPSUS. Then was fulfilled the prediction mentioned by Sophocles (b), which foretold, that Calchas ſhould die as ſoon as he ſhould meet with his maſter in the art of divining. If Mopſus had been as ignorant as that other Diviner, who ſeeing Calchas planting a vine, ventured to give him advice, he would not have been the cauſe of the prophecy's being accompliſhed, he would only have made Calchas laugh a little too much (c). This adventure happened at the ſame place where Mopſus diſputed with Calchas [A]. If we may believe Suidas, one of the Sibyls was Calchas's daughter, I mean her, whom he calls Lampaſa [B], and to whom he aſcribes ſome Oracles in verſe. He calls her alſo the Colophonian.

(b) Apud Strabon. lib. 13. p. m. 442.

(c) Servius in Ecl. 6. ver. 72.

(1) In Calepin. it is, apud fanum.
(2) In the article of MOPSUS. Remark [E].
(3) Apud Strabon. lib. 13. pag. 442.
(4) He was born at Geneva, and died at London, where he was a Miniſter of a French Church. See Decker, de Scriptis Adeſpotis, pag. 397. ed. Amſt. 1686.

[A] This adventure happened at the ſame place where Mopſus diſputed with Calchas.] Namely in the ſacred wood of Apollo of Claros, near the city of Colophon. I do not know, why Charles Stephens, Lloyd and Hofman added, that this place was at Samos, prope Samum (1). I ſhall take notice in another place (2) of the blunder they have committed in making Mopſus the aggreſſor, tho' Calchas is made to attack him, in the two Authors they quote, Heſiod and Pherecydes (3). The ſame error is in Calepin.

[B] If we may believe Suidas, one of the Sibyls was Calchas's daughter; namely ſhe, whom he calls Lampaſa.] Monſieur Muſſard (4), who was a very learned Miniſter, has given us the picture of this daughter of Calchas, in page 325 of his Hiſtoria Deorum fatidicorum. In the inſcription, which is at the bottom of the print, ſhe is ſaid to be the daughter of Calchas, and Prieſteſs of Apollo. The diſcourſe annexed to this print acquaints us, that there are ſeveral predictions of the Sibyl Lampaſa extant. Strabo is thereupon quoted, inſtead of Suidas. Mr. Blondel (5) cenſures Suidas, becauſe Calchas being an European, it is not probable, that his daughter ſhould be of Colophon. But this objection is of no weight; for the Sibyls did not always prefer the name of the place where they where born, to that of the place in which they ſettled. And beſides, might not Calchas have lived in ſome city of Aſia after the Siege of Troy?

(5) Blondel, Traité des Sibylles, pag. 37.

CALDERINUS (JOHN) was Profeſſor of Canon Law at Bologne his native country, where he died towards the middle of the fourteenth Century. See above (a) the article of ANDREAS (JOHN (b).

(a) Vol. 1. pag. 685.
(b) Remark [E].

CALDERINUS (DOMITIUS) read Lectures upon polite Literature at Rome with a great reputation, towards the end of the fifteenth Century. He was born at Calderia near Verona (a). He was a haughty Critic, who treated his adverſaries too ſeverely (b) [A], and who beſides had no Religion [B]. In order to ſupport the good opinion, which men had conceived of his knowledge, he was obliged to have recourſe to impudence, and many artful tricks [C]. He died very young [D] in the year 1477 (c). The Academy

(a) Jovius, Elog. cap. 21.
(b) Ibid.

(c) Trithem. apud Geſn. in Biblioth.

[A] He was a haughty Critic, who treated his adverſaries too ſeverely.] Paulus Jovius acquaints us with this particular. Peracerbas, ſays he (1), ſed juventuti maxime utiles cum æmulis ſimultates exercuit. Ambitioſo quidem & nimis aculeato dicendi genere ex aliena inſcitia (dum intemperanter perſtringit atque remordet) nomen quærens. i. e. "He had very bitter "diſputes with his adverſaries, but which proved very "uſeful to the youth: he endeavoured to make himſelf famous by the ignorance of others, and in his "cenſures and anſwer to others he made uſe of too "haughty and ſharp a ſtile." Raphael Volateranus, tho' his friend, could not forbear acknowledging this defect in him. Hujus ego, quamquam eram familiaris, vitium unicum livoris atque obtrectationis in omnes pene doctos non præteribo, dignus præterea, ut de Cælio Quintilianus ait, vita longiore ac ingenio meliore (2). i. e. "Tho' he was my friend, yet I cannot omit mentioning the only defect he had, which was envy; this "made him revile almoſt every learned man of his "time: in other reſpects he deſerved a longer life and a "better inclination, as Quintilian ſaid of Cælius." Latomus made ſport with his character in the Epitaph he wrote for him (3), and which may be read in Jovius.

(1) Jovius, Elog. cap. 21.
(2) Volat. lib. 21. pag. 777.
(3) . . . Caput languet Adhuc miſello tinniens, ob illas quas Convitiorum prope muliebrium pugnas Pro literis pluſquam viriliter geſſit: Humanitatis haud ferentibus Muſis Decus tam ineptè turpiterque proſcindi. Latomus, apud Jovium, Elogior. cap. 21. i. e. "The poor "man's head "rings ſtill with "thoſe quarrels "he ſuſtained "with a courage "more than "manly, though "almoſt with a "woman-like "ſcolding. Tho' "the Muſes do "not willingly "ſuffer, that the "glory of polite "Literature "ſhould be de-"baſed in ſo "ſilly and ſhame-"ful a manner."

[B] . . . And who beſides had no Religion.] He went to Maſs as ſeldom as he could; and if he happened to go at his friend's requeſt, he uſed to ſay, let us go and ſee the popular error. Domitius Calderinus ne Miſſam quidem volebat audire, & cum ab amicis eò duceretur, dixiſſe fertur, eamus ad communem errorem (4); this gave Politian an occaſion to preſent him with the following epigram.

Audit Marſilius Miſſam: miſſam facis illam
Tu, Domiti; magis eſt religioſus uter?
Quis dubitet? tanto es tu religioſior illo,
Quanto audire minus eſt bona quam facere (α).

(4) Lud. Viv. de Veritate fidei, lib. 2. p. m. 264, 265.
(α) Theſe verſes run only upon an equivocation, which cannot be tranſlated into Engliſh.

I have read ſome books of controverſy, written by Proteſtants, in which Calderinus was ranked amongſt the Witneſſes of truth, that is, amongſt thoſe perſons of underſtanding, who in the midſt of Popery had acknowledged the errors which crept into the Roman Church. Did they not make a very good choice?

[C] He was obliged to have his recourſe to impudence, and many artful tricks.] Here follows what we read in Politian. Auctoritatis tam magnæ fuit, ut Romæ inter Profeſſores juvenis adhuc primam ſibi celebritatem vindicaverit: cujus tuendæ ac retinendæ gratia factum compluries putamus, ut in ſuis operibus frontem perfricuerit, & per æqua per iniqua famam captans, parum ex fide quapiam retulerit, nonnulla etiam malè ſolers & præſtigioſus, ſpeciem quidem primorem veri habentia, magno credentium diſpendio, ſententiis ignorabilibus implicuerit, & pulverem, quod aiunt, oculis offuderit; aut ſicubi major difficultas nec abſtinens nec congrediens ſpem lectoris illuſerit. Ita dum neſcire ſe nihil probare contendit, etiam Parthis aliquoties & Cretenſibus mendacior invenitur (5). i. e. "He had gained ſo great a repu-"tation, that tho' he was ſtill very young, yet he "pretended to the greateſt fame amongſt all the Pro-"feſſors at Rome. We think it was in order to ſup-"port and maintain his reputation, that in his works "he forſook all ſhame, and endeavouring to make "himſelf famous right or wrong, he related many "things unfaithfully; and even ſome things, which "at firſt view ſeemed true, he hid artfully under un-"intelligible words, to the great detriment of thoſe, "who put any confidence in him, thus caſting a miſt "before people's eyes, as the ſaying is. Or if ſome "hard objection was propoſed to him, he diſappoint-"ed his hearers, becauſe he would neither recant his "opinions, nor enter into a diſpute to prove them, "Thus labouring to ſhew that he knew every thing, "he has been found a greater lyar, than even the Par-"thians or the Cretans." The character of a knaviſh boaſter cannot be better deſcribed. When this man found himſelf cloſely preſſed by any objection, he would neither fight nor retire. This puts me in mind of the tricks of ſome informers, who will neither recant nor prove their accuſations.

(5) Politian. Miſcellan. cap. 9.

[D] He died very young.] At the age of thirty, if we may believe Leander Albertus (6) and Volaterranus;

(6) Leand. Albert. in Deſcriptione Italiæ, pag. m. 722.

Academy of Rome cauſed him to be buried in a very pompous manner; and the Scholars attended his funeral in a mourning habit (d). Several of his Commentaries upon the ancients are extant, and he was the firſt, who ventured to write ſome upon the moſt difficult Poets [E]. He got an eſtate, and had been Apoſtolical Secretary, according to Volaterranus (e).

(d) Jovius, Elog. cap. 21.
(e) Volat. Comment. Urban. lib. 21. pag. 777.

(7) Volat. lib. 21. pag. m. 777.
(8) In Ibid. pag. 2.

(9) We read in Geſner's Bibliotheca, that Calderinus's Commentary upon the Satyrs of Juvenal, was printed at Rome in 1474.
(10) Volater. lib. 21. pag. 777.
(11) Jovius in Elog. cap. 21.

nus (7); or at thirty four according to Monſieur de Boiſſieu (8): but as he obſerves, that Domitius wrote a Commentary upon Ovid's Ibis in the year 1495, he ought not to have thought that this Critic died ſo young; for how is it poſſible that a man, who publiſhes a Commentary in the year 1474 (9), ſhould write another upon Ovid's Ibis in 1495, and yet live but thirty four years? He died of the plague according to ſome Authors (10); others ſay of a continual fever, having ruined his conſtitution by too great an application to his ſtudies. Ætate laudeque florentem, ſed imbecilli ſtomachi temperaturam nimis lucubrationibus exterentem, quum digna multis ſæculis opera conciperet, rapida febris eripuit (11). i. e. "A continual fever ſnatched him away in the prime of his "years and of his reputation, at a time when he pro"jected ſeveral works, which would have deſerved to "live a great many Ages; he had ruined the conſti"tution of his weak ſtomach by ſtudying too much." I have often wondered at the bad cuſtom of writers of Elogies; they very often forget to mention the year of the birth, and of the death, with ſuch other chronological circumſtances. I have enquired after the reaſon of theſe omiſſions, and finding that they were not owing to the love of brevity (for one ſheet of paper would contain five or ſix hundred dates of this kind) I concluded that lazineſs was the cauſe of all this; theſe writers don't remember theſe circumſtances, nor will they be at the pains of enquiring about them.

[E] He was the firſt, who ventured to write Commentaries upon the moſt difficult Poets.] Volaterranus tells us this. Acri vir ingenio, ſays he (12), PRIMUS qui hoc tempore Poetas duriuſculos diligentius cœperit enarrare, & in eos commentarios edere admodum juvenis. i. e. "He was a man of a very acute genius; and he "is the firſt, who began to explain the more difficult "Poets, and he wrote commentaries upon them, be"ing ſtill very young." Here follows what Calderinus himſelf ſays in his Preface to his edition of Statius. Incidi in libros 5. ſilvarum Papinii Statii, opus granditate heroica ſublime, argumento varium, doctrina remotiſſimum, quod nemo ante nos aut auſus eſt, aut potuit attingere. i. e. "I met with Papinius Statius's five "Books intitled, Silvæ; a work ſublime for its heroic "majeſty, containing a great variety of ſubjects, very "difficult on account of the doctrines it teaches, and "which no one before me either dared to attempt, or "could explain." He wrote this work in 1475 (13). See an encomium upon it in Barthius (14).

(12) Volat. lib. 21. pag. 777.
(13) Barthius in Statium, tom. 1. pag. 483.
(14) Idem, ibid.

☞ CALDWALL or CHALDWELL (RICHARD), an eminent Phyſician in the ſixteenth Century, was born in Staffordſhire, and educated in Brazen-Noſe College in the Univerſity of Oxford, of which he was afterwards Fellow (a). He took the Degree of Maſter of Arts in the year 1539 (b). In the 32d year of his age he became one of the Senior Students of Chriſt's-Church ſoon after its laſt foundation by King Henry VIII in 1547 (c). In 1555 he entered upon the Phyſic-line (d), and proſecuted his ſtudies in that Faculty with ſuch vigour and ſucceſs, that he took the Degrees in it, and was examined, approved, and admitted into the College of Phyſicians at London, and made Cenſor of it, in one and the ſame day [A]. Six weeks after he was choſen one of the Elects of that College, and in 1570 Preſident thereof (e). He wrote ſeveral Tracts relating to his Profeſſion [B]. He founded a Lecture upon Chirurgery in the College of Phyſicians, (which was then in Knight-riders-ſtreet, near the Church of St. Bennet Paul's Wharf (f),) in conjunction with the Lord Lumley (g). He died in the year 1585, and was interred in St. Bennet's Church abovementioned, where a monument was erected to him (b).

(a) Wood, Hiſt. & Antiquit. Univerſ. Oxon. lib. 2. pag. 217. and Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 223. 2d edit. London 1721.
(b) Idem, Hiſt. & Antiq. ubi ſupra.
(c) Idem, ibid. and Athen. Oxon. ubi ſupra.
(d) Idem, Hiſt. & Antiq. ubi ſupra.
(e Idem, Athen. Oxon. ubi ſupra.
(f) Idem, ibid.
(g) Camden, Annales Regin. Elizabeth. ad ann. 1585.
(b) Idem, ibid.

[A] Examined, approved, and admitted into the College of Phyſicians at London, and made Cenſor of it, in one and the ſame day.] Mr. Wood in his Athenæ Oxonienſes (1), and Dr. John Freind in his Oratio Anniverſaria in Theatro Collegii Regalis Medicorum Londin. habita, ex Harvæi Inſtituto, in eorum commemorationem, qui ſuâ in hoc Collegium beneficentiâ claruerunt, die 18 Octobris anno 1720 (2), mentions the ſame fact, which he tells us (3) was an honour, that perhaps never happened to any other perſon. Præ cæteris emicuit Caldwaldi Liberalitas; qui cum uno eodemque die, quod alii fortaſſe nemini contigit, & ſub examen vocatus, & ſimul admiſſus, & etiam ad cenſorium munus erectus fuiſſet, hanc, quæ ei indulta eſt, gratiam pio animo, retulit, &c. See likewiſe Dr. William Wood's Anniverſary Oration before the College (4), October 18th 1733.

(1) Vol. 1. col. 223. 2d edit. London 1721.
(2) Printed at the end of his Epiſtola ad celeberrimum Virum Richardum Mead M. D. de quibuſdam Variolarum Generibus, London 1727 in 8vo.
(3) pag. 15.
(4) pag. 7.

[B] He wrote ſeveral Tracts relating to his Profeſſion.] Mr. Wood in his Hiſtoria & Antiquitates Univerſitatis Oxonienſis. (5) and in his Athenæ Oxonienſes (6) informs us of this, but obſerves that he had never met with any of his works, except a Tranſlation into Engliſh of The Tables of Surgery, briefly comprehending the whole Art and Practice thereof. London 1585 in fol. Written originally in Latin by Horatio Moro, a Florentine Phyſician. T.

(5) Lib. 2. pag. 217.
(6) Ubi ſupra.

CALENUS (OLENUS) the moſt famous Diviner of his time amongſt the Etrurians, would have impoſed upon the Embaſſadors of Rome in the affair of the utmoſt importance, had not his own ſon acquainted them with the neceſſary precautions, they were to take. Tarquin, ſurnamed Superbus, or the Haughty, ſent to conſult Calenus concerning a Prodigy, which was, that the head of a man had been found in the ground, when people were digging to lay the foundations for a Temple, which Tarquin would build to Jupiter on mount Tarpeius. He thought that it was not proper to go on with the building, till it was known what that head portended. He ſent for all the Diviners of his Kingdom, but they anſwered, that they were not well enough ſkilled in their art to explain that Omen, and that he muſt apply to the Prophets of Etruria; they directed him to the moſt famous of them, and Tarquin ſent him immediately a Deputation. As ſoon as this Diviner knew, that the Prodigy portended a great happineſs, he endeavoured to deprive the Romans of it, and to divert ſo great an advantage in favour of his Etrurians. He would have accompliſhed his deſign, had not the Deputies, who had received notice of his intentions, taken care not to commit blunders in their anſwers to his artful queſtions (a) [A]. I ſhall explain this piece of curioſity in a Note.

(a) From Dionyſ. Halicarn. lib. 4. cap. 66 and 67. and Plin. lib. 27. cap. 2. pag. m. 558.

[A] He would have accompliſhed his deſign, had not the Deputies . . taken care not to commit blunders in their anſwers to his artful queſtions.] Pliny mentions this as an inſtance, which proves that one ſingle word is ſufficient to alter the fate of things. Let us quote his own words: Multi verò (auctores ſunt) multarum rerum fata & oſtenta verbis permutari. Cum in Tarpeio fodientes delubro fundamenta caput humanum inveniſſent, miſſis ob id a ſe legatis, Etruriæ celeberrimus vates Olenus Calenus prælarum id fortunatumque cernens, interrogatione in ſuam gentem transferre tentavit, ſcipione pius determinata templi imagine in ſolo ante ſe: HOC ERGO DICITIS ROMANI? HIC TEMPLUM JOVIS OPTIMI MAXIMI FUTURUM EST, HIC CAPUT INVENIMUS: conſtantiſſima annalium affirmatione, tranſiturum fuiſſe fatum in Etruriam, ni præmoniti a filio Vatis Legati Romani reſpondiſſent; NON PLANE HIC, SED ROMÆ INVENTUM CAPUT DICIMUS (1). i. e. "Several Authors maintain, that words can "change the fate of things, and the effects of prodi- "gies. When in digging the ground on mount Tar- "peius for laying the foundations of a Temple, a "man's head was found, the Romans ſent Embaſſa- "dors to Olenus Calenus, the moſt famous Diviner of "Etruria; who finding that the prodigy portended "ſomething very glorious and fortunate, endeavoured "by his ſubtle queſtions to divert the omen in favour "of his own Nation. Wherefore he drew the figure "of the Temple with his ſtick upon the ground be- "fore him, and addreſſed the Embaſſadors in the fol- "lowing manner: This then you ſay Romans; here "the Temple of Jupiter will be built; and here the "head has been found. It is conſtantly related in the "Annals, that the fate of Rome would have paſſed to "Etruria, had not the Roman Embaſſadors, who had "been forewarned by the Diviner's ſon, anſwered; "Not here, by no means, but at Rome, we ſay the head "has been found." This is a very preſſing inſtance. A man's head was found in the foundations of the Capitol; the earth had already been dug very deep, when the prodigy was diſcovered; the head of a man lately killed, ſtill warm, ſtill bleeding (2). Men leſs ſuperſtitious than the Heathens would have found a myſtery in this. It was after all an omen, that the place where the head was found, ſhould become the head of all Italy (3); but by a ſophiſtical trick that place might be cheated out of the rights which fate had granted it, and theſe advantages might be transferred to another place; and if Tarquin's Embaſſadors had forgot to mention Rome and Mount Tarpeius, when the Diviner aſked them, has not the head been found here? Rome would have loſt the Dominion of Italy, and the whole prodigy would have turned to the advantage of the Etrurians. Calenus endeavoured to accompliſh that fraud; for as ſoon as he knew what was the matter, he drew a circle upon the ground, marked the cardinal points upon it by ſtreight lines, Here is Mount Tarpeius, ſaid he to the Embaſſadors. Here is the Eaſt, the South, the North, the Weſt. Is it here or there (pointing with his ſtick) the head has been found? If they had anſwered it is here, the promiſes of fate would have been for Etruria; the place where Calenus was, would have become the ſeat of the Italian Monarchy. But the Roman Deputies were upon their guard, It is not here, anſwered they conſtantly, the head has been found, but at Rome on Mount Tarpeius. Calenus's ſon had taught them this expedient. My father, ſaid he to them, will explain this prodigy to you, without making uſe of any lye in the leaſt; for that is not permitted to a Diviner. But take care how you anſwer his queſtions. This is a curious piece of morality. Here we have a Prophet, who ſcruples to tell a lye in the explication of a prodigy; but who does not ſcruple to enſnare thoſe, who conſult him, nor to impoſe upon them by equivocations, and captious queſtions.

(1) Plinius, lib. 28. cap. 2. pag. m. 558.

(2) Dionyſ. Halic. lib. 4. cap. 66, pag. m. 247.

(3) Idem, ibid. cap. 68. pag. m. 248.

I do not wonder that the Heathens ſhould have believed there is a kind of fatality annexed to ſome inanimate things: for as the notion they had of God was not inconſiſtent with imperfections, there is no capricious whim, but they might aſcribe to their Gods. They might therefore think them capable of fixing their affections upon an image, a ſhield, &c. that is, of granting ſome particular favours to thoſe Nations, who ſhould ſucceſſively have that image, that ſhield, &c. in their poſſeſſion. But ſuch a diſpoſition of fate is inconſiſtent with the Wiſdom and Majeſty of a Sovereign Being, acting immediately himſelf. The occaſional cauſes maintained by the Carteſians, might afford ſome kind of ſolution in caſe of need. Whatever may have been the caſe of the Palladium of Troy, or of Numa's Shield, we have in this affair of the Capitol a very ſingular abſurdity: for it cannot be conceived, that a benefactor, how capricious ſoever he be, ſhould alter his deſigns for the ſake of the frivolous ſubtleties of an interpreter of prodigies. He deſigns to give the Empire of Italy to the City, in which a man's head ſhould be found in the earth. You are of that City, and in the ſincerity of your heart you ſay to ſome Divines of another place, who ſhew you a draught of your country, here the head has been found: and from that moment the Empire of Italy is transferred from your country, to the place where you ſpeak thus. Can there be any thing more monſtrouſly abſurd? I don't doubt but Pliny laughed in his heart at all theſe ſilly things, though he relates them, without ſeeming to deſpiſe them. Hæc ſatis ſint, ſays he (4), exemplis ut appareat, oſtentorum vires & in noſtra poteſtate eſſe, ac prout quæque accepta ſint, valere. i. e. "This is ſufficient to ſhew "by ſome examples, that the effects of prodigies are "in our power, and that they are, what the opinion "we have of them makes them to be."

(4) Plinius, lib. 28. cap. 2. pag. 558.

CALIGULA (CAIUS CÆSAR) Emperor of Rome ſucceeded Tiberius A. C. 37. He was the ſon of Germanicus and Agrippina, and degenerated in ſo terrible a manner, that the reign of his predeceſſor was regretted (a), which is the worſt that could be ſaid of him. They who have ſaid that Nature made choice of him in order to ſhew the world the utmoſt of her power in the way of evil [A], have judged very right. It is probable, that a ſuperior power, I mean a phyſical cauſe, greatly encreaſed the moral depravation of this Emperor [B]. He was almoſt entirely deprived of his free will by the

(a) Sceleratiſſimus ac funeſtiſſimus & qui etiam Tiberii dedecora purgaverit. Eutropius, lib. 7.

(1) De Conſolat. ad Helviam, cap. 9. pag. m. 779.

(2) This is quite the reverſe of Scipio Africanus's character, of whom Valerius Maximus ſays (lib. 6. cap. 9. num. 2.) Quem Dii immortales naſci voluerunt, ut eſſet in quo ſe virtus per omnes numeros hominibus efficaciter oſtenderet.

(3) Seneca, de Conſolat. ad Polybium, cap. 36. pag. 732.

[A] Nature made choice of him in order to ſhew the utmoſt of her power in the way of evil.] Thus I take the liberty to tranſlate the following words of Seneca (1): C. Cæſar quem mihi videtur rerum natura (2) edidiſſe ut oſtenderet quid ſumma vitia in fortuna poſſent. What he ſays in another place is not leſs ſtrong; Nature, ſays he, had produced him to the ſhame and ruin of mankind. Non poſſum . . . hunc præterire, ex omni Cæſarum numero excerpendum, quem rerum natura in exitium opprobriumque humani generis edidit (3).

[B] A phyſical cauſe greatly encreaſed the moral depravation of this Emperor.] Fools and madmen ſin with impunity, at leaſt with regard to the Civil Law; for a madman is not hanged, if having broken his chains, and falling upon the firſt man he meets, he kills him. They who condemn with the utmoſt ſeverity and without exception thoſe State-Revolutions, in which a lawful Sovereign is depoſed, do not deny, that it ought to be done, when a Prince is incorrigibly bad, or, which is the ſame thing, when his wickedneſs is owing to a diſorder in his organs, to a bodily diſeaſe, in a word, to any natural cauſe. The queſtion only is, whether Caligula's frenzy was of this kind. It is very probable, that the philter he was made to ſwallow, increaſed his wickedneſs to the utmoſt degree, and changed it into a mechanical and irreſiſtible fierceneſs, if I may be allowed the uſe of that word irreſiſtible, which is conſecrated to ſhew the efficacy, the Philter which had been given him; ſo that though the Romans had depoſed him in a regular manner, I do not think it could have afforded the leaſt argument to thoſe who are called Monarchomachi (α). The corruption of his mind diſcovered itſelf very early, for he wore ſtill the child's-robe, when he was ſurprized in inceſt with one of his ſiſters (b) [C]: he debauched all thoſe he had, and lived publickly with one of them, as though ſhe had been his wife [D]. But as we muſt give every one his due, I find myſelf obliged to ſay, that I believe they wrong him, who pretend that he committed inceſt with his own daughter [E]. He carried the crime of blaſphemy as far as it is poſſible for

(α) That is, the enemies of Monarchy. CRIT. REM.

(b) See the Article DRUSILLA (JULIA) remark [B].

ficacy of neceſſitating grace. Juvenal aſcribes Caligula's mad cruelties to the malignant effects of that philter:

——— Tamen hoc tolerabile, ſi non
Et furere incipias, ut avunculus ille Neronis,
Cui totam tremuli frontem Cæſonia pulli
Infudit. Quæ non faciet, quod Principis uxor?
Ardebant cuncta, & fracta compage ruebant,
Non aliter quam ſi feciſſet Juno maritum
Inſanum. Minus ergo nocens erit Agrippinæ
Boletus: ſiquidem unius præcordia preſſit
Ille ſenis, tremulumque caput deſcendere juſſit
In Cælum, & longa manantia labra ſaliva.
Hæc poſcit ferrum, atque ignes, hæc potio torquet,
Hæc lacerat mixtos equitum cum ſanguine patres (4).

That is,

" Some nimbler juice would make him foam and " rave,
" Like that, Cæſonia to her Caius gave:
" Who plucking from the forehead of the fole
" His mother's love, infuſed it in the bowl.
" The boiling blood ran hiſſing in his veins,
" Till the mad vapour mounted to his brains.
" The Thund'rer was not half ſo much on fire,
" When Juno's girdle kindled his deſire.
" What woman will not uſe the pois'ning trade
" When Cæſar's wife the precedent has made?
" Let Agrippina's Muſhroom be forgot,
" Giv'n to ſlav'ring, old, unuſeful ſot;
" That only clos'd the driveling dotard's eyes,
" And ſent his Godhead downward to the skies.
" But this fierce potion calls for fire and ſword;
" Nor ſpares the Commons when it ſtrikes the Lord.
Dryden.

(4) Juvenal. Sat. 6. ver. 614.

Suetonius ſays, not only that this philter made him turn raving mad, but alſo, that the oppoſite paſſions, with which he was tranſported, muſt be aſcribed to a diſorder in his mind. He obſerves that this Prince ſlept very little, and that he was troubled with a thouſand wild and extravagant viſions in his dreams. Mentis valetudinem & ipſe ſenſerat, atque ſubinde de ſeceſſu, deque purgando cerebro cogitavit. Creditur potionatus a Cæſonia uxore, amatorio quidem medicamento, ſed quod in furorem verterit. Incitabatur in ſomnia maxime; neque enim plus quam tribus nocturnis horis quieſcebat; ac ne his quidem placida quiete, ſed pavida miris rerum imaginibus; ut qui inter cæteras, pelagi quondam ſpeciem colloquentem ſecum videre viſus eſt. Ideoque magna parte noctis vigiliæ cubandique tædio, nunc toro reſidens, nunc per longiſſimas porticus vagus, invocare identidem atque expectare lucem conſueverat. Nec immeritò mentis valetudini attribuerim diverſiſſima in eodem vitia, ſummam confidentiam & contra nimium metum (5). i. e. " He perceived himſelf the diſorder of his mind; and " had now and then ſome thoughts of retiring and of " purging his brains. It is believed that Cæſonia his " wife had given him a draught; it was indeed a " love-potion, but it made him grow mad. He was " moſtly troubled in his ſleep; he reſted only three " hours in the night; nor had he an eaſy reſt being " diſturbed by extraordinary dreams and viſions; as " for inſtance, he fancied once that the image of the " Sea ſpoke with him. So that being tired with lying " a-bed without ſleeping, he uſed to paſs a great part " of the night, either ſitting on his bed, or walking in " his long galleries, every now and then invoking, and " impatiently expecting the next day. I ſhould not " be miſtaken, I think, if I ſhould aſcribe to a diſ- " order in his mind the contrary vices which met in " him, as the utmoſt confidence with a very great " fear." I own that Tiberius, who as a very wicked man, but whoſe wickedneſs was attended with the utmoſt hypocriſy, was very capable of forming a right judgment concerning the inclinations of others, foretold that Caligula would be the plague of mankind (6). I do not deny, therefore, that Caligula had naturally very pernicious diſpoſitions; but it was in his power to hide, and even to correct them before he took Cæſonia's potion. The beginning of his reign was admirably good; and no man ever acted his part more artfully, than he did under Tiberius. Omnibus inſidiis tentatus elicientium, cogentiumque ſe ad querelas, nullam unquam occaſionem dedit, perinde obliterato ſuorum caſu, ac ſi nihil cuiquam accidiſſet: quæ verò ipſe pateretur, incredibili diſſimulatione tranſmittens. Tantique in Avum, & qui juxta erant, obſequii, ut non immeritò ſit dictum, nec ſervum meliorem ullum, nec deteriorem dominum fuiſſe. Naturam tamen ſævam atque probroſam nec tunc quidem inhibere poterat, &c. (7). i. e. " Tho' many ſnares were laid before him, to " draw ſome complaints from him, yet he never gave " the leaſt occaſion to accuſe him. He ſeemed to " have forgotten the misfortunes of his friends, as tho' " none of them had ſuffered any thing: and he art- " fully diſſembled what he ſuffered himſelf. He was " ſo complaiſant to his grandfather and to all thoſe " who were about him, that it was ſaid of him, and " not without reaſon, that he was the beſt ſlave, and " the worſt maſter. Yet even then he could not al- " ways keep his fierce and ſavage temper within " bounds, &c." This ſhews, that tho' on ſome occaſions he ſhewed his fierceneſs, yet he could maſter it, and make his paſſions yield to reaſon when he pleaſed. If you conſider carefully what he did ſince that time, you will find in his conduct ſeveral ſymptoms of a diſeaſed mind, and many marks of madneſs.

(6) Quod ſagaciſſimus ſenex ita prorſus perſpexerat ut aliquoties prædicaret, exitio ſuo omniumque Cajum vivere & ſe natricem (ſerpentis id genus) populo Romano, Phaëtontem orbi, terrarum educare. Sueton. in Calig. cap. 11. i. e. " The ſagacious " old man had " ſo well diſcovered Caligula's character, " that he ſometimes would " ſay, that that " Caius was " born for his " own ruin, " and for that of " all; and that " he educated a " Natrix (it is a " kind of ſerpent) for the " Romans, and " a Phaeton for " the whole " world."

(7) Suetonius, in Caligula, cap. 10 and 11.

[C] He wore ſtill the child's robe, when he was catched in an inceſt with one of his ſiſters.] See above (8) the article of ANTONIA, where you will find in the margin (9) a paſſage of Suetonius, which proves this fact. You will find the ſame paſſage in the following remark.

(8) Vol. 2. pag. 66, 67.

(9) Quotation (9).

[D] He lived with one of his ſiſters, as tho' ſhe had been his wife.] He had three ſiſters, and all three lay with him; but Druſilla was always his favourite. It was with her that their Grandmother Antonia ſurprized him, and it is her I mean in the text of this Remark. The exceſſive griefs with which he was overwhelmed at her death, and the divine honours he conferred upon her (10), are not the leaſt follies of which he was guilty. As for his other ſiſters, he proſtituted them to his Bardachios, and then puniſhed them under the pretence of adultery and conſpiration, Cum omnibus ſororibus ſuis ſtupri conſuetudinem fecit, plenoque convivio ſingulas infra ſe viciſſim collocabat, uxore ſupra cubante. Ex his Druſillam vitiaſſe virginem prætextatus adhuc creditur, atque etiam in concubitu ejus quondam deprehenſus ab avia Antonia, apud quam ſimul educabantur. Mox Lucio Caſſio Longino conſulari collocatam abduxit, & in modum juſtæ uxoris propalam habuit. Hæredem quoque bonorum atque Imperii æger inſtituit. . . Reliquas ſorores nec cupiditate tanta nec dignatione dilexit, ut quas ſæpe exoletis ſuis proſtraverit. Quo facilius eas in cauſſa Æmilii Lepidi condemnavit quaſi adulteras, & inſidiarum adverſus ſe conſcias (11).

(10) See Sueton. in Calig. cap. 10. Seneca de Conſolat. ad Polybium, cap. 28. lib. 59. pag. m. 744. Dion, ad ann. U. 791.

(11) Sueton. in Calig. cap. 24.

[E] I believe they wrong him who pretend that he committed an inceſt with his own daughter.] " He " indulged his laſciviouſneſs with his own ſiſters; " and to appear ſtill more prodigiouſly inceſtuous he " raviſhed a daughter he had by one of his ſiſters." This is what we read in the Abbé de Marolles's French tranſlation of Eutropius; but I think that he did not well underſtand the original. Eutropius's words are as follow. Stupra ſororibus intulit, ex unâ etiam natam filiam cognovit (12). I am very much miſtaken if the ſenſe of theſe words is not this, He lay with his ſiſters, and even acknowledged for his daughter a girl for a creature to do. Like the Devil, he believed that there is a God, and trembled at the thought, and yet he belched out the moſt abominable blaſphemies againſt the Deity [F]. He proudly uſurped all religious honours [G], nor did he ſtick at any crime whatſoever (c). The laſt of his four wives was Cæſonia; ſhe was neither beautiful nor young, and yet he loved her paſſionately, notwithſtanding which his very careſſes of her were ſometimes attended with ſome marks of his ſavage and cruel temper [H]. He had a daughter girl he had by one of them (* a). I know that it can be proved by ſome inſtances that the Latin expreſſion. cognoſcere fœminam ſignifies ſometimes to lay with a woman. But theſe inſtances are ſcarce, and beſides, it is not at all probable, that in this paſſage Eutropius would have employed that expreſſion in that ſenſe. This was not a proper place to make uſe of ſuch modeſt and equivocal words. He had employed the word ſtuprum, when he ſpoke of the brother and ſiſters, and ſpeaking in the ſame ſentence of the father and the daughter ſhould he have made uſe of a ſofter expreſſion? With Caſaubon's leave (13), I do not find the leaſt probability in it. I add, that the common acceptation of the word cognoſcere, puts a very good ſenſe upon Eutropius's words. For it is a new degree of impudence in a man to acknowledge for his daughter the child he had by his own ſiſter. It is having ſome regard for the publick, to hide an inceſtuous commerce, and a man ſhews more or leſs reſpect for the publick, according as he keeps ſuch an intrigue more or leſs ſecret: but when a man acknowledges himſelf publickly for the father of the children, who are born of ſuch inceſt, it ſhews that he has loſt all manner of ſhame. I will not object to the Abbé de Marolles, that Caligula was never accuſed of having raviſhed his own daughter; for my tranſlation of Eutropius's words is not better ſupported by other Hiſtorians, than Monſieur de Marolles's verſion. Eutropius is the only Author, that I know of, who mentions either that acknowledgment, or that inceſt, which makes me doubt very much of what he relates. An Emperor, who dy'd before he was twenty nine years old, who had a daughter by his ſiſter, who ſhould ſee that daughter full grown, who ſhould raviſh her, or who from her cradle ſhould have acknowledged her publickly for his daughter, all this, I ſay, is too extraordinary and ſurpriſing, to have been mentioned only by one ſingle Author, if it were true.

(12) Eutropius, lib. 7. cap. 7. in Caligula.

(c) Concerning his cruelty. See Seneca, de Ira, lib. 3. cap. 18, 19.

(13) He takes Eutropius's words in the ſame ſenſe as Mr. De Marolles did. See Caſaub. in Sueton. Calig. cap. 24. Conradus Dietericus, in Vita Calig. pag. 29. takes the words in the ſame ſenſe.

Obſerve, that in all likelihood, Caligula did not lay with his ſiſters, before he entered into his grand-mother's houſe; and ſince he was eighteen years of age, when he went to live with her (14), it is impoſſible he ſhould have ſeen that daughter full grown, who was born of this inceſt. If it be objected, that the word cognoſcere would not be proper in the ſenſe I take it, ſince AGNOSCERE (15) is the word affixed to that ſenſe, I anſwer that Eutropius, is none of thoſe Authors, who write with the greateſt accuracy.

(14) See the remark [B] of the article DRUSILLA (JULIA.)

(15) See Pitiſcus, in Sueton. in Jul. cap. 52. num. 9.

(* a) Acknowledged for his daughter a girl he had by one of them.] Pæanius, who tranſlated Eutropius into Greek, puts the ſame ſenſe upon this paſſage, as Monſieur de Marolles does; for he tranſlates it thus. Καὶ τῆς ἑαυτῦ ἐκγόνης ἄυθις ἐγένετο φθορεύς. Upon which Barthius obſerves †, that it cannot be granted, that Caligula, who died at the age of twenty nine, ſhould have raviſhed his own daughter; wherefore, adds he, ſome with very good reaſon, read agnovit, inſtead of cognovit in the paſſage of Eutropius. Non hoc conceſſerit, qui noverit modo, anno xxix ætatis Caligulam interiiſſe. Quare alii optime ediderunt apud Eutropium, ex unâ etiam natam filiam agnovit. CRIT. REM.

† Barthius, Adverſarior. lib. 23. cap. 9.

[F] He believed that there is a God, and trembled at the thoughts, and yet he belched out . . . . blaſphemies againſt the Deity.] Here follows a paſſage from Calvin, which is not impertinently quoted. Nemo in audaciorem aut effrenatiorem numinis contemptum prorupiſſe legitur quam C. Caligula: nemo tamen miſerius trepidavit, cum aliquod iræ divinæ indicium ſe proferebat: ita Deum, quem ſtudebat ex profeſſo contemnere, invitus exhorrebat (16). i. e. "We read in Hiſtory, "that no body ever diſcovered a more audacious and "furious contempt for the Deity, than C. Caligula "did, and yet no body trembled in a more deſpicable "manner than he, at the leaſt token of divine wrath. "Thus dreading againſt his will that ſame God, whom "he ſtrove to contemn." All this is grounded on Suetonius's account, who tells us, that this ſame Caligula, who ſhewed ſo much contempt for the Gods, uſed to hide himſelf under a bed, when he heard a great thunder. Qui Deos tantopere contemneret, ad minima tonitrua & fulgura connivere, caput obvolvere, ad vero majora proripere ſe è ſtrato, ſub lectumque condere ſolebat (17). i. e. "He, who pretended ſo much to "deſpiſe the Gods, uſed to ſhut his eyes, and to co-"ver his head at the leaſt thunder and lightning, "and if it happened to thunder very much, he jump-"ed out of his bed, and hid himſelf under it." But let us obſerve, that he had not always ſuch a fear; for on the contrary, there was a time when he affected to vie with Jupiter, as well with regard to thunder as to thunder-bolts. With the noiſe of his engines, he anſwered the noiſe of the thunder, and if thunder-bolts fell from the ſky, he flung ſtones towards heaven, and addreſſing himſelf to the God, who thunder'd, he cried to him, take me out of the world, or I ſhall take thee out of it. Ταῖς τε βροντᾶις ἐκ μεχανῆς τινὲς ἀντέβροντα, καὶ ταῖς ἀστραπαῖς ἀντήστραπτε. καὶ ὅποτε χεραυνὸς καταπέσοι λίθον ἀντηκόντιζεν, ἐπιλέγων ἐφ' ἑκάστῳ τὸ τῦ Ὁμήρυ, ἢ μ' ἀνάειρ' ἢ ἐγὼ σε (18). Torrentius finds more fear than threatnings in theſe words, upon which he immediately quotes Suetonius who mentions Caligula's fear of the thunder. Non tam comminantis quam timentis eſt etiam, aut occide me aut ego te. Expaviſſe autem Cajum fulmina auctor eſt Suetonius (19). Torrentius did not underſtand this well, and put a wrong conſtruction upon Caligula's words. His expreſſions do not in the leaſt ſavour of fear; they contain a downright challenge, to a deſperate fight, which was not to end but by the death of one of the combatants. This is the ſenſe which Seneca plainly puts upon Caligula's words (20). Ad pugnam vocavit Jovem, & quidem ſine miſſione, Homericum illum exclamans verſum (21). Here follows another inſtance of Caligula's impiety. He uſed to approach the ſtatue of Jupiter Capitolinus in the day time, as tho' he would begin a converſation with him. Sometimes he ſpoke loudly to him, ſometimes ſoftly and in his ear; and then in his turn put his ear to Jupiter's mouth. Theſe converſations did not uſe to end without ſome diſputes, and Caligula was once heard to threaten Jupiter that he would ſend him back into Greece, εἰς γαῖαν Δαναῶν περάω σε. He boaſted that Jupiter had prevailed upon him by his prayers, not to put that threatning in execution, and obtained from him the favour of lodging with him; and it is for that reaſon, ſaid he, that I have cauſed a bridge to be made between my houſe and the Capitol (22).

(17) Sueton. in Calig. cap. 51.

(18) Dion, lib. 59. pag. 761. See alſo Seneca de Ira, lib. 1. cap. 16.

(19) Torrent. in Sueton. cap. 22.

(20) Seneca, de Ira, lib. 1. cap. 16.

(21) It is verſe the 724th of the 23d book of the Iliad. Ajax addreſſed thoſe words to Ulyſſes, with whom he wreſtled; they have not a ſanguinary ſignification in that place.

(22) Sueton. in Calig. cap. 22.

[G] He proudly uſurped all religious honours.] He often placed himſelf between the ſtatues of Caſtor and Pollux, and there received the adorations of all comers. He had a temple built to him, in which the choiceſt animals were every day ſacrificed to him (23). For ſome time he called himſelf Jupiter, and ſaid, it was for that reaſon he had lain with ſo many women, and even with his own ſiſters. At other times he would be Juno, Diana, Venus, Bacchus, and dreſſed himſelf in the habit proper to theſe Deities (24). He ordered a Body or College of Prieſts to be erected for him, his wife Cæſonia, and Claudius his uncle were members of that College, none were admitted into it, but rich men, who bought that dignity very dear. He would be himſelf his own Prieſt, for which reaſon he entered himſelf into that College, into which he alſo admitted his horſe (25).

(23) Idem, ibid. See alſo Dion, lib. 59. pag. 761.

(24) Dio, lib. 59. pag. 759.

(25) Idem, ibid. pag. 761.

[H] He loved Cæſonia paſſionately, notwithſtanding which his very careſſes of her were . . . . attended with ſome marks of his ſavage and cruel temper.] Mr. de Balzac will furniſh us with a Commentary upon theſe words. The fair, ſays he (26), who are beloved by tyrants are not ſafe. . . . Poppea was firſt Nero's miſtreſs, then his wife, and always his Governeſs. She had tamed that monſter, and made him tractable, yet ſhe could not always maſter him, for being once in a paſſion againſt her, he killed her by a kick he gave her daughter by her, who died with her father and mother in Caſſius Chærea's conſpiracy (d), A. C. 41. Lollia Paulina, another of his wives, had not been married to Caius Cæſar, Agrippa's ſon, as the learned Archbiſhop Uſher thought (e) [I]. Philo relates a ſaying of Caligula, which deſerves to be conſidered [K]. Seneca wonders that this Emperor ſhould have inſulted others by his railleries, whilſt he himſelf by his bodily defects was ſo much expoſed to ridicule [L]; but he was not afraid that people ſhould dare to laugh at him as he laughed at others. Perhaps alſo he did not perceive his own defects. One of his moſt impertinent follies was, that when the Moon was full, he deſired her to come her on the belly. His uncle Caius did not treat Cæſonia ſo ſeverely; however in the height of his love, he uſed to court her after this manner. This fine head will be cut off the moment I command it. He told her ſometimes, that he would have her put to the rack, in order to know from her, why he loved her ſo much. This is borrowed from Suetonius. Quoties uxoris vel amiculæ collum exoſcularetur, addebat, tam bona cervix, ſimulac juſſero, demetur. Quin & ſubinde jactabat, exquiſiturum ſe vel fidiculis de Cæſonia ſua, cur eam tantopere diligeret (27). It is ſtrange, that this woman, who was neither young nor beautiful, and who had already had three children by her huſband, ſhould have filled that ſavage breaſt with ſo great and ſo conſtant a love. Let men commend, as much as they pleaſe, the prime of youth, it will be found after all, that the ſkill and addreſs of a woman between thirty and forty, will better ſupport her reign, if ſhe be the miſtreſs of a Prince, than the beauty alone of a tender girl could do. Add to this that Cæſonia, and probably ſome other Ladies of the ſame character, learned ſeveral love practices, which abundantly ſupply the want of beauty. However that be Suetonius ſeems to hint, that Cæſonia's laſcivious temper was the reaſon why Caligula loved her ſo much. That Prince was ſo fooliſhly fond of her, that he uſed to ſhew her ſtark naked to his friends. Cæſoniam neque facie inſigni, neque ætate integra, matremque jam ex alio viro trium filiarum, ſed luxuriæ ac laſciviæ perditæ, & ardentius & conſtantius amavit, ut ſæpe Chlamyde peltaque & galea ornatam & juxta adequitantem militibus oſtenderit, amicis vero etiam nudam (28). He did not acknowledge her for his wife before ſhe was brought to bed; it was of a daughter ſhe was delivered; Caligula loved this daughter very tenderly; he found that ſhe was his own blood by her ſcratching the face of the little children with whom ſhe played. Nec ullo firmiore indicio ſui ſeminis eſſe credebat, quam feritatis quæ illi quoque tanta jam tunc erat, ut infeſtis digitis ora & oculos ſimul ludentium infantium inceſſeret (29). Judge, whether the perſon, who made her undergo the ſame kind of death, which the Pſalmiſt wiſhed to the children of Babylon (30), might not truly ſay, that he cruſhed to pieces a ſerpent ready hatched, mali corvi malum ovum.

FACTS relating to CÆSONIA.

(26) In one of his Letters.

(d) See the article of this CASSIUS, quotation (i).

(e) Annal. tom. 2. ad An. 4003.

(27) Sueton. in Calig. cap. 33.

(28) Ibid. cap. 25.

(29) Ibid.

(30) Periit una & uxor Cæſonia gladio à Centurione confoſſa, & filia parieti illiſa. Suet. cap. 59. i. e. "Cæſonia "and her daughter died at the "ſame time, "the former by "the ſword, the "latter being "daſhed againſt "the wall." Here follow the words of Pſalm cxxxvii. ver. 9. Happy ſhall be he, that takes and daſhes thy little ones againſt the ſtones.

[I] Lollia Paulina another of his wives, had not been married to Caius Cæſar . . . . as Archbiſhop Uſher thought.] His miſtake was occaſioned by the following words of Suetonius in Chapter the xxvith of the life of the Emperor Claudius, Deque Lolliæ Paulinæ, quæ C. Cæſari nupta fuerat. i. e. "Of Lollia Pau"lina's (marriage), who had been married to C. "Cæſar." The Archbiſhop thought that theſe words muſt be underſtood of Auguſtus's grandſon. But he would not have committed this ſmall blunder, had he obſerved, two things; I. he ſhould have conſidered, that Suetonius in Chapter the XXVth of Caligula's life, ſays poſitively that this Emperor married Lollia Paulina, and ſoon after divorced her. II. That Tacitus, in Chapter XL of the fourth Annals, tells us, that Caius Cæſar, Auguſtus's grandſon, married Livia Druſus's daughter, and ſiſter of Germanicus, and that he died before her, ſince it is known, that ſhe was afterwards married to Druſus Tiberius's ſon. Theſe obſervations come from the learned F. Noris (31), and not from me.

(31) Cenotaph. Piſan. pag. 189.

[K] Philo relates a ſaying of Caligula, which deſerves to be conſidered.] One of our modern Authors has dreſſed it in the following manner. Far from being ſurprized, ſays he (32), that Princes have not all the good qualities, which are requiſite in them, I ſhould be much more ſurprized, if they did not argue like Caligula ſince our blind ſubmiſſion to their moſt wild and unjuſt fancies, muſt naturally raiſe their pride to the higheſt degree of inſolence. "Since they, who lead "droves of cattle, ſaid that arch-madman *, are not "beaſts, like them, but of a more exalted nature; "ſo they who command men, in a manner ſo ab"ſolute, and to whom others obey, cannot be mere "men like them, whom they govern, but muſt be "Gods." This is the effect, which our flattery muſt naturally produce upon the minds of Princes, and which it uſed to produce amongſt the Heathens. That the reader may obſerve the difference there is between Authors, I ſhall here relate in what manner St. Romuald, a Monk of the Order of St. Bernard, has miſrepreſented all this. At that time (33), ſays he, flouriſhed Caius, that illuſtrious Philoſopher, to whom the following fine apophthegm is aſcribed. "He who governs others, "ſhould not only be a man but more than a man; "that is, much more virtuous and perfect than they. "For as they do not chuſe a ſheep, to lead ſheep, ſo to "govern men you muſt not chooſe a man but a God. "Paſtor ovium ſays he, non eſt ovis, Paſtor boum non "eſt bos, caprarum paſtor non eſt capra ſed homo; "ergo hominum paſtor aliud quam homo eſſe debet, Quid "ergo? Deus. Otherwiſe he is in danger of deſtroy"ing them, and himſelf with them." Let the reader, if he thinks fit, be at the pains of examining how many blunders there are in the words of that honeſt Monk.

(32) S. Real, Ceſarion, pag. m. 202.

* Philo Judæus in his embaſſy.

(33) That is, in the time of Perſeus, the laſt King of Macedon, in the year of the world 3826. See his Abregé Chronol. tom. 1. pag. m. 697.

[L] He inſulted others by his railleries, whilſt he himſelf by his bodily defects was ſo much expoſed to ridicule.] He was the greateſt ſlanderer in the world, and a very ugly man; pale, his eyes ſunk deep in his head, a wild look, a hairy neck, and a bald head; his feet enormouſly big, and his legs thin like a ſpindle. A man ill-favoured as he was, laughed at every one, and uſed to tell people the moſt ſhocking things; as when he told Valerius Aſiaticus with a loud voice in a full company, the defects he had found in his wife, when he had enjoyed her (34). Let us hear Seneca upon this. C. Cæſar, inter cætera vitia, quibus abundabat, contumelioſus mirabiliter ferebatur omnibus aliqua nota feriendis, ipſe materia riſus benigniſſima. Tanta illi palloris inſaniam teſtantis fæditas erat, tanta oculorum ſub fronte anili latentium ſervitas (35), tanta capitis deſtituti & emendicatis capillis aſperſi, deformitas; adjice obſeſſam ſatis cervicem, & exilitatem crurum, & enormitatem pedum. Immenſum eſt, ſi velim ſingula referre, per quæ in patres avoſque ſuos contumelioſus fuit, per quæ in univerſos ordines: ea referam, quæ illum exitio dederunt. Aſiaticum Valerium in primis amicis habebat, ferocem virum, & vix æquo animo alienas contumelias laturum. Huic in convivio, item in concione, voce clariſſima, qualis in concubitu eſſet uxor ejus, objecit. Dii boni, hoc virum audire, Principem ſcire, & uſque eo licentiam perveniſſe, ut non dico Conſulari, non dico amico, ſed tantum marito, Princeps & adulterium ſuum narret, & faſtidium (36)? i. e. "Amongſt the other vices to which Caligula was ſub"ject, he was very ſmart upon thoſe, who gave the "leaſt occaſion for raillery, for which he himſelf af"forded matter in abundance; by his pale face, a "ſure ſign of his madneſs, by his eyes deeply hid in "his old woman's head, by his bald pate; covered "with borrowed hair; add to this, his hairy neck, "thin legs, and monſtrous feet. It would be an in"finite taſk to relate, how many ways he abuſed his "fathers, and grand-fathers, and all the orders of the "State. I ſhall only mention that, which brought "his ruin upon him. Valerius Aſiaticus was one "of his beſt friends, a proud man, who could "hardly bear the reproaches of others: to him Cali"gula told at dinner, before company with a loud "voice, how his wife behaved in bed. Good God! "A huſband to hear this, a Prince to know it; and "that licentiouſneſs ſhould go ſo far, that a Prince "ſhould

(34) Suetonius in Calig. cap. 36. tells us, that Caligula uſed to invite the moſt eminent men of Rome to dinner with their wives; and when he had a mind, he uſed to go out with the woman he liked beſt; and returning ſome time after, he related to the company the moſt hidden beauties or defects he had found in the Lady. Recentibus adhuc laſciviæ notis reverſus, vel laudabat palam, vel vituperabat, ſingula enumerans bona malave corporis atque concubitus.

(35) See Sueton. in Calig. cap. 50. where he draws a picture of this Emperor, much like what we tranſcribe here, and with ſome ſtrokes which are not in Seneca.

(36) Seneca, de Conſtantia, cap. 18. pag. m. 693.

come and lie with him (f), he even boaſted that he had lain with her (g). What ſhall I ſay of the honours of Prieſthood which he conferred on his horſe (b)? See the laſt remark [M]. The deſcription which St. Paul gives us of the Man of Sin, of Antichriſt, agreed ſo well with this Emperor's character, that I don't wonder ſome learned men ſhould have explained of him that part of the propheeies contained in the New Teſtament (i). However I do not pretend to affirm that they are in the right. The reader will find in the article of MACRO, that the intrigues of a woman contributed very much to the raiſing of Caligula ſooner to the Throne. A Profeſſor at Utrecht has very well diſplayed in an Oration (k) the bad qualities and monſtrous actions of this Emperor.

(f) Sueton. in Calig. cap. 22.
(g) Dio, lib. 59. pag. 761.
(b) Idem, ibid.
(i) See Grotius, in Tractatu de Antichriſto.
(k) See the 13th Oration of Antonius Æmilius.

" ſhould boaſt of his adultery and diſguſt; I do not " ſay before a conſular man, before a friend, but even " before the huſband himſelf? I have quoted in the margin a paſſage from Suetonius, which ſhews that Valerius Africanus's wife had ſeveral fellow ſufferers in her misfortune, and that there were many more women, whoſe hidden defects the indiſcreet Caligula publiſhed. They who know how detrimental ſuch an indiſcretion was to the affairs of Henry the IIId of France, will be ſurpriſed that the Ladies had ſo little ſhare in the conſpiracies againſt Caligula. For I believe, that at that time the Roman Ladies were not leſs concerned at ſuch affronts, than the Ladies at the French Court in the XVIth Century. Now, here follows what we read in Mezerai. It was reported to the King, that the leaſt evil the leaguers intended to do him, was to make a Monk of him, and that the Ducheſs of Montpenſier ſhewed the ſciſſars, with which ſhe intended to clip his crown. The reaſon of this was, that he had exaſperated that widow, by diſcovering in converſation ſome hidden defects of her; an injury much more unpardonable with women, than an attempt upon their chaſtity (37).

(37) Mezerai, Abregé Chronol. tom. 5. ann. 1588, pag. m. 315.

[M] See the laſt remark.] His converſations with the ſtatue of Jupiter, the pretended ſecrets he told him in his ears, his quarrelling, and threatnings, during that fine converſation (38), his enjoyment of the moon, his deſigning to make his horſe a Conſul, his whim of having his horſe dine at table with him, and a thouſand other things like theſe, are unqueſtionable marks of madneſs. He was very wicked, but he was at leaſt ſomething more mad than wicked. It is certain, that he was no Atheiſt; all his impious actions prove, that he believed the being of Gods; ſo that the Author of the Penſees ſur les Comètes, was in the right (39), when he quoted Caligula as an inſtance, that the moſt profligate wretches, mentioned in hiſtory, have acknowledged a Deity.

(38) See above, remark [G].
(39) Pag. 344, 380.

☞CALLIMACHUS, a Greek Poet, who flouriſhed in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and Ptolemy Euergetes, Kings of Egypt, was born in Cyrene, a famous City of ancient Libya, and was ſon of Battus [A] and Meſatme (a); from whence Ovid calls our Poet Battiades. Strabo informs us (b), that our Poet declared himſelf to be deſcended from King Battus, who was the Founder of Cyrene. We have no account of the particular year, when he was born; but it is generally agreed, that he commenced his fame under the patronage of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and continued in the reign of his ſucceſſor Ptolemy Euergetes (c), whoſe Queen Berenice having conſecrated her locks in the Temple of Venus, and a cunning Mathematician having ſtolen them thence to tranſlate them to Heaven, gave occaſion to the beautiful Elegy of this Poet, which we have now only in the Latin of Catullus. Aulus Gellius (d) tells us, that he flouriſhed a little after the firſt Punic War. He ſtudied under Hermocrates Jaſenſis the Grammarian, and married the daughter of Euphrates of Syracuſe (e). Before he was recommended to the favour of Ptolemy Philadelphus, he taught ſchool in the ſtreet Eleuſine in Alexandria, and had the honour of educating Apollonius, the Author of the Argonautics [B]. He wrote a great number of ſmall Poems, of which we have only ſome Hymns and Epigrams remaining [C]. We ſhall give the judgments, which have been (a) Suidas in Voce Καλλίμαχος.

(b) Lib. 17.
(c) Suidas, ubi ſupra.
(d) Noctes Atticæ, lib. 17. cap. 21.
(e) Suidas, ubi ſupra.

[A] He was ſon of Battus.] Mr. Baſil Kennet in his Lives and Characters of the Ancient Greek Poets (1) tells us, that our Author's common title of Battiades makes the Grammarians uſually aſſign one Battus for his father; but that perhaps he may as well derive that name from King Battus the Founder of Cyrene, from whoſe line, as Strabo (2) aſſures us, he declared himſelf to be deſcended. But whoever his father was, our Poet has paid all his duties and obligations to him in a moſt beautiful epitaph, which we find in the Anthologia; and in which the old man is repreſented as addreſſing the viſitants at his tomb in the following manner:

(1) Part 1. pag. 156. edit. London 1697, in 8vo.
(2) Lib. 17.

Ὅστις ἐμὸν παρὰ σῆμα φέρεις πόδα, Καλλιμάχῳ, με
Ἰοδὶ Κυρηναῖος παῖδά τε καὶ γενέτην.
Εἰδείης δ' ἄμφω κεν· ὁ μὲν πότε πατρίδος ὅπλων
Ἦρξεν, ὁδ' ἵππευσεν κρείσσονα Βασκανίης.
Οὐ νέμεσις· Μῶσαι γὰρ ὅσους ἴδον ὄμμασι παῖδας
Ἀχρὶ βίης πολιὰς οὐκ ἀπέθεντο φίλας.

That is,

" Stranger! I beg not to be known but thus,
" Father and ſon of a Callimachus.
" Chief of a war, the firſt enlarg'd his name;
" And the laſt ſung what envy ne'er ſhall damn;
" For whom the heav'nly Muſe admir'd a child,
" On his grey hairs the Goddeſs always ſmil'd."

Kennet.

[B] Had the honour of educating Apollonius, the Author of the Argonautics.] This Poet having provoked Callimachus, the latter wrote an invective Poem againſt his ungrateful Scholar, under the reproachful name of Ibis (3); which furniſhed Ovid with a pattern and a title for his ſatyrical piece of the ſame kind.

(3) Suidas in Καλλιμαχος.

[C] He wrote a great number of ſmall Poems, of which we have only ſome Hymns and Epigrams remaining.] He uſed often to ſay, that a great book was a great evil. When it was objected to him by his enemies, that his Muſe could not undertake any conſiderable work, he gave them the following anſwer at the end of his hymn to Apollo:

Ὁ φθόνος Ἀπόλλωνος ἐπ' οὔατα λάθριος εἶπεν,
Οὐκ ἄγαμαι τὸν ἀοιδὸν, ὃς οὐδ' ὅσα πάντος, ἀείδει.
Τὸν φθόνον ὁ Πόλλων ποδὶ τ' ἤλασεν ὦδί τ' ἔειπεν,
Ἀσσυρίω ποταμοῖο μέγας ῥόος, ἀλλὰ τὰ πολλὰ
Λύματα γῆς καὶ πολλὸν ἐφ' ὕδατι συρφετὸν ἕλκει,
Δηοῖ δ' ἐκ ἀπὸ παντὸς ὕδωρ φερέυσι Μέλισσαι,
Ἀλλ' ἥτις καθαρή τε καὶ ἀχραδάντος ἀνέρπει
Πίδακος ἐξ ἱερῆς ὀλίγη λιβάς, ἄκρον ἄωτον.

That is,

" Sly envy in his ear Apollo told,
" He's poor, that writes leſs than a ſea can hold.
" Apollo ſpurn'd the monſter off, and ſaid,
" See vaſt Euphrates, how his billows ſpread:
" But ſee the loads of muck, that preſs his ſide,
" And foul the water, while they raiſe the tide.

" But

been passed upon him, in the Note [D]. Gerrard John Vossius in his first Book (f) de Historicis Græcis places our Author among the Historians, because he wrote a Table or Account of those Persons, who were eminent in every Science, and of the Books, which they wrote; which work consisted of an hundred and twenty Books, and is mentioned by Suidas and Athenæus in his Deipnosophists (g), and by an Etymological writer quoted by Vossius. Athenæus observes, that Callimachus mentioned in this work how many lines every book contained; for as it is easy for the Moderns to do this with regard to the Poets, so it was not difficult for the Antients to do the same with respect to the writers in prose, since in transcribing Authors they used paper of a certain form (b). Our Author wrote likewise of the origin of Islands and Cities, and of the changes of their names; of the Rivers in Europe; of the wonderful and incredible things in Peloponnesus and Italy; of the alteration of the names of Fishes; of the Winds; of Birds; of the Rivers of the Earth; and collections concerning the wonderful things in the several parts of the World; with (f) Cap. 15. pag. 92. edit. Francofurti 1677, in 4to.

(g) Lib. VI. and XIV.

(b) See Salmasius's Prolegomena to Solinus.

[D] We shall give the judgments, which have been pass'd upon him in the Note.] Madam Dacier in the Preface to her Edition of him, printed at Paris 1674 in 4to under the following title, Callimachi Hymni, Epigrammata, & Fragmenta, Græcè & Latinè, nec non ejusdem Poematium de Comâ Berenices a Catullo versum, edente cum notis & indice Anna Tanaquilla Fabri filia; tells us, that among the writings of ancient Greece, there is nothing more elegant and polite than these compositions of our Author. And that Lady's father, Tanaquil Faber, in his Abregé des Vies des Poetes Grecs, is of the same opinion, and declares that Callimachus's manner of writing is neat and strong; and that Catullus and Propertius imitate him very frequently, and sometimes even translate him. However some other writers have not entertained so favourable an opinion of his genius. For Ovid, when he gives him a place in his Catalogue of Poets, pronounces him immortal merely upon the account of his art, and at the same time expressly denies his title to wit:

Battiades toto semper cantabitur orbe:
Quamvis ingenio non valet, arte valet (5).

(5) Amor. Eleg. 15. lib. 1.

But Daniel Heinsius, in the Prolegomena to his Hesiod, has endeavoured to make Ovid's judgment speak a more favourable sense, and tells us, that when that Poet seems to accuse Callimachus for want of genius, he does not pretend that he wanted invention, subtilty, address, or spirit; but because he was not natural enough, and was too elaborate and affected, as if he had endeavoured after the reputation of a good Grammarian rather than that of a true Poet. Mr. Basil Kennet (6) observes, that Heinsius did not succeed in this explication of Ovid's words, and that the attentive reader will be apt to imagine, that Ovid intended his words should be understood according to their natural import, but that thro' a spirit of envy and emulation, he has wilfully contracted his rival's praises; and that it is plain Ovid had no higher ambition than to be thought superior to Callimachus; and declares he should admire a mistress, who would honour him with that preference:

(6) Ubi supra, pag. 162.

Est quæ Callimachi præ nostris rustica dicit
Carmina; cui placeo, protinus ipsa placet (7).

(7) Amor. lib. 2. Eleg. 4.

"But not with liquor drawn at every stream,
"Great Cere's Maids regale their Heav'nly Dame:
"But some untainted chrystal brook supplies
"Its spotless drops to purge the sacrifice." Kennet.

The Scholiast on this place observes, that to stop the mouths of these detractors, the Poet composed his Hecate, a work of a large size; which is now lost, but is frequently cited by the Greek and Roman Authors (4). Suidas, who omits the mention of that Poem, tells us, that he wrote eight hundred pieces. Καὶ ἐστι αὐτῷ τὰ γεγραμμένα βιβλία ὑπὲρ τὰ ὠ. The same writer mentions the titles of some of them, particularly the Arrival of Ion, Semele, the Builders of Argi, Arcadia, Glaucus, Ἐλπίδες or Hope, Satyrical Fables, Tragedies, Comedies, Poems, Ibis, &c. His Hymns and Epigrams were published at Utrecht 1697 in two volumes in 8vo under the following title, Callimachi Hymni & Epigrammata & Fragmenta ex recensione Theodori J. G. F. Grævii, cum ejusdem & aliorum animadversionibus.

(4) See the argument of this Poem in Politian's Miscellanies, cap. 24.

Mr. Kennet likewise remarks (8), that it is true, we have still many prodigious instances of his art, as, besides the Apology for himself abovementioned, the manner of bringing King Ptolemy's praise into the Hymn of Jupiter, the making Apollo while yet in his mother's belly prophecy of the same Prince's, and the like; yet it will be difficult to persuade any person, who has considered the surprizing delicacy of his thought and turn, to compound for half his applause, and to quit the credit of his invention for that of his judgment; since both the talents seem so happily tempered together, that it is hard to give an instance of one virtue, without displaying the other in the same view. What can be a fairer argument, continues the same writer (9), for the union of the same talents, than those wise and delicious sentences, which striking us suddenly in a work, where one would not expect them, look as much like inspiration as any thing, that Poetry can produce? Two of these in the very first hymn may vie with the entire labours of more bulky Authors. The first of them is a fine Answer to the modern Libertines, who from the fancied uncertainty of a future state, take occasion to live and die at a venture, and expect as good a chance as their neighbours. The Poet is speaking of Jupiter's title to the Empire of Heaven, as a thing acknowledg'd and unenvied by his two brothers; and hence he reflects on the folly of the ancient story-tellers, who would make the three sons of Saturn divide the three Realms by lot.

(8) Pag. 159.

(9) Pag. 161.

Τὶς δὲ κ' ἐπ' Ὠυλύμπῳ τε καὶ ἀμφὶ κλῆρον ἵησται,
Ὃς μάλα μὲν νήπλω· ἐπ' ἰσαίη γὰρ ἔοικε
Πλαῶς· Τὰ δ' τόσσον ὅσον διὰ πλείων ἔχουσι.

That is,

"For who, yet blest'd with senses, would submit,
"A lottery should decide his doubtful right
"To Heaven or Hell? In things of equal state
"The lot's of use, and ends the vain debate.
"But those so wide, that distance cannot name
"The space; for distance is express'd by them."

The other is the concluding Strain of the Hymn, where he makes his fare-well Prayer to the Deity:

Χαῖρε πάτερ, χαῖρ' αὖθι· δίδε δ' ἀρετήν τ' ἄφενός τε,
Οὔτ' ἀρετῆς ἄτερ ὄλβος ἐπίσσεται ἀνδρὸς ἀέξειν,
Οὔτ' ἀρετὴ ἀφένοιο. δίδυ δ' ἀρετήν τε καὶ ὄλβον.

That is,

"Hail, Father! hail again! and send us down
"Virtue and gold. For gold is quickly gone,
"Unblest'd with virtue's care; and virtue's cold,
"Naked of wealth: send virtue down and gold."

A modern Author, who assumed the fictitious name of Candidus Hesychius, in his book, entitled, Godellus utrum Poeta (10), asserts that Callimachus finding that he had not the wind favourable, never dared to expose himself to the open sea, but had the prudence to keep near the shore, that he might be secure of a port; that is, not having the poetical Genius and Enthusiasm, which elevates Poets, he would not attempt works of a large size. Quintilian in his Institutiones Oratoriæ (11) affirms, that our writer is the Prince of Elegiac Poets, among the Greeks. Tunc & Elegiam vacabit in manus sumere, cujus princeps habetur Callimachus. And Mr. Kennet observes (12), that the greatest testimonies of his merit and the foundation of his character with the ancients, were his numerous (10) Cap. 2. pag. 75. apud Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, tom. 3. num. 1124. pag. 143. edit. Amsterdam 1725, in 4to.

(11) Lib. 10. cap. 1.

(12) Pag. 162.

with ſeveral other works mentioned by Suidas. But this Author has omitted his Treatiſe περὶ ἀγώνων, in which he treated of the Actian Games, mentioned by Virgil, as Harpocration informs us under the word Ἄκτια; who likewiſe under the word Ἀκή cites our Author's ὑπομνήματα or Commentaries. There was another CALLIMACHUS of Cyrene, an Epic Poet, and ſon of Staſenor and Megatima, ſiſter of the elder Callimachus. But his reputation was much inferior to his Uncle's; ſo that when Strabo (i) gives an account of the famous men of Cyrene, he mentions only the elder Callimachus, who, he ſays, was highly honoured by the King of Egypt. (i) Lib. 17.

pieces in the elegiac ſtrain; of which we have only the Hymn upon Minerva's Bath, and Catullus's Tranſlation of his Poem upon Queen Berenice's Hair. The former ſeems, like his other Hymns, to incline moſt to the free ſpirit of Lyrics; the curious ſtory of Tireſias making the greater part of the Poem. The other is more agreeable to our common notions of Elegy; and, as it is commonly printed with the works of Tibullus and Propertius in the ſame ſtrain, ſo it may vie with the ſweeteſt and the moſt exact of their pieces. For inſtance they have nothing of a more natural turn, than that thought, which makes it a greater honour to belong to the Queen's Head, than to have a place among the Conſtellations. The Star is ſuppoſed to ſpeak, and thus compliments its miſtreſs:

Sed quanquam me nocte premunt veſtigia divum.
Luce tamen canæ Tethyi reſtituor;
Non his tam lætor rebus, quam me abſore ſemper,
Abſore me à Dominæ vertice diſcrucior.
Sydera cur retinent? Utinam coma regia fiam, Proximus Arcturo fulgeat Erigone.

That is,

" But tho' all night honour'd with feet divine,
" And lodg'd with Tethys, when I ceaſe to ſhine;
" The unequal'd glory baniſh'd I contemn,
" Baniſh'd for ever from my Princely Dame,
" Ye Gods reſtore me to that ſacred Head,
" And let Arcture unparted court his maid."

Propertius fix'd our Poet as his pattern:

Inter Callimachi ſat erit placuiſſe libellos,
Et cecinisſe modis, pure Poeta, tuis (13). (13) Eleg. 5. l. 3.

However there is another paſſage in Propertius, which ſeems to contradict his former judgment, and which is commonly alledg'd by thoſe, who pretend to cenſure Callimachus. It is in the thirty third Elegy of the ſecond Book:

Tu ſatius memorem Muſis imitare Philetum,
Et non inflati ſomnia Callimachi.

That is,

" But you, my friend, court ſweet Phileta's Muſe,
" And fly the dreams of ſwoln Callimachus."

But Mr. Kennet remarks (14), that by joining non with inflati in the conſtruction, the difficulty is eaſily ſolved, and the ſuppoſed detraction turns into a commendation; but that it is much more rational to imagine, that Propertius here cenſures ſome particular work of Callimachus (at preſent not extant) as bombaſt and extravagant; adviſing his friend to apply himſelf to ſome eaſier and more agreeable labour. Scaliger judges the particular piece to have been the Ἄκτια, which Martial ridicules as an harſh obſcure Poem, and which Propertius's friend might then probably think of tranſlating. This conjecture may be farther improved from hence, that in one of the old Epigrams in the Anthologia, Callimachus is ſuppoſed to have been honoured with the commands of the Muſes in a dream, for undertaking that difficult work. " But whatever, ſays " Mr. Kennet, becomes of this point, it is impoſſible " Propertius ſhould deſign any general reflection, ſince " he declares it for his higheſt wiſh, to be called the " Roman Callimachus.

" Ut noſtris tumefacta ſuperbiat Umbria libris,
" Umbria Romani Patria Callimachi." T. (14) Pag. 164.

CALLIRHOE, daughter of the River Achelous, and wife of that Alcmeon who killed his mother Eryphile, was married to him when he had ſtill another wife living. He had given to this other wife the famous necklace, of which a preſent had been made to Eryphile [A], in order that ſhe might perſuade Amphiaraus her huſband to engage in the Theban expedition. Callirhoe having heard of this fine necklace, flatly declared

[A] The famous necklace, of which a preſent had been made to Eriphyle.] It was a gold necklace, which Venus had given to Hermione her daughter and wife to Cadmus (1). She gave her at the ſame time a Peplum, which was a kind of Robe. Both theſe preſents fell into the hands of Eryphile; Polynice gave her the necklace, and Therſander Polynice's ſon the Peplum. The necklace was the occaſion why ſhe was betrayed by her huſband, and the peplum made her be betrayed by her ſon. But to give the curious a more full ſatisfaction, I muſt obſerve, that men talked differently of Hermione's necklace. Some ſaid (2), it came originally from Jupiter, who gave it to Europa, ſhe to Cadmus, and Cadmus to Hermione. Others ſay (3), that Vulcan was the workman of that necklace, and made a preſent of it to Cadmus. It is added (4), that he made that preſent out of malice, and to be revenged on Hermione, who was born of the adultery of Venus with Mars, for his wife's injury to him. He cauſed this necklace to become fatal to all thoſe, who ſhould wear it. He choſe the materials to compoſe it, with miſchievous figures, and, amongſt other things, he mixed it with aſhes, which remained upon his anvil after he had made the thunderbolts (5). In a word, it ſeems that he deſigned to make a fatal Taliſman of it; and hence it happened that Hermione, Semele, Jocaſta, Eriphyle, &c. who wore that necklace ſucceſſively, came to an unhappy end. We may therefore compare it to the Aurum Tholoſanum (the gold of Toulouſe), and to the horſe Sejanus. When Polynice fled from Thebes to Argos he took with him Hermione's necklace and peplum (6). Statius (7) and Nonnus (8) deſcribe this necklace at large; but eſpecially the latter, who deſcants upon it without bounds or meaſure. The Scholiaſt on Statius ſays (9), that this necklace was conſecrated to Apollo, and thrown into a fountain, where it was ſtill to be ſeen, but that one could not touch it, without perceiving that the Sun was offended at it, ſince there aroſe immediately great tempeſts. Pauſanias's account is much leſs chimerical. This Author thinks (10), that when the Temple of Delphi was plundered by the Phoceans, Hermione's necklace was part of their plunder; and he ſhews, that that, which had been carried to Amathonte in the Iſland of Cyprus, and lodged in the Temple of Venus and Adonis, and which was ſaid to be Hermione's and Eriphyle's necklace, was not the true one.

Diodorus Siculus aſſures us, that a Phocean Lady, who after the pillaging of the Temple of Delphi dared to adorn herſelf with Eryphile's jewels, was burnt in her houſe, which had been ſet on fire by her eldeſt ſon, who was excited to it by the Furies (11). See the remark [S] of the article HELENA. Obſerve, that Athenæus (12) quotes an Author, who ſays, that Alcmeon did really conſecrate Eriphyle's Necklace in the Temple of Delphi, the Oracle having required that reward of him, to cure him of his madneſs. The Heathen Gods did nothing gratis. What you aſk for, ſaid the Oracle, is very valuable; you pray for a remedy

(1) See Diodor. Sic. lib. 5. cap. 6.

(2) Pherecydes, apud Apollod. lib. 3. pag. 171.

(3) Apollod. pag. 169.

(4) Statius, Theb. lib. 2. ver. 272, & ſeq.

(5) Siculaque incude relictos Fulminis extremi cineres. Stat. Theb. lib. 2. ver. 279.

(6) Apollod. lib. 3. pag. 185.

(7) Theb. lib. 2. ver. 279.

(8) Dionyſius, lib. 5.

(9) See Barthius's Comment. tom. 2. pag. 967.

(10) Lib. 3. ſub finem.

(11) Diodor. Sic. lib. 16. cap. 65. pag. m. 786.

(12) Athen. lib. 6. pag. 232.

declared to Alcmeon, that ſhe would abſolutely not lie any more with him [B], if he did not make her a preſent of that jewel. Hereupon the unhappy man went to Phegeus (a), his other wife's father, and made him believe, that the Oracle had declared, that he would never be cured of his frenzy (b), if he did not offer up this necklace in the Temple of Delphi. Phegeus delivered him the necklace; but being acquainted that it was deſigned for Callirhoe, he commanded his two ſons to murther Alcmeon, which they did accordingly. Callirhoe was very much concerned at his death, but yet in ſuch a manner as made her wiſh to be revenged, rather than engaged her to mortify her fleſh. She deſired paſſionately that her huſband's murderers ſhould be puniſhed, but at the ſame time ſhe indulged her ſelf with the ſoft pleaſures of love. It was when Jupiter enjoyed her (c), that ſhe begg'd of him that the children ſhe had by Alcmeon, and who were ſtill very young, might become in a moment full grown men [C]. This petition was too well timed, to be refuſed (d). She owned that ſhe deſired this miracle, that her children might be very ſoon capable of revenging their father's death. Her petition was granted, and immediately her two ſons Amphoterus and Acarnanus ſet out; they met on the road Alcmeon's two murderers [D], who were going to offer the necklace and Eriphyle's gown at Delphi. Callirhoe's ſons killed them, and went afterwards to Pſophis, where they murdered Phegeus and his ſpouſe. On their return they were purſued as far as Tegeum; but there they met with ſuch a powerful aſſiſtance, that they were capable of putting the enemy to flight. Having given an account to Callirhoe of what they had done, they ſet out for Delphi, where they conſecrated the necklace and Eriphyle's gown to Apollo, as Achelous had commanded them to do. They went afterwards to Epirus, where they eſtabliſhed a Colony (e). With regard to the two children, which Euripides ſuppoſes Alcmeon had by Manto the Propheteſs, it muſt be known, that their father ſent them to Creon King of Corinthus, to be educated by him; one of theſe children was a boy nam'd Amphilochus, the other a girl call'd Tiſiphone, who was a perfect beauty. Creon's wife, fearing leſt her huſband ſhould marry that beautiful virgin, had her ſold away, and it was Alcmeon himſelf who bought her without knowing her. Apollodorus, from whom I have extracted this article (f), does not tell us, how Tiſiphone came to be known. This ſerved, no doubt, to unravel the plot in Euripides's Play.

We read in Pauſanias, that Clytius the ſon of Alcmeon, and of Phegeus's daughter, left his mother's brothers, becauſe he did not doubt but they had killed his father, he retired into Elis, where he left a poſterity behind him. Eperaſtus the Diviner, who carried the prize at the Olympick Games, was deſcended from him (g).

(a) He lived at Pſophis in Arcadia.

(b) He was tormented by the Furies after he had killed his mother.

(c) Καλλιῤῥόη τὴν Ἀλκμαίωνος ἀπώλειαν μαθοῦσα. πλησιάζοντος αὐτῇ τοῦ Διὸς αἰτεῖται. Apollod. lib. 3. pag. 199.

(d) Gaudia poſt Veneris quæ poſcet munus amantem;
Ipſa ſuas nolet pondus habere preces. i. e. "She who asks "a favour of "her lover after "enjoyment, "acts as if ſhe "would not "have her peti-"tion granted." Ovid. de Art. Amandi, lib. 3. ſub finem, ver. 805.

(e) That of Acarnania.

(f) Biblioth. lib. 3. pag. 199, &c.

(g) From Pauſanias, lib. 6. pag. 195.

(13) Idem, ibid.

medy againſt madneſs, it muſt coſt you a rich preſent; bring me your mother's necklace (13). Apollo acted the Merchant, he made uſe of the conditions of a contract, do ut des, I give, that you may give in your turn. If he had only accepted voluntary offerings, it had been tolerable, but he was for ſtipulating and making bargains beforehand.

[B] She declared to her huſband that ſhe would not lie any more with him.] I expreſs myſelf thus, becauſe they had already had two children, when ſhe aſked her huſband for the necklace. We muſt therefore correct in Charles Stephens, Lloyd and Hofman, the prepoſterous order in which the facts are related. They tell us, that Alcmæon promiſed Callirhoe to make her this preſent, if ſhe would be his wife. Neither Apollodorus nor Philoſtratus mention this; and the latter ſays very clearly (14), that Alcmæon had two ſons by Callirhoe, when that woman obliged him to go and fetch againſt his will this necklace, which ſhe would have abſolutely.

(14) Pauſanias, lib. 8. pag. 255.

[C] She begged of Jupiter, that the children, ſhe had by Alcmæon . . . . might become in a moment full grown men.] Ovid mentions this in ſuch a manner, as deſerves to be here related; he gives a very happy turn to Alcmæon's action, and to the reſt of his ſtory.

——— Ultuſque parente parentem
Natus, erit facto pius & ſceleratus eodem:
Attonituſque malis, exul mentiſque domuſque,
Vultibus Eumenidum, matriſque agitabitur umbris:
Donec eum Conjux fatale popoſcerit aurum,
Cognatumque latus Phegeius hauſerit enſis.
Tum demum magno petet hoc Acheloïa ſupplex
Ab Jove Callirhoe, natis infantibus annos
Addat, neve necem ſinat eſſe ultoris inultam.
Jupiter his motus privignæ vota (15) nuruſque
Præcipiet, facietque viros impubibus annis (16).

That is,

" The ſon ſhall bath his hands in parents blood,
" And in one act be both unjuſt and good.
" Of home and ſenſe depriv'd, where-e'er he flies,
" The Furies and his mother's ghoſt he ſpies.
" His wife the fatal bracelet ſhall implore,
" And Phegeus ſtain his ſword in kindred gore.
" Callirhoe ſhall then with ſuppliant pray'r
" Prevail on Jupiter's relenting ear.
" Jove ſhall with youth her infant ſons inſpire,
" And bid their boſoms glow with manly fire.

GAY.

(15) He means Hebe, the Goddeſs of Youth, Juno's daughter and Hercules's wife.

(16) Ovid. Metam. lib. 9. ver. 408, &c.

Moreri ſays (17), it was Achelous, who obtained from Jupiter, that Alcmæon's children ſhould paſs ſuddenly from infants to full grown men; this is making the whole ſtory inſipid, at the ſame time that it is giving a falſe account of it. But he alledges a proof againſt his own aſſertion, by quoting Ovid's verſes. Charles Stephens, Lloyd and Hofman relate, that Jupiter changed Alcmæon's ſons into Gods, as ſoon as they were born. I don't think they read this in any of the ancient Authors.

(17) See the article of Callirhoe.

[D] They met on the road Alcmeon's murtherers.] Why then ſhould Charles Stephens tell us a falſity, which was to be tranſcribed from one Dictionary into another for ſo many years following? I mean, that Phegeus's ſons were killed on the ſpot by Alcmeon, at the ſame time that they murthered him. Qui tamen & ipſi ab eodem (Alcmeone) mutuis vulneribus petiti, perierunt.

CALLISTRATUS, an Athenian Orator, gained a great reputation and authority in his native country. He was the occaſion that Demoſthenes, being ſtill but a young ſcholar, dedicated himſelf entirely to the ſtudy of eloquence. For Calliſtratus having pleaded with a wonderful ſucceſs a very important cauſe concerning the City of Oropus, this filled the young lad's mind with an eager deſire of making his way through the world in the profeſſion of an Orator. Admiring the force of eloquence, and the glory Calliſtratus acquired by it, he had no other thought than to diſtinguiſh himſelf the ſame way (a). Some ſay that he was already a diſciple of Plato, and that he quitted the ſtudy of Philoſophy, to apply himſelf entirely to Oratory [A]. Calliſtratus was baniſhed, which was the uſual fate of thoſe who had the greateſt ſhare in the government of the Athenian Republic. In this misfortune he ſaid a thing which very much deſerves to be praiſed, and which gave Seneca an opportunity of delivering very good maxims [B]. He upbraided once the Thebans with the parricide of Œdipus, and the Argians with that of Oreſtes, but Epaminondas anſwered him with gravity and wit, We have baniſhed them from our Cities, and you have admitted them into yours (b). Melanopus, who was Caliſtratus's antagoniſt in the management of the affairs of the Commonwealth, ſuffered himſelf always to be bribed by him with money, and then mounting into the pulpit, he told the people; It is true, that Calliſtratus is my enemy, yet I muſt yield to him this time; the intereſt of the public muſt carry it (c).

(a) Plutarch. in Demoſth. pag. 847, 848.

(a) Plutarch, de gerenda Republica, pag. 810.
(c) Idem, in Vita Demoſt. pag. 851, 852. We have followed the original. Mr. Bayle quotes Amiot's French Tranſlation.

[A] Some ſay that Demoſthenes . . . . quitted the ſtudy of Philoſophy, to apply himſelf entirely to Oratory.] Hermippus related this, and even added, that it was only by chance Demoſthenes happened to hear that fine diſcourſe of Calliſtratus. For as he was going to the Academy, where Plato uſed to read his lectures, he ſaw a great concourſe of people, and having aſked the reaſon of their meeting, he was told that they went to hear a great Orator, which created in him a deſire to know, whether that man's eloquence really deſerved ſuch a concourſe of auditors. He heard him, and was ſo charmed with his Oration, that from that moment he became his diſciple, and forſook Plato and the Academy (1). Ita motus & demulctus & captus eſt, ut Calliſtratum jam inde ſectari cæperit, Academiam cum Platone reliquerit (2). Henry Stephens has corrected ſome words in the Chapter, in which Aulus Gellius relates this: he thought that the words Calliſtrato Rhetore, which are in the title of the chapter, were a miſtake; ſince Calliſtratus being only ſtiled an Orator, and a Demagogue (a man who knows how to manage the people, or, who is conſulted by the people) he ſhould not have been called a Rhetorician in the title or ſummary (3). I believe, however, that Aulus Gellius conſidered him as a man who uſed to teach Rhetorick, and who really taught Demoſthenes that art: but then, I think Aulus Gellius was miſtaken in this; and yet I would not change any thing in the ſummary, ſince it muſt anſwer to what is contained in the chapter to which it is prefixed.

(1) From Aulus Gellius, lib. 3. cap. 13.
(2) Ibid.
(3) Henr. Steph. Specimen Emendat. in Aul. Gell. pag. m. 193, 194.

[B] He ſaid a thing, which gave Seneca an opportunity of delivering very good maxims. I ſhall quote that Philoſopher's own words, to which I ſhall add the tranſlation. Calliſtratum aiunt, ita certe Hecaton Auctor eſt, cum in exilium iret, in quod multos ſimul cum illo ſeditioſa civitas, & intemperanter libera expulerat, optante quodam, ut Athenienſibus neceſſitas reſtituendi exules eſſet, abominatum talem reditum. Rutilius noſter animoſius; cum quidam illum conſolaretur, & diceret inſtare arma civilia; brevi futurum, ut omnes exules reverterentur; Quid tibi, inquit, mali feci, ut mihi pejorem reditum, quam exitum optares? Malo ut patria exilio meo erubeſcat, quam reditu mœreat. Non eſt iſtud exilium, cujus neminem non magis, quam damnatum, pudet. Quemadmodum illi ſervaverunt bonorum civium officium, qui reddi ſibi penates ſuos noluerunt clade communi, quia ſatius erat, duos iniquo malo affici, quam omnes publico; ita non ſervat grati hominis affectum, qui bene de ſe merentem difficultatibus vult opprimi, quas ipſe ſubmoveat: qui etiamſi bene cogitet, male precatur. Ne in patrocinium quidem, nedum in gloriam eſt, incendium exſtinxiſſe quod feceris (4). i. e. "They "ſay, (and they have it from Hecaton) that when Cal-"liſtratus went into baniſhment, with ſeveral other "perſons, whom the city of Athens, then full of ſe-"ditions, and who made a tyrannical uſe of her li-"berty, had baniſhed, ſomebody wiſhed, that the "Athenians might ſoon be obliged to reſtore the ex-"iles; at which Calliſtratus ſhewed a great abhor-"rence. Our Rutilius acted ſtill in a more heroic "manner. For when ſomebody would comfort him, "by repreſenting to him, that a civil war would ſoon "break out, which would occaſion all the exiles to "return; What harm have I done to thee, ſaid "Rutilius, that thou ſhouldſt wiſh me a return "worſe than my baniſhment? I chooſe rather that "my country ſhould bluſh at my baniſhment, than "mourn at my return. That cannot properly be cal-"led a baniſhment, at which none is left more aſhamed "than the perſon condemned. Now, as theſe two "have performed the duties of good citizens, by re-"fuſing to owe their return to a public calamity, "becauſe they thought it was better that two perſons "only ſhould ſuffer unjuſtly, than that the whole "ſtate ſhould come under misfortunes; ſo a man "does not ſhew a grateful heart, who wiſhes, that "a perſon, to whom he is under ſome obligations, "ſhould fall under difficulties, that he might have "an opportunity to extricate him; for though his "thoughts are good, yet his wiſhes are bad. There "is neither kindneſs nor glory in extinguiſhing a "fire, which you kindled yourſelf (5)." Seneca had already illuſtrated this laſt thought very nobly by ſeveral inſtances, in order to prove, that a man is ungrateful, if he wiſhes that his benefactor ſhould want his aſſiſtance (6). Quis pium dicet Æneam, ſi patriam capi voluerit, ut captivitate patrem eripiat? Quis Siculos juvenes, ut bona liberis exempla monſtrarent, ſe optaverint, ut Ætna immenſa ignium vi ſupra ſolitum ardens & incenſa præcipitet, datura ipſis occaſionem exhibendæ pietatis, ex medio parentibus incendio raptis? Nihil debet Scipioni Roma, ſi Punicum bellum ut finiret, aluit; nihil Deciis, quod morte patriam ſervaverunt, ſi prius optaverant, ut devotioni fortiſſimæ locum ultima rerum neceſſitas faceret. Graviſſima infamia eſt medici, opus quærere: Multi, quos auxerant morbos, & incitaverant, ut majore gloria ſanarent, non potuerunt diſcutere, aut cum magna miſerorum vexatione vicerunt (7). i. e. "Who would call Æneas pious, if he had wiſhed for "the ruin of his country, that he might deliver his "father from ſlavery? Who would commend the young "men of Sicily, if in order to afford a bright exam-"ple to poſterity, they ſhould wiſh, that Mount Etna "might throw up more flames, than it uſes to do, that "they might have an opportunity of ſhewing their love "of their parents, by carrying them away thro' the "flames? Rome has no obligations to Scipio, if he "protracted the Punic War, in order to have the glory "of finiſhing it; the Decii deſerve no thanks, for "undergoing a voluntary death for their country, if "they could have wiſhed beforehand, that their "country were reduced to ſuch ſtreights, as not to be "ſaved but by ſuch a couragious action. 'Tis a great "ſhame for a Phyſician to wiſh for patients. There "have been ſeveral amongſt them, who having en-"creaſed a ſickneſs, that they might acquire more repu-"tation by the cure, could not perform it afterwards; "or if they did perform it, it was after they had mi-"ſerably tormented their patients (8)."

(4) Seneca, de Beneficiis, lib. 6. cap. 37. pag. m. 334.

(5) Mr. Bayle, quotes Chalvet's French Tranſlation of Seneca De Beneficiis, folio 67 of the Paris edition 1637, fol.
(6) Qui optat amico aliquam neceſſitatem, quam adjutorio fideque diſcutiat: quod eſt ingrati, ſe illi præfert, & tanti æſtimat illum miſerum eſſe, ut ipſe gratus ſit, eb hoc ipſum ingratus. Seneca, de Beneficiis, lib. 6. cap. 34. pag. 132.
(7) Idem, ibid. cap. 36. pag. 134.

We meet in Demoſthenes with a Calliſtratus, who was baniſhed to Methone in Macedonia, whom the Athenians had twice condemned to death; and who had a daughter married to Timomachus an inhabitant of the Iſle of Thaſus (9). He is probably the ſame with him who is the ſubject of this article; Juſtus Lipſius did not doubt of it (10).

(8) This may add weight to the objections of the Manichees, which I mention in the Remark [E] of the Article ORIGEN, num. 4. and in the Remark [E] of the Article PAULICIANS.
(9) See Demoſth. Orat. adv. Polyclem. pag. m. 712.
(10) Lipſius, in Senecam de Beneficiis, lib. 6. cap. 37.

CALVIN (JOHN) one of the chief Reformers of the Church in the ſixteenth Century, was born at Noyon in Picardy July the 10th 1509. As he was deſigned for the Church, they procured him very ſoon a Living in the Cathedral Church of Noyon, and afterwards afterwards the Rectory of Pont-l'Evéque (a) [A]. But theſe deſigns took no effect, firſt, becauſe Calvin, by the advice of Robertus Olivetanus applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Religion from the pureſt ſprings of it, which determined him to renounce all ſuperſtitions; and ſecondly, becauſe his father, altering his mind, choſe to make a Lawyer of him rather than a Divine. Therefore, after he had gone through a courſe of polite Literature at Paris, he was ſent to Orleans, where he ſtudied the Law under Peter de l'Etoile (b), then to Bourges, where he continued the ſame kind of ſtudy under Andrew Alciat. He made a great progreſs in that Science, and did not improve leſs in the knowledge of Divinity by his private labours. At Bourges he applied himſelf to the Greek tongue, under the direction of Wolmar, who taught this language there. His father's death having obliged him to return to Noyon, he continued there but a ſhort while, and went ſoon after to Paris, where he wrote a Commentary upon Seneca's Treatiſe De Clementia [B]. He ſoon made himſelf known to thoſe who had ſecretly admitted the Reformation. The Oration which he ſuggeſted to Nicholas Copus, Rector of the Univerſity of Paris, having been very much diſliked by the Sorbonne, and the Parliament, occaſioned the beginning of a perſecution againſt the Proteſtants; ſo that Calvin, who narrowly eſcaped being taken in the College of Fortet [C], retired into Xaintonge [D], after he had had the honour

(a) A village, where Calvin's father was born, ſituated near Noyon.

(b) He was Preſident in the Parliament of Paris. He is called in Latin Petrus Stella.

[A] They procured him very ſoon a Living in the Cathedral Church of Noyon, and afterwards the Rectory of Pont-l'Evéque.] They who have ſaid, that Calvin was a Canon of Noyon, have been miſtaken. The living, which was given him was not a Canonſhip, but a Chappel called de la Geſine. He was preſented to it May the 21ſt, 1521. And as to the Rectory of Pont-l'Evéque, he obtained it July the 5th, 1529, having exchanged for it the Rectory of Marteville, to which he had been preferred September the 27th, 1527. They who are curious to ſee the Hiſtory of the changes, reſignations, ſales, &c. of theſe Livings, will find it in a Book of Monſieur Drelincourt (1). We read there, that on Munday the 4th of May, 1534, Calvin reſigned the Chappel of Geſine to Maſter Anthony de la Marlière, and the Rectory of Pont-l'Evéque to Caim. Monſieur Maimbourg is therefore miſtaken, in placing this before Calvin's journey to Paris, which happened in 1532 (2). It muſt be carefully obſerved, that Calvin never was in Prieſt's-Orders, and that he belonged to the Clergy only by having received the firſt tonſure.

(1) Défenſe de Calvin, pag. 215, &c. The Author quotes the Annales de l'Egliſe de Noyon, written by James le Vaſſeur, Doctor of the Sorbonne, and Dean of that Cathedral, printed at Paris, in 4to, in the year 1633, 1634.
(2) Hiſt. du Calviniſme, pag. 57.

[B] He wrote a Commentary upon Seneca's Treatiſe de Clementia.] He dedicated it to Claude Hangeſt, Abbot of St. Eloi at Noyon. The Dedication is dated from Paris April the 4th, 1532; whence it follows, that he wrote this Book before he was full twenty three years old, and not in his twenty fourth year, as Beza aſſerts (3). Monſieur de Varillas's blunders with regard to this Book, are ſo monſtrous, that they are ſufficient to make a man forſake for ever the ſtudy of Hiſtory. For ſince we cannot be better prepoſſeſſed in favour of a thouſand Hiſtorians of former ages, than we can be in his favour, how ſhall we know, that what we read in them, is more to be depended upon, than his falſhoods are? If Calvin's treatiſe was loſt, who ſhould dare to object any thing againſt all the falſities, which Monſieur de Varillas relates with a thouſand circumſtances? And is it not reaſonable to think, that a great many Hiſtorians are like him? However that be, here follows an account of the many falſities he relates upon the ſubject before us.

(3) Beza, in Vita Calvini.

VARILLAS's miſtakes.
(4) Varillas's, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, lib. 10.

I. Calvin, ſays he (4), ſoon gained their eſteem, by a Book he wrote upon conſtancy, with a deſign to encourage them to ſuffer for the new doctrine. This is neither the true title, nor the deſign of the Book. II. It is ſurpriſing, that this ſmall work ſhould have made ſuch a noiſe in the world, and that Calvin's Panegyriſts ſhould have preferred it before all the pieces of eloquence and learning, which have been written by the Ancients, or Moderns. We do not believe, that this work was ever commended in ſuch a manner, and we challenge Monſieur de Varillas to name ſuch Panegyriſts. III. There are blunders in that Book, which cannot be excuſed, but on account of Calvin's tender age, who was then but eighteen. He was in his twenty third year. IV. There is nothing particular in that Book, but continual invectives, and figures exceſſively bold. The Book contains nothing of that nature; it being only an explication of Seneca's thoughts ſupported with proper authorities, and examples; the whole in the ſtile of a Commentator. Varillas had never read that Book, and took it to be an Oration. V. The Sacramentarians, who were burnt at a ſlow fire, are there exalted to the ſkies, far above the moſt illuſtrious Martyrs of the ancient Church, and King Francis I . . . . has his character drawn in the moſt odious light. There is not a word in the whole Book either to the honour of thoſe, who ſuffered death for the ſake of their Religion under Francis I, nor againſt that Prince. How would Calvin have dared to publiſh a Book ſuch as Varillas repreſents it? How, ſay I, would he have dared to publiſh it at Paris, with his name, turned into Latin, prefixed to it (5), and with that of the Abbot of St. Eloi, to whom it was dedicated? VI. The reſt of the Book contains nothing but ſcraps taken from Seneca the Philoſopher, and tacked together with a great deal of careleſneſs. The whole is a perpetual Commentary upon Seneca's Treatiſe of Clemency: the text of Seneca is given entire, and at the end of ſome chapters of Seneca there is a Commentary by Calvin, and ſuch as I have repreſented it. VII. The cream of the jeſt is, that Calvin did not know then, that there have been two Seneca's, both born at Corduba in Spain. The one known by the title of the Rhetorician, becauſe he taught Rhetoric all his life time; the other the ſon of the Rhetorician, more famous than his father, ſurnamed the Philoſopher, and who was Nero's Præceptor. As they both lived very long, tho' the Philoſopher had obeyed the command, which Crevo (6) ſent him, of killing himſelf, Calvin, who could not deny it, bethought himſelf of giving to one only the years which belonged to both, and wrote, that his imaginary Seneca lived an hundred and forty years. Since Mr. De Varillas thought that Calvin was then but eighteen years old, he ought not to have confider'd it as ſuch a groſs piece of ignorance, that he did not know that there have been two Seneca's. It is not true, that Calvin makes his Seneca live 140 years; he gives him but about 115 years. Obſerve that this ſame Hiſtorian ſpeaks more pertinently of this work of Calvin, in his Hiſtory of Francis I. He wrote, ſays he (7), his Commentary upon Seneca's Book on Clemency, in order to gain a reputation by hiding his deſign under the veil of a Moral Philoſophy, which favoured of nothing but Heatheniſm. His only view was, to fill the mind of Francis I, who loved very much ſuch kind of treatiſes, with doubts and ſcruples about the fires, which at his command had been kindled thro' the whole Kingdom, againſt thoſe, who ſhould be convicted of having ſaid any thing againſt the Religion of their anceſtors.

(5) Having put his name in Latin in the title of his book, he left his ſurname of Cauvin, to take that of Calvin. Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Calviniſ. page 57. Papyrius Maſſo, in Vita Calvini, pag. 412. ſays, that the Commentary upon the books de Clementia, was publiſhed under the name of Lucius Calvinus, Civis Romanus.
(6) Read Nero.

(7) Varillas, Hiſt. de Francois I. liv. 8. tom. 2. pag. 251. edit. Holl. in 1690.

[C] He narrowly eſcaped being taken in the College of Fortet.] Beza's ſilence makes me doubt of the following account. "Lieutenant * Morin . . . . went "himſelf, with a great many attendants to the Col- "lege of Cardinal le Moin, where Calvin lodged, in "order to ſeize his perſon; but when they came to "his room, they found that he had made his eſcape "thro' the window, by ſliding down by his ſheets, "which were found faſtened to the window (8)." If this account was true (9), Beza would be a bad Hiſtorian, for he ſays only, that Calvin happened not to to be at home, quo forte domi non reperto (10); Varillas tells us the ſame ſtory with Maimbourg, and relates it with a great many circumſtances (11).

* It is a kind of a Judge, who takes cognizance of ſome cauſes.
(8) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Calviniſm, pag. 58.
(9) This ſtory is grounded on Papyrius Maſſo, in Vita Calv. pag. 414.
(10) Beza, in Vita Calvini, pag. 367.
(11) Hiſtoire de François I. liv. 7. pag. 201.

[D] He retired into Xaintonge.] He met there with a very good friend, at whoſe requeſt he compoſed ſome Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, liv. 10. pag. 336.

honour to ſpeak with the Queen of Navarre, who had appeaſed this firſt ſtorm. She alſo reſcued the learned Faber Stapulenſis * out of the hands of the Inquiſitors, and ſent him to Nerac, where Calvin went to pay his reſpects to him, after which he returned to Paris in the year 1534. Servetus was then in that City, and did not go to the place which had been appointed for a conference between Calvin and him. This year was very ſevere to the Reformed; for which reaſon Calvin reſolved to retire out of France, after he had publiſhed at Orleans a Treatiſe againſt thoſe, who believe that the departed ſouls are in a kind of ſleep [E]. He choſe Baſil for the place of his reſidence, and ſtudied Hebrew in that city; where he was particularly beloved by Grynæus and Capito; and though he did not hunt after glory, yet he was obliged to publiſh a work, which was very proper to ſpread his reputation abroad; I mean his Chriſtian Inſtitution, which he dedicated to Francis I [F]. After he had publiſhed this work, he went to pay ſhort Chriſtian exhortations, which in ſome pariſhes were read at Church in order to bring the people inſenſibly to an enquiry after truth. Beza (12) does not name this friend of Calvin, nor can I well gueſs for what reaſon: for a man who had acquired ſuch a taſte for the true doctrine, that he retired into Switzerland with Calvin, for the ſake of the Goſpel, as that Hiſtorian tells us (13) did very well deſerve that his name ſhould appear in the life of that great Reformer. The Reader will not be diſpleaſed to find here, that his name was Lewis du Tillet (14), and that he was brother of John du Tillet, Regiſter to the Parliament of Paris, and of another du Tillet, Biſhop of Meaux. Monſieur Maimbourg ſays (15), that this Lewis du Tillet was a Canon of Angouléme, and Curate of Claix, and that he was reclaimed from his errors by the admonitions of his brother John du Tillet, ... who went himſelf to bring him into Germany, in order to bring him back to the Catholic Church. That Author adds; that Calvin being thus forſaken by his friend, and not daring to appear again at Angouléme, went to ſeek for other friends at Poitiers, when he made new diſciples, with whom he celebrated the Lord's Supper his own way, in cellars and caves. This laſt fact ſeems doubtful to me, not to ſay any thing worſe. For if this fact had been true, Beza would not have been ignorant of it; and if he had known it, he would not have omitted it in the Life of Calvin. Add to this, that if the Regiſter John du Tillet, had been in Germany to bring home the loſt ſheep, I mean his brother the Canon of Angouléme, he muſt have converted him ſince Calvin and the Canon had retired to Baſil, and whilſt they were there. Now at that time Calvin had left Angouléme, ſo that it ought not to have been ſaid, that he durſt not ſhew his face there. Laſtly, Beza aſſerts, that ſince this journey to Baſil, Calvin did not return into France, but only to ſettle his private affairs, after which he deſigned to go to Baſil by the way of Savoy, but ſtopt at Geneva, in the year 1536. Ex Italia . . . in Galliam regreſſus, rebus ſuis omnibus ibi compoſitis, abductoque, quem unicum ſuperſtitem habebat, Ant. Calvino frater, Baſileam vel Argentinam reverti cogitantem, interclusis aliis itineribus, per Allobrogum fines iter inſtitutum proſequi bello coegerunt. Ita factum ut Genevam veniret (16). See the Remark [G].

* In French, Le Fevre d'Eſtaples.

(12) In Vita Calvini Oper. tom. 3. pag. 367.

(13) Ibid.

(14) See The Defence of Calvin, by Mr. Drelincourt, pag. 40.

(15) Hiſt. du Calviniſme, pag. m. 59.

(16) Beza, in Vita Calvini, pag. 368.

[E] He retired out of France, after he had publiſhed at Orleans a Treatiſe againſt thoſe, who believe that the departed ſouls are in a kind of ſleep.] Poſtquam Aureliæ inſignem illum libellum edidiſſet, quem Pſycopannychian inſcripſit, adverſus illorum errorem, qui dormire ſejunctas a corporibus animas, errore a vetuſtiſſimis ſæculis repetito, docebant (17). i. e. "After he "had publiſhed at Orleans that famous Book, which "he entitled Pſycopannychia againſt them, who teach "that the ſouls ſleep, when they are ſeparated from "the bodies; an error revived from the moſt ancient "times."

(17) Idem, ibid. pag. 367.

[F] He was obliged to publiſh . . . his Chriſtian Inſtitution, dedicated to Francis I.] Some ſay, that he compoſed the greateſt part of his Inſtitution at Claix, in the houſe of Lewis du Tillet (18). This may be; but Beza ſays nothing of it, nor does he mention the year in which it was printed, tho' he ſays on what occaſion it was publiſhed. He tells us (19) that Francis I courting the friendſhip of the Proteſtants in Germany, and knowing that they were full of indignation on account of the cruel perſecutions, which their brethren ſuffered in France, made uſe of an evaſion, which William de Bellay ſuggeſted to him (20): for he would perſuade them, that he had puniſhed only ſome Enthuſiaſts, who under the name of Anabaptiſts ſubſtituted their own Inſpirations inſtead of the word of God, and deſpiſed all the Magiſtrates. Calvin thought himſelf under an obligation to write an apology for the Reformed, whom they burnt in France; and this engaged him to publiſh his Inſtitution, with an Epiſtle Dedicatory to Francis I, which is one amongſt the three or four prefaces, which are moſt admired (21). It is dated from Baſil Auguſt the 1ſt, 1536. This date agrees perfectly well with Beza's account; for it was in 1535 that William du Bellai made uſe of that ridiculous evaſion, by which he proved the truth of that old ſaying, you take us for Germans. Here follows what we read in the life of Calvin. Edere coactus eſt Chriſtianæ Religionis Inſtitutionem quam vocavit, operis longe maximi rudimentum. Quum enim illam Franciſci Regis carnificinam ægre ferrent Germani Principes, qui Evangelio nomen dederant, & quorum ille tam amicitiam ambiebat, hoc unum ille σοφὸν φαρμάκον auctore Gulielmo Bellaio Langæo repererat, ut ſeſe non niſi in Anabaptiſtas pro verbo divino ſuum tantum Spiritum jactantes, & omnium Magiſtratuum contemptores animadvertiſſe diceret. Hoc vero dedecus veræ Religioni inuſtum non ferens Calvinus, ejus edendi libri occaſionem arripuit, meo quidem judicio incomparabilis; addita excellenti ad Regem ipſum præfatione, quam ſi forte legiſſet ille, aut ego vehementer fallor, aut magnum eſſet illi meretrici Babylonicæ jam tum vulnus illatum (22). Beza pretends, that after the publication of this Book, Calvin went to ſee the Dutcheſs of Ferrara in Italy; whence being returned into France, and having ſettled his affairs there, he intended to return to Baſil or to Straſbourgh, over the territories of the Duke of Savoy, but that he was prevailed upon to ſtay at Geneva, where he was declared a Miniſter, and Profeſſor of Divinity, in Auguſt 1536. This is ſo inconſiſtent with the date of the Preface, that there is no occaſion for me to ſhew the inconſiſtency. See below the Remark [V]. I do not object to Beza Monſieur Spon's account, who ſays (23) that in September 1536 Farel prevailed upon Calvin to ſtay at Geneva not to preach, but to teach Divinity (24). It would be an endleſs taſk, if one was to relate all the Chronological differences, which are to be met with in the accounts of different Authors. Here for inſtance, we have Mr. Leti (25), who ſays, that Calvin arrived at Geneva September the 14th. This puts us very far from the month of Auguſt mentioned by Beza, for according to Mr. Spon, whom Mr. Leti does not contradict, Calvin was a great while before he yielded to the intreaties of Farel; Mr. Leti ſuppoſes, that Calvin, as a man of wit, would be preſſed, and that he alledged ſeveral reaſons to be excuſed, till the Syndics themſelves joined their prayers to thoſe of the Miniſters. But let us return to the Inſtitution.

(18) Maimbourg, Hiſt. de Calvin. pag. 59. Varillas, Hiſt. de Franc. I. liv. 7. pag. 251; Hiſt. de l'Herés. liv. 10. pag. 376.

(19) Beza, in Vita Calv. pag. 367. See alſo Calvin, Præf. in Pſalm. I quote him below, Remark [V].

(20) See the Remark [B] of the Article BELLAI (William du).

(21) Thuanus's Dedication, and Caſaubon's Preface on Polybius are of this number. See Alexander Morus in his Panegyrique de Calvin, pag. 22. and Tanaquillus Faber, Notis in I Scaligerana, pag. 40. To theſe Prefaces muſt be added that which Monſieur Peliſſon wrote on the works of Saraſin.

(22) Beza, in Vita Calvini, pag. 367.

(23) Spon, Hiſt. de Geneve, liv. 3. pag. m. 243.

(24) See the Remark [I] quotation (55).

(25) Leti, Hiſtoria Genevrina, tom. 3. pag. 40.

When this work was firſt publiſhed, it was only a ſketch of a larger work (26). The Author reviſed afterwards ſeveral times, and made it ſo perfect, that even Scaliger admired it (27). There are few perſons but know the famous diſtich of Paul Thurius, in which he places this Work next to the Writings of the Apoſtles.

Præter Apiſtolicas poſt Chriſti tempora Chartas,
Huic peperere libro ſæcula nulla parem.

The firſt edition is that of Baſil, 1535, 8vo. The ſecond of Straſbourgh, 1539, in folio. Calvin was then Profeſſor of Divinity and Miniſter at Straſbourgh. This edition was larger and more correct than the former;

(26) Operis longe maximi Rudimentum. Beza, in Vita Calvini, pag. 367. Neque enim denſum hoc & laboriоſum opus, quale nunc extat, ſed breve duntaxat Enchiridion, tunc in lucem prodit. Calv. Præf. in Pſalmos.

(27) See I Scaligerana, pag. 40. and II Scaligerana, pag. 14 pay a visit to the Duchess of Ferrara, a Princess famous for her piety, who received him very kindly. He then returned into France, and having settled his private affairs, he proposed to go to Strasbourgh or to Basil [G], in company with Anthony Calvin, the only brother he had left. But as on account of the war the roads were not safe, except thro' the territories mer; the same may be said of the third with regard to the second. The third is also of Strasburgh, 1543. It is to this edition (28) that the words of Sturmius relate, which are generally prefixed to the work. Joannes Calvinus, homo acutissimo judicio summâque doctrinâ & egregiâ memoriâ præditus est, & scriptor est varius, copiosus, purus, cujus rei testimonium est Institutio Christianæ Religionis, quam primo inchoatam, deinde locupletatam, hoc verò anno absolutam edidit. That is, "John Calvin is a man adorned with a penetrating "judgment, very great learning, and a happy me- "mory. He is a writer of a great and diversified "eloquence, and an exact and clear style; witness "his Institution of the Christian Religion, of which he "first printed only a sketch, afterwards he enlarged "it, and this year he has publish'd it quite finished." Gesner (29) heard, that in 1544 they were printing a fourth edition in the same city, with new additions. That of Geneva 1550 ex Officina Joannis Gerardi, in 4to would then be the fifth at least. It is said in the title-page, that the work had been corrected in an infinite number of places, and that it was adorned with two Indexes. Nunc ex postrema Auctoris recognitione quibusdam locis auctior, infinitis verò castigatior .... additi sunt Indices duo locupletissimi; unus rerum insignium, alter verò locorum omnium, quos partim ex sacris Bibliis, partim ex aliis Theologiæ Doctoribus Author tanquam ex divite penu in suum usum vel apte transtulit, vel docte interpretatus est. One of the Indexes was of the remarkable things treated of in the work; the other of the passages either from the Bible, or from the writings of other Divines, which are quoted or explained in the Institution. The last edition either French or Latin, revised by the Author, is of the year 1558 (30). In that edition the work was divided into four books, and each book into several chapters, of which there are in all fourscore; there being eighteen in the first book, seventeen in the second, twenty five in the third, and twenty in the fourth. The edition of 1550 is divided only into one and twenty chapters. There is therefore an egregious falshood in Varillas, who says, that about the year 1535 Calvin's Institution was printed in four books and 104 chapters (31). The following words of Papyrius Masso have misled Varillas. Basileæ anno 1536 publicavit de Institutione Christianæ Religionis Libros quatuor .... illâ Institutione sæpe aucta & millies excusa capitibus centum & quatuor ... rejecit, &c. (32). I have said in another place (33), that the public complained of Beza, because he altered and corrected his Notes upon the New Testament in every new edition. Bolsec complains also, or rather insults in a very unpolite manner the frequent corrections of Calvin's work. I cannot forbear taking notice, says he (34), of a circumstance mentioned by Beza to the great honour, as he thinks, of his master, father, and friend Calvin. He says that Calvin, being obliged to keep at home on account of his sickness, and to leave off reading and preaching, yet did not lose his time; for he laboured at home, and during that time he began and finished his last Institution, in Latin and French. One might very well ask Beza here, which was this last Institution; for the first only has been seen, which was composed and published long before. If the first was so well done, and every way complete, what occasion was there to revise and alter it so often? But here we discover the falshood of what Beza asserts; he says, that his master, father, and friend Calvin was so perfectly learned, that he never retracted any of the opinions or propositions, which he had written, or spoken. For having been censured, and accused of heresy for several false opinions, which were discovered in his Institution of the first and second edition, he revised and corrected them, and then suppressing the former editions, he caused the work to be reprinted thus corrected. In the mean time he resisted those who censured his opinions, calling them lyars, impostors, calumniators, and appealing to this last edition of his Institution, in which he had corrected his errors. By this artifice he would make himself pass for an infallible Doctor, who never retracted any of the opinions he either wrote or spake.

If we may believe F. Maimbourg (35), John Calvin's Christian Institution was first published in French. Mr. de Sponde says the same thing (36), and adds that it was at Basil August the 1st 1535, and that there was in the title-page a flaming sword, with these words, non veni mittere pacem sed gladium, that is, "I "came not to send peace, but a sword." I cannot well say whether they are mistaken or not; only I know that there had been some editions of this work in French before the year 1544 (37), and that Calvin himself had translated it into French. There have been also Italian (38), German, Dutch, Spanish (29) and English Translations of it. But Monsieur Teissier ought not to have understood literally these words of Papyrius Masso millies excusa. He (Masso) testifies, says Mr. Teissier (40), that this work was so well received by the Public, that it went through above a thousand editions in a very little time. Papyrius Masso was very far from saying this. You will find a Supplement to this in the remark [BB] of this article, and in the remark [B] of the article SCHULTINGIUS.

Here follows an abstract of a Letter. "The most "ancient edition of Calvin's Institution, which is in "the Library of Geneva, is an octavo of 514 pages, "printed at Basil per Thomam Platterum, & Balthasarum Latium, mense Martio, Anno 1536. At the "end of the book there is a figure of Minerva, with "these words, Tu nihil invita facies dicesve Minerva. "The beginning is wanting to page 42. So that we "cannot know by this copy, whether the Flaming "Sword was in this edition: it is to be found in se- "veral other as well Latin as French Editions, as in "a French one of the year 1545, and in another of "the year 1561 (41)." I have observed, that John Girard the Bookseller, who printed this Institution in Latin in the year 1550, in 4to, did not put these words non veni pacem mittere in terram sed gladium, about the sword surrounded with flames, as he had put them in the frontispiece of Calvin's Treatise contre la Secte phantastique & furieuse des Libertins, i. e. "against "the phantastical and furious Sect of the Libertines" in the year 1545: but I have also observed, that he put them in the French Edition of the Institution, published in the year 1553, 4to. For the rest, I don't believe, that the Edition of Basil per Thomam Platterum, & Balthasarum Latium mense Martio, Anno 1536, is the first. I shall give my reasons for it in the remark [B] of the article SCHULTINGIUS.

[G] He proposed to go to Strasbourgh, or to Basil.] All men of sense will grant me, that with regard to the chronological series of Calvin's voyages, no Author is more to be depended upon than Beza, when things of this nature cannot in the least affect Calvin's reputation. Since then Beza asserts, that Calvin left Paris to go to Xaintonge, that from Xaintonge he returned to Paris, that from Paris he retired to Basil, that from Basil he went to Ferrara, that from Ferrara he returned into France, that from France he went to Geneva, with a design to go further either to Basil or Strasbourg, we must follow this account rather than that of the Maimbourg's and the Varillas's: for in the first place it is neither more nor less glorious to Calvin to have gone from Ferrara directly to Geneva, than to have returned from Ferrara into France, and to have left that Country immediately, in order to go to Geneva. I do therefore believe, that all reasonable men will explode what Mr. Maimbourg says (42), viz. that Calvin having took a journey into Germany with Lewis du Tillet, returned into France, preached secretly at Poitiers, gained the Magistrates, the Professors, and a great many other disciples, and celebrated the Lords Supper in a cellar his own way; that he returned to Paris, where finding that the persecution was more cruel than ever, he left France for ever, and made his escape to Basil. These adventures at Poitiers are so considerable, and so much to the honour of Calvin, that it would be very strange, if they had been unknown

(28) See the Remark [H] of the Article STURMIUS (John).

(29) Gesn. Bibliothec. fol. 395. verso.

(30) Beza, in vita Calvini, ad ann. 1558 asserts it. But observe, that the Preface, which Calvin prefixed to his last Latin edition, is dated August the 1st 1559, and that this edition printed at Geneva by Robert Stephens, fol. is dated 1559.

(31) Varillas, Hist. de François I. liv. 7. pag. 249.

(32) Papyr. Masso, Elog. tom. 2. pag. 414, 415.

(33) In the Remark [E] of the Article BEZA.

(34) Hist. de Calvin, cap. 32. pag. m. 107.

(35) Hist. du Calvinis. pag. 60.

(36) Ad ann. 1535. num. 6.

(37) Gesner, in Bibl. folio 396 verso.

(38) See the Article PASCHALI (Gulio Cæsare).

(39) This was done by Cyprianus de Valera, and printed in 1597, in 4to.

(40) Eloges des Hommes Savans, tom. 1. pag. 246.

(41) Taken from a Letter of Mr. Turrettin, written June the 7th, 1700.

(42) Hist. de Calvin, pag. 59, 60, &c.

territories of the Duke of Savoy, he was obliged to go that way. This was a particular direction of Providence; it was his deſtiny to ſettle at Geneva, and when he only deſigned to paſs through that City in order to go further, he found himſelf ſtopped there by an order from heaven, if I may ſay ſo, particularly intimated to him [H]: for William Farel threatened him in the moſt ſolemn manner, with God's curſe, if he did not ſtay to aſſiſt him in that part of the Lord's vineyard. Calvin therefore found himſelf obliged to comply with the choice, which the Conſiſtory and Magiſtrates of Geneva had made of him, with the people's conſent, as well to preach as to be a Profeſſor of Divinity [I]. He had condeſcended to accept only this laſt employment, and would have refuſed the firſt, but he was at laſt obliged to take them both upon him in Auguſt 1536. The next year he made the whole people ſwear ſolemnly to a body of doctrines, which contained alſo a renunciation of Popery; and becauſe the reformation of the doctrinal part of Religion had not had a great influence upon the morals of the people, which were very much corrupted, nor baniſhed the ſpirit of faction, which divided the chief families of the Commonwealth, Calvin, aſſiſted by the other Miniſters, declared, that ſince all their admonitions and warnings had proved unſucceſsful, they could not celebrate the holy Sacrament, known to Beza, and ſtranger ſtill, if having been acquainted with them, he had omitted to mention them in the Life of Calvin. As for Mr. Varillas, he tells us (43), that Calvin and Lewis du Tillet, being reſolved to take a journey into Germany, parted at Geneva, becauſe du Tillet the Regiſter, who overtook them in that city, prevailed upon his brother to return back into France; that Calvin continued his journey to Straſbourgh; that he had a conference there with Bucer; that he went back into France; that he ſtopp'd at Poitiers, where he made ſeveral diſciples; that he ſent ſome of them as his Apoſtles to preach the Goſpel in the Provinces; that he returned to Paris; that he left that city ſoon after, and went to Straſburgh, where he founded a Church compoſed of French Refugees; that he taught Divinity there; that having ſpent two whole years in that difficult employment, he went to Ferrara; but as he could ſtay no longer there (44), and not knowing whither to retire, he went to Geneva, where Farel detained him in the year 1536. This account abounds with falſe facts and chronological miſtakes; for firſt, when Calvin and Du Tillet went into Germany, they did not go thro' Geneva, but over Lorraine, and ſtopped together at Baſil: Secedere ex Gallia ſtatuit, eoque conſilio unà cum illo, quicum eum apud Santonas aliquandiu vixiſſe diximus, iter Baſileam verſus per Lotharingiam ingreſſus, non procul urbe Metenſi in maximam difficultatem incidit . . . adeo ut . . . vix Argentinam indeque Baſileam pervenerint (45). II. Calvin did not make any ſtay at Straſbourgh then, and he did not return into France, till he had been at the Court of Ferrara. III. He was not choſen a Miniſter and Profeſſor at Straſburgh, but after he had been baniſhed from Geneva in the year 1538. IV. This whole account is entirely confuted, even more than Mr. Maimbourg's, by Beza's ſilence. It muſt be obſerved that it is no where hinted in the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtories of the Reformed Churches, written by Beza, that Calvin was any ways concerned in the beginning of the Reformation within the city of Poitiers (46). Such a ſilence would certainly be ſurprizing to the utmoſt degree, if all that others relate were true. The Author of the Hiſtoria Genevrina (47) ſuppoſes that Calvin having left Paris, becauſe Queen Catherine (48), who governed the whole Kingdom, had publiſhed an Edict by which all the Lutherans were baniſhed, went to Angouleme, and that after three years ſtay in that city, he could not live there any longer, and was obliged to go into Italy, whence having made his eſcape, as it were, by a miracle (49), he went to Geneva in the year 1536. One muſt be very cunning, to find at that time a Queen Catherine in France. Beſides, Beza in page the 14th of the firſt Book of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, aſſerts that Calvin, after he had retired into Xaintonge, returned to Paris the next year.

Let us obſerve that Varillas's account is only a tranſcript of that of Florimond de Remond. See below the remark [AA]. The principle I have laid down in the beginning of this remark, is very proper to confute thoſe, who ſay (50), that Calvin, whilſt he ſtudied at Orleans, revolted from the Church of Rome, and went into Italy, and ſtaid chiefly at Rome, at Venice, and at Padua; that thence he returned to Paris, where he eſcaped being taken by the Lieutenant Criminel; that he retired to Noyon; that he there diſpoſed of his livings, after which he went into Gaſcony and Bearn in the year 1533, where he did not meet with a kind reception, becauſe he was a Sacramentarian; that he went to Geneva, where he was like to be thrown down from the top of the bridge, (which is a kind of puniſhment uſed amongſt them) becauſe he ſpread his opinions abroad; that having made his eſcape, he fled to Lauzane, whence in a little time he returned to Geneva, where ſeveral perſons being then already corrupted in their Religion, he could ſtay with more liberty. This is the ſubſtance of an Information, which a Notary of Noyon communicated to Cornelius vander Myle, and which Mr. Drelincourt has inſerted into his Vindication of Calvin, where he obſerves (51), that Andrew Rivet had already inſerted it into his Jeſuita vapulans. James Deſmai, a Doctor of the Sorbonne publiſhed at Roan in 1647 (52) a ſmall book entitled, Remarques ſur la vie de Jean Calvin Hereſiarque, tirées des Regiſtre de Noyon ville de ſa naiſſance, i. e. "Obſervations upon the Life of John Calvin the "Hereſiarch, taken from the Regiſters of Noyon his "native place." He aſſerts (53) in page 39, that Calvin went to the Univerſities of Paris, Orleans, Toulouſe, Padua; that he took a journey to Rome, and Venice, and into Bearn, and to ſome other places; that he did not continue long at Rome nor at Venice, but was ſome time longer at Padua. You may ſafely ſtrike out of the catalogue of his voyages all thoſe which Beza does not mention. He could not have been ignorant of them, had they been real; and he would certainly have mentioned them, had he known them; for theſe are things which are honourable to Calvin. One has reaſon to be ſurprized at ſo many falſhoods related to no purpoſe whatſoever.

[H] He found himſelf ſtopt at Geneva by an order from Heaven, if I may ſay ſo, particularly intimated to him.] "Farellus ut erat plane vir ille ſpiritu quodam "heroico afflatus, multis eum verbis fruſtra obteſta"tus, ut ſecum potius Genevæ laboraret, quam lon"gius excurreret, nec ei facile Calvinus aſſentiretur. "At ego tibi, inquit, ſtudia tua prætexenti, denuncio "Omnipotentis Dei Nomine, futurum ut niſi in opus "iſtud Domini nobiſcum incumbas, tibi non tam "Chriſtum, quàm te ipſum quærenti Dominus ma"ledicat (54)." The ſubſtance of this paſſage has been given in the text, to which this remark belongs.

[I] Calvin complied . . . as well to preach as to be a Profeſſor of Divinity.] Beza aſſerts this ſo poſitively, that Moreri has not miſtaken him. Calvinus ſe Preſbyterii & Magiſtratus voluntati permiſit, quorum ſuffragiis, accedente plebis conſenſu, delectus non Concionator tantum, (hoc autem primum recuſârat) ſed etiam ſacrarum Literarum Doctor, quod unum admittebat, eſt deſignatus anno Domini 1536, menſe Auguſto (55). i. e. "Calvin yeilded to the deſire and wiſhes of the Con"ſiſtory, and of the Magiſtrates, by whoſe ſuffrages "and the people's conſent, he was choſen not only a "Preacher (which he firſt declined) but alſo Profeſſor "of Divinity, which poſt alone he was willing to "accept, in Auguſt 1536." Can there be any thing more

(43) Hiſt. de le Hereſie, liv. 10. pag. 337, &c.

(44) Ibid. liv. 11. pag. 3 and 30.

(45) Beza, in Vita Calvini, pag. 367, ad ann. 1534.

(46) See that Hiſtory, Book 1. pag. 63.

(47) Tom. 3. pag. 152.

(48) He means no doubt Catherine de Medicis.

(49) Hiſt. Genevrina, tom. 3. pag. 40.

(50) See Mr. Drelincourt, Defenſe de Calvin, pag. 35, &c.

(51) Ibid. pag. 37.

(52) Ibid. pag. 155.

(53) Ibid. pag. 166, 167.

(54) Beza, in Vita Calvini, pag. 368.

(55) Idem, ibid.

Sacrament, as long as theſe diſorders reigned. He alſo declared, that he could not ſubmit to the regulations, which the Synod of the Canton of Berne had lately made [K], and that they of Geneva ought to be heard in the Synod which was to meet at Zurich. Hereupon the Syndics having ſummoned the people, it was ordered in that Aſſembly, that Calvin (c), Farel, and another Miniſter ſhould leave the City within two days, becauſe they had refuſed to adminiſter the Sacrament. Calvin retired to Straſburgh, where Bucer and Capito gave him a thouſand proofs of their love and eſteem. He eſtabliſhed a French Church at Straſburgh, of which he was made the firſt Miniſter; he was alſo choſen at the ſame time Profeſſor of Divinity there. During his ſtay at Straſburgh, he continued to give ſeveral marks of his kind affection to the Church of Geneva, as appears amongſt other things, by the anſwer he wrote in 1539 to the beautiful but artful Letter of Cardinal Sadolet (d) [L] Biſhop of Carpentras. Two years after the Divines of Straſburgh would have him aſſiſt at the Diet, which the Emperor had appointed to meet at Worms and at Ratiſbon, in order to appeaſe, if poſſible, the troubles occaſioned by the difference of Religion. Calvin went therefore to the Diet with Bucer, and entered into a conference with Melancthon. The people of Geneva entreated him ſo earneſtly to return to them, that at laſt he conſented to be their Miniſter again for a certain time (e); but they were to wait till he was returned from the Diet. He arrived at Geneva September the 13th 1541, to the great ſatisfaction of the people, and the Magiſtrates. The firſt thing he did after his arrival was, to eſtabliſh a form of Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline, and a Conſiſtorial Juriſdiction with the power of reproving, and inflicting all kinds of canonical puniſhments, as far as excommunication excluſively. This was very much diſliked by ſeveral perſons, who ſaid, that by this means the papal tyranny would ſoon be revived. However the thing was executed; and this new Canon paſſed into law in an Aſſembly of the whole people held November the 20th 1541, and the Clergy and Laity promiſed ſolemnly to conform to it for ever. The inflexible ſtrictneſs with which Calvin aſſerted on all occaſions the rights of his Conſiſtory, drew upon him the hatred of a great many perſons (f), and occaſioned ſometimes great tumults in the City; and one would hardly believe, if there were not unqueſtionable proofs of it, that amongſt all the diſturbances of the Commonwealth, he could yet take ſo much care as he did of the foreign Churches in France (g), in Germany, in England, and in Poland, and write ſo many books [M], and ſo many letters. He did more by his pen than by his preſence, and yet on ſome occaſions he acted in perſon, as when he went to Francfort in 1556, on purpoſe to put an end to the diſputes which divided the French Church there. He had been ſick ſome time before, and the report which was ſpread of his being dead did very much pleaſe the Roman Catholicks [N]. He always led an active life, having almoſt conſtantly pen

(c) In 1538.

(d) He wrote it to the Senate, Council, and People of Geneva, exhorting them to return into the pale of the Church.

(e) The Magiſtrates of Straſburgh conſented afterwards to the abrogation of this limiting clauſe.

(f) See the Article of BERTELIER.

(g) See Paſquier, Recherch. de la France, liv. 8. chap. 55.

more poſitive? And yet neither Mr. Spon nor Mr. Leti amongſt the Proteſtants, nor Mr. Maimbourg amongſt the Roman Catholics, underſtood this. Farel would detain Calvin, ſays Mr. Spon (56); but he reſiſted for a long while; at laſt Farel entreating him more earneſtly he conſented to ſtay, not to preach but to teach Divinity. Mr. Leti ſays the ſame. Calvino ſe laſciò perſuadere di fermarſi non gia con la conditione di predicare, di che ne laſciava a gli altri la cura, mà d'inſegnare la Theologia (57). Mr. Maimbourg's words are as follow: They ſhared between them the functions of their Miniſtry. Farel, who uſed to thunder in the pulpit, continued to preach; and Calvin, who was not an agreeable Orator, took upon him the taſk of teaching Divinity, in his own way, without having ever ſtudied it (58).

(56) Hiſt. de Geneve, liv. 3. pag. m. 243.

(57) Hiſtoria Genevrina, tom. 3. pag. 41.

(58) Hiſtoire du Calviniſme, pag. 64.

[K] He declared that he could not ſubmit to the Regulations, which the Synod of the Canton of Berne had lately made.] The Church of Geneva made uſe of leavened bread in the holy Communion, and had cauſed the baptiſmal fonts to be removed out of the churches, and had aboliſhed all the Feaſts except the Sundays. The Churches of the Canton of Berne diſliked theſe three things, and paſſed an Act in the Synod held at Lauſanne, to require that the uſe of unleavened bread, the baptiſmal fonts, and the feaſts be reſtored at Geneva: theſe were the regulations, to which Calvin refuſed to ſubmit (59).

(59) Beza, in Vita Calvini, pag. 369, ad ann. 1538.

[L] The anſwer he wrote to the ... Letter of Cardinal Sadolet.] That Letter is to be found in the volume, which contains Calvin's ſmall works (opuſculos): it is dated from Straſbourgh September the firſt 1539, and it is certain that Calvin did not return to Geneva but in the year 1541. The Author of the Hiſtoria Genevrina did not obſerve this (60). Queſta lettora .... ancora communicata à Calvino in Straſburg; che pure riſpoſe ma dopo ritornato in Geneva.

(60) Tom. 3. pag. 69.

[M] One would hardly believe ... he could ... write ſo many books.] The edition of his works publiſhed at Geneva contains twelve volumes in folio, which have been reduced to nine volumes in the edition of Amſterdam printed in 1667. The Commentaries upon the Bible are the moſt conſiderable part of Calvin's works. See the judgment, which Mr. Simon paſſed upon theſe Commentaries (61); it is mixed with good and bad; but after all he ſhews a very great eſteem for Calvin, and very much extolls his merit. There is a Jeſuit, who falſly ſuppoſes that this Miniſter publiſhed a work de non caſtigandis Hæreticis (that hereticks ought not to be puniſhed) after the puniſhment of Servet. This Jeſuit quotes this as an inſtance to prove, that it is the ſpirit of heretics to endeavour to unite together things inconſiſtent. A thing, ſays he (62), which never appeared more evidently than in the perſon of John Calvin ... for as ſoon as Calvin had cauſed Servet to be condemned to death, becauſe of the novelties and the atheiſm, which he ſpread at Geneva, immediately after this curſed heretick had been burnt, and his aſhes ſcatter'd through the air, Calvin wrote a book de caſtigandis hæreticis, belying thus his own action by his doctrine. Thus the wicked confute themſelves, like the Antipheron of Ariſtotle. All this is ridiculous: for on the contrary, after the puniſhment of Servet, Calvin publiſhed a book intitled, Fidelis expoſitio errorum Michaelis Serveti, & brevis eorundem refutatio, ubi docetur jure gladii coercendos eſſe Hæreticos. i. e. "A "faithful account of Michael Servetus's errors, with a "ſhort confutation of them; in which it is proved, "that Hereticks ought to be reſtrained by the ſword." A book, which ſtill occaſions a great clamour againſt its Author. This falſhood, publiſhed againſt Calvin, could no where be better taken notice of, than in a remark, which relates to his works.

(61) Hiſt. Critique du Vieux Teſtament, liv. 3. chap. 14. pag. 434, &c.

(62) Garaſſe, Doctrine Curieuſe, pag. 230.

[N] The report which was ſpread of his being dead did very much pleaſe the Roman Catholicks.] In the year 1556 he had been ſeized with a tertian ague whilſt he was preaching, and as he was forced againſt his will to come down from the pulpit, this occaſioned immediately a thouſand falſe reports concerning him. Beza adds, that the Canons of Noyon made a ſolemn proceſſion

pen in hand, even when his diſtempers confined him to his bed. He lived, I ſay, in the continual labours, which his zeal for the general good of the Churches impoſed upon him, till May the 27th 1564 (b). He was a man on whom God had conferred the moſt eminent talents; a great wit, a ſound judgment, an happy memory [O]; he was a judicious, eloquent, and indefatigable writer; he had a very extenſive learning, and a great zeal for the truth. Joſeph Scaliger, who found but very few perſons worthy of his praiſes, yet could not forbear admiring Calvin (i); he commended him amongſt other things, for not having attempted to write a Commentary on the Revelations of St. John [P]. The Roman Catholicks have at laſt been obliged to rank amongſt the ill-ground fables, all thoſe horrid calumnies, which had been publiſhed againſt Calvin's morals; their beſt Writers content themſelves now [Q] with ſaying, that if he were free of the vices of the body, yet he was ſubject to thoſe of the mind, as pride, anger, detraction, &c. There has been ſpread abroad a pleaſant ſtory concerning his Devotion to St. Hubert [R]; they, who proceſſion to give thanks to Heaven for the death of the hereſiarch, whom their City had produced. Multis inde falſis ſecutis rumoribus, iiſque uſque adeo Pontificiis gratis, ut de Calvini Morte ſolemni ſupplicatione Novioduni, Calvini patria, Canonici ſuis idolis gratias egerint (63). I ſuſpect the Hiſtorian's memory play'd him here ſome bad trick; he miſtook, I think, the year 1556 for the year 1551. I have quoted in another place (64) a paſſage of Calvin, which ſhews that the proceſſion of his countrymen the Canons, in order to give thanks for his pretended death, happened in the year 1551. Would they have done the ſame thing over again, five years after, upon a falſe report? I can hardly believe it; I think it is much more probable, that Beza writing this ſeveral years after it happened, was miſtaken with regard to the time. The beſt memories are oftener guilty of ſuch miſtakes, than we are aware of.

(b) Taken from his Life written by Beza.

(i) See the Scaligerana.

(63) Beza, in Vita Calvini, pag. 379. ad ann. 1556.

(64) In the marginal reference (8) of the article BERTELIER.

[O] He had a happy memory.] His Hiſtorian gives the following inſtances of it. He knew men again after ſeveral years, tho' he had ſeen them but once; when he dictated any thing, and happened to be interrupted for ſeveral hours, he followed the thread of his diſcourſe, without having occaſion of being told where he ſtopped; and he never forgot what he once had truſted to his memory, I ſpeak of ſuch things, which it was his duty to remember. Memoriæ incredibilis, ut quos ſemel aſpexiſſet, multis poſt annis ſtatim agnoſceret; & inter dictandum ſæpe aliquot horas interturbatus, ſtatim ad dictata, nullo commonefaciente, rediret, & eorum, quæ ipſum noſcere muneris ſui cauſa intereſſet, quantumvis multiplicibus & inſignitis negotiis oppreſſus, nunquam tamen obliviſceretur (15).

(65) Beza, in vita Calvini, pag. 386.

[P] Scaliger commended him, amongſt other things, for not having attempted to write a Commentary upon the Revelations of St. John.] And yet he conſidered him as one who had better diſcovered the ſenſe of the Prophets, than any of the other Commentators. O quam Calvinus bene aſſequitur mentem Prophetarum! nemo melius (6). Since therefore he adds, Sapit, quod in Apocalypſi non ſcripſit: i. e. "He did wiſely, not to "write on the Apocalyps," he muſt have been perſuaded, that there is nothing to do upon that book. I have read in Bodin a thing, which I ſhall relate here. In Oraculis interpretandis, malui judiciorum illam formulam, NON LIQUET, uſurpare, quam temere ex aliorum opinione non intellecta cuiquam aſſentire. Ac valde mihi probatur Calvini non minus urbana quam prudens oratio, qui de libro Apocalypſeos ſententiam rogatus, ingenue reſpondit, ſe penitus ignorare, quid velit tam obſcurus ſcriptor, qui qualiſque fuerit nondum conſtat inter eruditos (67). i. e. "In the explication of "Prophecies I chooſe rather to make uſe of this law-"word, non liquet, (or, it does not appear to us) "than to follow any one in fixing a ſenſe upon an au-"thor, whoſe opinions I do not underſtand. And I "approve very much Calvin's prudent and civil an-"ſwer, who being aſked what he thought of the "Apocalyps, ſaid very frankly, that he did not know, "what was the deſign of ſo obſcure an author, it "being not yet agreed amongſt the learned, who, or "what ſort of a man he was." I would be glad to know, if Calvin ſaid this in ſome book, or only in converſation. I had rather think the latter; becauſe it would not bave been prudent for a man like him; to declare, that it was not yet determined amongſt the learned, what ſort of a man the Author of the Apocalyps was.

(66) In Scaligeranis, pag. m. 41.

(67) Bodin, Method. Hiſtor. cap. 7. pag. m. 416.

[Q] The Roman Catholics have been obliged at laſt to rank amongſt the ill-grounded fables the . . . Calumnies, which had been publiſhed againſt Calvin's Morals: their beſt writers content themſelves now &c.] I deſire that my expreſſions be not taken in a more general ſenſe, than ſuch propoſitions naturally bear. I know that Cardinal de Richelieu, or that excellent Writer, who publiſhed La Methode pour convertir (The Method of making Converſions) under the name of his Eminence, has admitted all the ſilly tales of Boliec. It is therefore not at all impoſſible but ſome great Author ſhould ſtill tranſcribe them at this time. I don't pretend to deny this; my meaning is only, that generally ſpeaking, great Authors ſcorn to bring ſuch things again upon the carpet. As for the common ſcriblers who, as Papyrius Maſſo obſerves (68), have ſpread theſe calumnies, they will never give them up. They are a ſort of men, who never let a piece of news drop, when they like it; ſo that we may ſay, that, thanks to their carefulneſs, there is never ſo mean a News-Writer, but may hope to be immortalized by all the groſs lies he invents with a pipe in his mouth. They will be tranſcribed three months after by ſome of theſe ſcriblers, and publiſhed again now and then, as there will be occaſion for it. And if any publick or private intereſt requires it, they will be found two or three hundred years hence, in ſome collections of Satyrs, amongſt the duſt of Libraries, and will be quoted again in ſome new Libel (69). Bolſec's work will meet with the ſame fate (70), as long as there will be Calviniſts in the world, who will have adverſaries. But to convince him for ever of calumny, it will be ſufficient to quote a certain number of grave Authors, who did not admit his ſtories. If they had the beſt appearance of truth, theſe grave Authors would not ſo eaſily give up the advantages they could make of them. This reflection ſhould be carefully obſerved. An Author adorned with a vaſt many titles (71) has lately copied after Bolſec.

(68) Plebei Scriptores libidines ei, ſcortationeſque objiciunt, nemo tamen adulteria acrius odiſſe videbatur. Papyr. Maſſo, in Elog. tom. 2. pag. 429.

(69) See the remark [A] of the article CAPET.

(70) Theſe calumnies are formed in the Syſtema Decretorum dogmaticorum, publiſhed at Avignon in 1693, by Francis Porter, Hibernus Medenſis, Ordinis Fratrum Minorum Provinciæ Hiberniæ, olim in Romano Sancti Iſidori Collegio Sacræ Theologiæ Profeſſor Primarius, & nunc Lector bis jubilatus, ac ſereniſſ. Majeſtatis Britannicæ Theologus & Hiſtoricus.

[R] They have ſpread a pleaſant ſtory concerning his devotion to St. Hubert.] It has been ſaid, that he having made uſe of all kinds of remedies, to cure his ſon, who had been bit by a mad dog, but all to no purpoſe, had his laſt recourſe to the interceſſion of St. Hubert. It is added, that the ſon of the Hereſiarch having paid all the neceſſary devotions in the church of that Saint, was cured of his double madneſs that was occaſioned by the dog, and that of Calvin; and they quote verſes which were made on that occaſion. Notabile illud fuit, filium Calvini fruſtra expertum alia quævis amuleta, miſſum Geneva Andainum, ab impio & ſacrilego parente, ut ibi ope ſancti Huberti a rabidi canis morſu curaretur. Quemadmodum ille reipſa ibidem abjurata ſimul hæreſi, ab utraque, hoc eſt, caninâ & Calviniânâ, rabie convaluit. Extant verò de ea re carmina Bartholomæi Honorii, Poetæ illius ætatis (72). Let us tranſcribe theſe verſes (73) written by Bartholomy Honorius, a Poet of thoſe times.

(71) See the foregoing quotation.

Scis quid Calvinus Sanctorum fecerit oſor,
A cane cum rabido filius ictus erat?
Tentavit medicis illum ſanare venenis,
Quæ Pedemontanus juſſit Alexis emi;
Sed Deus hunc non eſt medicina paſſus abuti,
Ne quis ab hoc Divos temneret Hærcticus.
Namque opus invalidum Calvini reddidit, ut ſe
Per Sanctos cuivis ferre probaret opem.

(72) Silveſter à Petra Sancta, Notis in Epiſtol. Molinæi ad Balzacum, cap. 17. pag. 171.

(73) Jean Chappeville, Canon and Grand-Vicar of Liege, quotes them, and from him le Vaſſeur, quoted by Drelincourt, Defenſe de Calvin, pag. 198.

Ille

who pretended to confute that ſtory, by ſaying that Calvin had no children, were miſtaken; for it is not true that his marriage was fruitleſs [S]. Nothing ſhews more the bad effects, which a miſtaken zeal has upon men's judgment, than to ſee Authors of ſome reputation, who yet relate with the utmoſt gravity, that Calvin would make people believe, that he raiſed the dead [T]. It is not long ſince a young Abbot accuſed him of having

Ille itaque incaſſum ſudans, eſt nocte coactus
Pignus in Ardennam mittere languidulum.
Immortalis ubi Numen ſe pandit Huberti,
Talia qui Chriſti vulnera curat ope.
Venit eo proles ſcelerati manca parentis,
Et ſupplex Aras procidit ante ſacras.
Quodque precabatur ſuperos, erat ut ſibi vellent
E membris morbum pellere rabificum.
Neve ſibi objicerent male ſani dogmata patris,
Quæ modo per mundi climata nata forent;
Nam ſe cum ſtolido non conſentire parente
Velle ſed in veteri Religione mori.
Hæc ubi fatus erat ſacra cum veſte Sacerdos
Prodiit, illius vulnera dira fovens.
Nec multos manſiſſe dies narratur ibidem,
Quin fuerit dono ſanus, Huberte, tuo.
Sparſerat interea Calvinus in urbe Genevâ,
Saxonicas natum nuper adiſſe plagas;
Ille quidem dignus, non qui luat à cane tali
Vindictam, ſed quem Cerberus ipſe vovet.

The ſenſe is,

" Would you know, what Calvin the Saint-hater did, " when his ſon had been bit by a mad dog? He " thought firſt to cure him with medicines; but God " would not ſuffer him to be thus cured, leſt the He- " retics ſhould hence take an opportunity of deſpiſing " the Saints. God render'd Calvin's endeavours " fruitleſs, in order to prove that he helps men " by the interceſſion of the Saints. The Hereſiarch " therefore was obliged to ſend his ſon to St. Hubert, " who cures ſuch diſeaſes by Chriſt's aſſiſtance. The " child then of that wicked father came to the Saint, " and falling down upon his knees before the Altar, " he prayed to be delivered of his madneſs; and beg- " ged that his heretical father's errors, which he had " ſpread over the world, might not be objected to him, " for that he was not of his ſtupid father's opinion, " and would die in the old Religion. When he had " thus pray'd, the Prieſt came in his Holy Garment, " and fomented his wound: nor did the youth wait " many days, but he was cured by your favour, O " Hubert, as it is reported. In the mean time Cal- " vin reported at Geneva that his ſon was gone into " Saxony; Calvin, a man who deſerved to be puniſhed " not by the bite of a mad dog, but to be devoured " by Cerberus himſelf."

It is not worth the while to confute all this, no more than what we read in Varillas; I. Calvin being intreated by a Canon to return into the Pale of the Catholic Church, anſwered, that ſince he was engaged in his new maxims, he would perſevere in them to the end; but that if he was to begin again, he would never forſake the faith of his anceſtors. II. Calvin's nephew aſked him one day, whether one might be ſaved in the Church of Rome, to which he anſwered, yes. III. A Roman Catholick exhorting him one day to retract his errors, he anſwered with a ſigh, it is too late (74). Theſe are things, which an Hiſtorian, who knows his duty as ſuch, will never publiſh, becauſe, a mere denial, muſt neceſſarily reduce him to a ſhameful ſilence.

(74) Varillas, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie. liv. 10. pag. 336.

[S] It is not true, that his marriage was fruitleſs.] Calvin did not ſhew, like ſome other perſons, a great inclination for marrying. He was at leaſt thirty, when he married Idolletta de Bure (75) the widow of an Anabaptiſt whom he had converted. He married her at Straſburgh, by the advice of Martin Bucer his Patron (76). She had ſome children by her firſt huſband, John Strordeur a native of Leige (77), and died in the beginning of the year 1549. Calvin was extreamly afflicted at this loſs (78), and continued a widower all the reſt of his life. See what he anſwers for himſelf, to the charge brought againſt the Reformers, that they made war againſt Rome, as the Greeks did againſt Troy, for the ſake of a woman. Fingunt adverſarii nos mulierum cauſa quaſi Trojanum bellum moviſſe. Ut alios in præſentia omittam; me ſaltem ab hoc probro immunem eſſe concedant neceſſe eſt. Quò mihi ad refellendam eorum putidam garrulitatem major ſuppetit libertas: Cum ſemper ad ducendam uxorem ſub Papæ Tyrannide liber fuerim, ex quo me inde eripuit Dominus, per annos complures ſponte calebs vixi; mortuâ uxore, ſingularis expli Fœminâ, jam ſeſquiannus eſt ex quo non invitus cœlibatum rurſus colo (79). i. e. " Our adverſaries pre- " tend, that we make a kind of Trojan war for the " ſake of women. But not to mention the others " now, the adverſaries muſt confeſs that I am at leaſt " free of that blame. I am ſo much the more at li- " berty to confute their ridiculous clamours, that I " always was free to marry, whilſt I lived under the " tyranny of the Pope, from which it pleaſed the " Lord to deliver me, ſince which time I have lived " ſingle ſeveral years, tho' I might have married, if " I had had a mind to it; and ſince the death of my " wife, who was a bright example amongſt the wo- " men, I have now again lived a year and a half ſin- " gle, though not againſt my will." He had by his wife a ſon, who died before, a circumſtance which he told the public in his anſwer to thoſe, who upbraided him with being childleſs (80). Crimen ἀστοργίας ſibi objectum diluere volens (Balduinus) orbitatem mihi exprobrat. Dederat mihi Deus filiolum, abſtulit; hoc quoque recenſet inter probra liberis me carere. Atqui mihi filiorum ſunt myriades in toto orbe Chriſtiano (81). i. e. " Balduinus, in order to vindicate himſelf of the " crime of hard-heartedneſs, upbraids me with my " being childleſs. The Lord had given me a ſon; " and he took him from me again. This then muſt " be a ſhame to me, that I have no children. But I " have millions of children over the whole Chriſtian " world." If Papyrius Maſſo had been acquainted with this paſſage, he would not have ſaid that Calvin could get no children. Eum ſibi matrimonio junxit irritâ ſpe prolis & liberorum, nullos enim ſuſcipere potuit. Mr. de Sponde has repeated the ſame thing, and has even added this obſervation to it, that Calvin's wife had children by another huſband. Ideletam Buriam ſibi junxit & multis annis cum eâ vixit, nullis tamen ſuſceptis liberis, quamvis illa ex priori marito nonnullos haberet (82) Florimond de Remond had already ſaid before them, that theſe were nuptials condemned to a perpetual ſterility, tho' Ideletta was both young and beautiful (83). But who would be ſurprized at the falſhood aſſerted by theſe three Authors, when he obſerves, that a Miniſter of a very extenſive reading, did not know, that Calvin had been a father? This Miniſter is Mr. Rivet. In order to confute the ſtory of the pretended cure made on Calvin's ſon at the interceſſion of St. Hubert, Rivet ſaid amongſt other things, that he did not think, it could be proved that Calvin ever had a child. Vanus ego ſim, ſi ille vel quiſquam alius unquam probet Calvinum fuiſſe filii parentem, nedum ut filium ſuum miſerit Huberto ſanandum, quod nemo etiam crediturus eſſet mente ſanus, vel ſi decem liberos habuiſſet Calvinus. Ergo Bartholomæus ille non Honorius, ſed inglorius & infamis manebit, qui ſecum miſerum Loyolitam in participationem infamiæ pertraxit (84). In another place, he flatly denies that Calvin ever had a ſon. Claudit miraculorum Huberti ſpecimine in filio Calvini, qui nunquam fuit in rerum natura.

(79) Calvinus, in Tractatu de Scandalis, pag. 100. This Treatiſe is dated July the 10th 1550. See the Critique generale du Calviniſme de Maimbourg, pag. 155 of the 3d edition.

(80) Tractat. Theolog. pag. 369.

(81) See how Mr. de Meaux, Hiſt. de Variations, liv. 9. num. 78. makes uſe of theſe words, to charge Calvin with pride, and what Mr. Drelincourt anſwered to thoſe who had already upbraided Calvin with this. Defenſe de Calvin, pag. 313.

(82) Spond. Annal. 1538, num. 12.

(83) Flor. de Remond, Hiſt. de la Naiſſ. de l'Hereſie, liv. 7. cap. 17. pag. m. 926.

(84) Rivet. Caſtig. Notarum Silveſtri Petroſanctæ, cap. 1. Oper. tom. 3. pag. 495.

(75) Papyrius Maſſo, Elog. pag. 418.

(76) Beza, in Vita Calv. pag. 370.

(77) Papyrius Maſſo, Elog. pag. 418.

(78) See among his Letters, the 101ſt, and 102d.

[T] Authors of ſome reputation relate with the utmoſt gravity, that Calvin would make people believe, that he raiſed the dead.] Claude Deſpenſe was certainly a learned man, and one of the moſt celebrated Clergymen in the ſixteenth Century; and yet he has been weak enough to publiſh that ſilly tale. Alii etiam illum neſcio quem vivum pro mortuo cadavere excitando univerſo etiam teſte populo ſuppoſuiſſe fabulantur, quod non minus putidum mendacium, quam ſi Romæ Papa fuiſſe diceretur, auſus eſt rapſodus ille Sorbonicus Claudius Spenſa maledicentiſſimo quodam libro inculcare (86). i. e. " Some fabulouſly report, that he ſuppoſed I do " not know what perſon, who was alive, inſtead of a " corps, which he pretended to reſtore to life even " in preſence of the whole people; which as fooliſh a " ſtory,

(85) Ibid. cap. 19. num. 5. pag. 558.

(86) Beza, in Vita Calvini, ſub finem.

having expreſſed ſome where a very brutiſh thought, but being challenged to quote the paſſage, which he boaſted to have read, he did not anſwer the challenge (k), ſo that his accuſation may be ranked amongſt the notorious calumnies. Moreri is not ſo erroneous in this article as might have been expected [U]. He does not deny that Calvin had ſeveral good qualities. There would be a great many perſons amongſt the Roman Catholics, who would do Calvin juſtice, if they dared to ſpeak their mind. Guy Patin gives (k) See he Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for June 1685, pag. 688 of the ſecond edition. N. B. The paſſage is not in th firſt edition.

" ſtory, as tho' it were ſaid, that he had been a Pope " at Rome. This that ſcribbler Claude Deſpenſe a " Doctor of the Sorbonne dared to publiſh in a very " malicious libel." If there had been at that time Miſſionaries, who were Cutlers or Shoemakers by trade, one would not be ſurprized, that they ſhould have diverted the mob on holy days in the corners of the ſtreets, by ſo ridiculous a tale. But one cannot ſufficiently wonder that grave men ſhould tell it ſeriouſly. They who had this weakneſs do not raiſe our compaſſion, when we ſee them ſeverely cenſured by Beza (87). If it was upon ſome other account, the cenſure would appear too ſevere. If the ſtory mentioned by Bolſec in his XIIIth Chapter had happened to Calvin, if he had attempted to raiſe one, who feigned to be dead, and who was found to be really dead, Baudouin would not have ſpared him (88), he would have expoſed him to all the ſhame, which ſo odious and criminal a cheat deſerved. Yet he did not mention it either directly or indirectly; let us therefore infer from this Hiſtorian's ſilence, that this is nothing but a ridiculous ſtory. The only witneſs Bolſec quotes for it is a woman, who had been baniſhed from Geneva. She was, ſays he, the widow of him, who promiſed to perſonate the dead, and to revive when Calvin ſhould ſpeak the word. This was indeed a very creditable witneſs! She might be judged and condemned by her own words. She owned, that in order to have a ſhare in the alms of the Church, ſhe entered into an engagement with Calvin, to aſſiſt him in this abominable cheat, and that ſhe acted her part, till the death of her huſband obliged her to diſcover the whole trick. Was not this confeſſing very plainly, that ſhe was capable of calumniating Calvin, in favour of thoſe, who would pay her for it (89)? And muſt not a man be as weak, as ſhe was wicked, or even as wicked as herſelf, to lay any ſtreſs upon ſuch a ſtory? And yet a great many writers have related it. The Continuator of Baronius is of that number (90). Father Labbe ſets down the year in which this pretended prodigy happened, and if one was inclined to cavil with him, one might maintain that he even mentions the day; for he expreſſes himſelf thus under the year 1553. " Calvin " cauſes Michael Servetus to be burnt at Geneva Oct. " the 27th, and pretending by his prayers to raiſe a " poor man from the dead, whom he had bribed, " to feign himſelf dead, he was really the oc- " caſion of his death (91)." Mr. Varillas had wit enough to underſtand how ridiculous this ſtory is, but he was not bold enough, to publiſh his opinion: he left out of his Hiſtory of Francis I what he had ſaid upon this ſubject; but as there were copies of his Manuſcript, it has been poſſible to know his thoughts, and to impart them to the publick, in the edition of his Hiſtory, printed in Holland. Here follows what he had written, and what he durſt not publiſh. Calvin was very far from undertaking to raiſe the dead, ſince he maintained that true Miracles were entirely uſeleſs, ſince the firſt publication of Chriſtianity; or from lending money out upon uſury, ſince he was contented with a ſalary of a hundred crowns for the ſupport of his family (92). All this is borrowed from Papyrius Maſſo. See his life of Calvin, p. 431, 432.

(87) See the foregoing quotation.

(88) See Papyrius Maſſo, in vita Calvini, pag. 432.

(89) This obſervation is not ſufficiently minded in thoſe countries, where the witneſſes retract ſo often what they ſay, and inform againſt thoſe who have bribed them.

(90) Spondanus, ad ann. 1553, num. 15.

(91) Chronologue François, tom. 5. pag. 766.

(92) You will find this paſſage in a parentheſis, in the Hiſtoire de François I. tom. 2. liv. 7. pag. 255. of the edition printed at the Hague in 1690.

[V] Moreri is not ſo erroneous in this article, as might have been expected.] I ſhall confine my ſelf to thoſe errors only, which concern ſome facts, and even amongſt theſe, I ſhall take notice only of ſuch lies, as I can confute otherwiſe, than by oppoſing the praiſes, which Calvin's friends have beſtowed upon him, to the injuries with which his enemies have loaded him. I ſay then in the Iſt place, that Moreri deſerves to be cenſured for what he ſays concerning Calvin's return into France after his parting with Du Tillet the Canon. It ſeems even that Moreri has taken more liberties than other writers; for he ſuppoſes, that Calvin dogmatized ſince his return not only at Poitiers, and at Bordeaux, but alſo at Angouléme, where, according to Maimbourg, he durſt not appear any more ſince the converſion of Lewis du Tillet (93). II. Moreri ſays, that Calvin fell in love with a very pretty woman, called Idelette de Bure, married to an Anabaptiſt of Leige, and that ſhe happening to become a widow ſome time after, he married her. I know of no Author (94) who ſays that this woman was pretty, nor that Calvin loved her before ſhe was a widow. Bucer engaged him to marry her, ſo that it was not a marriage made for love-ſake. III. Bolſec . . . relates ſome things very particular concerning Calvin's marriage; perhaps he ſays too much to be credited, however he deſcribes well enough the places and perſons, having been acquainted with them. This is what Moreri ſays: now it is certain, that Bolſec does not mention Calvin's marriage, and that he does not ſay a word either for or againſt Ideletta. IV. Calvin had no children by this woman. I have ſhewed above (95) that this is falſe. V. He publiſhed at Baſil his Books of the Inſtitution in 1534, under the name of Alcuin, which is the anagram of his name. I have ſaid already, that the dedication of this work is dated from Baſil Auguſt the 1ſt, 1536, but I have owned at the ſame time, that it is impoſſible to make this date agree, with what Beza tells us of Calvin's travels, from the publication of this Book to his ſettlement at Geneva with the title of a Miniſter in Auguſt 1536. The beſt way to ſolve this difficulty is, I think, by ſuppoſing that inſtead of 1536 in the date of the dedication, it muſt be 1535 (96); for Calvin's Inſtitution muſt of neceſſity have been publiſhed in 1535. The artifices, which were made uſe of in Germany, to palliate the ſufferings of the Lutherans in France, whom Francis I had put to death, determined Calvin to publiſh this work (97), as he tells us himſelf. Quum incognitus Baſiliæ laterem, quia multis piis hominibus in Gallia exuſtis grave paſſim apud Germanos odium ignes illi excitaverant, ſparſi ſunt ejus reſtinguendi cauſa improbi & mendaces libelli, non alios tam crudeliter tractari quam Anabvptiſtas, ac turbulentos homines, qui perverſis deliriis non religionem modo, ſed totum ordinem politicum convellerent. Ego hoc ab aulicis artificibus agi videns, non modo ut indigna ſanguinis innoxii effuſio falſa ſanctorum martyrum infamia ſepeliretur, ſed ut poſthac per cædes quaſlibet abſque ullius miſericordia graſſari liceret, ſilentium meum non poſſe a perfidia excuſari cenſui, niſi me pro virili opponerem. Hæc mihi edendæ inſtitutionis Cauſa fuit (98). i. e. " Whilſt I lived unknown at " Baſil, it happened, that the burning of a great num- " ber of pious men in France raiſed the indignation " of the Germans; to remove which, there were ſpread " ſome wicked Pamphlets, full of lies, in which it " was aſſerted, that none were treated thus cruelly but " Anabaptiſts, and turbulent men, who by their wicked " conceits laboured to overthrow, not only Religion, " but the State it ſelf. I, finding that by this arti- " fice the Courtiers intended not only to palliate the " ſpilling of innocent blood by an undeſerved infamy " caſt upon the Holy Martyrs, but alſo that for the " future no body ſhould have the leaſt compaſſion for " thoſe, whom they ſhould put to death; ſeeing this, " I ſay, I thought that my ſilence could not be free " from perfidiouſneſs, if I did not oppoſe them as " much as lay in my power. And this is, what " determined me to publiſh my Inſtitution." Now the martyrdom of theſe Lutherans happened in January 1535; ſo that this work muſt have been ſent to the preſs ſince the month of January 1535; whence it follows, that the year 1534, ſet down by Moreri, is a miſtake. The Edition cannot be of the year 1536, ſince it is certain, that ſoon after this work was publiſhed, Calvin went into Italy to the Ducheſs of Ferrara, whence being returned into France, and deſigning to go towards the Rhine, he went to Geneva, where he ſettled in Auguſt 1536. Beza is not the only Author who ſays, that Calvin left Baſil after the publication

(93) See the Remark [D].

(94) Except Florimond de Remond. See above, quotation (83).

(95) In the remark [S].

(96) Spond. ad ann. 1535, num. 6. ſays, that year, Auguſt the firſt, Calvin publiſhed his Inſtitution for the firſt time, Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſ. des Egliſ. Reform. liv. 1. pag. 22. places the firſt publication of this book in the year 1535, and obſerves that this ſame year is ſet down at the end of the dedication in ſome editions; as for inſtance in the French edition printed at Geneva in 1566, fo. io.

(97) Beza, in vita Calvini, pag. 367.

(98) Calvin, Præf. in Pſalmos.

gives us room to think ſo [X]; he was the occaſion that the Life of this Reformer written by Papyrius Maſſo has been publiſhed [Y]. That Life has been very detrimental to publication of his Book; Calvin himſelf tells us the ſame, adding this circumſtance, that nobody knew him to be the Author of it (99). Read the Preface, where he ſays this, and where he alſo acquaints the publick, that his natural baſhfulneſs engaged him to ſhun glory, and to live retired, without caring for reputation. With regard to the name of Alcuin, ſee the Remark [BB].

(99) An propoſitum eſſet mihi famam aucupari, patuit ex brevi diſceſſu, præſertim cum nemo illic ſciverit me authorem eſſe. Calvinus, Præf. in Pſalmos.

There is in the Supplement to Moreri an Article of Calvin, tranſcribed word for word from Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm; it would be therefore repeating the ſame things over again, if we were to criticize here upon that Article. This has already been done in the foregoing Remarks.

[X] A great many Roman Catholics . . . would do Calvin juſtice, if they dared. . . . Guy Patin gives us room to think ſo.] "As for Calvin, I am very well "acquainted with the worth of his wit. It is a great "while ſince Monſieur Turenne openly praiſed it to "me: I was then but twenty years of age. Joſeph "Scaliger ſaid, that Calvin was the greateſt wit that "appeared in the world ſince the Apoſtles (100). . . . "No man was ever ſo well verſed in Eccleſiaſtical "Hiſtory, as Calvin. At the age of 32 he was the "moſt learned man in Europe. I happened to be "once at a feaſt of one of our candidates for the "Doctorſhip, where one of our old Doctors, named "Baſin, ſaid, that Calvin had entirely falſified the "Holy Scriptures; but I took the good old man to "taſk, and made him appear ſo ridiculous, that "Monſieur Guenant the younger, who ſat next to "me, told me that I preſſed too hard upon him, "and that I ought to pity his age and weakneſs. "John de Monluc, Biſhop of Valence, uſed to ſay, "that Calvin was the greateſt Divine in the world; "do not think, that they would ſay the ſame at "Rome (101)."

(100) I don't believe that Scaliger made uſe of an expreſſion ſo improper, and which ſuppoſes, that the Apoſtles were great wits, which is abſolutely falſe.

(101) Patin, Letter 24. of the firſt edition, and 39. of the 2d.

[Y] Patin was the occaſion, that the life of Calvin, written by Papirius Maſſo has been publiſhed.] Patin acquaints us with this particular in the letter we have juſt now quoted. As for Papyrius Maſſo, ſays he, he wrote his (Calvin's) life by it ſelf, and the Author's brother, who was a Canon, gave it me in 1619; but as ſince that time, they printed here a Collection of Papyrius Maſſo's Elogies, I obtained, tho' with great difficulty, that this life ſhould be added to them. The Bookſeller had aſked advice from the Jeſuits, who forbad him to print that life, yet he believed me, when I told him, that this addition would make his book ſell the better. The text of this remark evidently ſhews, that I have not depended too much upon Varillas. I have examined with the utmoſt attention all that he ſays of the life of Calvin printed with Papyrius Maſſo's Elogies, and I have not found that it could in the leaſt ballance the teſtimony of Guy Patin. The Reader will judge of my conduct in this reſpect, after having compared the paſſage from Varillas, and my obſervations upon it.

An examination of a paſſage of Mr. Varillas, concerning the Life of John Calvin by Papyrius Maſſo.

"Baleſdans cauſed the Elogies of Papyrius Maſſo "to be printed, and inſerted amongſt them a life "of Calvin, becauſe having found it amongſt the "papers of that Author, he thought it was of his "compoſing. His error is ſo much the leſs pardona"ble, that the manner in which this Life is written, "differs ſo much from that in which Maſſo's other "works are written, that a very ſuperficial knowledge "in the Latin Tongue, is ſufficient to obſerve the dif"ference. But I cannot ſufficiently wonder, that the "famous Sponde Biſhop of Pamiers, ſhould have been "impoſed upon by Baleſdans, who thought that Maſſo "was the real author of this Life, and ſhould have "choſen to ſubmit to the opinions of others, rather "than to follow his own judgment. I heard from "Meſſieurs Dupuy, that this Life was written by the "celebrated James Gillot, Councellor Clerc in the "great Chamber of the Parliament of Paris, who had "ſo great a ſhare in the works of the Wits of his time, "tho' he would not have his name publiſhed in them; "and indeed that Life ſeems to me every way wor"thy ſo great a man; it is a maſter-piece in its kind, "and if there are ſome longer, there are none more "elaborate, nor oftener reviſed. Yet it has not been "of great uſe to me, becauſe it contains rather a "confutation of what Balduin the Civilian, and Weſt"falius the Divine have reproached Calvin with, than "a particular account of his actions (102)." This is Mr. de Varillas's paſſage; here follow my obſervations upon it. I. This Life of Calvin was not found amongſt the papers of Maſſo by Baleſdans: we have heard Patin, who aſſerts that it was himſelf who furniſhed the Bookſeller with this Life, and perſuaded him to add to it Papyrius Maſſo's Elogies. This is not all: Maſſo and his brother had made a preſent of this Life to Guy Patin, and did not doubt but his brother had compoſed it; he even added ſome things to it, which he had learnt by tradition, whilſt he was a Canon at Angouleme. II. The manner in which this Life is written does not differ from Maſſo's other works, but only as an Hiſtorical Life muſt differ from a mere Elogium. If Mr. de Varillas had compared this Life of Calvin with the Lives of Charles IX, Dante, Petrarch, and Boccace, written by Maſſo, I am certain he would have found a great conformity between theſe Lives, and that of Calvin. You meet in all theſe Lives with the ſame order and diſpoſition of the ſubjects, the ſame diviſion of the chapters, the ſame ſtyle, the ſame genius, the ſame manners. This together with the clear and poſitive teſtimony of Guy Patin would be ſufficient to perſuade me, either that Meſſieurs Dupuy were miſtaken, or that Mr. de Varillas did not well remember what he heard them ſay. But I have another very ſtrong argument. The Author of this Life of John Calvin had ſtudied the Law under Baudouin (103). This can perfectly well be applied to Maſſo (104), but not, as I think, to the illuſtrious Mr. Gillot. We read in that Life, that Baudouin ſilenced Calvin, and that it was a very mortifying ſilence for the latter (105); what Papyrius Maſſo obſerves in Baudouin's Elogium (106) agrees perfectly well with this. III. Baleſdans and Sponde are not therefore to blame, for having thought that this Life was compoſed by Maſſo. IV. It does not deſerve the praiſes, which Varillas beſtows upon it with ſo much profuſion. I appeal for this to the judgment of all thoſe, who have any ſkill in this kind of writings. V. It is by no means a Confutation of what Baudouin the Civilian, and Weſtfalius the Divine, have reproached Calvin with. That Civilian is often quoted in it, without being contradicted; for on the contrary, the deſcription he makes of his peeviſh, paſſionate and proud temper is ſupported by the authority of Baudouin (107). So that I cannot imagine after what manner Mr. de Varillas uſed to read a book; he was the only man in the world, who after having read this Life of Calvin, could ſay, that the Author's chief deſign was to confute that Civilian.

(102) Varillas, Preface to the 1ſt vol. of the Hiſtoire de l'Hereſie.

(103) Sic enim Balduinus Præceptor meus in Jure Civili. pag. 418.

(104) See the Elogium of Baudouin, amongſt thoſe of Papyrius Maſſo, pag. 263.

(105) Ipſi ſilentium Balduinus Juriſconſultus impoſuit ſeni, magno dolore Calvini, pag. 421.

(106) Ferunt Calvinum nullius linguam, ſtylum, eruditionem, magis horruiſſe quam hujus Atrebatis. pag. 262.

(107) See the pages 428, 430, 455.

If Mr. de Vigneul-Marville will be at the pains of conſidering this carefully, and eſpecially of comparing according to the rules of Critics, the other pieces of Papyrius Maſſo with this Life of Calvin, I am perſuaded, that he will no longer believe, that we have an Elogium of Calvin, written in Latin by Mr. Gillot, and which has been without reaſon printed at the end of Papyrius Maſſo's Illuſtrious Men (108).

(108) Melanges, d'Hiſtoire & de Literature recueilles par Mr. De Vigneul-Marville, pag. 201.

I have been miſtaken in my conjecture; Mr. de Vigneul-Marville has ſeen this, and yet he perſiſts in his former opinion. He ſays, that what I alledge, viz. that this Elogium was found amongſt the papers of Papyrius Maſſo after his death, as his brother told the late Mr. Patin, does not prove any thing: For every day the writings of one Author paſs from one ſtudy into another, and yet one cannot infer any thing from it. As for the ſtyle, that of Calvin's Life is not at all like that of Papyrius Maſſo, who did not write with ſo much politeneſs, nor with ſuch a delicacy, nor did he paſs his judgment upon the ſubject he treated as Mr. Gillot does. Beſides there is ſomething at the end of the work, which does not ſuit the character of Papyrius Maſſo, tho' it agrees perfectly well with the genius of Mr. Gillot, who did not take the affairs of thoſe times ſo much to heart (109). I have examined all this with all the attention I am capable of, and yet I am ſtill of the ſame opinion, as I was before; and that the reader may ſee it is not without reaſon, I obſerve, I, That a man, who had read Mr. de Vigneul-Marville's words, and not to the Tranſcribers of Bolſec; for one cannot read it, without laughing at thoſe who have been ſo imprudent as to accuſe this Miniſter of having been a lover of wine, good cheer, money, &c. An artful ſlanderer would have owned that Calvin was ſober by his conſtitution, and that he did not care to hoard up riches [Z]. They who deſire to ſee a full and curious vindication of this great man, may read what Monſieur Drelincourt publiſhed upon this ſubject at Geneva in 1667.

(109) Ibid. tom. 2. pag. 36. edit. of Holland.

I ſhall ſay ſomething concerning a fact, which I overlooked in Moreri, when I publiſhed the firſt edition of this work; it related to the judgment which Eraſmus is ſaid to have made of Calvin, after he had conferred with him upon the controverſies of thoſe times. The Hiſtorian who relates this particular, commits ſo many blunders, that they can ſerve only to render his account doubtful [AA]. The many reproaches with which Calvin not my Dictionary, will not certainly think, that the only argument, or at leaſt the chief argument I inſiſted upon was, that this Life of Calvin had been found amongſt Papyrius Maſſo's papers; whereas the truth of the matter is, that I did not make uſe of this argument. I know very well, that I have exploded as a falſhood, what Mr. de Varillas relates, namely, that Baleſdans had found this Elogium amongſt Papyrius Maſſo's papers; and I own that in order to prove the falſhood of this, I have maintained that the manuſcript had been communicated to the Bookſeller by Guy Patin, who had it from Papyrius Maſſo's brother; but none of my arguments are grounded upon the work's having been found amongſt the papers of the writer, whom I think the author of it. To give a true account of my argument, it ſhould have been ſaid, that Papyrius Maſſo's brother gave the manuſcript to Guy Patin, as a work of his brother. Mr. de Vigneul-Marville's reflection does not in the leaſt affect this proof; for one can eaſily think, that men of letters know very well how to diſtinguiſh, amongſt the papers of a brother (110), the pieces he compoſed himſelf, from thoſe which are written in another hand. I omit ſaying, that Papyrius Maſſo had probably told his brother, what manuſcripts of his own compoſing would be found amongſt his papers. As for the ſtyle, I appeal again to thoſe who will be at the pains of comparing this Life of Calvin with any other Life written by Papyrius Maſſo; and this is my ſecond obſervation. The third and laſt is, that Mr. Gillot's character, who did not take the affairs of thoſe times much at heart, is ſo far from being an argument againſt me, that on the contrary it is a proof of my opinion. For here follows, what we find at the end of the work. Hæc de vita Calvini ſcribimus, neque amici neque inimici, quem ſi labem & perniciem Galliæ dixero, nihil mentiar. Atque utinam aut nunquam natus eſſet, aut in pueritia mortuus! Tantum enim malorum intulit in patriam, ut cunabula ejus meritò deteſtari atque odiſſe debeas (111). i. e. This is what I had to ſay of Calvin's Life, being "neither a friend nor an enemy to him, tho' if I "ſhould call him the Plague and Bane of France, I "ſhould but ſpeak the truth. And would to God he "had never been born, or had died in his cradle! For "he has been the occaſion of ſuch great misfortunes to "his Country, that you muſt hate and abhor his birth." This is the ſtyle of a rank Papiſt, and not of a Roman Catholick like Gillot, who hated the Leaguers, and all the Monks, and had a great friendſhip for Scaliger, and for a great many other Proteſtants.

(110) Papyrius Maſſo's brother was a Canon.

(111) Papyrius Maſſo. Elog. pag. 455.

[Z] He did not care to hoard up riches.] That a man, who had acquired ſo great a reputation, and ſuch an authority, ſhould yet have had but an hundred crowns ſalary, and ſhould have refuſed to accept more, and that having lived till the age of about fifty five with the utmoſt frugality and temperance, he ſhould have left to his heirs only three hundred crowns, even including the price of his Library, which was ſold very dear; all this, I ſay, is ſomething ſo heroical, that none but baſe and inſenſible minds can forbear admiring it. Accumulandis ſcilicet opibus ſtuduit, cujus bona omnia, care etiam divendita ipſius Bibliotheca, vix trecentos aureos æquârant, ut non minus ſcitè quam verè calumniam iſtam longe impudentiſſimam refellens, hæc verba uſurpavit (in Præfat. in Comment. in Pſalm.) Me non eſſe pecunioſum, ſi quibuſdam vivus non perſuadeo, mors tamen oſtendit (α). Teſtari certe poteſt Senatus, cum perexigua eſſent ejus ſtipendia, tantum abfuiſſe, ut in iis non acquieſceret, ut ampliora etiam oblata pertinaciter recuſârit (112). This is one of the moſt admirable victories, which virtue and an exalted ſoul can gain over nature, even in thoſe, who perform the functions of Miniſters of the Goſpel. Calvin has found imitators with regard to his activity, his zeal, and his love for his party; they employ their tongues, pens, ſteps, ſollicitations, for the eſtabliſhing of God's Kingdom, but they don't forget themſelves, and they are, generally ſpeaking, a proof, that the Church is a tender mother, in whoſe ſervice there nothing is loſt; they verify St. Paul's aſſertion, that Godlineſs has promiſe of the Life that is now, and of that which is to come. In a word, God pours his bleſſings ſo abundantly upon the diligence, with which they take care of their domeſtic affairs, that we ſee them enjoy conſiderable penſions, and leave a large eſtate to their heirs. They diſtribute alms, and are very charitable; but that is not very difficult for them, ſince the ſums which other people deſign for charitable uſes are depoſited into their hands, without their being accountable for them. In a word a Teſtament like that of Calvin, a diſintereſtedneſs like his, is a very uncommon thing, and proper to make them, who caſt an eye upon the Philoſophers of ancient Greece, cry out; Non inveni tantam fidem in Iſrael. "I have not found ſo great a "faith, no not in Iſrael." When Calvin took his leave of thoſe of Straſburgh in order to go to Geneva, they would continue him his freedom as a Citizen, and the income of a Prebend, which had been aſſigned to him. He accepted the firſt of theſe offers as an honour, but refuſed the income. Ii tandem Argentinenſes conceſſerant, ea tamen conditione, ut jus civitatis honorarium, quod in Calvinum contulerant, ſalvum eſſet, & præbendæ, quam vocant, annuos reditus retineret: quorum illud probavit Calvinus, iſtud verò ut acciperet nunquam ab eo extorqueri potuit, ut qui nihil minus quam opes curaret (113). He had brought one of his brothers with him to Geneva, but he had no thoughts of raiſing him to any honourable poſt, as others would have done, had they had the ſame intereſt as he had. He took indeed care of the honour of his brother's family, for he laboured to diſingage him from a wife who was guilty of adultery (114), and obtained him the permiſſion of marrying another wife: but his own enemies relate, that he made him learn the trade of a Bookbinder, which he followed all his life-time (115). Take notice of the marginal quotation (116).

(113) Ibid. pag. 370, ad ann. 1541.

(114) Idem, ib id. pag. 387. See the remark [CC].

(115) Varillas, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, liv. 10. pag. 337.

(116) I have ſaid nothing of a great many groſs errors concerning Calvin, which Mr. Drelincourt has confuted.

[AA] I ſhall ſay ſomething concerning . . the judgment, which Eraſmus is ſaid to have made of Calvin. . . . The Hiſtorian, who relates it . . . commits ſo many blunders, that they can ſerve only to render his account doubtful.] "Calvin ſtopt ſometime at Baſil, and Bucer "having preſented him to Eraſmus, this great man, "who could diſtinguiſh the characters of thoſe he con"verſed with, having talked of Religion with Calvin, "ſaid with a loud voice; The Church has brought up "in the perſon of this young man a plague, which "will prove fatal to her." Theſe are Moreri's words; I do not believe he conſulted the firſt Author of this report, I mean Florimond de Remond; in all likelihood he did not go higher up than the Annals of Mr. De Sponde (117). However that be, let us quote the original and primitive Author of this particular (118). The Regiſter of the Parliament of Paris, being very much concerned for his brother's fault, follows him far into the country, and brings him back into France, leaving Calvin in Germany, who entered into the ſervice of Rouſſel, whom I have mentioned before. There he ſaw thoſe, who worked upon the people's conſcience, and amongſt them Bucer, who preſented him to Eraſmus, who was obſerving how things would go at laſt, without ſuffering himſelf to be led away by the multitude. As Bucer had given him a very great character of Calvin's

(117) Spondani ad ann. 1534, num. 11. pag. 424.

(118) Florim. de Remond, Hiſt. de la Naiſſance de l'Hereſie, liv. 7. chap. 10. pag. m. 889, 890.

(α) That is, "If whilſt I "am ſtill alive "I cannot con"vince ſome, "that I am not "rich, yet my "death will "ſhew it." The ſenſe of the reſt of this paſſage is given before.

(112) Beza, in vita Calvini, pag. 387, ſub fin.

Calvin has been loaded on account of his changing his name, will give us an opportunity of making a remark, in which we ſhall clear up ſeveral circumſtances of his life, and which will be a ſupplement to ſome of the foregoing obſervations, and eſpecially to the vin's parts, Eraſmus conferred for ſome time with him upon the moſt difficult points of Religion, and being aſtoniſhed at what he had obſerved in that ſoul, be ſaid to Bucer, pointing to Calvin, Video magnam peſtem oriri in Eccleſia adverſus Eccleſiam, I ſee a great plague riſe in the Church againſt the Church. Take particular notice of Florimond de Remond's marginal note, for he ſays, Beza in his Preface upon Joſhua places this voyage in the year 1534. Obſerve this well, I ſay, as a proof that he admits this Chronological circumſtance. We ſhall ſoon ſee that it is to his coſt; for thirty pages after this, he relates, that Calvin fearing to be ſurprized at Poitiers, went to Nerac to ſee Rouſſel and Le Fevre; and that he obſerves again, that Calvin had been Rouſſel's ſervant in the journey to Germany (119). Calvin, continues he (120), having taken his leave of them, returned to Paris, whence for fear of the fire, he retired with a torch in his hand, and an exaſperated ſoul, being reſolved to ſet his own country on a blaze, which he never ſaw afterwards; ungrateful country, to refuſe him a reſting place, as he ſaid. He went to Straſburgh, where for two years he was Bucer's ſcholar, who received him as a man, whom he immediately judged proper to raiſe a commotion in the Church. . . . Calvin communicated his Inſtitution to him; it was there and at Baſil, that he put the laſt hand to it; he dedicated it to Francis I. . . . The firſt print he prefixed to his Inſtitution was an Emblem, the body of which was a Flaming Sword, and the motto, theſe words, non veni mittere pacem ſed gladium. . . . . Whilſt he was at Straſburgh he aſſiſted and confuted the French, who fled from the fires kindled in their country; and from that time he began to gain ſome reputation and authority. . . . . Having been told, that the Ducheſs of Ferrara began to know the truth, he went to ſee her, and after he had rambled enough, he went to Geneva, where he had already made himſelf known, when he paſſed there with Du Tillet; and at the Inſtigation of Farel (121), he took upon him the function of teaching Divinity, and of making ſome exhortations to the Refugees. Let us obſerve, that Florimond de Remond ſays in the margin, that the firſt Edition of Calvin's Inſtitution, was made in 1534. We have here the origin of Mr. De Varillas's ſhameful anachroniſms, which we have already obſerved (122).

They are ſtill more glaring in Florimond de Remond's account; of which I hope to convince the moſt unreaſonable perſons: and firſt I obſerve, that Rouſſel's journey into Germany was a conſequence or an effect of the firſt diſperſion of thoſe, who preached up a Reformation. It is an event, which happened in 1523 (123); Farel, one of them, went into Switzerland; Faber Stapulenſis into Guienne . . . . and as for Rouſſel he went into Germany, out of a deſire to ſee Luther, that great man, of whom all the world talked ſo much (124). I borrow all this from Florimond de Remond, who adds, that Rouſſel returning from his travels (125) was very kindly received in Bearn by the Queen of Navarre, followed her to Paris, preached there (126), was put in priſon, and after his releaſe went to Nerac, and paſſed the reſt of his life in France. Calvin ſaw him at Nerac, as this Author told us above (127). It follows from all this, that if Calvin had been Rouſſel's ſervant in the journey to Germany, it muſt have been in the year 1523. But it is certain that he was then upon his ſtudies at Paris, and that he continued there for ſome years, having a Chapel at Noyon (128). It muſt be well remembered, that the Author admits Beza's Chronology, namely, that Calvin and du Tillet went out of France in 1534. Since then he aſſerts, that du Tillet, being prevailed upon by his brother, who had followed him very far into the country, left his Calvin in Germany who put himſelf in Rouſſels ſervice (129), he muſt pretend that Calvin was Rouſſel's ſervant in Germany, in the year 1530; an egregious blunder, ſince he himſelf places this journey of Rouſſel under the year 1523. Obſerve alſo, I. that he relates, that Calvin's Inſtitution was printed for the firſt time in 1534 (130), and that the Author had drawn the plan of it at Angouléme (131); and has communicated it to Le Ferre at Nerac. II. That after this communication he makes him go to Paris, and then to Straſburg, to be there a diſciple of Bucer. How is it poſſible, at this rate, that in 1534 Calvin ſhould have accompanied Rouſſel as his ſervant in a journey to Germany? But more, how could it be poſſible that Calvin being gone into Germany that year, and having continued at Straſburg two full years hearing Bucer's lectures, he ſhould have finiſhed at Baſil his Chriſtian Inſtitution, printed in 1534? How is it poſſible again, that after he had been for two years Bucer's diſciple at Straſburgh, he ſhould have took a journey into Italy, he ſhould ramble enough, and taking Geneva in his way, he ſhould have ſtopt in that city, in the year 1536 (132)? This is not all; for this ſame Hiſtorian, ſtill admitting Beza's Chronology, aſſerts, that Calvin, being twenty three years old, dogmatized at Paris, but did not continue long in that city, becauſe it was too hot there for thoſe who held erroneous opinions; . . . he went therefore away by ſtealth, . . . and retired to Angouléme, where he thought he ſhould be more ſafe, and was there maintained during three years at the expence of Lewis du Tillet (133) . . . , who having his head full of the opinions, with which Calvin had inſpired him (134), went into Germany with him, and left him by the way. The other continued his journey, went to meet Bucer, had a conference with Eraſmus, and being returned into France, he choſe Poitiers for the place of his reſidence (135), made ſeveral diſciples there, held there his firſt Council (136), celebrated there the Lord's Supper for the firſt time after his own way, and there alſo he took meaſures for ſpreading his opinions over the whole Kingdom. But fearing leſt he ſhould be ſeiz'd at Poitiers, where his deſigns had been diſcovered, . . . he left the place privately, and went to Nerac to ſee Rouſſel and le Ferre (137). . . . and having took his leave of them, he returned to Paris, whence for fear of the fire . . . . he retired to Straſburgh, . . . and it was there and at Baſil, that he put the laſt hand to his Inſtitution printed in 1534 (138). This account is ſo full of blunders, that it is not ſurprizing, that an infinite number of Roman Catholick Authors have tranſcribed it; yet it is very ſtrange, that none of the Proteſtant Authors, as far as I know, ſhould have undertaken to confute it. It was a very eaſy taſk; obſerve only this chronological Touch-ſtone: Calvin was born July the 10th, 1509 (139), and made his eſcape from Paris to Angouléme at the age of twenty three (140). Florimond de Remond admits theſe two facts: He muſt therefore place Calvin's eſcape from Paris under the year 1532. Now he ſuppoſes, that the firſt edition of Calvin's Inſtitution was publiſhed in the year 1534: he finds then between theſe two years (1532 and 1534), a ſtay of three years at Angouléme, a journey into Germany, a return into France, a ſtay at Poitiers, long enough to lay the foundations of a clandeſtine Church, to celebrate the Lord's Supper, to hold a Synod, &c. a voyage to Nerac, another to Paris, and a ſtay of two full years at Straſburgh. Can there be any thing more monſtrous? Let us not forget to obſerve, that he ſuppoſes, that Charles le Sage, a teaching Doctor at Poitiers, and a native of Noyon, was one of Calvin's diſciples, whom he converted after his journey into Germany, which happened three or four years after his eſcape from Paris, in the year 1532. Since then he pretends that this le Sage was a man for whom the Queen Regent, the King's Mother, had a very great value, and by whom ſhe was like to be ſeduced (141), he would have us believe, that this Doctor, who was himſelf perverted in the year 1536, endeavoured afterwards to ſeduce the Queen Regent, who yet died in 1531.

This is the Writer, who aſſerts, that Eraſmus paſſed that judgment upon Calvin, which we have mentioned in the text of this remark. Let my readers judge, whether the authority of ſuch a man be of any weight, of a man, I ſay, who contradicts himſelf ſo egregiouſly, who forgets in one place, what he has ſaid in another, who does not obſerve in his own writings the moſt palpable abſurdities and impoſſibilities, which

(119) Ibid. chap. 17. pag. 921.
(120) Ibid. pag. 922.
(121) Ibid. pag. 924.
(122) In the remark [G].
(123) Florem. de Remond. Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, liv. 10. chap. 3. pag. 846.
(124) Ibid. pag. 847.
(125) Ibid. pag. 849.
(126) Ibid. pag. 850.
(127) See quotation (119).
(128) See Mr. Drelincourt, Defenſe de Calvin, pag. 160, &c.
(129) Flor. de Rem. lib. 7. cap. 10. pag. 889.
(130) Ibid. pag. 922.
(131) Ibid. pag. 921.
(132) Flor. de Remond, liv. 7. chap. 10. pag. 923.
(133) Ibid. pag. 883.
(134) Ibid. pag. 889.
(135) Ibid. pag. 890.
(136) Ibid. pag. 892.
(137) Ibid. pag. 920.
(138) Ibid. pag. 922.
(139) Ibid. chap. 8. pag. 880.
(140) Ibid. chap. 9. pag. 883.
(141) Ibid. chap. 11. pag. 891.

the paſſage where I mention his famous work of the Chriſtian Inſtitution [BB]. Men have collected, with ſo much eagerneſs, all the ſlanders publiſhed againſt this Reformer, that which ſtare in every reader's face. Such an Hiſtorian muſt be dealt with like inſolvent Merchants, who have loſt all their credit; no money is lent to them but upon good pledges, or unqueſtionable ſecurities. We ſhould therefore be very weak, if we were to believe Florimond de Remond, as long as he does not quote his vouchers, nor alledge his proofs of any kind whatſoever. It would be very imprudent to truſt him, and we ſhould well deſerve to be impoſed upon, if we were to make ſo ill an uſe of our well-meaning honeſty. I thought therefore that a criticiſm on this Author's lies was a proper preliminary, and that after this my readers would be much better qualified to form a true judgment of the fact in queſtion. And we may be perſuaded, that this man is the only witneſs that can be produced in this affair; for the Author, who took ſo much pains to prove that Eraſmus was a very good Roman Catholic, and who could have reaped a great benefit to his cauſe from this fact, yet was not able to quote any other authority for it, than that of Florimond de Remond (142). After all this judgment of Eraſmus cannot but be very much to the honour of Calvin in the opinion of the Proteſtants, ſince it would be an argument, that he diſcovered very eminent qualities in the young man.

(142) See the book printed at Cologne, with the title of Sentimens d'Eraſme de Rotterdam conformes à ceux de l'Egliſe Catholique, in 1638, pag. 308, 309.

I would not have given my ſelf ſo much trouble to lay before the reader Florimond de Remond's blunders, had I not obſerved, that they are tranſcribed from one book into another, and that the moſt celebrated Authors render them in a manner immortal by admitting them. I have found them in Father Alexander's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, in the laſt volume of the folio edition, which is an edition corrected and enlarged. I am perſuaded, that this famous Writer would not have tranſcribed Mr. Sponde, the tranſcriber of Florimond de Remond, had he known that this laſt Writer had undergone a critick, like that, which has been read above. If the Proteſtants complain, that Father Alexander revived that confuſed heap of blunders, and put them in a condition of being better received in the world, than they were under the protection of their firſt Father, he may complain in his turn, that the Proteſtants had neglected to expoſe theſe impertinencies. It is ſometimes very difficult to deprive errors of immortality, even by confuting them in the moſt ſolid manner; how much more, if they are paſſed over unobſerved?

[BB] The reproaches, with which Calvin has been loaded on account of his changing his name, will furniſh us with an opportunity of making a remark . . which will be a ſupplement to the paſſage, where I mention his Chriſtian Inſtitution.] Some people have thought it very ill, that inſtead of calling him Cauvin, which was the name of his family, he took that of Calvin. Monſieur Drelincourt has very well juſtified him in this reſpect, not only by quoting ſeveral inſtances of the ſame nature (143), but alſo by a very ſtrong reaſon. After all (ſays he (144), the changing of one letter in the name of Calvin is not conſiderable, and may even be ſaid to be none at all. For being to tranſlate into Latin the name of Cauvin, in order to give it an air and a termination ſuitable to the genius of that language, he could not be tranſlated otherwiſe than by Calvinus. For as inſtead of Cauve, in the dialect of Picardy, and Chauve † in French, all good writers ſay Calvus in Latin; ſo inſtead of Cauvin in the dialect of Picardy, and Chauvin in French, we cannot ſay otherwiſe in Latin but Calvinus. Now the firſt works of this man of God having been written in Latin, and he being known every where by the name of Calvinus, if when he wrote in French he had taken another name than that of Calvin, it had been thought that a work publiſhed under ſuch another name had been written by another Author, which would have been a great prejudice both to the Public, and to the Printers. Here follows an account of much more conſiderable changes of names. "The moſt notorious "impoſtor amongſt all the hereſiarchs with regard to "diſguiſing one's ſelf, was John Calvin, who in the "beginning of his revolt being animated with a reſtleſs ſpirit, and fearing his own ſhadow, changed "his name oftener than his lodgings. For, 1. In the "year 1539, having half lick'd that little bear of "his, I mean his firſt Inſtitutions, he preſented them "to King Francis I under the name of JOANNES "ALCVINUS, which was the anagram of his name, "and they were printed with that name at Straſburgh, "per Vindelinum Ribelium menſe Auguſto, Anno 1539. "2. In the year 1543 he called himſelf JOANNES "CALIDOENIUS, a name partly Greek, and partly "Latin, as it were Joannes de Calido Vino; and thus "he ſigned his name at the end of the works of "Pacianus, in the Epiſtle he wrote to his friend Boygard; Boygardo JOANNES CALIDOENIUS. This "name is thought to anſwer exactly to that of his family, for Calidæmius may be tranſlated into French "by Chauvin *, this is really believed to have been "the name of his father. 3. In the year 1548, he "took the name of JOANNES CARVINUS, as if it "were Chervin ††, and thus he ſtiled himſelf at the "end of Orus Apollo's Ænigma'ſ, or Riddles, printed at Paris for Chriſtian Wechel in 1548, per Jo"annem Mercerum, who was the firſt Tranſlator of "them; for at the end of this Tranſlation there is an "Epigram intitled, JOANNIS CARVINI ad Mer"cerum Epigramma. 4. Since the year 1550 he "would be called by his friends CHARLES DE HAP"PEVILLE , which was a fatal omen, ſays Mat"thew Launoy in his reply, that Calvin and his fol"lowers would one day ſnap and take towns by treaſon and ſurprize, and hide themſelves within our "walls, as an experience of fifty years has ſhewed "us, at the expence of ſo much noble blood, which "has been ſpilt to force theſe traitors to ſurrender the "towns, which they have held till this time. 5. Laſtly, that he might not be wavering in a contiinual fantaſticalneſs, he took the name of JOHN "CALVIN; and that name he keeps ſtill (145)."

* Chaud in French ſignifies calidus, warm, as vin ſignifies οἶνος, vinum wine.

†† Carum vinum, dear wine.

 As much as to ſay Snaptown.

(145) Garaſſe, Doctrine Curieuſe, pag. 1023, 1024.

Theſe words of Garaſſe are very proper to puzzle all the critics, who have not the opportunity of conſulting large Libraries; and this being my caſe, I own, that I don't find myſelf capable of confuting this paſſage as it ought to be done. I don't doubt but it is full of errors, but wanting the neceſſary books, which might furniſh me with literal and demonſtrative arguments againſt that Author, I can object to him nothing but probable conjectures. The firſt article will be examined below; I can ſay nothing againſt the ſecond; but I dare venture to affirm that he is miſtaken in the third; for what likelihood is there, that in the year 1548 Calvin would have ſpent his time in writing an Epigram upon a Book like that of Orus Apollo? It is infinitely more probable that Joannes Carvinus is the true name of him who wrote that Epigram. Florimond de Remond aſſerts, that one of the Apoſtles of Calviniſm was one John Carvin, who came from the Province of Artois, was a School-maſter at Ville-neuve in the County of Agenois ††, and acted the part of a Miniſter under the gown of a School-maſter (146); he is probably the ſame Joannes Carvinus, a Phyſician of Montauban, who publiſhed ſeven Dialogues de Sanguine (concerning the Blood) at Lyons, printed for Sebaſtian Gryphius, in 1562 (147). We may ſafely contradict Garaſſe upon his fourth article; for how ridiculous would it not be to ſuppoſe, that after the year 1550 Calvin would have made himſelf known by the name of Charles de Happeville? What occaſion had he to diſguiſe himſelf at that time? He lived with the utmoſt ſecurity at Geneva, he was known every where under his true name, he prefixed it to his books, and had made it venerable amongſt the whole Proteſtant Party. Garaſſe miſtakes the times with the utmoſt ignorance; he ſhould have choſen another period of time, as Papyrius Maſſo has done, who aſſerts, that Calvin took the name of Hepeville, when he went into Italy to pay a viſit to the Ducheſs of Ferrara (148). The fifth of Garaſſe's articles is the moſt abſurd of all. A man muſt be prodigiouſly ſtupid, who dares to publiſh, that the laſt name, which this Miniſter took, was that of John Calvin, after he had bore that of Charles Happeville ſince the year 1546. Monſ. de Sponde charges him with having taken the name of Carolus Hepevillus only on his journey to Italy (149); obſerve that he alſo charges him with having called himſelf

†† A County of the Province of Guienne in France.

(146) Flor. de Remond, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, chap. 11. pag. 894.

(147) Merklin. in Lindenio renovato, pag. 549.

(148) Dimiſſoque Calvini verbo, Hepevillum ſe appellabat. Papyr. Maſſo, Elog. tom. 2. pag. 416.

(149) Spondan. ad ann. 1535, num. 7. pag. 430.

(143) Drelin. Defenſe de Calvin, pag. 202, &c.

(144) Ibid. pag. 204, 205.

† Bald.

that they have even upbraided him with the wretched life of his brother's wife [GG]. They himself Deparcan in 1534 at Angouléme (150). Papyrius Maſſo's brother ſays the ſame thing (151).

We have ſeen already (152) that Moreri pretends, that Calvin prefixed the name of Alcuin to his Books of the Inſtitutions, printed at Baſil in 1534 (153). I cannot tell whether he be miſtaken or not. I could find no where a copy of the firſt edition of this work of Calvin, but what prevents me from determining any thing is, that according to Mr. de Sponde, it was only in the Straſburg edition, printed in 1539, that the Anagram of Alcuinus was made uſe of. Ipſe ex paterno cognomine, in Latinam formam mutato, ex Calvino aliquando tranſpoſitis literis, Alcuinum ſeſe nominavit, uti in inſtitutionis ſuæ editione Argentorati 1539; nomen emulatus Magni illius Alcuini, qui Caroli Magni Præceptor fuit, ei Pariſienſem Academiam inſtituit. Qui potius alia tranſpoſitione Lucianum ſe dicere debuiſſet (154). Theſe Latin words are only a looſe tranſlation of the following paſſage of Florimond de Remond. "His name was John Chauvin; . . . but "as Luther altered his name, he alſo thought it pro- "per to take the name of Calvin. And as tho' that "name had not yet been honourable enough for him, "and rather, as it was unfortunate, ſince the anagram "of Calvin is Lucian, he took the name of Alcuin, "the learned Preceptor of Charlemagne; and his firſt "Inſtitution, printed at Straſburgh in 1539, had that "name prefixed to it (155)." Garaſſe, as we have ſeen above, has ſpoke more accurately of this fact, for he mentions even the name of the Printer. I dare not deny this; for I could not procure a copy of the edition of that of Straſburgh in 1539, no more than of that of Baſil in 1535. But I venture to ſay, that if this work was ever publiſhed under the name of Alcuin, it is much more probable that it was the firſt edition of it, rather than in that of Straſburgh in 1539; ſince in 1539 Calvin, being a Miniſter and a Profeſſor at Straſburgh, had not the ſame reaſons to diſguiſe himſelf, which might have induced him to take the name of Alcuin in 1535. Obſerve, that he is accuſed of having forged a book for Alcuin Charlemagne's Preceptor, that is, of having compoſed it himſelf, and publiſhed it under the name of this Alcuin. The Inquiſition of Rome, and that of Spain, condemned this book as being the work of Calvin, falſely aſcribed to Alcuin. It was a book upon the Trinity. Alcuinus ſeu potius Calvinus. Ejus Commentarii in Libros de Trinitate omnino prohibentur (156). They mention neither the year in which it was publiſhed, nor the place where it was printed. Theophilus Raynaud ſpeaks (157) of this in ſuch general terms, that one may very well believe this ſtep of the Inquiſition has no foundation at all.

The Inſtitution of Calvin has not only been cenſured as a pſeudonymous work, that is, a work publiſhed under a falſe name, but they have alſo found fault with the figure, which he is ſuppoſed to have prefixed to it, and it has moreover been ſaid, that the whole work was nothing but a piece of plagiariſm. The figure, they ſay, was a ſword, ſurrounded with flames, and with theſe words, Non veni mittere pacem ſed gladium (158). Several Authors have aſſerted, that this was the Motto; but Monſieur Drelincourt maintains, that it is falſe, and that the proof they bring for it, is ridiculous. It is, continues he (159), as tho' they would object to me the emblematical figures, which have been prefixed without my knowledge, to ſome of my books, and perſuade me that it is my device or emblem. We are not accountable for the liberties, which the Printers take on ſuch occaſions, who think that all is permitted to them as well as to Poets and Painters. When I conſider this Motto with more attention, I find that it is neither Calvin's, nor his Printer's, but that of Jeſus Chriſt himſelf, who ſays expreſly, that he did not come to ſend peace on earth but the ſword, war, and fire. So that all the ſtrokes and invectives of the Jeſuit (160) are levelled at Jeſus Chriſt our Saviour himſelf, and furniſh the Atheiſts with arms againſt his holy doctrine (161). As for the plagiariſm, with which this great Author is charged, read only the following words of Mr. de Sponde. Secedens Angoliſmam ibi triennium . . . commoratus, peſtilentem ſuam Inſtitutionem fabricare cœpit ex locis communibus Melanchthonis, Heperii Sarcerii (162) & id genus quiſquiliis magna parte conſarcinatum: quamquam Weſtphalus Lutheranus ſcribens poſtea adverſus eum, meram Oecolampadii doctrinam, ſed immutatum paululum atque amplificatam in ea contineri ait (163). This Annaliſt has only tranſlated the following paſſage of another Writer: It was at Angouléme, that Calvin, in order to impoſe upon the Chriſtian World, firſt drew up his Inſtitution, which may be called the Alcoran, or rather the Talmud of Hereſy, being a collection of almoſt all the errors of former times, and thoſe which, I think, will be for the future, which he gathered partly from Melanchthon's common places, from Heperius, and from Sarcier (Sarcerius). Weſtphalus the Lutheran ſays, that it is only the doctrine of Oecolampadius a little diſguiſed and enlarged (164). It is certain, that the ſecond edition of this work of Calvin was finiſhed, when Heperius lived ſtill in obſcurity, and before he made himſelf known by theological works. I do not ſay quite the ſame with regard to Eraſmus Sarcier, I know that he had publiſhed ſome books before the year 1539: but all thoſe, who are capable of judging, if they compare Calvin's Inſtitution with Sarcier's work, will ſoon find, that the former had not the leaſt occaſion to tranſcribe the latter, and that he would have ſeemed to become a plagiary at ſuch a rate. There is ſuch a maſterly hand in his work, and ſuch an eminent genius, that the charge of plagiariſm cannot but appear ridiculous to all good judges. Length of time has not abated the eſteem in which the Inſtitution was at firſt: ſeveral of thoſe, who cannot read it in the learned language, are ſorry to find the old French Tranſlation obſolete. 'Tis in their favour that a Refugee Miniſter has undertaken a new Tranſlation of it. He has already turned the firſt and ſecond Books into modern French (165), and he continues that work. But with their leave, they ſhew themſelves either too nice, or too ignorant. The French ſtile of Calvin, which was very good in his time, is not yet unintelligible. I know men of a very good taſte, who read with a great deal of pleaſure the tranſlation he made himſelf of his work; the beſt edition of which is, I think, that of Geneva in 1560 folio, printed for Conrad Badius, or rather that, which was publiſhed in the ſame city two years after (166). Let us confirm by a paſſage of Paſquier, one of the things we juſt now mentioned. Calvin was a man who wrote very well, both in Latin and French, and to whom our French language is very much indebted for an infinite number of fine ſtrokes, with which he has enriched it (167).

[CC] They have upbraided him with the wicked life of his brother's wife.] Let us quote the words of the writer of his life. Exprobrant ei alii, quod illius frater Antonius Calvinus priorem uxorem ſuam ob adulterium, cognita cauſa repudiarit. Quid ergo dicerent illi, ſi adulteram foviſſet? Quod ſi in eum redundat hoc impudicæ mulieris dedecus, quid fiet Jacobi, Davidis, ipſius denique Filii Dei familiæ, in qua ipſemet Diabolum ex ſuis unum diſerte notavit (168). i. e. "Others reproach him, that his brother Anthony "Calvin was divorced from his wife who had been con- "victed of adultery. What would they then have "ſaid, if he had countenanced this adultereſs? But "if that lewd woman's ſhame muſt reflect upon him, "what will become of the families of Jacob, David, "and even of the Son of God himſelf, who expreſly "called one of his a devil." You ſee in this paſſage that Calvin's ſiſter-in-law was divorced from her huſband for the crime of adultery. But Florimond de Remond ſpeaks only of a niece of Calvin, who was puniſhed for that crime (169). "He alſo married his "brother Anthony Calvin to the daughter of one, "who had been a bankrupt at Antwerp, whoſe name "was Nicholas de Fer, and who had made his eſ- "cape to Geneva, where the Holy Ghoſt opened "the gates to all. He turned Bookſeller, in or- "der to ſell the books written by his brother. But "this Anthony was unhappy in his marriage, for his "daughter having been guilty of Adultery, ſhe was "whipped at Geneva by the common hang-man, "which made Calvin almoſt die for grief. Beza does "clearly hint this in his Preface upon Joſhua, "where he ſays that Calvin's houſe was free from for- "nication. It is true, ſays he, that God exerciſed "him (he means, tried his patience) that way in the "perſon of thoſe who were nearly related to him: but "ſomething

(150) Idem, ad ann. 1534, num. 1. pag. 424.
(151) In Addit. ad cap. 4. Vitæ Calvini, pag. 456. Elog. Pap. Maſſo, tom. 2.
(152) In the remark [U] numb. 5.
(153) He ſhould have ſaid 1535.
(154) Spondan. ad ann. 1544, num. 9. pag. 423.
(155) Flor. de Remond, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, liv. 7. chap. 8. pag. 880.
(156) Index Libr. prohibit. & expurgand. juxta exemplar Madriti, pag. m. 36. See alſo pag. 3. of the 2d volume containing the Index publiſhed at Rome by order of Pope Alexander VII.
(157) Theophil. Raynaud, de malis ac bonis Libris, num. 267. pag. m. 163.
(158) See the remark [F] quotation (36) and the remark [AA] quotation (120).
(159) Drelincourt, Triomphe de l'Egliſe, Part 2. pag. 428.
(160) That is to ſay father Cauſſin.
(161) Drelincourt, Triomphe de l'Egliſe, Part 2. pag. 428.
(162) In my edition of Spondanus there is no comma between Harperii and Sarcerii, which is a great error.
(163) Spondan. ad ann. 1534, num. 2. pag. 424.
(164) Flor. de Remond, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, pag. 883.
(165) The firſt book was printed at Brémen in 1696, 4to; and the 2d with a large dedication to the Elector of Brandenburgh, was printed in the ſame City the following year.
(166) The marginal quotations have been corrected in that edition by Auguſtin Marlorat, who has added two Indexes to it.
(167) Paſquier, Recherches de la France, liv. 8. chap. 55. pag. m. 768.
(168) Beza, in vita Calvini, ſub fin. pag. 387.
(169) Flor. de Remond, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, liv. 7. chap. 17. pag. 926.

They have triumphed in the return of one of his nephews to the Catholic Church [DD]. The report which was ſpread at Augſburgh, when the Diet of the Empire was held, about the year 1559, that Calvin was turned again a Roman Catholick (l), that report, I ſay, was credited, more than it ſhould have been, even by ſome Proteſtant Princes. He complained of it, as of an ingratitude, which his conſtancy ſo often put to the ſevereſt trials did not deſerve (m). Thuanus obſerves that Calvin ſhewed ſomewhere in his works, that he was extremely diſpleaſed at the title of Head of the Church given to the King of England (n). Mr. Ancillon has quoted that paſſage of Calvin, and does not cenſure thoſe who thought it had been the occaſion of a libel which was publiſhed againſt that Miniſter [EE].

(l) See the Preface to his Chriſtian Inſtitut. ed. 1559.

(m) Hæc eſt ſcilicet eorum gratitudo, quoi certè non latent plurima conſtantiæ meæ experimenta. Ibid.

(n) Thuan. lib. 1. pag. 92. edit. Pariſ. 1604, 8vo.

I ſhall begin my ſupplements with obſerving, that Beza wrote the Life of Calvin in Latin and in French. That which is in French was prefixed by way of preface to Calvin's Commentary upon Joſhua, and was alſo printed by itſelf. The firſt edition is not ſo large nor ſo exact as the following editions. I have compared it with that publiſhed in 1565 (o), and have found in the latter ſeveral new facts, and ſome other ſet in a clearer light, and the circumſtances of time are much better obſerved in it. I ſhall give ſome inſtances of all this [FF]. This edition has almoſt all theſe advantages above the Latin Life, (o) At Geneva, by Francis Perrin, with the Commentary upon Joſhua, in folio.

" ſomething worſe happened to Jacob, and to David. " The ſame misfortune befel the niece of Beza, her " name was Deniſe, and ſhe was the wife of Corne- " lius (170) Reader of the Hebrew Tongue at Ge- " neva. It is true, that whether Beza had a greater " intereſt in the city, or that the laws were grown " more remiſs, ſhe was not whipped through the city " as the other was."

(170) Cornelius Bertram, whoſe article I have given. I have ſaid above that he was married with the niece of Beza's firſt wife. I have read no where but in Florimond de Remond, that ſhe led a bad life.

[DD] They have triumphed in the return of one of his nephews to the Catholick Church.] Gaſpar de la Favergne going from Chambery to Geneva, in order to pay a viſit to one of his uncles, who was turned Proteſtant, embraced there the Proteſtant Religion, and married Rochel de St. André Anthony Calvin's niece. From this marriage came Stephen de la Favergne, who after the death of his parents was brought up in the family of the Calvins, and ſent to Heidelberg by Anthony Calvin his Guardian . . . Having finiſhed his ſtudies, he returned to Geneva, where at the age of thirty, he was admitted into the Council . . . of the two hundred. Having been to pay a viſit to one of his relations in Savoy, he went there to hear Francis de Sales preach, and had even ſome converſations with him concerning ſeveral Doctrines of Religion. He had alſo ſome diſputes with two Franciſcan Fryars. In 1600 he took a journey to Rome to ſee the ceremonies of the Jubilee. He was robbed on the road by his fellow traveller, and laboured under a continual fever. As ſoon as he arrived at Rome he ſent for a Phyſician, who came to him, but would not return a ſecond time, till, (according to the cuſtom of Rome) he had a certificate in writing, that he had confeſt to a Prieſt. The Patient ſent to the Convent of the Franciſcans to know, whether there was any Monk from Savoy, who could come and viſit a Gentleman of that Country. Father Cherubin, whom he had ſeen in Savoy, came to him, and recommended him to Father Peter of the Mother of God † Commiſſionary General of the barefooted Carmelites of the Congregation of Italy. This Monk viſited him, and cauſed ſome conſiderable alms to be given him from the Pope. This act of Charity touched the Patient's heart. He propoſed his doubts to the Franciſcans, and to the Carmelite, and reſolved to turn Roman Catholic. The Pope promiſed him a penſion of 800 Crowns, and put him under the care of Cardinal Baronius to be inſtructed. The Carmelite gave him the life of St. Thereſa to read. Laſtly, the Proſelyte would be a bare footed Carmelite, tho' the Pope diſſuaded him from it, and as ſoon as his probation time was finiſhed, he was admitted to make his Profeſſion July the 14th, 1602. He then took the name of Clement de Sainte Marie; he was raiſed to a great many offices in his Order, and died in the Convent of Avignon in the year 1643 (171).

† Au Pere Pierre de la Mere de Dieu.

(171) Taken from a book printed at Antwerp in 1670, intitled, Les Fleurs du Carmel, cueillies du Parterre des Carmes déchauſſez de France. . . Par le Reverend Pierre de la Mere de Dieu, Carme déchauſſé, pag. 81, &c.

[EE] Mr. Ancillon has quoted a paſſage of Calvin, and does not cenſure thoſe, who thought it had been the occaſion of a Libel publiſhed againſt that Miniſter.] I muſt make ſome ſhort obſervations upon this, for the inſtruction of my Readers. The paſſage, in which Calvin complains that the flatterers of King Henry VIII called him the ſupreme head of the Church is in his Commentary upon verſe the 13th of the VIIth Chapter of the Prophet Amos, where Calvin has the following words. Qui initio tantopere extulerunt Henricum Regem Angliæ, certè fuerunt inconſiderati homines, dederuntque illi ſummam rerum omnium poteſtatem, & hoc me ſemper graviter vulneravit. Erant enim Blaſphemi, cum vocarent ſummum Caput Eccleſiæ ſub Chriſto; hoc certe fuit nimium. i. e. " They, who in the begin- " ning raiſed Henry King of England ſo high, were " certainly inconſiderate men, ſince they gave him a " ſovereign power over every thing; which has al- " ways grieved me very much. For they were blaſ- " phemous, when they ſtiled him the Head of the " Church under Chriſt: this was really too much." I don't know whether it was not this paſſage, that vexed a certain Engliſhman, and whether it was not, as ſome believe, the pretence of a libel, which was publiſhed againſt Calvin, and in which that Engliſhman, who was John Brerley, a Miſſionary Prieſt in England, charges him with having ſaid in his Commentary upon Daniel, that we muſt ſpit in the face of Roman Catholic Kings rather than obey them; in anſwer to which Libel there was publiſhed a Letter, which is inſerted in the firſt collection of the memorable things, which happen'd during the league, &c. That letter is intitled, Lettre d'un Gentilhomme François contenant bréve réponſe aux Calomnies d'un certain pretendu Anglois. (i. e. " A letter from a French Gentleman, containing " a ſhort anſwer to the calumnies of a certain pre- " tended Engliſhman.") They ſhew in that letter that Calvin in his Commentary meant Nebuchadnezzar, who would have his ſtatue worſhipped (172). I ſay in the firſt place, that the Libel, which is confuted in the Letter of a French Gentleman inſerted in the firſt volume of the Memoires de la Ligue, was not written againſt Calvin, but in general againſt the Proteſtant Party, and in order to hinder Henry de Bourbon Navarre from ſucceeding to the Crown of France. Calvin is not mentioned in it but occaſionally, and in a few words. I ſay in the ſecond place, that the Author of that Libel was not an Engliſhman, every body knows that Lewis d'Orleans compoſed it. The method he followed was, to ſuppoſe, that the Roman Catholics of England warned thoſe of France, not to ſuffer that an Heretical King ſhould ſucceed Henry the IIId. III. Neither John Brerley, nor any other Engliſh Papiſt could be angry with Calvin for his obſervation concerning Henry the VIIIth. All the Roman Catholics ought to have approved his opinion, and might make uſe of it againſt Queen Elizabeth; and really, if he had writ nothing but in that ſtrain, he would have been very little expoſed to the ſlanders of the Papiſts, and much leſs to the Libels of the Engliſh Prieſts, than to thoſe of the Prieſts of any other nation. IV. I obſerve laſtly, that the anſwer, inſerted in the firſt volume of the Mémoires de la Ligue, is that which Monſieur de Pleſſis-Mornay wrote to Lewis d'Orleans's Libel (173), and which I have quoted in another place (174).

(172) Ancillon, Melange Critique, tom. 2. pag. 51, 52.

(173) It is the firſt volume of the Memoires de Mornai, pag. 619, &c.

(174) Quotation (17) of the article BROCARD.

[FF] His Life . . . in French . . . of the Edition of 1565 . . . contains ſeveral new facts, and ſome others ſet in a clearer light, and the circumſtances of time are much better obſerved in it. I ſhall give ſome inſtances of all this.] We do not find in the Edition of 1564, in 12*mo*, what I have tranſcribed from the folio Edition

Life, but on the other hand, there are ſome things in this, which are not in the French (p). The ſupplement I have to give concerning the editions of the Inſtitution, will be found in the remark [D] of the article SCHULTINGIUS. I have ſaid already (q) that a great clamour was raiſed againſt Calvin, becauſe he charged the Popes and the Cardinals with ridiculing the Chriſtian Religion [GG]. I ſhall make ſome new obſervations upon all this.

(p) For inſtance, what relates to the diſſolute life of Bolſec's wife. See the remark [F] in the article of BOLSEC.

(q) In the remark [H] of the article of CASTELLANUS.

of 1565, when I ſaid, that the grandſon of a baſtard of Philip the good Duke of Burgundy forſook the Church of Rome (175). We do not read there, that in March 1559, Peter Viret, for very good reaſons, and ſome others with him, left the place where they were, (that is Lauſanne) and retired to Geneva, where the Magiſtrates, as well as Calvin and the other Miniſters, deſired him to perform the functions of a Paſtor of the Church (176), and that the Magiſtrates and the Governor of the City, by Calvin's advice, were encouraged to lay ſome foundations for a ſchool, and for public Profeſſorſhips for the chief languages, having then in their city very able men amongſt thoſe who retired to Geneva with Mr. Peter Viret (177). This confirms my conjecture, that Viret left Lauſanne for ſome particular reaſons, which he did not think it proper to explain (178). This gives me alſo ſome hints to conjecture why Beza left Lauſanne; for we muſt be perſuaded that he was amongſt thoſe, who went away with Viret for very good reaſons. The circumſtance of the time perſuades me of it. For in 1559 he began to teach in the Univerſity of Geneva; and he tells us, that the Profeſſors were choſen amongſt thoſe, who retired to Geneva with Viret. Now, ſince he retired from Lauſanne with ſo great a man, and for the ſame reaſons, I infer from this, that it was not for ſome ſcandalous action, as his adverſaries have aſſerted (179); and I conjecture that the whole was nothing elſe, but an academical or conſiſtorial faction. Obſerve, that the Paſſage, from which I infer all this, is not in the Latin life of Calvin.

(175) In the addition to the remark [G] of the article of that Duke; and obſerve, that this is not found in the Latin Life of John Calvin.

(176) Beza, Preface ſur Joſué, edit. de Geneve, 1565, pag. 30.

(177) Ibid. pag. 31.

(178) See the remark [A] of the article VIRET.

(179) See the remark [D] of the article BEZA.

Neither that, nor the French of 1564, in 12*mo*, contain what I am going to tranſcribe. "In 1546 Calvin wrote in French a little book of advices, in "which he ſhews, how profitable it would be, to "make an inventory of all the relicks, which the Papiſts value ſo much, in France, Italy, Germany, "Spain, and other countries. There he diſplays not "only the abuſes and idolatry occaſioned by them, but "alſo the glaring lies of the Prieſts, who all pretend "to have the ſame thing in different Churches, Cities, and Countries. He has not mentioned all thoſe "relicks, but only quoted ſome inſtances, and even a "good many, and of ſuch things, as cannot be denied. Yet he intended to enlarge his book, if he "could have had a particular account of ſuch relicks, "from the countries we have mentioned, and which "abound with them. And indeed he uſed ſometimes "to rebuke his friends, tho' in a bantering manner, "for not having procured him fuller accounts of ſuch "relicks. However, there was little to be expected "that way from France, God be praiſed; for the war "has furniſhed ſo many opportunities of breaking "and deſtroying that rubbiſh, that there remains nothing more to be done, than to pray God, that he be "pleaſed to take away, what may ſtill remain of it, "either in France, or in any other country, and that "by ſome method leſs detrimental to the people "(180)."

(180) Beza, Pref. upon Calvin's Commentary on Joſhua, pag. 15.

There is in this Edition of 1565, a more particular account of Calvin's diſputes with Bolſec, with Caſtalio, and with Gentilis, &c. than in the Latin Life, and than in the firſt Edition of the French life.

The Author had committed a few errors, which he corrected afterwards. He had ſaid, that Calvin publiſhed his inſtitution at Baſil in 1534 (181); we do not find that in the Edition of 1565. He had ſaid, that Calvin married the widow of John Strordeur, called Idelette de Bure, with whom he lived ſo peaceably, till the Lord took her away from him in 1548, having had no children by him (182): but his words in the Edition of 1595 are, he always lived peaceably with her, till the Lord took her away, without any children; for tho' ſhe had had a child by him (183), yet it died immediately (184). Some pages after he obſerves (185), that ſhe died in March 1549.

(181) Beza, Hiſt. de la Vie & de la Mort de Calvin, fol. m. ciii. verſo, edit. 1564, 12mo.

(182) Ibid. the laſt leaf of the ſheet C.

(183) See above, the remark [S].

(184) Beza, Pref. ſur Joſue, pag. 21.

(185) pag. 17.

He did not correct all that he ſhould have corrected; for he ſays in the Edition of 1565, as well as in the preceding, and in the Latin life, that Calvin being twenty four years old dedicated his Commentary upon Seneca's book concerning Clemency, to one of the Lords de Mommor, with whom he had been maintained in the ſchools at Paris, tho' not at that Lord's expence (186). Now is it certain that this Book was dedicated April the 4th 1532, to Claude Hangeſt, Abbot of St. Eloi at Noyon: Calvin was not then quite twenty three years old. See the Remark [B].

(186) Ibid. pag. 6.

[GG] A great clamour was raiſed againſt Calvin, becauſe he charged the Popes and the Cardinals with ridiculing the Chriſtian Religion.] I have mentioned in another place (187) how the Jeſuit John Hay relates the words of this charge: Mr. de Sponde relates them in the ſame manner, but he obſerves, that Calvin adds, that tho' all are not of that opinion, and tho' few ſpeak thus, yet it is long ſince that Religion * began to be in uſe with the Pope, as is well known to thoſe, who are acquainted with the Court of Rome (188). "Did he "not bluſh, continues Mr. de Sponde, when he wrote "theſe blaſphemies? Or rather did he not turn pale, "for fear God ſhould tear off the hand that wrote "them? If this were true, and he believed it was ſo, "why did he not bring in his proofs for it, ſince he "was ſo zealous for our ſalvation. The Miniſter "Coladon, who gave an Edition of his Inſtitution in "the year 1576, acknowledging that this was an offenſive paſſage, endeavoured to ſupport it by the authority of Eraſmus in a letter to one Steuchus †, "where he ſays, There may be ſome in Germany, who "do not forbear blaſpheming againſt God, but they are "condemned to very terrible puniſhments. But I have "myſelf heard ſome at Rome, who uttered abominable "blaſphemies againſt Jeſus Chriſt and his Apoſtles, and "that in preſence of ſeveral other perſons, who heard "them as well as I, and yet they were not puniſhed. "I have not at preſent Eraſmus's Book at hand; but "it is eaſy to judge, from the paſſage quoted by Coladon, that Eraſmus ſpeaks of the diſſolute mob, "which at Rome as well as all over the world, is "uſed to blaſpheme, and the Reformed themſelves "know, how many there are even amongſt them, "who are guilty of that crime. There may be ſome "at Rome; and even ſome men worſe than blaſphemers; but that this is a point of ſecret doctrine, "is what Calvin can never prove, and that paſſage "alone of his works, ſhews him to have been a man "obſtinately reſolved to proſecute his deſigns ††."

(187) In the remark [H] of the article CASTELLANUS.

* That there is no God, and that all that is contained in the Bible are mere fables.

(188) Spond. Declaration des principaux motifs, pag. 203. edit. of Antwerp 1595.

† Eraſm. Epiſt. ad Steuchum.

†† That is, of calumniating the Roman Catholics.

It is certain, that Eraſmus does not ſpeak of a diſſolute mob: for he mentions ſome Prieſts of the Pope's Palace. Let us tranſcribe the whole paſſage, and obobſerve by the way, that he brings it as an anſwer to the charge of impiety, which Steuchus had loaded the Proteſtants with. Interdum ſtilum odioſius ſtringis, mea ſententia, quam par eſt in Germanos, veluti Deuteronomii capite ſexto, quum is locus non porrigat anſam incandeſcendi. Neque enim, inquis, hoc dicimus, quorundam Germanorum imitati procacitatem, qui ſibi omnibus & Diis, & hominibus, & humanis, & divinis rebus maledicendi licentiam uſurparunt. Ita tu quidem. Fieri poteſt, ut in Germaniâ ſint, qui non temperent a blaſphemiis in Deum; ſed in hos horrendis ſupplíciis animadvertitur. At ego Romæ his auribus audivi quoſdam abominandis blaſphemiis debacchantes in Chriſtum, & in illius Apoſtolos, idque multis mecum audientibus, & quidem impunè. Ibidem multos novi, qui commemorabant, ſe dicta horrenda audiſſe a quibuſdam Sacerdotibus aulæ Pontificiæ miniſtris, idque in ipſa Miſſâ, tam clarè, ut ea vox ad multorum aures pervenerit (189).

(189) Eraſmus, Epiſt. 34. lib. 26. pag. 1456.

☞CALVISIUS (SETH), a celebrated Chronologer in the beginning of the ſeventeenth Century, was born in a village called Gorſchleben near Saxoburg in Thuringia, February

February the 21ſt 1556 of honeſt parents, though in very low circumſtances [A]. His father dying while he was very young, his mother gave him as good an education as her circumſtances would permit, finding that his genius led him to learning, though ſome perſons would have perſuaded her to put him to a trade. He went to Franchuſe at thirteen years of age, and three years after removed to Magdeburg, in both which places he ſupported himſelf chiefly by ſinging from door to door with others of his companions; and by this means ſaved money enough to maintain himſelf in the Univerſity of Helmſtadt, after he had lived ſeven years at Magdeburg. He went to Helmſtadt in 1579, and the year following removed to Leipſic, and was appointed Chantor in the illuſtrious Schola Portenſis ad Salam in November 1582 [B]. In this ſtation he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Hiſtory and Chronology, and laid the foundation of that great work of Chronology, which he afterwards finiſhed at Leipſic [C]. Having continued eleven years and an half in the ſchool abovemention'd he was choſen by the Senate of Leipſic Governor of the Choir of Muſick in the Schola Thomana in that City in May 1594. In this province he diſtinguiſhed himſelf to great advantage by his ſkill in Muſic, his diligence and ſucceſs in the inſtruction of the youth in the ſchool, and his uncommon knowledge

[A] Of honeſt parents, tho' in very low circumſtances.] His father James Kalwitz, was an huſband-man, and ſupported himſelf and his family by his labour, in a tolerable manner, though with difficulty. His mother Elizabeth Krumin, after her huſband's death, practiſed midwifry for thirty years. Parentibus honeſtis quidem ac probis, ſed non magnâ cum re, ſicut de Ennio quoque alicubi Cicero meminit. Pater fuit Jacobus Kalwitz, loci illius incola, vir bonus, qui, quoad vixit, ruſticis operis ſe ſuoſque laborioſe & difficulter, attamen honeſtè ſuſtentavit. Mater, Elizabetha Krumin, honeſta quoque fœmina, quæ poſt mariti obitum ad puerperia iis in locis eſt adhibita feliciter annos ſupra xxx (1).

(1) Programma Rectoris Academiæ Lipſienſis in funus B. Autoris prefixed to Calviſius's Chronology, edit. Francfort 1685, in fol.

[B] Appointed Chantor of the illuſtrious Schola Portenſis ad Salam in Nov. 1582.] He continued in this laborious employment almoſt twelve years with that fidelity, diligence, and ſucceſs in the inſtruction of the youth, that he was univerſally approved. He publiſh'd there a Tract upon Muſic, which was greatly applauded; and beſides Muſic he taught likewiſe in that School the Elements of the Hebrew Tongue (2).

(2) Ibid.

[C] Laid the foundation of that great work of Chronology, which he afterwards finiſhed at Leipſic.] The firſt edition of it was publiſhed at Francfort in folio, In his Apology for it dated October 5, 1604, and addreſſed to the Governors of the Univerſity of Leipſic, printed in the Appendix to the edition of his Chronology at Francfort 1685 in fol. he obſerves, that while he lived in the illuſtrious Schola Portenſis, where he enjoyed a good deal of leiſure, and a large Library, he applied himſelf to Hiſtory, and noted down the particular periods of the moſt conſiderable events; but was not able to draw up a Syſtem of Chronology, till Joſeph Scaliger's Book de Emendatione Temporum was reprinted at Francfort in 1593. Upon this he read over and examined that work with great attention, and compared it with all the Chronologers, whom he could procure, and enquired into the reaſons of the ſeveral diſagreements in Chronology. At laſt he found that all the certainty of it depends upon the laws of Aſtronomy, and that thoſe Chronologers, who neglect aſtronomical Calculations, have fallen into the moſt palpable miſtakes. For this reaſon he undertook to explain in an obvious and popular method, what Scaliger had performed with greater ſubtilty and abſtruſeneſs; and he examined all the ſeveral epocha's with the utmoſt accuracy, enquired into the grounds of their certainty, confirmed them by proper demonſtrations, and ſolidly and clearly refuted whatever might be objected. Quapropter ipſe aggreſſus rem, quæ Joſephus Scaliger ſubtilius perſecutus fuerat, populari & omnibus obvio modo explicare conatus ſum, omnes epochas diligentiſſimè excuſſi, quæ cauſa certitudinis earundem eſſet, inveſtigavi, demonſtrationibus eaſdem munivi, & quæ contradici poſſent, ſolidè & evidenter refutavi. This coſt him a prodigious deal of labour, ſince he was obliged to calculate above an hundred and fifty eclipſes, that is, all that were mentioned by the Hiſtorians, in order to determine the times of the particular events. He drew up likewiſe Aſtronomical Tables, by which the equable motion of the Moon may be eaſily diſcovered with regard both to the longitude and latitude, ſo that by theſe Tables any perſon, tho' ignorant of Aſtronomy, may certainly affirm, that the eclipſes mentioned by Hiſtorians to mark out any particular event, happened at the time aſſigned. To theſe he added the proceſſion of the Equinoxes and Solſtices, and ſeveral other Tables; and ſhewed by tables or the moſt certain rules how any epocha may be rightly compared with any other; which was never done by any Chronologer before him. He added to all theſe a Chronology from the beginning of the world to his own time; in which he inſerted the Hiſtory of all Ages, deſcribed by ſuch circumſtances, that even children might comprehend in their minds a continued ſeries or ſynopſis of Hiſtory. Adjunxi hiſce omnibus Praxin, hoc eſt, Chronologiam à condito mundo ad noſtra uſque tempora deductam, cui hiſtorias omnium temporum admiſcui, ejuſmodi circumſtantiis deſcriptas, ut adoleſcentes vel pueri continuam hiſtoriarum ſeriem vel ſynopſin animo concipere & comprehendere poſſent. When he had finiſhed this work, he determined to publiſh it at the perſuaſion of his friends; upon which he delivered it to the Profeſſor of Hiſtory in the Univerſity of Leipſic for his opinion, who having kept it about a month, at laſt committed it to Dr. Meurer, the Mathematical Profeſſor, for his judgment, becauſe there were a great many Aſtronomical Calculations in it. Dr. Meurer having examined it, declared that the Aſtronomical Calculations were right. Calviſius thought the whole affair was now concluded, but it happened otherwiſe; for the Profeſſor of Hiſtory reſolving to ſuppreſs this Chronology, had recourſe to the Governors of the Univerſity to prevent the publication of it, ſince nothing is ſuffered to be printed there without their permiſſion. He complained, as our Author obſerves in his Letter to Joſeph Scaliger dated at Leipſic Jan. 4th 1606, that there were a great many innovations in it contrary to the received doctrine; that ſeveral weak arguments were made uſe of; that the youth would be thrown into confuſion by it in their ſtudies; that Calviſius had uſurped another man's province, ſince he was not the Profeſſor of Hiſtory. And by ſuch arguments as theſe he prevailed upon the Governors of the Univerſity to prohibit the impreſſion of it. M. D. igitur hiſtoricus, cui ex lege cenſenda venerat mea Chronologia, cauſatus multa ineſſe contra publicam doctrinam novata; argumenta proferri infirma, quæ facilè convelli poſſunt; turbari diſcentium ſtudia; me curare ἀλλότρια, cum profeſſio hiſtoriarum mihi demandata non ſit; & talia hujuſmodi perſuadet Academicis, ut interdicant. Our Author wrote the abovementioned Apology to the Governors of the Univerſity, and appealed to others and offered to demonſtrate his Scheme by Aſtronomy. At laſt after the Academical Council had been called ſeveral times, he gained his cauſe, not ſo much by the ſuffrages of the Judges, as by the favour of ſome perſons, who were for following Gamaliel's advice in this point; ſuch was the influence that his antagoniſt's authority had over many of them. Quid facerem? Scribo Apologiam ad Academicos. Provoco etiam ad alios. Offero me ad demonſtrationem aſtronomicam; & tandem cum Concilium Academicum aliquoties convocatum eſſet, cauſam obtineo, non tamen tam judicantium ſuffragiis ex re ſumptis, quam quorundam benevolentiâ, Gamalielis conſilium hîc ſequendum putantium; adeò M. D.

ledge in the moſt abſtruſe parts of Aſtronomy and Chronology. He wrote ſeveral excellent Treatiſes upon Muſic, and compiled a Theſaurus of the Latin tongue for the uſe of the youth. His writings gained him ſo great a reputation, that ſeveral Univerſities and States made him very conſiderable offers to ſettle among them, particularly the Univerſity of Wittemberg, which offered him the Profeſſorſhip of Mathematics, and that of Francfort, which propoſed to him honourable conditions. But he preferred his humble and laborious ſtation at Leipſic to the moſt ſplendid titles in other places, and lived in a very frugal and modeſt manner. He married Magdalen the daughter of John Junigen, a Citizen of Leipſic, February the 10th 1595, by whom he had three ſons and one daughter. One of his ſons died in his infancy. Our Author died at Leipſic November the 23d 1615, with great ſentiments of devotion, and was interred there the 27th of the ſame month (a). Beſides the works abovementioned he publiſhed at Erford 1610 in 4to, Enodatio duarum Quæſtionum, viz. circa Annum Nativitatis & Tempus Miniſterii Chriſti; and in 1612 Elenchus Calendarii Gregoriani, & duplex Calendarii melioris Forma. Franc. Marchionum in 4to. In this Elenchus he propoſes two points; firſt to explode the Gregorian Calendar by the principles of Aſtronomy, and next to point out a truer and more convenient form of a Calendar. Our Author is reckoned among the Heretics of the firſt rank in the Index Expurgatorius publiſhed at Madrid in 1667.

(a) Ex Programmate Rectoris Academiæ Lipſienſis in funus B. Authoris, prefixed to Calviſius's Chronology, edit. Francfort 1685.

M. D. autoritas & opinio ſani judicii prævalebat. Dr. David Pareus, Profeſſor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Heidelberg, and Elias Reuſner, Profeſſor of Hiſtory in the Univerſity of Jena, and John Kepler the celebrated Mathematician, wrote againſt this work of our Author; but without any conſiderable ſucceſs. It was highly approved of by Joſeph Scaliger, as appears from ſeveral of his Letters. In his 115th Letter addreſſed to Iſaac Caſaubon he ſtiles it a moſt accurate Chronicle, accuratiſſimum Chronicon; and in his 117th Letter addreſſed to Caſaubon he ſays, that it is the only work, which after ſo many Ages was worthy of the title of a Chronology, and deſerved to be immortal. Solum illud eſt, quod poſt tot ſæcula Chronologiæ nomine dignum ſit, & ſanè meretur immortalitatem. In his 240th Letter, addreſſed to Richard Thomſon, he ſtiles our Author a very learned German, though before the publication of his book unknown to him, and obſerves that his Chronology was excellent, being confirmed throughout by his (Scaliger's) reaſons; and that he was a very good and learned man, and the firſt among the Chronologers, who ceaſed to triſle, his work being admirable, uſeful, and full of all kinds of learning. Alo tibi, doctiſſimum Germanum, aliàs ignotum mihi, Sethum Calviſium, eximium Chronicon rationibus noſtris per omnia munitum edidiſſe, cujus exemplar ad me miſit. . . Solus ille optimus & eruditiſſimus vir repertus eſt, qui inter chronologos nugari deſiverit. Opus eſt præſtantiſſimum, utiliſſimum, & omni doctrinâ refertiſſimum. In his 439th letter addreſſed to John de Laet, he obſerves that ever ſince he had publiſhed his works with relation to Chronology, which had been ſo long neglected before, no perſon had ſpent an hour in reading his books, or examining his reaſons, till at laſt Seth Calviſius aroſe, who was worth all the reſt, being an accurate maſter of that ſubject, and publiſhed a moſt learned and complete Chronology, which entirely depended upon his reaſonings, and was an heroic work, and worthy immortality. Ex quo tempore Chronologica tamdiu ignorata publicavimus, nemo extitit, qui aut horam lectioni Librorum noſtrorum impendere, aut rationes noſtras probare voluerit. Unus tandem, qui inſtar omnium erit, accuratiſſimus, & harum literarum peritiſſimus Sethus Calviſius, Germanus, nuper eruditiſſimum & conſummatiſſimum Chronicon edidit, quod totum rationum noſtrarum inſiſtit munimentis, opus heroicum & æternitate dignum. See likewiſe his 308th Letter. Theodorus Spizelius in his Templum Honoris reſeratum (3) tells us, that our Author in this exquiſite work has ſhewn ſo much acuteneſs and judgment, that if he has any equals, he appears to have had none ſuperior to him in our age in that ſcience. He obſerves likewiſe, that Calviſius ſpent twenty years intirely in this work, which he confirmed by demonſtrations in ſuch a manner, that his induſtry is not only highly applauded in all parts of Germany, but alſo among foreign nations, and that among all the diſputes of Chronologers there will not be any one eaſily found, who has ſhewn by Aſtronomical reaſoning, that our Author has been guilty of any groſs error. Sethus Calviſius tantam in exquiſitiſſimo opere ſuo Chronico oſtendit ingenii acrimoniam ac judicii dexteritatem, ut ſi pares aliquos in hoc genere, ſuperiores ſane ævo noſtro nullos habuiſſe videatur. Totos viginti annos accuratæ operis ſui Chronologici impendit elaborationi, idque hujuſmodi firmavit demonſtrationibus, ut non ſolum in tota Germania, ſed etiam apud exteras nationes mirificè commendata ſit Viri induſtria, nec quiſquam in tantis Chronologorum diſſenſionibus facile inventus fuerit, qui craſſæ cujuſdam falſitatis Calviſii Chronologiam arguere aut convincere Aſtronomicâ potuerit Veritate. Degory Whear in his Reflectiones Hyemales de ratione & methodo legendi utraſque Hiſtoricas, Civiles & Eccleſiaſticas (4) tells us, that Calviſius exerted himſelf with ſo much induſtry in the late Edition of his work, that he has omitted nothing, but given us a true ſyſtem of Chronology in an exquiſite manner. . . . Sethum Calviſium, qui nuperâ ſuæ Chronologiæ editione operoſam adeo diligentiam adhibuit, ut nihil quicquam omiſerit, quo verum Hiſtoriarum tempus exquiſite doceatur. Dr. Richard Montague, Biſhop of Chicheſter, in his Apparatus II. (5) obſerves that Calviſius was without controverſy a man excellently well ſkilled in Chronology, but too fond of innovations. Sethus Calviſius, vir citra controverſiam in re Chronologicâ verſatiſſimus, ſed nimium pronus ad innovandum. T.

(3) Apud Blount, Cenſur. Celebriorum Authorum, pag. 897. edit. Genev. 1694, in 4to.

(4) Sect. 6. pag. 44. edit. Oxon. 1637.

(5) Sect. 41.

CAMALDOLI (AMBROSE DE) Ambroſius Camaldulenſis, ſo called becauſe he was Abbot General of the Order of Camaldoli, was one of the moſt learned men of the fifteenth Century. He was born near Florence at Portico, a ſmall City in Romagna (a); he learnt the Greek tongue under Emanuel Chryſoloras, who taught it at Venice (b). He entered into the Order of Camaldoli at the age of fourteen, and was made General of it in 1431 (c). He had had other employments before this in that Order, in which he had then lived thirty years (d). Pope Eugenius IV, who had a great eſteem for him, ſent him to the Council of Baſil, and had reaſon to be ſatisfied with his zeal for the ſupport of the authority of the See of Rome. This General continued to exert the ſame zeal in the Councils of Ferrara and Florence, in which he diſputed with great ardour againſt the Greeks. At Ferrara he addreſſed in 1437 a Greek Oration to John (e) Paleologus Emperor of Conſtantinople, and obliged the Greeks to own, that none amongſt the Latins underſtood their language better than he did (f). Pope Eugenius ſent him to Florence, in order to prevail with the inhabitants, that the Council of Ferrara might be transferred to their City. He obtained from them what the Pope deſired, and was choſen to draw

(a) Volater. lib. 21.
(b) Wharton, Append. ad Cave, Hiſt. Liter. Script. Eccleſ.
(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Hodæporicon, Ambr. Camaldul. pag. 1.

(e) Voſſius, who calls him Emanuel, De Hiſt. Latin. pag. 555. is miſtaken.
(f) Sguropulus, Hiſt. Concil. Flor. Sect. 10. cap. 2.

draw up the articles of union between the Latin and Greek Churches (g). Sguropulus charges him not only with an extreme partiality in favour of the Pope, but alſo with hypocriſy and knavery (b)[A]. Ambroſe diſtributed amongſt the poor Greeks, the ſmall ſums which the Pope allowed them. He collected a very large Library in the Convent of St. Mary de Angelis, where he lived (i), and tranſlated a great many books out of Greek into Latin, as thoſe of Dionyſius Areopagita de cæleſti Hierarchia, thoſe of Manuel Calecas againſt the errors of the Greeks, the Life of St. Chryſoſtom by Palladius, the Theophraſtus of Æneas Gaza [B], the Pratum of John Moſchus, St. John Climacus, ſeveral Sermons of St. Ephrem, &c. It is ſaid that Gerard Voſſius, Provoſt of Tongres, has been guilty of an enormous piece of Plagiariſm with regard to this laſt Tranſlation (k). Ambroſe did not content himſelf with tranſlating the writings of ſeveral Fathers of the Church; he would alſo try his ſkill upon Heathen Authors, and choſe one who is none of the eaſieſt, I mean Diogenes Laertius, nor indeed did he ſucceed very well in that Tranſlation (l). The works of his own compoſing are a Chronicle of the Abbey of Mount Caſſino, an Hiſtory of his own actions, whilſt he was General of the Order of Camaldoli, the Lives of ſome Saints, ſome Orations, a Treatiſe de Sacramento admirabili corporis Chriſti, &c. Some add to theſe a Treatiſe of the proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt [C]. As he had wrote a vaſt number of Letters, Coſmus de Medicis, who had a very great eſteem for him (m), had them collected into one volume by a Monk of Camaldoli. This volume has not yet been publiſhed (α), it is kept in the Library of Florence; we are in hopes that it will be publiſhed with the notes of Nicholas Bartholini, who has already publiſhed Ambroſe's Hodæporicon, a work which ſhews, both that the Author was an honeſt man, and that he lived in a very corrupt age [D]. They who ſay he died in 1490 (n) are miſtaken

(b) Ἀνὴρ ποικίλος μὲν καὶ πανοῦργος πρόσχημα δὲ περικείμενος εὐλαβείας. Sguropul. Hiſt. Concil. Florent. Sect. 7. cap. 1.

(g) Wharton; Append. ad Cave, Hiſt. Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt.

(i) Jovius in Elog.

(k) Wharton; Append. ad Cave; Hiſt. Script. Eccl.

(l) See the Preface of Valentine Curio upon Diogenes Laertius, edit. 1544, apud Geſner, Biblioth. folio 32.

(m) Hodæporicon Ambroſii, ſub fin.

(n) Bellarm. De Scriptor. Eccleſ. & Ibi Phil. Labbe, Hofman, Moreri, Konig, Baillet.

[A] Sguropulus charges him . . . with hypocriſy and knavery.] There are few perſons but have ſpoken of this Author in a quite different manner. We meet with ſome ſtrokes in his works, which entirely confute Sguropulus's calumny; and after all, it is certain, that one of the moſt ſatyrical writers of his time, gave a moſt authenthic teſtimony, of our Ambroſius's honeſty. I mean Poggius of Florence. Here follows what he ſays of Ambroſius, in his Dialogue againſt the Hypocrites, in which he levels his ſtrokes every way againſt the moſt illuſtrious men. Quid, Carolus inquit, de noſtro Ambroſio judicatis? rectâne an tortuoſâ philoſophabatur viâ? nunquid vobis hypocriſim redolebat? Nequaquam, Hieronymus inquit; fuit enim vir optimus, meo judicio, ac probatiſſimus, qui in ſuo cœnobio literis deditus multa ſcripſit magnâ cum laude & Doctrinâ. Summa certe fuit præditus humanitate ac virtute. Laudo vitam illius, Carolus inquit, & exiſtimo extra hypocriſim fuiſſe, &c. i. e. "What do "you think, ſaid Charles, of our Ambroſius? has he "philoſophized the right way or not? did he alſo ſa"vour hypocriſy? Not at all, anſwered Jerom, for "he was, in my opinion, a very good and honeſt "man; who ſtudying in his Convent, gained a great "reputation by his many learned writings. He was "a very polite and virtuous man. I commend his "manner of living, ſaid Charles, and believe that "he was not guilty of hypocriſy, &c." Father Nicholas Bartholini quotes this paſſage at the end of the Hodæporicon, and tells us, that this Dialogue of Poggius was going to be printed under the care of ſome Frenchmen, to whoſe requeſts Mr. Magliabecchi could not refuſe it. Paul Jovius, who ſometimes ſpeaks more evil than good of thoſe, whoſe Elogiums he writes, acknowledges, that the General of Camaldoli, by an uncommon happineſs, united together piety with good humour, and that he was ſo free from envy, and from a ſpirit of contradiction, that when he endeavoured to reconcile Poggius with Laurence Valla, he declared to them, that they acted neither as true men of letters, nor like Chriſtians, ſince they diſgraced the dignity of the ſciences by their ſatirical writings. Fuit hic vir, quod rarò evenit, ſine oris triſtitia, ſanctus, ſemper utique ſuavis, atque ſerenus; ita procul a livore contentioneque, ut cum Vallæ Poggium reconciliare conaretur, eos neque plane literatos, neque item Chriſtianos videri diceret, qui inducta ſimultate ſacroſanctum literarum decus probroſis libellis importunè defædarent (1).

(1) Jovius, Elog. cap. 11.

[B] He tranſlated . . . The Theophraſtus of Æneas Gaza.] I make a remark upon this Tranſlation only that I may have an opportunity of obſerving, that our Ambroſe made a voyage, which few people have mentioned. I ſay then, that he went to Conſtantinople with Guarini and Philelphus, in order to improve himſelf in the Greek Tongue; and that on his return he paſſed thro' the Iſland of Scio, where Andreolo Juſtiniani, who was a great lover of learning, and a patron of the learned, received our travellers with the greateſt kindneſs. Ambroſe dedicated to him his Tranſlation of Æneas Gaza, a proof of his gratitude (2).

(2) See the Dedication of Auguſtine Juſtiniani, grandſon of Andreolo, prefixed to that Tranſlation, in the edition of Venice 1513. See alſo the Tranſlator's dedication.

[C] Some reckon among his works a Treatiſe of the Proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt.] Voſſius (3), after he had obſerved, that Poſſevinus, Trithemius and ſome others (4), aſcribe to the General of the Camaldoli a Book concerning the Holy Ghoſt, adds, that they ſeem to have taken for a work of this General, what is only a tranſlation. Mr. Wharton, who wrote a great while after Voſſius, yet aſcribes the original of that work to Ambroſe; he alſo makes him the author of a work contra vituperatores monaſticæ vitæ; (againſt the deſpiſers of a monaſtic life), which is, ſays he (5), amongſt the manuſcripts of the Library of St. Juſtin at Padua, and which neither Bellarminus nor Poncianicius have mentioned. But I don't doubt, but that work is only the tranſlation of Chryſoſtom's three Books adverſus vitæ monaſticæ vituperatores, which Volaterranus did not forget to mention, when he ſpoke of our Author. See alſo Father Labbe (6) in the account of the fourth volume of St. Chryſoſtom's works, according to the Paris edition 1614: and Geſner's Bibliotheca, in the account of the works of the ſame Father printed at Baſil in 1530. This work, as tranſlated by our Ambroſe, is mentioned in both theſe editions.

(3) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Latin. pag. 556.

(4) Volaterranus, and Bellarminus are of that number.

(5) Ex Tomaſino.

(6) De Scriptoribus. Eccleſiaſt. tom. 1. pag. 534.

* (α) That volume has not yet been publiſhed.] It has been ſince inſerted in the third volume of the Fathers Martenne's and Durand's work, intitled, Veterum Scriptorum & Monumentorum Collectio. Paris, 1724. fol. Ambroſe, at the perſuaſion of his friends, had begun to make a collection of the Letters, which he wrote to ſeveral perſons, and his diſciples finiſhed that collection. But the Manuſcripts, which have been kept of them, are not compleat. Father Mabillon being in Italy got a copy tranſcribed from the manuſcript, which he thought the moſt compleat; it contained 548 letters divided into eighteen Books. He alſo cauſed thoſe letters to be tranſcribed from other manuſcripts, which were wanting in that. The Fathers Martenne and Durand have collected them in two other Books which contain 89 Letters; ſo that there are in all 637 Letters divided into 20 Books. Moſt of theſe Letters relate only to the particular affairs of his order, and therefore cannot be very diverting, nor material. Thoſe of the firſt Book, which are addreſſed to Pope Eugenius IV, are more important, becauſe they contain ſeveral particulars concerning the Councils of Baſil and Florence. We alſo meet in theſe letters with a few hints concerning the lives and characters of the learned men of his time. The Editors of theſe letters have added to them the Prefaces, which Ambroſe prefixed to his ſeveral tranſlations (α) ADD. REM.

(α) Niceron, Mem. pour ſervir à l'Hiſt. des Hom. illuſt. tom. 19. pag. 18, 19.

[D] His Hodœporicon ſhews, both that the Author was an honeſt man, and that he lived in a very corrupt age.] This work contains an account of a journey, miſtaken [E], nor is it very probable that thoſe are in the right, who pretend that he died at Conſtance. His corps is depoſited in the Oratory of Camaldoli, without any epitaph ney, which Ambroſe made to ſeveral parts of Italy in the years 1431, and 1432. He ſet out from his Convent October the 11th 1431, to go to the general chapter of the Order of Camaldoli. That chapter depoſed the General, and choſe our Ambroſe in his ſtead, who went afterwards to viſit ſeveral Monaſteries of his Order. He found every where an extreme corruption of manners. Some Nunneries were perfect bawdy-houſes; which our Author choſe to expreſs in Greek, rather than in Latin; deprehendi ἐπιτήδια in monaſterio commorari, non ſanctimoniales (7). He inveighs bitterly againſt ſuch a diſorder; and the Abbeſs owned at laſt, that the Nuns did not behave as they ought in that Convent; but that neither ſhe, nor ſome of the moſt aged ſiſters followed the bad example. He was not ſilly enough to be ſatisfied with ſuch an imperfect confeſſion; he found out the whole extent of the evil; he ſtrictly forbad the Nuns to admit any Monk or any Layman in their Monaſtery, and threatened them to have it pulled down, and burnt, if the ill reports ſhould continue. It is probable that he was not ſo cunning, or ſo happy with regard to another Convent; he had at firſt a bad opinion of it; but upon enquiry, he thought he had found things better than he expected. But when he was gone away, he was aſſured, that his enquiry had been very imperfect, and that almoſt all the Nuns of that Convent were Ladies of pleaſure; omnes fermè πόρναι εἶναι (8). He was extremely vexed at it, tho' he could not perſuade himſelf, that they had evaded his reſearches. He returned to the Convent, and diſcovered, that a Prior had debauched a Nun, who made her eſcape afterwards; the Abbeſs owned to him, that ſhe had had a child; Ejus confeſſione ſimplici τέκνον ποιήσαι eam comperimus (9): Afterwards he contents himſelf with ſaying only in general, that he had found ſeveral things, which deſerved correction. Plurima ibi quæ correctione digna eſſent, invenimus. He did not find leſs irregularity in the Convents of men. There were ſome in which the Monks had fought with ſticks and ſwords, and where the Prior was accuſed of ſo many lewd actions, that it was not thought proper to come to law-proceedings (10). Things were examined, and the criminal was convicted as ſecretly as could be; and after a pretty favourable ſentence, and ſome written regulations for the future, the criminal was cenſured by word of mouth for his crime, and only before a very few witneſſes; and care was taken, for the honour of the Convent, that nothing ſhould be left in writing upon that ſubject (11). Sometimes he ventures to ſpeak plain, without having recourſe to the Greek tongue. Et ex matre Domini, & ex pleriſque aliis perceperamus PROSTIBULUM illud eſſe. Deprehendimus rem opinione etiam deteriorem (12). i. e. "By the account of the Convent of the Lord's Mother, and of "ſeveral others, we have found, that they are down-"right bawdy-houſes, things have been found even "worſe than we expected." On another occaſion he was to declare, that the Prior of a Monaſtery had had a baſtard, and he chuſes to make uſe of the Greek word υἱὸς rather than of the Latin Filius (13). The Abbot de la Roque commends our Ambroſe's prudence, for having choſen to expreſs theſe great diſorders in a language leſs known than the Latin, in order that they ſhould not be ſo public (14). But he ſhould not have made that reflection, if he intended to concur with our Ambroſe; for they, who will know his precaution, will now more eaſily find out thoſe tickliſh paſſages, than they would have done; they have only to look for the Greek words, and they will immediately find, where the joke lies. There are few men, but are able to look for the ſenſe of a Greek word, when they can underſtand a Latin Book. The inſtance, which this General gives of the power of jealouſy is remarkable (15). An old Prieſt, who had been for a long time in love with an Abbeſs, fell in ſuch a paſſion, when he found himſelf diſappointed and ſupplanted by his rival, that he informed againſt the Nun, and ſhewed ſeveral ſmutty letters, which he had written to her. It did not appear by theſe letters, that the Abbeſs had yielded to his deſires, yet Ambroſe kept them, and objected them to her as a convincing proof. She did not own that ſhe had done any thing againſt her reputation, but ſhe confeſſed that ſhe had received the letters of the laſcivious old man.

This Hodœporicon was printed at Florence from a Manuſcript communicated by the famous Magliabecchi to F. Nicholas Bartholini, regular Clerk of the Congregation of the Lord's Mother. The year in which it was printed is not ſet down in the copy of which I make uſe, but it muſt have been in the year 1680, 1681, or 1682. Mr. Wharton had probably a copy of it, in which the title was different from that which is prefixed to my copy. For he tranſcribes it thus (16). Hodœporicon, ſeu deſcriptio Itineris Eugenii Papæ auctoritate anno 1431 a ſe per Italiam ſuſcepti, ut corruptos Monachorum & Virginum clauſtralium mores emendaret. There is nothing like this in my copy. I do not know what reaſons Mr. de la Roque had, to believe, that there had been already an Edition of this Work, and that the ſtile of it is elegant. It muſt be owned, that Ambroſe wrote well enough for a man of his profeſſion, and conſidering the time he lived in. But let us not ſay, as Monſieur Varillas does, that he tranſlated the Hierarchy aſcribed to St. Denys with ſo much eloquence and clearneſs of ſtile, that no body could ſince that time come near his manner of writing (17).

[E] They who ſay he died in 1490, are miſtaken.] I. If he had died in the year 1490, he would have lived to the age of an hundred and three years. Now, if he had come to ſo uncommon a period of life, it would certainly have been obſerved in an infinite number of Books, which ſpeak of him, or of learned men who lived very long. Since therefore no writer whatſoever obſerved this, we may infer from it, that he did not live ſo long (18). The proof of his having lived a hundred and three years, as is pretended, is as follows. He was fourteen years old when he became a Monk, and had already lived thirty years in his Convent when in 1431 he was ſent a Deputy to the General Chapter of his Order. He ſays it himſelf in the beginning of his Hodœporicon. II. The dedication of his letters ſpeaks of him as of a man who was not then living; and we are told there, that Coſmus de Medicis had made choice of a Monk of Camaldoli to make a collection of theſe letters. The Monk having acquitted himſelf of this commiſſion, dedicated the work to Coſmus de Medicis. All this ſuppoſes, that there paſſed ſome years ſince the Author's death, and the time when the dedication of his letters was written. Now that dedication was made before the year 1464, in which Coſmus died. III. Poggius of Florence, as Voſſius tells us (19), made the Funeral Oration of the General of Camaldoli; now, Poggius died in 1459; ſo that that General died long before the year 1490. What Voſſius ſays, that Poggius had been Ambroſe's diſciple, ſeems a little doubtful to me. For Poggius muſt have made a figure in the world before Ambroſe was known, and he was older than him. He began to be Secretary of the Briefs about the year 1407; he was a man of conſequence when the Council of Conſtance was held, when he gave an account of the puniſhment of John Stas in 1416; and ſince he died in 1459 at the age of fourſcore, it follows that he was born in the year 1229. Now Ambroſe was ſtill an obſcure mark, when the Council of Conſtance was held, and he was born in the year 1586, or 1587. Sandius is in the right to think, that Poggius was rather Ambroſe's ſchool-fellow in the ſtudy of the Greek tongue, than his ſcholar (20), but he ought not to have confuted Voſſius with regard to the Funeral Oration, ſince his argument, tho' conditionally propoſed, is grounded upon this falſe ſuppoſition, that Ambroſe lived till the year 1490. I ſhall obſerve by the way, a miſtake of Moreri; he ſays, tho' in a prepoſterous order, that Ambroſe aſſiſted at the Councils of Baſil and Conſtance. How could he prove this with regard to the laſt fact? IV. Bartholine (21) tells us, that Pope Eugenius VI, having been acquainted with the death of the General of Camaldoli, was very ſorry for it. Dum ejus primum inaudita morte ſubita vi doloris abreptus in lachrymas & aliquandiu quoque ingemiſcens, cum ex nomine vocare non ceſſaret, in has voces indentidem erumpens, AMBROSI fili,

(7) Hodœporicon Ambroſii, pag. 4.

(8) Pag. 26.

(9) Pag. 29.

(10) Pag. 30, 31.

(11) Præcepta ſecretiora tradidimus, quæ ſcriptis ligare ob illius & noſtrum, ipſiuſque monaſterii honorem nolueramus περὶ τῆς τῶν νέων συνουσίας, & aliis hujuſmodi quibuſdam.

(12) Hodœporicon Ambroſii, pag. 48.

(13) Viſitavimus Priorem ipſius Monaſterii, & quæ de illo fama vulgaverat, vera eſſe deprehendimus, namque υἱὸν habuit, juvenem ingenii non mali, à quo ſcriptam Orationem acceperamus. Hodœporicon Ambroſii, pag. 35.

(14) Journal des Savans, for March 2, 1682.

(15) Hodœporicon Ambroſii, pag. 64.

(16) Wharton, Append. ad Cave, Hiſt. Scriptor. Eccleſ.

(17) Varillas, Anecdot. de Florence, pag. 164.

(18) See the Remark [A] of the article CONRARUS.

(19) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 556.

(20) Sandius, Not. in Voſſium, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 212.

(21) Hodœporicon Ambroſii, pag. ult.

epitaph nor ornament [F]. A large account of his life, written by Auguſtin of Florence, is annexed to the Hiſtory of Camaldoli, containing three books, written by the ſame Auguſtin. Father Labbe was miſtaken, when he ſaid, that this Author wrote three books of that life (o). Mr. Wharton has cenſured that error.

(o) Labbe, De Script. Eccleſ. tom. 1. pag. 45.

fili, quis te mihi eripuit, quis Ecclesiæ Lumen adeò intempeſtive extinxit? i. e. "Hearing of the death of "Ambroſius, which had not been told him before, he "was ſeized on a ſudden with ſuch a grief, that he "could not forbear ſhedding tears, and now and then "he uſed to ſigh, calling him conſtantly, and crying "out, O Ambrose my ſon, who has ſnatched thee "from me, who has extinguiſhed that Light of the "Church ſo unſeaſonably?" This Pope died in 1447. If Ambroſe died before him, what do ſo many Authors mean, who obſerve with one accord, that he lived very long (22)? And what reaſon had Paul Jovius to ſay, that Ambroſius was admired by Eugenius IV, and Nicholas V (23)? Some pretend that both theſe Popes had a mind to make him a Cardinal (24). However that be, they are miſtaken, who ſuppoſe there was an intercourſe of friendſhip between him and Poljtian (25); for the latter was not born till the year 1454.

They were printing this, when a friend of mine (26), whom I had deſired to conſult Auguſtinus Florentinus, let me know, 1. That we read there, that Ambroſe died October the firſt 1439, on his return from the Council of Florence, to which he had ſubſcribed (27), and that he enter'd into the Order at the age of fourteen years and twenty two days, in the year 1400 (28). 2. That Don Thomas de Minis a Florentine, who publiſhed the Catalogue of the Saints of the Order of Camaldoli in 1606 at Florence, ſays in page 45, that Ambroſe the thirty fifth General died in 1539. I wonder, that Mr. Wharton, who had the work of Auguſtinus Florentinus in his hands, ſhould have made our Ambroſe flouriſh in the year 1440, and ſhould have repreſented him as living ſtill longer. Voſſius, who made him flouriſh in the year 1450, was not well acquainted with this whole affair, nor did he rightly quote Jacobus Bergamenſis, who mentions our Ambroſe under the year 1431, and not as Voſſius ſays, under the year 1449.

(22) Exceſſit è vitâ plane ſenex. Jovius. Obiit valde grandævus, non ſine ſanctitatis opinione. Wharton.
(23) He ſucceeded Eugenius IV.
(24) Varillas, Anecdot. de Florence. Wharton, Append. ad Cave de Script. Eccleſ.
(25) Val. Curio, Præf. in Diogen. Laert. apud Geſn. Biblioth. folio 30.
(26) Monſieur de Larroque.
(27) Aug. Florentinus, in vitâ Ambroſii, cap. 29.
(28) Idem, cap. 4.

[F] His corps is depoſited in the Oratory of Camaldoli without any epitaph, or ornament.] Dom Mabillon ſhews his indignation at this by the following reflexion, which he made on that account, and which he relates in his Muſæum Italicum. In Oratorio, ſays he (29), *ſepultus eſt ſine lapide & titulo magnus ille Ambroſius, Camaldulenſium quondam ſummus præpoſitus, tum Cœnobitarum, tum Eremitarum, qui ſub Petro Delphino a Cœnobitis diſceſſionem fecerunt. Subit indignatio, ut cum Plinio Juniori loquamur , tanti viri poſt tot annos reliquias neglectumque cinerem ſine titulo, ſine nomine jacere, cujus memoria orbem terrarum gloria pervagata eſt. Sed potior Ambroſii apud Deum gloria eſt ac memoria. i. e. "The great Ambroſe lies buried in the Oratory, "without any tomb-ſtone, without any inſcription; "he who was General of the Order of Camaldoli, as "well of thoſe who lived in common, as of thoſe "who led the life of hermits, after they were ſepa"rated from the others under Peter Delfini. It is "with indignation, to ſpeak with Pliny, that I ſee "the remains and aſhes of ſo great a man lie neglect"ed after ſo many years, without any inſcription, not "ſo much as of his name; he whoſe memory has been "ſpread with Glory over the whole world. But "Ambroſe enjoys now a better glory with God."

(29) Muſæum Ital. tom. 1. pag. 180.
* Plinius, lib. 6. Epiſt. 10.

CAMDEN (WILLIAM) one of the moſt able and illuſtrious men of his age, was born at London, the 2d of May 1551, of a mean family [A]. At the age of fifteen he was ſent to Oxford. He ſtudied there for five years, without taking any degree [B], and then he returned to London, where he found among other Patrons Gabriel and Jeoffry Goodman. Theſe were two brothers, who perceiving Camden's extraordinary parts, took a great deal of pleaſure in affording him means to cultivate them. One of them (a), being Dean of Weſtminſter, gave him in 1575 the place of Under-maſter in the ſchool which Queen Elizabeth had founded in Weſtminſter Abbey (b). Camden, who was Humaniſt ſufficient to acquit himſelf worthily of this employment, diſcharged all the functions of it with exactneſs, and yet omitted not to employ himſelf in more elevated ſtudies. By natural inclination he applied himſelf chiefly to ſearch into the Antiquities of his own country; and as the fineneſs of his genius and the profoundneſs of his judgment made him ſoon diſcover the full extent of this deſign, and all the helps which were neceſſary for him to ſucceed therein, he turned all his thoughts and all his labours towards making preparations for the Work he had in view. It was the Hiſtory of the ancient inhabitants of Britain: he deſigned to treat exactly of their origin, their manners, and their laws. For this end it was neceſſary for him not only to underſtand whatever the Greek and Latin Writers have left us concerning Great Britain, but alſo the old Language of that Iſland, the old Britiſh, and the old Saxon. It was alſo neceſſary for him to examine the ancient Itineraries, to ſearch Records, and to conſult an infinite number of old Papers. He neglected nothing of all this: his diligence and application were extraordinary,

(a) It was Gabriel.
(b) Regiæ Scholæ in hoc illuſtri Collegio à ſereniſſimâ Reginâ Elizabethâ beatæ memoriæ fundato... Hypodidaſculum..? conſtituit. Thomas Smithus, in Vita Camdeni, pag. 8.

[A] He was but of a mean family.] His father, who was a native of Litchfield in the County of Staffordſhire, came and ſettled in London, where he followed the trade of a Houſe-painter. He left but little at his death; ſo that his ſon, who was yet a child, was maintained in the Orphan-houſe. Camden in his great elevation was ſo far from endeavouring to conceal the obſcurity of his family from the knowledge of the public, that he left by his will a ſilver-gilt cup (1) to the company of Painter-ſtainers with this inſcription, Gul. Camdenus Clarenceus, filius Samſonis, Pictoris Londinenſis, dono dedit. i. e. "The gift of Will. Camden "Clarenceux, the ſon of Samſon, Painter-ſtainer of "London." It is one of the cups uſed at the feaſts of that company on ſolemn occaſions. Camden, on his mother's ſide, was related to an ancient (2) family (3).

(1) It coſt 16 pounds ſterling.
(2) That of the Curwens, deſcended from Goſpatric, Earl of Northumberland.
(3) Ex Vitâ Camdeni, Autore Thoma Smitho, pag. 2.

[B] He ſtudied at Oxford, without taking any degree.] I obſerve this, that I may have an opportunity of ſaying, that in 1588, when his reputation had ſet him above the degree of Maſter of Arts, which the Univerſity of Oxford is uſed to confer on thoſe who are of ſeven years ſtanding, he deſired to be admitted to it: they anſwered, that he ſhould be admitted, provided he preſented himſelf, according to cuſtom, at the next meeting of the Univerſity. He had not time to go thither; but in 1613, he made his appearance in the Univerſity, having taken a journey to Oxford to attend the funeral of Sir Thomas Bodley, and he received the title of Maſter of Arts. It was a great honour to that illuſtrious Univerſity, that a man of his age and reputation ſhould deſire to have that title (4).

Take notice that there are ſome writers who aſſure us the Univerſity offered it him, but that he did not think he then wanted it, and there is great probability he did not accept it. This is the opinion of Biſhop Gibſon (5), and he ſupports it by the authority of Mr. Wood.

(4) Ex eodem Tho. Smitho, ibid. pag. 6, 7.
(5) Gibſon's Life of Camden. See below the citation (35).

extraordinary, and the fruit he reaped thence was ſo likewiſe; and as his reputation had ſpread itſelf even into foreign countries, all thoſe who knew how to judge of things eſteemed him ſingularly capable of executing this great deſign, and encouraged and aſſiſted him therein, every one according to his abilities. He reſolved to acquaint himſelf with the ſituation of places by his own eyes, and there was never a corner in England which he did not carefully viſit. All theſe labours at the end of ten years produced his Britannia, which he publiſhed at London in 1586 [C]. This Work anſwered the expectation which the Learned had conceived of it: it ſold ſo well, that they were obliged to reprint it the year following (c), and that beſides the German Editions, we may reckon thoſe of England in the years 1590, 1594, 1600, and 1607 (d). They who know the nature of this kind of Works, need not be informed that the new Editions were conſtantly improved [D]. The great ſucceſs of this Book, and the praiſes which it drew from all ſides on its Author, abated nothing of the natural modeſty of Camden, nor inſpired him with the deſire of quitting the drudgery of the School, where he had been Under-maſter a long time. If his friends had not taken more care of his fortune than himſelf, his nation and age would at this day have borne the ſhame of having neglected ſo great a man (e). But this was provided againſt: for in the year 1588 the Biſhop of Saliſbury (f) conferred on him the Prebend of Ilfarcombe, which Camden enjoyed during his life without reſidence, and without having been promoted to holy Orders. In 1593 he ſucceeded Edward Grant, who had been Head-Maſter of Weſtminſter School, and he compoſed a new

(c) See the Remark [L] at the end.

(d) Smith. in Vitâ Camdeni, pag. 78.

(e) Nullo aut ambitionis aut avaritiæ æſtro percitus, ſui plus æquo negligentior. Amici non icem, ut ſeculum apud poſteros abſolverent, quaſi optimè meritos, inter quos Camdenus jure recenſendus, neglexiſſet. Smith. in Vita Camderi, pag. 17.

(f) His name was John Piers.

[C] He publiſhed his Britannia at London in 1586.] This date refutes thoſe who ſay that King James ordered William Camden to make a Deſcription of England. This Deſcription was printed five times one after another at London, before the death of Queen Elizabeth. It does not appear that that Princeſs entred into the Author's deſign: he was engaged in thoſe inquiries by the taſte or natural turn of his genius, and he employed his ſteps and his ſtudies in the execution of his plan, without the leaſt appearance, as I have already ſaid, that the Court had given him any commiſſion on that head, or promiſed him any ſalary (6). There is a fault therefore in the paſſage I am going to cite: I ſhall ſet it down a little at large, becauſe it contains an elogy which cannot be ſuſpected: the public remembers the juſt complaints occaſioned by the relation of Sorbiere (7). "England is the beſt "known of any country in the world; becauſe Cam- "den by King James's order made a deſcription of "it, in the doing of which he ſpent ſeveral years in "travels undertaken for that very purpoſe. He fol- "lowed the courſe of the rivers, and deſcribed what- "ever he met with to the right and left. He made "ſeveral incurſions into the champain country, he pe- "netrated the foreſts, and traverſed the mountains. "So that he diſcovered what was remarkable there, "took the exact poſitions of the ſmalleſt caſtles, and "by the way gave the Hiſtory, the Genealogy, and "the Alliances of all the conſiderable families. His "work makes one of the moſt curious parts of Bleau's "Atlas (8)." Dr. Smith obſerves, that Camden's Britannia makes the fourth part of the Atlas of Janſſonius, printed at Amſterdam in the year 1659, but that it is very much altered in that collection: the Author's method is not kept, the whole is not ſaid that he has ſaid, and they have tacked to his work here and there what others have ſaid, without taking notice what belongs to him, and what belongs to another writer. Nitidiſſimis quidem characteribus, ſed ordine planè diverſo: multis omiſſis, multis quoque è Johannis Speedi aliorumque ſcriptis interpoſitis adjectiſque, ut quid ipſe Camdenus quidve illi ſcripſerint meritò ambigatur (9). If any one would reprint this work, he might be furniſhed with ſeveral corrections and additions made by the Author (10). See the Remark [E] towards the end.

(6) Dr. Smith, pag. 10. gives us only to underſtand that Sir Philip Sidney encouraged the Author, and made him an offer of his friendſhip.

(7) Dr. Sprat publiſhed a Treatiſe in Engliſh againſt Sorbiere's Relation, which Treatiſe being tranſlated into French and augmented by the Author, was printed at Amſterdam in 1675.

(8) Sorbiere, Relation d'Angleterre, pag. 19. of the Dutch edition of 1666.

(9) Smith. in Vitâ Camdeni, pag. 78.

(10) Idem, ibid.

[D] . . . . It was reprinted ſeveral times . . . . the new Editions were conſtantly improved.] It contains matters which are inexhauſtible: ſomething may always be added, becauſe ſomething is always forgotten which might have been ſaid. This is the fate of Dictionaries. There are other ſubjects ſo difficult, ſo obſcure, and loaded with ſo many acceſſories, that all that can be done is to avoid frequent miſtakes. In a word, there are ſeveral reaſons why a book grows perfect by being often printed and reprinted. Frequently, from a very bad book at its firſt appearance, it becomes a good one. It is, however, a diſadvantage to the Author; for he may be told that he made a little too much haſte, and that this work was at firſt but a poor untimely production. This is not our Camden's caſe. The laſt Edition of his Britannia is incomparably better than the firſt; but the firſt is notwithſtanding a good performance. I ſet down the words of Dr. Smith, and I aſſure my ſelf that readers of capacity will not condemn this remark: it is very proper to inſtruct people how they ought to judge of works of a certain nature. And what is there more neceſſary than to form a Reader's judgment, by placing before his eyes certain looſe thoughts choſen from another book? This is the motive which induces me to inſert ſuch kind of detached reflections in this Dictionary; which I deſire may be ſaid once for all. My quotation follows. Cum enim opus ejuſmodi ex argumentorum, quæ in illo tractantur, varietate continui incrementi capax ſit, & tam ingenti rerum hactenus incognitarum, quarum origo aut obſcura aut incerta, copiâ & apparatu referciatur, nemo, qui de biſce ſtudiis rectè, & prout par eſt, judicandi facultate pollet, errores, ſi qui in primis Editionibus reperirentur, non ex levitate & inconſtantiâ mentis, non ex præcipiti inſulſas & nulli fundamento innixas conjecturas, venditandi audaciâ aut inani pruritu, ſed ex defectu debitæ auctoritatis aut mentis non ſemper attentæ variiſque cogitationibus diſtractæ laſſitudine admiſſos, qui vel vigilantiſſimo obrepere poſſint, exprobrare, aut illud omnibus numeris nondum fuiſſe abſolutum miſtis querelis mirari debet. In hoc fœcundi ingenii partu pulchra quidem lineamenta apparuere, & nullo vitio diſtorta compages, quibus novos colores integrumque vigorem inductura eſſet maturior ætas. Hoc nempe erat plurium annorum & cumulatioris experientiæ negotium, ut lucubrationes iſtæ, ſæpè repetitis curis recognitæ, limâque accuratiori perpolitæ, novis auctariis in juſtam decoramque molem demum creſcerent (11). i. e. "For ſince a "work of this kind, by reaſon of the variety of "matters therein treated, is capable of continual ad- "dition, and comprehends ſo vaſt an abundance and "apparatus of things hitherto unknown, the origi- "nal whereof is either obſcure or uncertain, if any "faults ſhould happen to be found in the firſt edi- "tions, which proceed not from levity or inconſtancy "of mind, or from a precipitate boldneſs, or vain "itch of putting off filly and groundleſs conjectures, "but from want of due authority, or the laſſitude of a "mind not perpetually attentive and diverted by va- "rious thoughts, and which may ſurprize the moſt "vigilant writer, no man, who is able to judge right- "ly and equitably of theſe ſtudies, ought to upbraid "the Author with them, or to wonder, and at the ſame "time complain, that his performance is not com- "plete in every reſpect. In this offſpring of a fruit- "ful genius many beautiful lineaments appeared, and "a frame diſtorted by no deformity, which was to "receive new colours and perfect vigour from a riper "age. For this was the buſineſs of many years, and "of more accumulated experience, namely, that theſe "lucubrations, being frequently reviewed with repeat- "ed care, and poliſhed with greater exactneſs, might "at length by new acceſſions riſe to a juſt and decent "ſize." This whole paſſage deſerves to be well weighed.

(11) Idem, ibid. pag. 15.

new Greek Grammar, which appeared in 1597, and was received not only in the School under his own direction, but in all the other public Schools in England. He was taken from this Pedagogue's life the ſame year, to ſucceed Richard Leigh, who had been Clarenceux King at Arms. This dignity expoſed him to the anger of a man, who thinking he deſerved it, and not doubting but that it would be conferred on him, looked on the diſpoſition which was made thereof in favour of another as an affront. To diſſipate his ill humour, and revenge himſelf for the injury he pretended to have received, he attacked Camden's work, and publiſhed (g) a Criticiſm on it full of ſharpneſs and paſſion [E]. Camden anſwered him with a great deal of moderation, juſtified himſelf very learnedly, and convinced him of ſeveral groſs miſtakes. After this he thought he could not employ his leiſure to better purpoſe, than in ſearching after the ancient Hiſtorians of his own Nation; of which he collected ſeveral, and publiſhed them in Germany in the year 1603. It is time I ſhould ſpeak of his Annals of Queen Elizabeth, a Work which has gained him not much leſs reputation than his Britannia. So ſoon as Camden had been promoted to the dignity of King at Arms in the year 1597, Sir William Cecil deſired him to write that Queen's Hiſtory, and promiſed him all ſorts of Memorials: Camden engaged in it; but the death of Cecil, which happened the year following, greatly cooled the ardour with which he had already applied himſelf to that Work, in hopes that ſome other, among ſo many perſons of ability who had been loaden with that Princeſs's favours, would have undertaken it: but ſeeing that no one entered the liſts to publiſh the Hiſtory of ſo glorious a Reign, he reaſſumed his firſt deſign with ardour, omitted no reſearches which might furniſh him with valuable materials, and publiſhed in 1615 the Annals

(g) In the year 1599.

[E] An irritated man . . . attacked his Britannia, and publiſhed a Criticiſm thereon full . . . of paſſion.] This man, whoſe name was Ralph Brooke, was a Herald at Arms by the title of York. Having ſpent two years in examining William Camden's Britannia, he publiſhed a Book in Engliſh intitled, A Diſcovery of certain Errors in the much commended Britannia, very prejudicial to the diſcents and ſucceſſions of the ancient Nobility of this Realm. He publiſhed it without permiſſion, and without naming either the Bookſeller or Printer. He was not ſatisfied with attacking Camden as to genealogical matters, he alſo accuſed him of plagiariſm with reſpect to all the other, that is to ſay, with having pillaged the writings of the learned Leland. Dr. Smith complains that the Author who has publiſhed an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of England has renewed this accuſation of Ralph Brooke, without examining any farther: Cujus ſolius auctoritate fultus ſcriptor quidam ex noſtratibus, utinam ob mentis ſolertiam & judicium pariter ac ob ingenium & induſtriam commendandus, eamdem calumniam credulè reque penitus inexploratâ arripit (12); and he acquaints us that Camden's anſwer ſerved for an Appendix to the fifth Edition of the Britannia, which appeared in the year 1600, dedicated to Queen Elizabeth (13). This Author touched genealogical matters at firſt only ſuperficially; but after he was made King at Arms, he ſtudied them exactly (14), his Office required it, and by this means he rendered himſelf capable of clearing up learnedly in his anſwer a thouſand obſcurities on that head. He owned the charge when he found he had been miſtaken, and denied not but that he had peruſed thoſe writers who had treated of the Art of Heraldry; but ſince he had mentioned them with honour, what room was there for complaint? What I have juſt now ſaid ſhews that the Edition of 1600 excells the preceding ones; but it was much inferior to that of 1607. Therein Camden ſurpaſſed himſelf, and it was then that he principally merited the elogies which have been given him of the Britiſh Varro, Strabo, and Pauſanias. This laſt Edition was accompanied with maps and cuts (15). There is an Abridgment of this work, and an Engliſh Tranſlation. Reinerius Vitellius of Ziric-zee is the Author of the Abridgment; and Philemon Holland, an Engliſh Phyſician, is the Author of the Tranſlation (16). There was an Author who took upon him to diſcover an infinite number of faults in Camden's Britannia, but it has not yet appeared that he ever made good his promiſe. [Illud ditiſſimum & uberrimum Antiquitatum Britannicarum penu, non minore fide & judicio quam curâ & methodo digeſtum ordinatumque, omnes harum rerum ſtudioſi bonique judices agnoverunt,] excepto unico D. Simondſio Deweſio, qui neſcio quo invidiæ æſtro percitus, ſe in Magnæ Britanniæ, quam dolitus eſt, Hiſtoria, vix unam in ipſius Camdeni toties celebratâ Britanniâ paginam ſuis carere erroribus oſtenſurum contendit. Sed hoc decantatum opus Hiſtoricum nec ipſe nec alii poſt quinquaginta annos hactenus in lucem produxerunt (17). i. e. [" All lovers and competent judges " of theſe things allowed that work to be a moſt rich " and plentiful ſtorehouſe of Britiſh Antiquities, di- " geſted and methodized with no leſs fidelity and judg- " ment than care and order,] except only Sir Symonds " D'Ewes, who ſtung with envy, gave out that in " the Hiſtory of Great Britain, which he was prepar- " ing, he would demonſtrate that there was ſcarce a " page in Camden's ſo much celebrated Britannia with- " out its faults. But this boaſted Hiſtorical perfor- " mance has not as yet, after fifty years expectation, " been publiſhed either by himſelf or any body " elſe."

(12) Smith. in Vitâ Camdeni, pag. 24. He puts in the margin, in Hiſtoria Eccleſiaſticâ Britanniæ (hoc enim magnifico titulo iſtam Rhapſodiam inſignire placuit) Libro 5. pag. 198.

(13) The firſt edition was dedicated to Sir William Cecil.

(14) Smith. pag. 25.

(15) It was in folio; the three firſt were in 8vo, and the two following in 4to. Idem, pag. 78.

(16) Idem, ibid.

(17) Idem, ibid. pag. 45, 46: he puts in the margin, in literis ad Jac. Uſſer. 28 Sept. datis quæ exſtant in Uſſerianarum Epiſtolarum Sylloge, pag. 496. It was D'Ewes therefore who was to ſhew ſo many faults.

Since the firſt Edition of this Dictionary, I have ſeen a work in folio, printed at London in the year 1695, and intitled, Camden's Britannia newly tranſlated into Engliſh: with large Additions and Improvements, publiſhed by Edmund Gibſon, of Queen's College in Oxford. One of the motives which induced the publication of this new Engliſh Tranſlation (18) was that Dr. Holland, who had done the other, had inſerted therein ſeveral things of his own. Theſe interpolations, which a great many Readers could not diſtinguiſh, have occaſioned ſome Writers to alledge the authority and teſtimony of Camden to prove facts which he never advanced. They took that for the original which ſhould only have been conſidered as patches tacked to it by the Tranſlator. Mr. Gibſon was therefore of opinion, that to prevent any one's falling into this inconvenience for the future, it was neceſſary to give a Tranſlation of Camden purged from all foreign interpolations. So that for the time to come they who have a mind to cite Camden will run no riſque of making a falſe quotation. But becauſe Dr. Holland's Additions are ſometimes good, and it was generally believed that he had conſulted Camden himſelf when he met with any obſcurities, Mr. Gibſon has preſerved them, and placed them under the text in a ſmaller character. Here are ſome other things which greatly inhance the value of this new verſion. Remarks have been added at the end of each County, either to confirm what Camden had advanced, or elſe to give a more particular account of the places which he had deſcribed, or the deſcription of places which he had not ſpoken of. Every part of the text to which theſe Additions refer is marked with a letter, whereby the Commentary belonging to it may be eaſily found. Mr. Gibſon has given a liſt of the perſons who have furniſhed him with materials. It is enough of it ſelf to prevent one in favour of his Remarks, and to ſhew that great pains are taken in England in illuſtrating the Antiquities of that country, and making the moſt exact Topographies. He has alſo given a Life of our Camden, which is little more than an Abridgment of that publiſhed by Dr. Smith. Take notice he obſerves, that in the ſpace of three years, he publiſhed at London three Editions of Camden's Britannia.

(18) It was done by ſeveral hands. A new edition of it was publiſhed in 1722.

Annals of England and Ireland, from the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, to the year 1689. This Work, which is in Latin, was received with applauſe, and it muſt be acknowledged that the matter could not have been treated with more judgment and gravity, with more exactneſs, or with greater clearneſs of ſtyle. The continuation of theſe Annals, finiſhed about the year 1607, appeared not till after the Author's death (b). He would never conſent to publiſh it in his life-time, and to prevent all ſorts of accidents, he ſent a copy of it to Peter du Puy at Paris (i). Some have pretended that King James had made him ſtrike out and add ſeveral things in the firſt Part in favour of the Queen his mother [F]; and this ſtory, true or falſe, keeps up Hiſtorical Pyrrhoniſm with regard (b) The whole Work has been tranſlated into French by Paul de Belligent, Advocate in the Parliament of Paris. It is alſo tranſlated into Engliſh.

(i) See the Remark [H], citation (40).

[F] Some have pretended that King James had made him ſtrike out and add ſeveral things in the firſt part of his Annals in favour of the Queen his mother.] Lewis du Moulin, a truſty ſervant of Cromwell's, and a violent Independent, aſſerted in an Oration which he pronounced at Oxford in praiſe of Camden, that the flatterers of King James had abominably defiled Camden's Hiſtory, by thruſting into it ſeveral things contrary to the Author's ſentiment. Criminantur alii, inter quos * Ludovicus Molinæus, in rebus Angliæ turbandis a primis impii belli civilis incendiis occupatiſſimus, tyrannidis Cromwellianæ ſtrenuus aſſertor, & poſt auſpicatiſſimum R. Caroli II reditum adverſus Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ ritus & diſciplinam ſcriptor maledicentiſſimus, aliam manum acceſſiſſe, præter haud dubio mentem Auctoris, unde opus fœdè commaculatum ſuit, hiſce corruptelis in Aulæ Regiæ adulatores, ut ille pro ſolito candore & modeſtiâ loquitur, traductis derivatiſque (19). Dr. Smith rejects this as a notorious calumny, and maintains that Camden might as an honeſt man and a faithful Hiſtorian relate the Revolution of Scotland, and the adventures of the unfortunate Queen Mary, in another manner than Buchanan has done: and that therefore ſincerity and prudence both concurred in obliging him to ſay ſome things which tend to the juſtification of that Princeſs. He adds, that it is to be preſumed, if Camden ſubmitted his book to the cenſure of the King his Maſter, that it was only with a view of rectifying what might have been not ſtrictly conformable to truth. Neque aliâ de cauſâ Sereniſſimi Regis Jacobi aut illius Nobiliſſimi Viri a Rege fortean deputati, ad quem ſcripſit . . . . cenſuræ Annalium Supplementum, ut par eſt credere, ſubjecit, quàm ut veritas magis magiſque eruueretur, & ſi quicquam ipſi minus intento aut non probè edocto ſubrepſiſſet, regiis caris limatum emendaretur (20). It is certain that Lewis du Moulin is not the firſt who has ſaid that Additions were made to Camden's Book: for ſo early as the year 1620, there was a Scottiſh Gentleman †, whoſe father was deeply concerned in the troubles of Scotland, who complained of the Annals of William Camden on that very account. Quinquennio poſt emiſſam in dii luminis auram Hiſtoriam D. Metallanus de patris ſui Baronis Lidingtoniæ, qui turbatiſſimis Scotiæ rebus, RR. Maria & Jacobo regnantibus, multum momenti & ponderis authoritate ſuâ & conſiliis addiderat, famâ ſolicitus, Camdeno moleſtiam faceſſivit, ac ſi non motu proprio & ex ſe, ſed ex aliorum invidiâ & in parentem malignitate clauſulis inſititiis eam exagitâſſet (21).

* Oratione in laudem G. Camdeni, habitâ Oxonii, x Julii 1652.

(19) Smith. in Vitâ Camdeni, pag. 54.

(20) Ibid. pag. 55.

† His name was Maitland: he was ſon to the Lord Lidington.

(21) Ibid. pag. 57.

Dr. Smith (22) complains of a modern Author, who accuſes Camden of having blown hot and cold, I mean of having furniſhed Thuanus with Memoirs very different from what he afterwards publiſhed in his Annals. The modern Author pretends that Thuanus complained of it, and reproached Camden with this inconſtancy with ſome indignation. This principally regards the troubles of Scotland, and it is on this head only that the friends of Buchanan, and the enemies of King James's mother, maintain that Camden's Annals were altered. Dr. Smith firſt takes notice that this envious adverſary of William Camden produces no reaſon which can give any ſhadow of certainty to this reproach; and then he obſerves, that Mr. de Liſle having in 1606 (23) ſettled a friendly and epiſtolary correſpondence between Thuanus and Camden, the latter ſincerely anſwered the requeſt which Thuanus had made him. Thuanus aſked him whether he liked his Hiſtory: Camden anſwered him, that he had found therein ſeveral particulars relating to the affairs of Scotland which had no foundation, or but a weak one, and which had been borrowed from a Writer ‡ who had ſet all his malice and wit at work to blacken Queen Mary. Pro amore veritatis & amicitiæ jure, id quoque rogatus, monet quaſdam rerum Scoticarum narrationes aut nullo aut debili prorſus fundamento niti, Buchanumque, a quo illas acceperat, omnes tum ingenii tum malitiæ nervos contendiſſe ut Mariæ Reginæ famam ſpurciſſimis convitiis læderet (24). Dr. Smith adds, I, that Thuanus teſtified a great deal of regret for having incurred the cenſure and anger of King James, by adhering to Buchanan's Hiſtory. II, That Camden by order of King James his maſter made a Liſt of the falſhoods which had been found in Thuanus, with reſpect to the troubles of Scotland (25), and ſent it to that great Hiſtorian. III, That if Thuanus had received theſe informations time enough, he would not have been ſo partial againſt Queen Mary, and for the Earl of Murray; nor would he afterwards have had recourſe to the vain excuſes which he formed. IV, That all who weigh theſe Remarks well, will be convinced that Camden did not write things to Thuanus different from what he afterwards publiſhed in his Annals of Queen Elizabeth. Hæc ſeriò penſitanti non aliter Camdenum ad Thuanum, aut ab iis diverſa quæ poſt in Annalibus poſuit, olim ſcripſiſſe, quicquid in contrarium fingitur, vero verius eſſe videbitur (26).

(23) Literis per D. Inſulanum . . . anno M.DC.VI. miſſis. Smith. in vitâ Camdeni, pag. 52. If there is not a fault of the preſs here, Thuanus's firſt Letter to Camden is not rightly dated. See below the Citation (27).

‡ Buchanan.

(24) Smith. in Vitâ Camdeni, pag. 52.

(25) This liſt is printed at the end of Camden's Letters.

(26) Smith. in Vitâ Camdeni, pag. 54.

It muſt be confeſſed that theſe Conſiderations have ſome force: for, I, the Letter which Thuanus wrote to Camden in the month of February 1605, ſhews that they were not yet acquainted. Vix ſperaveram, ut rogatus à me faceres quod ſolâ D. Inſulani amiciſſimi viri commendatione feciſti. Quid enim ſum ut ſeria tua ſtudia tantiſper remorer? Camdenum in meis legendis jacturam bonarum horarum feciſſe? tanto hominem ſibi IGNOTUM beneficio devinxiſſe (27)? Camden had read Thuanus's Books at the requeſt of Mr. de Liſle: Thuanus admiring that Camden had taken that pains for an Author who was unknown to him, and who had not himſelf requeſted it of him, returns him the more hearty thanks. We may be ſure, therefore, that it was the firſt time he wrote to him. But at that time the Books of his Hiſtory which treat of the troubles of Scotland were already in the preſs (28); wherefore he had not compoſed them from the Memoirs of Camden. II. He conſults him in the ſame Letter: he knows that King James is angry with Buchanan, he knows not whether Buchanan was not too bitter (29), he would not offend the Engliſh Court, but he cannot prevail on himſelf to ſuppreſs real facts: he therefore deſires Camden to aſſiſt him with his counſel in ſo delicate a conjuncture. He aſks him for no Memoirs (30), but only a word of advice: Scribe, & amico conſilii inopi tuum ne denega. Innuere VERBO potes, nec opus eſt ut DISTINCTIUS ſcribas (31). III. The particulars of Camden's Anſwer are not known; but we know that he adviſed him to obſerve a great deal of moderation: for when Thuanus towards the end of July 1606, ſent him the ſecond volume of his Hiſtory, he tells him that he is apprehenſive of not having every where kept the temperament which he (Camden) had adviſed him to (32); and thereupon he draws up a very ſpecious Apology for the Earl of Murray, in order to ſhelter himſelf under it. IV. The event ſhewed him that his apprehenſion was but too well grounded. King James was highly exaſperated againſt him, and ordered William Camden to ſend him a Liſt of faults relating to the troubles of Scotland. V. It appears from a Letter of Thuanus, dated the 13th of April 1608, that Camden had not yet furniſhed him with any Memoirs, if you except only what he had ſent him concerning Ireland: for Thuanus teſtifies that he would very gladly have received the like inſtructions with reſpect to England and Scotland; and in that caſe he doubted not but he ſhould have kept ſuch meaſures as would have ſatisfied the Court of England. What can be deſired more deciſive againſt thoſe who have given out that Camden communicated (27) Pag. 68 Epiſtolar. Camdeni.

(28) Ibid.

(29) Acerbius hæc FORTASSE à Buchanano ſcripta, & audio diſcipulum præceptori ob id ſuccenſere, & tamen quia geſta ſunt citra flagitium diſſimulari non poſſunt. Pag. 68 Epiſtolar. Camdeni.

(30) Obſerve, however, that he asks of him ſome Memoirs for Ireland, and promiſes to make good uſe of the Remarks which he had received from him on the Volume already printed; to make good uſe of them, I ſay, in the next Edition.

(31) Pag. 68 Epiſtolar. Camdeni.

(32) Mitto ad te . . . ſecundum Hiſtoriarum noſtrarum tomum, ſed valdè vereor ut temperamentum illud de quo moneras in rerum Scoticarum narratione ubique ſervaverim. Pag. 73 Epiſtol. Camdeni.

gard to the adventures of that Princeſs [G]. The ſending the copy to Peter du Puy miniſters occaſion to ſome ſuſpicions [H]. Camden, not contented with having employed his communicated to Thuanus certain particulars which he did not afterwards put into his own Annals? We ſhall ſee preſently that Thuanus laments, that for want of Camden's aſſiſtance, he had been obliged ſolely to follow Buchanan. In Hibernicis jam multum profeci.... Utinam quæ veſtra ſunt, & ad univerſam Britanniam ſpectant, pari compendio & ſimplicitate ſcripſiſſes. Sic enim factum eſſet, ut temperamentum, quod in Scoticis à me quidam fortaſſe ſunt deſideraturi, tuis veſtigiis inſiſtens, facilius ſecutus eſſem, & in veſtratium Magnatum offenſionem, quam vitatam cupiebam, non incurriſſem. Sed cum neminem haberem præter Buchananum, neceſſe mihi omninò fuit ſeriem illius tragicæ narrationis per alios eoſque Religioni Proteſtantium minimè addictos antea adprobatæ, petere: cæterum omni inſectatione omiſſâ (33). VI. A Letter (34), which Thuanus wrote to Camden in the year 1613, ſhews indeed that he had received ſome Memoirs from England; wherein Camden had a conſiderable ſhare; but it was Sir Robert Cotton who had ſent them to him by the order of King James: from whence we ought to conclude, that theſe Memoirs were conformable to thoſe which Camden has followed in his Annals. What therefore could occaſion the reproaches which it is pretended Thuanus made him? VII. To conclude, among the Letters written to Camden, and publiſhed by Dr. Smith, there is not one of Thuanus's, or of Mr. du Puy's, or from any body elſe, which makes mention of thoſe reproaches. See the remark [H].

Biſhop Gibſon has vigorouſly oppoſed the report which has been ſpread of theſe pretended complaints of the French Hiſtorian. He examines the circumſtances very cloſely, and draws ſtrong reaſons from them. His argument is to this effect: Thuanus writing to Camden, when he ſent him the ſecond Volume of his Hiſtory, begins by making his excuſes to him, and tells him he is afraid he has not exactly followed his advice in the account of the affairs of Scotland; and towards the end of the ſame Letter he ſays, that he has related thoſe things as he had learnt them from ſome Scots-men who were eye-witneſſes, and by whoſe ſcale he had weighed the Writings of Buchanan. Is it not a proof, either that he had not received any Memoir from William Camden, or that he had made no uſe of what he might have received from him? Add to this, that if he had fallen into any miſtake, and if he had offended his Britannic Majeſty by having followed Camden's informations, he had reaſon to promiſe himſelf that this latter would have excuſed him for it to that Prince. Candour and good manners required in that caſe, that William Camden ſhould have made his excuſes to Thuanus in a very particular manner, and have acknowledged himſelf to have been then in a miſtake; but that his diſcourſes with the King, and reading of the public Records, had made him acquainted with the truth. This doubtleſs is what Camden ought to have done ſome where or other in his Critical Remarks on Thuanus's Hiſtory: but he has not done it; he only criticiſes; he mixes ſome ſharpneſs in his cenſure; and greatly blames Thuanus for having followed Buchanan more cloſely than he ought. Can one reaſonably believe that Thuanus, attacked in this manner, would not have ſhewn his reſentment, and have written to his Cenſurer, If I have been miſtaken, it is your ſelf who is the cauſe of it? He muſt even ſo early as then have reproached him with what it is ſaid he did not reproach him till after he had read the firſt volume of the Annals of Queen Elizabeth (35). There are a thouſand traditions of this nature, which are received for ages together throughout a whole Kingdom, without having any other foundation than the fancies of a prejudiced party, full of ſuſpicion and artifice. Examine them a little cloſely, take the trouble to ſearch for proofs to the contrary, and they vaniſh into ſmoke.

[G] ... And this ſtory ... keeps up hiſtorical Pyrrhoniſm with regard to the adventures of Mary Stuart.] Thoſe who favour the cauſe of the Scots cite Buchanan, and thoſe who favour Queen Mary cite Camden. In this competition the prejudices would be againſt Buchanan. I. A rambling gadding life, as his was, and ſo many Verſes written by him, ſatyrical on one hand, laſcivious and immodeſt on the other, do not at all prevent one in his favour, and hinder us at leaſt from conceiving ſo good an opinion of his probity, as of the virtue of Camden, who always lived like a prudent man and without reproach. II. Beſides, Camden was not perſonally intereſted in the juſtification of Queen Mary, as Buchanan was perſonally intereſted in the blackening of her. Buchanan was very deeply engaged in the faction which dethroned and expelled that Queen: he was a party concerned therefore in a conduct which would become moſt execrable, if that Queen was not extremely guilty; whereas the more abominable the crimes of that Princeſs were, the leſs would thoſe be blamed who expelled her. I have elſewhere (36) touched on this conſideration: Dr. Smith has not forgotten it; I quote him in the margin (37). III. Buchanan had for his patron the head of the party which dethroned Mary Stuart; and on the other ſide, Camden had a thouſand obligations to Queen Elizabeth. Therefore Buchanan writes a Manifeſto for his Mæcenas, by loading Queen Mary; but what Camden owns in diſcharge of Mary is a ſtain in the memory of Queen Elizabeth. IV. To conclude, Buchanan is an enemy to the Roman Catholics, and Camden alſo. This conformity of Religion puts a great inequality between their teſtimonies; Buchanan's is weakened by it; but Camden's is ſtrengthened: The Roman Catholic Writers, who are extravagant Panegyriſts of Mary, have not failed to make their adverſaries obſerve that they juſtified her, not by citing the work of ſome Monk, or zealous Papiſt, but by citing a Heretic, the Hiſtoriographer of Queen Elizabeth his benefactreſs.

If there were nothing to ſet againſt this, they who are determined by the greater probability would not continue one moment in Hiſtorical Pyrrhoniſm: but we may alledge againſt them that Camden wrote under a Prince, who, as ſon to Mary, ought to wiſh that Elizabeth's reign were blackened rather than his mother's; and that no one therefore ought to wonder at that Annaliſt's having in certain particulars ſacrificed the glory of the late Queen to the affection of the reigning Prince. Beſides, Camden was not the leſs adverſe to the Scottiſh Puritans, for being an enemy to the Catholics. Every body knows in what manner the Epiſcoparians do even at this day treat the maxims of Buchanan and his faction (38). This is what may be ſaid to invalidate the teſtimony of Camden, and this is what they actually ſay. They ſay his Work was caſtrated by King James's order, and that the gaps which this made ſerved to receive other paſſages more agreeable to that Prince's mind. On this ſuppoſition, all the advantages which the Catholics pretend to draw from the Annals of Queen Elizabeth are overturned. But is this ſuppoſition true? I cannot tell. Is it certain? If it were, Dr. Smith, a Prieſt of the Church of England, would not have dared to deny it. Is it a ſubject of Pyrrhoniſm? Without doubt; ſince even at London ſome deny it, and others affirm it. We are going to ſpeak of a thing that renders it probable; which is that Camden ſent a Copy of his ſecond Volume to Paris. Is it not a ſign he was afraid that his manuſcript would be altered? Was not this fear a ſufficient mark that he had already paſſed through that trial? If it be not a ſufficient mark, is it not at leaſt a pretext for contention, and a prop to diſpute?

[H] The ſending the Copy to Peter du Puy miniſters occaſion to ſome ſuſpicions.] This is all that can reaſonably be ſaid, ſince there are ſeveral other conſiderations, which might determine the Author to act in that manner. And indeed Dr. Smith mentions two or three without ſo much as thinking of that which others aſſign

" to reaſon by compulſion, if they offend againſt the Laws, that the people and inferior
" Magiſtrates may reform Religion and the Commonwealth by force of arms, in ſpite
" of thoſe who enjoy the ſupreme power, and other maxims of this kind, which de-
" ſtroy Religion itſelf, and bring certain ruin on mankind; and hence did theſe
" calumnies againſt Queen Mary publiſhed in the Hiſtory of Scotland, and eſpeci-
" ally in that infamous Libel, intitled the Detection, take their birth." Smith. in Vitâ Camdeni, pag. 53. edit. Londin. 1691.

(33) In Epiſt. Camdeni, pag. 97.

(34) Ibid. pag. 139.

(35) Extracted from the Life of Camden, written by Biſhop (then Mr.) Gibſon, and prefixed to the new Engliſh Tranſlation of Camden's Britannia.

(36) In the Remark [C] of the Article BUCHANAN.

(37) Buchananum a quo illas acceperat, omnes tum ingenii tum malitiæ nervos contendiſſe, ut Mariæ Reginæ famam ſpurciſſimis convitiis læderet: qui non aliter ſperare poterat, ſe perfidiam & flagitioſa rebellium ſubditorum, qui vindicandæ Religionis & Legum Scotiæ violatarum ſpecie & prætextu arma ſumpſiſſent, facinora poſſe tueri. Smith. in Vita Camdeni, pag. 52, 53.

(38) Hinc iſta impia dogmata, omne jus regnandi à populo, Reges in ordinem cogendos, ſi contra leges deliquerint, licere populo & inferioribus magiſtratibus vi & armis religionem & rempubliçam, invitis qui ſummo imperio potiuntur, reformare, & ejuſmodi reliqua, quæ ipſam religionem tollunt, certamque humano generi perniciem inferunt: hinc in rerum Scoticarum Hiſtoriâ & potiſſimum in iſto infami Libello, qui Detectio inſcribitur, calumniæ in R. Mariam enatæ. i. e. "Hence, that is to ſay, from what had been done in Scotland againſt Mary Stuart, " have " proceeded thoſe " impious doc- " trines, that all " right of Sove- " reignty proceeds " from the people, " that Kings " muſt be brought his pen in the ſervice of the Republic of Letters, reſolved alſo to beſtow part of his Eſtate in founding a Lecture in Hiſtory in the Univerſity of Oxford. He delivered the Deeds of this new foundation in 1622, and named Degory Whear for the firſt Profeſſor. He died the 9th of November 1623, at a houſe in the country (k), where, from the year 1609, he had paſſed all the time he could be abſent from London. He had directed by his will that he ſhould be buried where he died; but the Executors of that Will did not follow his intention in that particular: they interred him pompouſly in Weſtminſter Abbey. The Univerſity of Oxford paid him great honours, and continue ſo to do. Let us conclude with ſaying that he was not leſs illuſtrious for his virtues than for his learning. He was firm to his Religion (l), and ſo modeſt that he refuſed the title of Knight. He was ſincere, of a ſweet temper, affable, and a good friend: he hated ſlander, both from the tongue

(k) It was at Chiſſelhurſt, ten miles from London.

(l) It was that of the Epiſcopal Church.

aſſign as the only one; I mean, he has not dropped the leaſt word which may inſinuate that paſt experience made Camden believe that King James would give the other part of his Annals to be corrected. I ſhall ſet down Dr. Smith's words and citations. [Cum verò moleſtiam, invidiam, obtrectationem, & odium à quibuſdam malevolis, fato cum cæteris Hiſtoriarum Scriptoribus qui veritati litârunt communi, inde ſibi quoque ex vitio & malignitate ſui ſeculi creari offendiſſet,] mentem contra alterius tomi, dum viveret, editionem nullis machinamentis expugnandum obſirmavit. Ut poſteritati tamen, quæ abſque affectu ſolet judicare, integer ſervaretur, nec incendio aut quocunque triſti caſu deletus, aut malignorum hominum invidiâ ſuppreſſus intercideret, Apographum fideliſſimè exſcriptum (Archetypo, quod in Bibliothecâ Cottonianâ conſervatur, apud ſe retento) tanquam ſacrum depoſitum Petri Puteani curæ & fidei concredidit †, & eò quidem libentiùs, magni Thuani exemplum ſibi ob oculos ponens, cujus Hiſtoriarum reliqua pars ante mortem inedita, cum eam publicæ luci donare Curatoribus Teſtamenti non liceret (39), forſan periiſſet, niſi mens periculi præſaga, exemplari † apud Virum integerrimum nobiliſſimumque Georgium Michaelem Lingelſhemium relicto, iſtud damnum prudentiſſimè antevertiſſet (40). i. e. "[But when he found that, by a fate common to other "Hiſtorians who have religiouſly adhered to truth, the "vice and malignity of his own age had thence alſo cre-"ated him trouble, envy, detraction, and ill will from "ſome malevolent people,] he ſet a firm and unconquer-"able reſolution not to publiſh the ſecond Part in his life-"time. However, that it might be preſerved entire "for poſterity, which is accuſtomed to judge without "affection, and might neither be deſtroyed by fire or "any other ſad miſchance, nor be ſuppreſſed by the "envy of malicious men, he intruſted a very faithful "Copy, (retaining the Original, which is now preſerv-"ed in the Cotton Library, in his own hands,) as a "ſacred Depoſitum, to the care and fidelity of Peter "du Puy; and this he the rather did, as he ſet be-"fore his eyes the example of the great Thuanus, the "remaining part of whoſe Hiſtory, not printed be-"fore his death, which the Executors of his Will "were not allowed (39) to publiſh, would probably "have periſhed, had not he, foreſeeing the danger, "very wiſely prevented that loſs by leaving a copy "with the upright and noble George Michael Lingelſ-"heim." It is even true that the Annaliſt might fear leſt the Continuation of his Work might be altered, though he had not experienced the like with reſpect to the firſt Volume: for a Book is much more ſubject to accidents after the Author's death than during his life; and Camden had reſolved to hinder the Continuation of his Annals from being printed ſo long as he lived: I add, that they frighted him with the riſque which Thuanus's Hiſtory had ran, and exhorted him to imitate that Preſident's precaution. Here is what Peireſkius wrote to him in the year 1620. "If that of "Thuanus had been to be found no where but in his "own ſtudy, it ran the hazard of being ſuppreſſed; "for his Executors, who were Guardians to his chil-"dren, had a mind to throw it into the fire for "ſome private ends. Mr. Lingelſheim, with whom "Thuanus had intruſted a Copy, has ſaved all. If "Grotius had believed me above ſix months before his "misfortune, there would have been a copy of his "Hiſtory in this Kingdom, which would be no longer "at the diſcretion of his enemies or of thoſe who en-"vied him. For God's ſake think of your own, "and if you do not care to put it to the preſs in your "life-time, let there be more than one copy of it, "and let them not be all on your ſide the water (41)." It is very poſſible Camden might apprehend, not the ſtriking out or adding of a few lines, but a total ſuppreſſion, ſuch as that which Thuanus's manuſcript would have undergone, if timely proviſion had not been made againſt it. However it be, let us give an account of a Diſpute which made ſome noiſe in the year 1687.

† V. etiam V. Cl. Petri Puteani Vitam, à Rigaltio conſcriptam, Pariſiis, 1652, 4to, pag. 50, & Epiſtolâ CCLVII pag. 310.

(39) Non liberet, i. e. were not willing, would agree better with the paſſage of Peireskius which will be quoted immediately.

† V. Epiſt. CCXLVI. pag. 310.

(40) Smith. in Vitâ Camdeni, pag. 58.

(41) Camden's Letters, pag. 310.

It was occaſioned by theſe words: "Camden has "written this Hiſtory with ſo much judgment, and ſo "little partiality, that it got him the friendſhip and "eſteem of Thuanus, who after Camden's death pub-"liſhed the ſecond Volume of his Work, from a ma-"nuſcript copy of it, which had been ſent him by "the Author (42)." They were anſwered in the following manner: It is not true that Mr. de Thou was the perſon who publiſhed after Camden's death the laſt Part of his Hiſtory; and the ſame Camden, according to the character which is given of him, was too diſcreet a man to burden a Preſident au Mortier with a piece of work ſo unworthy of him as the publiſhing his Book would have been. I have often heard the laſt Mr. du Puy ſay that it was himſelf to whom Camden had applied for that purpoſe, and that he had diſcharged himſelf of that truſt with his own hand. It is no proof that Camden's Hiſtory is not partial, becauſe Mr. de Thou cauſed it to be reprinted: on the contrary, it is the greateſt mark of his partiality that can be produced, ſince all the world knows that Preſident tranſcribed whatever he relates of the affairs of England and Scotland, to the year 1570, from Buchanan, who paſſes for the moſt partial of the modern Writers. The late Mr. le Chere de St. Martin has ſeveral times declared in my preſence, that in the vacation of the year 1620, going with Mr. de Thou's eldeſt ſon to ſalute King James at his palace of Whiteball, his Majeſty made the ſame Mr. de Thou ſo bitter a reproach for what his father had written in prejudice of the truth againſt Queen Mary Stuart his mother, that it coſt him a fit of ſickneſs of three months (43). A reply was made to this which I am going to copy: "I am here obliged to relate the Hiſtory of Camden's "manuſcript in a more particular manner than I had "at firſt judged neceſſary. Mr. de Thou, having "formed the deſign of writing his General Hiſtory, "eſtabliſhed correſpondences throughout all Europe, "with people who in appearance were able to give "him exact information of what he deſired to "know. He kept a very ſtrict one with Camden, "and when the firſt volume of that Author appeared, "he wrote to him and reproached him, that he found "his Hiſtory agreed not with what he had written to "Mr. de Thou in his Letters, and particularly in "what concerned the affair of the Queen of Scots. "Upon this, Camden told him the truth, which was "that King James would abſolutely review that Hi-"ſtory himſelf, and had afterwards put it into the "hands of the Earl of Northampton, brother to the "Duke of Norfolk, who had been beheaded for that "very affair, ſo that ſeveral things had been ſtruck "out of his book, and ſeveral others had been altered. "This touched Camden to the quick: he took care "the ſecond part ſhould not run the ſame riſque, and "ſent it into France to Mr. de Thou, to the end it "might be faithfully printed after his death. This is "a fact well known in England, and the care which "he took to ſend this ſecond part beyond ſea to a "ſtranger, may eaſily convince one that the true "cauſe of it has been now aſſigned. I do not believe, "indeed, that a Preſident au Mortier went to the "Bookſellers of that time to ſell the Manuſcript, or "to correct the preſs. If a man of Mr. du Puy's "quality and learning took care that it ſhould be "faithfully printed, Mr. de Thou did nothing beneath "his dignity, when he agreed to become the Depo-"ſitary of ſo excellent a piece; and he perfectly well "acquitted himſelf of all that he was obliged to do (42) Dr. Burnet's Reflections on Mr. Varillas's Hiſtory of the Revolutions, &c. Or Critique du IX Livre de Mr. Varillas, pag. 33. of the Amſterdam edition of 1686.

(43) Reponſe de Mr. Varillas à la Critique de Mr. Burnet, pag. 77. of the Dutch edition of 1687.

tongue and from the pen: he bore no envy to his neighbour, and was not at all revengeful. With theſe good qualities it is no wonder that he had ſo great a number of illuſtrious friends in England, and in foreign countries. His application to ſtudy hindred him from travelling abroad, or engaging himſelf in a married ſtate (m) [I]. Several Letters, which he had received or written, were publiſhed at London, in the year 1691, by Dr. Smith, who has joined thereto a Piece of his own, which is very curious and well written; I mean the Life of William Camden. A great many particulars are to be found therein; among which that concerning the reſentment of a Gentleman, who had a female Relation mentioned with diſhonour in the Books of this able Writer, is not the leaſt conſiderable [K]. We alſo find there that our Author did not always put his name to the Books which he publiſhed [L]; and that the loſs of one part of the Memoirs which he made uſe of in compoſing his Annals [M] has been very ſenſible to all the curious. We

(m) Extracted from his Life, written by Dr. Thomas Smith, and prefixed to his Letters, publiſhed by the ſame Author at London, in 1691, in 4to.

" with regard to that Depoſit, when he entruſted his " couſin with it. It is true that King James reproached Mr. de Thou the ſon with his father's having " copied the invectives of Buchanan againſt Queen " Mary; but Mr. de Thou muſt have been very ſenſible, to be ſick three months on that account (44)." The firſt of theſe three paſſages has not been well criticiſed, and we may very well place to the Critic's account, by reaſon of his ſilence, theſe two miſtakes: firſt, that the publiſhing of the Annals procured William Camden the friendſhip of Thuanus; and ſecondly, that Thuanus ſurvived Camden. I have ſhewn in the Remark [F], that the friendſhip and epiſtolary correſpondence between theſe two great Hiſtorians began in the year 1605, ten years before the Annals of Queen Elizabeth had ſeen the light. It is certain that Thuanus died the 17th of May 1617, above ſix years before Camden. I do not know what the ſame Critic would have ſaid as to the third paſſage, in caſe he had rejoined; but I am ſure he would not have produced the real proofs which ſhew that Thuanus was not concerned in the Edition of the ſecond Volume of Camden, nor was the Depoſitary of the Manuſcript. The beſt proofs of this are to be found, not in the Life of Peter du Puy (45), but in Camden's Letters. The CXLVII was written to him by Peter du Puy, a few days before the death of Thuanus (46). At that time Peter du Puy knew by hear-ſay only that the Annals of Queen Elizabeth were finiſhed: he tells the Author that the Continuation of them was daily expected. He wrote the ſame thing to him ſome months after (47). We have ſeen above what Peireſkius wrote to him in the year 1620. Peter du Puy wrote to him in the month of November the ſame year. He had not yet that Manuſcript depoſited with him, but he expected it. Cum de Hiſtoria tua agis, & de me depoſitario cogitas, non malè certè cogitas, fidelem enim & verè amicum hac in re experieris: tantum effice ut tutò ad me perferatur (48). i. e. " When you ſpeak of your Hiſtory, and think of me for the depoſitary, you " certainly do not think amiſs; for you ſhall find me " a truſty and real friend in this affair: only take care " that it be conveyed ſafely to me." I belive he ſent it to Holland after the Author's death: it was printed at Leyden in the year 1625.

(44) Defence of the Reflections &c. Or Defenſe de la Critique de Mr. Varillas, pag. 60. of the Amſterdam edition of 1688.

(45) Servavit etiam (Petrus Puteanus) Camdeni partem alteram Elizabethæ Britannorum Reginæ, quam Auctor ſe vivo edere non auſus penes Puteanum deponi curaverat. i. e. " He (Peter du Puy) alſo preſerved the ſecond part of Camden's Elizabeth, which the Author not daring to publiſh in his life-time, had taken care to depoſit with Du Puy." Rigaltius in Vita Puteani, pag. 663. in Collectione Bateſii. If this is not the beſt proof, it is at leaſt a good one.

(46) IV Kal. Junii 1617.

(47) III Kal. VIIbris 1617.

(48) Epiſt. Camd. pag. 310.

(49) Smith. in Vita Camdeni, pag. 72.

(50) This Letter is the XCVIIth among thoſe of Camden, pag. 137.

[I] His application to ſtudy hindred him from travelling abroad, or ingaging in marriage.] With regard to the latter, theſe are the words of Dr. Smith. Ut a literis neutiquam avocaretur, Ortelii, Joſephi Scaligeri, Nicolai Fabri, aliorumque, quorum fama melius ſcriptis ex fœcundiſſimo cerebro prognatis quam longâ nepotum ſerie in omne ævum propagabitur, exempla æmulatus, opulentis matrimoniis, quæ multa ſtudiorum impedimenta allatura prævidiſſet, vitam prætulit cælibem, ſancti propoſiti uſque & uſque retinentiſſimus (49). i. e. " That " nothing might take him off from his Books, in imitation of Ortelius, Joſeph Scaliger, Nicholas Faber, " and others, whoſe fame will be tranſmitted to future ages by their writings, the offſpring of their " fertile brain, better than by a long ſeries of deſcendants, he choſe to lead a ſingle life rather than to " marry advantageouſly, foreſeeing that matrimony " would bring along with it many hindrances to ſtudy; " and he kept his good reſolution to the laſt." As to travelling, the Author of his Life obſerves that Claudius Joubert was miſtaken, when he wrote to Camden from Dijon, in the year 1612 (50), that he called to mind with pleaſure the time they had paſſed together at Padua; Camden having never ſtirred out of England. Licet per negotioſam vitam patrio ſolo adfixus, ne pedem quidem unquam extra Angliam moviſſet: quod adnotari maximè oportuit, ne quiſpiam D. Joubertii, ex lapſu memoriæ alium pro alio ſubſtituentis, literis deceptus, illum olim Patavii ſtuduiſſe crederet (51). A great many people boaſt of having been familiarly acquainted at the Univerſities with ſuch or ſuch a perſon who is become famous by his Writings: they boaſt of it, I ſay, though the thing be not true (52); but there are few who write ſo to that perſon, as Joubert did to Camden.

(51) Smith. in Vita Camdeni, pag. 75.

(52) See the Letters of Des Cartes, tom. 2. pag. 454.

[K] We find . . . in the Life of Camden the reſentment of a Gentleman who had a female Relation mentioned with diſhonour in the Books of that Hiſtorian.] Camden had made mention of a Lady, without naming her, who had ſhewn her regard for a Gentleman ſo far as to grant him the laſt favour, without having been able to avoid thoſe diſagreeable conſequences which are talked of at Court and about town, with more pleaſure than ſcandal. The Gentleman became illuſtrious by his valour and learning, and repaired the Lady's honour in the uſual way; for he married her. One of the girl's relations pretended Camden had diſhonoured their family, and was ſo tranſported with rage againſt that Hiſtorian, that he broke the noſe of his ſtatue placed over his tomb in Weſtminſter Abbey (53). This is what Hiſtorians who flatter not, and who ſpeak the truth, make themſelves liable to; and this is the reaſon why there are ſo few Hiſtories wherein they dare ſpeak plainly of thoſe who are living, or who have left children of any conſideration behind them. Camden, by having been ſincere and faithful, had made himſelf ſo many enemies, that this was the reaſon why he would not let the Continuation of his Annals be printed in his life time. At leaſt he wiſhed, in caſe the King ordered it otherwiſe, that they ſhould not ſuffer his Annals to be tranſlated into Engliſh during his Life. He was afraid he ſhould find fewer equitable Readers among the vulgar than among the learned. Crebrâ experientiâ didicerat, ſtudium veritatis eruendæ in Annalibus ipſi odium & obtrectationem peperiſſe; ideo de parte alterâ in lucem publicam edendâ, quod ſupra monui, non ſolicitus, vel potius ne ederetur, niſi poſt cineres conditos, totum id Regiæ Majeſtatis arbitrio commiſit, obnixè deprecans, ne, ſi ita ſtatuiſſet Rex optimus, in vernaculum ſermonem opus iſtud Hiſtoricum ipſo vivente verteretur, ſatis gnarus, indoctos è vulgo Lectores iniquiſſimis cenſuris in Hiſtoriarum Scriptores, ut ut veritati ex integro lita-verint, dum vita adhuc ſupereſt, pro fatuitate & malitiâ ſuâ fieri ſolere (54).

(53) Smith. in Vita Camdeni, pag. 75, 76.

(54) Ibid. pag. 75.

[L] He did not always put his name to the Books which he publiſhed.] He prefixed only the two letters M. N. to an Engliſh Book which he publiſhed in the year 1604, under the title of Reliquiarum de Britannia (55). He had printed in the year 1600 a Collection of Inſcriptions and Epitaphs, which are to be read in Weſtminſter Abbey &c. to which he did not ſet his name; but he ſet it to the Latin Tranſlation of Father Garnet's Tryal, publiſhed at London in 1607.

(55) Ibid. pag. 40.

[M] One part of the Memoirs which he made uſe of in compoſing his Annals has been loſt.] Godfrey Goodman, the ſon and nephew of two perſons to whom Camden had great obligations, and who was afterwards advanced to the Biſhoprick of Glouceſter, deſired that he would leave him his papers of that ſort by his will, and wrote to him on that head. Camden aſſured him that he would have left them to him with all his heart, if he had not a long time before promiſed them to Richard Bancroft Archbiſhop of Canterbury. After that Archbiſhop's death, his right was tranſmitted

to

We ſhould be in the wrong, in my opinion, to imagine, from a Paſſage of Caſaubon, that Camden did no more than turn the Annals of Queen Elizabeth into Latin [N].

to George Abbot his Succeſſor, who, as it is ſaid, put all thoſe papers into a room in Lambeth Palace. What is become of them is not now known: however, theſe were not the Memoirs which concerned civil affairs, for they are to be found in the Cotton Library: theſe were the Memoirs which concerned Eccleſiaſtical affairs. Dr. Smith ſuppoſes they were loſt when Archbiſhop Laud was impriſoned. As he was accuſed of ſeveral imaginary crimes, ſays he, William Prynne, who was pilloried for his ſeditious Libels, took away all that Prelate's papers, to ſee whether any thing might be found in them either to ſupport the accuſations which were brought againſt him, or to clear him from them. Afterwards, Thomas Scott, one of the Demagogues in the Rebellion, and Hugh Peters, who were both executed for the murder of Charles I, plundered Laud's Library. Poſtea Thomas Scottus e Demagogis Parliamentariis lingua & manu promptus audaxque; & Hugo Petri infamis & impurus homuncio, quorum uterque ob Regicidium meritiſſimas ſuſpendii pœnas vindice juſtitiâ poſt duodecennium luebat, Bibliothecam diripuerunt (56). After the Reſtoration of the Royal Family, William Sancroft Archbiſhop of Canterbury collected all the ſcattered remains, and ſearched every where after them. He found a great many papers in the room where Camden's ſhould have been; but the latter were quite gone, nor could they be traced at all (57).

(56) Ibid. pag. 56.

(57) Idem, ibid. pag. 55, & ſeq.

[N] We ſhould be in the wrong to imagine, from a paſſage of Caſaubon, that Camden did no more than put the Annals of Queen Elizabeth into Latin.] The paſſage of Caſaubon (58) is in a letter to Thuanus; which is the CCXCIV. Caſaubon's words follow: Scripſi aliquoties ad te Cottonium ab urbe abeſſe, in contexendâ Hiſtoria occupatum. Nuper cum mihi Ser. Rex indicaſſet ipſum eſſe in urbe, memor mandatorum tuorum adii: reſpondit ſe totum in eo eſſe ut cœptam Hiſtoriam abſolvat quam ille Anglico Sermone compoſuit, Camdenus Latinam fecit. i. e. "I have wrote to you more than once "that Sir Robert Cotton was out of town, and buſy "in preparing his Hiſtory. Being lately informed "by the King that he was in town, I went to him "purſuant to your deſire: he anſwered that he was "wholly taken up in finiſhing the Hiſtory he had be-"gun, which he has written in Engliſh, and Camden "has turned into Latin."

(58) It was pointed out and ſent to me by Mr. Hill, the learned Miniſter of the Engliſh Church at Rotterdam.

☞ CAMERARIUS (JOACHIM), one of the moſt learned Writers of the ſixteenth Century, was born April the 12th in the year 1500 at Bamberg, a City of Franconia. He was ſon of John Camerarius [A], a Senator of that City, who lived to eighty years of age without ever having taken Phyſic or let Blood, by Martha Wecelia, a native of Steinfurt (a). He began his ſtudies in his own country under a Maſter, who was eſteemed a perſon of conſiderable abilities at that time; and in a ſhort ſpace he made ſo great a progreſs, that when he was but thirteen years old, his Maſter declared that he could teach him no further. Upon this he was ſent to Leipſic to ſtudy under George Heltus, who being charmed with his genius and diſpoſition, took the ſame care of him as if he had been his own ſon. We may judge what advances he made in learning from this circumſtance, that Richard Crocus, under whom he ſtudied the Greek Language, being ſometimes obliged to be abſent, he left our Author to read the Lectures in his room, though he was then but ſixteen years of age (b). He had a peculiar affection for that Language, and was particularly charmed with Herodotus [B], whom he read over frequently with the utmoſt attention. Peter Moſellanus ſucceeding Crocus in the Profeſſorſhip of the Greek Tongue, our Author continued his ſtudies under him with ſo much vigour, that he ſoon became ſuperior to his Maſters in the knowledge of moſt Arts and Languages. After he ſtaid five years at Leipſic he went at eighteen years of age to Erford, where he was admitted Maſter of Arts in 1521. The troubles of that City, and the Plague which raged there, obliging him to leave it, he was induced by the reputation of Luther and Melancthon to go to Wittemberg to viſit them [C]. The war of the Peaſants, which laid Germany waſte in 1525, not ſuffering him to enjoy the repoſe and tranquillity which he wiſhed at Wittemberg, he went to Pruſſia with James Fuxius, a Gentleman of Franconia, where he was received with the utmoſt civility, not only by the men of learning, but even the Magiſtrates and Princes. The year following Melancthon being deſired by

(a) Melchior. Adam. Vitæ Germanorum Philoſophorum, pag. 258. edit. Francofurti 1663, in 8vo.

(b) Idem, pag. 258, 259.

[A] He was ſon of John Camerarius.] The antient name of the family was Leibhard; but it was afterwards changed into that of Cammermeiſter, in Latin Camerarius, from the Office, which one of his anceſtors had held at Court in the time of Henry the Lame (1).

(1) Melch. Adami, Vitæ Germanor. Philoſoph. pag. 251. edit. Francofurti 1663 in 8vo.

[B] He had a peculiar affection for that language, and was particularly charmed with Herodotus.] At that time there was a great ſcarcity of Greek books; and it was eſteemed a prodigious piece of good fortune, when learning firſt revived in Germany, to be poſſeſſed of, or to have the opportunity of reading Homer or Herodotus, or other Greek Writers. When Camerarius had copied with his own hand a great part of thoſe Authors, he met with Aldus's firſt edition of Herodotus (2), upon which he congratulated himſelf as if he had found a treaſure; and was ſo highly fond of it, that when the inhabitants of Leipſic roſe upon the ſtudents there, he took no care of any thing but his Edition of Herodotus, which he concealed under his gown; and by reading that Writer often over he made himſelf maſter of the Greek Language. Magna erat tum Græcorum voluminum penuria, enatiſque primum in Germaniâ literis, Homerum aut Herodotum, alioſve Graii oris Autores habuiſſe & volutâſſe magnum erat. Quare illorum non exiguam cum partem ſuâ deſcripſiſſet manu, mirum quam de primâ Herodoti Editione Aldinâ, velut Pactoli aut Tagi opibus, ſibi fuerit gratulatus, adeò quidem ut in Panico Civium adverſum Studioſos tumultu, de reliquo parum anxius, unum ſuum Herodotum ſub veſte teneret; è quo Scriptore ſæpius percurſo Græca poſtmodum addidicit (3).

(2) It was printed at Venice in 1502.

(3) Melch. Adam. pag. 259.

[C] He was induced by the reputation of Luther and Melancthon to go to Wittemberg to viſit them.] At Wittemberg every one, who was capable of forming a good judgment of his excellent abilities and diſpoſition, ſhewed him the utmoſt civility and reſpect, and eſpecially Melancthon, to whom he was known before, and who conſidered him in the ſame light, as Cicero did Atticus, and lived ever after in the utmoſt friendſhip and confidence with him. With the ſame facility, when he was but in the four and twentieth year of his age, he procured himſelf the acquaintance of Eraſmus, as he tells us in his Commentaries upon the firſt Book of the Tuſculan Queſtions. Hic quotquot de ingeniis aliquid poterant judicare, amore ipſum complecti, præcipuè verò Melancthon, cui jam antea innotuerat Camerarius, quod Cicero olim Atticum, id ipſe Camerarium ſibi exiſtimare; eoque ſic ſequentibus vitæ annis uti, ut nec familiarius ullo, nec libentius. Eadem facilitate anno ætatis vigeſimo quarto aditum ſibi ad Eraſmi notitiam patefecit & muniit; de quâ ipſe in Commentariis ſuper Tuſculanarum Quæſtionum librum primum (4).

(4) Idem, pag. 260.

by the Senate of Nuremberg to erect a College in their City, and to ſuch Profeſſors there, as might give it reputation, he engaged Camerarius, who was juſt returned from Pruſſia, to teach the Latin and Greek Tongues there. He entered upon this Province with his Collegues the ſame year [D]. And his writings, of which he publiſhed a great number in the courſe of a long life, raiſed him a diſtinguiſhed character [E]. The Diet of Spires, which was then held, thinking proper to ſend an Embaſſy to the Emperor Charles V, who was at that time in Spain, nominated Albert Count Mansfeld for that purpoſe, and appointed our Author for his Latin Interpreter. This was highly agreeable to Camerarius, who had a ſtrong deſire to ſee Spain; but he went no further than Eſlingen, becauſe the Embaſſy was ſuſpended till another time (c). Upon his return to Nuremberg he married in 1527 Anne Truchſes of Grunſperg of a noble and antient family, with whom he lived in the utmoſt harmony for forty ſix years, and had nine children by her. He had the ſame year the misfortune of loſing his father and one of his brothers (d). In 1530 the Senate of Nuremberg ſent him with ſome other perſons to the Diet of Augſburg; and four years after choſe him for their Secretary; but he refuſed that poſt, tho' of great profit (e). In 1538 Ulric Duke of Wirtemberg ſent for him to Tubing, in order to reſtore the Univerſity, which had been extremely diſordered by the war; and he continued there five years, during which time he recovered it to its former luſtre. He ſeems to have been peculiarly deſigned for the reſtoration of Univerſities; for he had ſcarce re-eſtabliſhed that of Tubing, when he was ſent for in 1541 to Leipſic by the Duke of Saxony for the ſame purpoſe. He taught there during the remainder of his life, but with ſome interruption; for the war obliging him to depart, he removed from one place to another till 1547, when affairs being brought to a ſtate of tranquillity, he returned and reſumed his former employments. In 1555 he went to the Diet of Augſbourg, and afterwards with Melancthon to Nuremberg upon affairs of Religion. The year following he accompanied that learned man, who repoſed the moſt unreſerved confidence in him, to the Diet of Ratiſbon. The year 1557 was very unfortunate to him; for he loſt two of

(c) Idem, pag. 259, 260, 261.

(d) Idem, pag. 261.

(e) Idem, pag. 262.

[D] He entered upon this Province with his Collegues the ſame year.] His Collegues were Helius Eobanus Heſſus, a celebrated Poet, Michael Rotingus, and Jo. Schoner, an eminent Mathematician (5). Our Author ſoon procured himſelf a prodigious reputation by his lectures; and his Auditors, among whom were ſome of the Senators themſelves, received the utmoſt advantage from them. Statimque ſingularem ipſe Laudem, Auditores verò, de quòrum numero nonnulli etiam ex Senatorio ordine fuerunt, maximum ſenſerunt fructum (6).

(5) Idem, ibid.

(6) Idem, pag. 261.

[E] And his Writings, of which he publiſhed a great number in the courſe of a long life, raiſed him a diſtinguiſhed character.] His Works are almoſt infinite in number, tho' the greateſt part of them, as Mr. Baillet obſerves (7), are become very ſcarce, becauſe men of taſte and judgment purchaſe them as ſoon as ever they meet with them. Geſner in his Bibliotheca has given us a Catalogue of his works; and Father Niceron in his Memoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſtoire des Hommes illuſtres (8), has mentioned 150 Books either written or tranſlated by him. He tranſlated into Latin Herodotus, Demoſthenes, Xenophon, Euclid, Homer, Theocritus, Sophocles, Lucian, Theodoret, Nicephorus, and Gregory Nyſſen, &c. He publiſhed a Catalogue of the Biſhops of the principal Sees; Greek Epiſtles; accounts of his journies in Latin Verſe; Epigrams of the ancient Greek Poets; a Commentary on Plautus; the lives of Helius Eobanus Heſſus and Philip Melancthon, &c. We ſhall now conſider the judgments, which have been paſſed by the learned upon our Author. Hadrian Turnebus in his Adverſaria (9) ſtiles him the glory and ornament not only of Germany, but even of all Europe. Non ſuæ tantum Germaniæ, ſed etiam totius noſtræ Europæ decus & ornamentum, Joachimus Camerarius. Henry Stephens in his Preface to Macrobius, gives him the title of the luminary and pillar of Polite Literature in Germany. Lipſius in his letter to our Author's ſon, Joachim, aſſerts, that he had no equal in all Germany. Grati mihi Camerarii ob unum illum virum, quem Germania veſtra habuit ſine pari. Taubman (10) calls him the Prince of Writers in the Latin and Greek Tongues. Theodore Beza in his Icon illuſtrium Virorum tells us, that it was generally agreed among the learned, that Germany had no Writer more ſkilled than him in the Greek Language, and but few more elegant in Latin, and not one more exact, as appears from his Works. Eo provectus eſt Eruditionis, ut communi Doctorum omnium conſenſu, peritiorem Linguæ Græcæ neminem, in Latinâ verò Linguâ diſertiores perpaucos, exactiorem autem nullum ſcripto-rem habuerit Germania, ſicut plurima ipſius monumenta teſtantur. Joſeph Scaliger in the Scaligerana prima (11) ſays, that his tranſlations of Authors were not ill done. Camerarius vir bonus, qui non malè Authores interpretabatur. And in the Scaligerana ſecunda he ſays, that our Author was one of the greateſt men in Germany in his time. Camerarius fuit unus è maximis ætatis ſuæ Germanis. Paulus Jovius in his Elogia tells us, that he was ſo well ſkilled in the Greek and Latin tongues, that in his Writings he imitated Cicero with great ſucceſs. Eſt in celebri famâ Joachimus Camerarius, Græcæ atque Latinæ linguæ ita peritus, ut ſcribendo pernobilis Ciceronis imitator evaſerit. Eraſmus in the 45th Epiſtle Lib. XXVI (12) obſerves, that he owed more to his induſtry than to nature. Joachimus plus habere videtur curæ quam naturæ. Schioppius in his Book de Arte Critica (13) affirms, that the ſervices which he did to the Republic of Letters, were innumerable; and that the envious attempts of others have not been able in the leaſt to injure his character. Nota Joachimi Camerarii innumera in rem literariam benè promerita; quemque nequicquam ingrati Lucumones rodere conantur. Gerard Voſſius in his Book de Scientiis Mathematicis (14) tells us, that he is ſuperior to all the praiſes, which have been given him; and that he was the Phœnix of Germany, not only in the opinion of his own country, but even that of foreign nations; that Jovius, Turnebus, Lipſius, and all the beſt and moſt learned men have extolled his merits; ſo that any perſon, who ſhould not have the greateſt eſteem for him, would upon the ſureſt grounds deſerve immediately to be placed among men of no learning, or of no virtue. Profectò vir hic nunquam ſatis laudatus, ſi alius quiſquam, verè Germaniæ ſuæ Phœnix fuit, non gentis ſuæ judicio ſolum, ſed etiam exterarum. Quantis enim præconiis eum extollunt Jovius, Turnebus, Lipſius, ac optimus & doctiſſimus quiſque, uſque adeo, ut qui eum non maximi faciat, is certiſſimo indicio, vel inter indoctos, vel improbos referri mereatur. Gabriel Naudæus in his Bibliographia Politica mentioning our Author and Zuingerus, aſſerts that no perſon ever read them without great improvement: à quorum Lectione nemo unquam niſi doctior receſſit; and in another place he tells us, that Camerarius and Giphanius never attempted any thing in Literature in an abſurd manner: Camerarius & Giphanius nihil unquam inepte moliti ſunt. Olaus Borrichius in his Diſſertatio de Poetis Latinis (15) obſerves, that beſides the other ſervices which he did the youth of Germany, he ſucceeded likewiſe extremely well in verſe, eſpecially of the elegiac kind, in which he was inferior

(7) Jugemens des Savans, tom. 2. num. 380. pag. 170. edit. Amſterdam 1725, in 4to.

(8) Tom. 19. pag. 84--120. edit. de Paris 1732.

(9) Lib. 4. cap. 1.

(10) Apud Baillet, ubi ſupra.

(11) Pag. 41.

(12) Apud Blount, Cenſur. Celebrior. Autborum, pag. 591. edit. Geneva 1694. in 4to.

(13) Pag. 7.

(14) Cap. 65. §. 14. pag. 377.

(15) pag. 127.

of his daughters, and his dear friend Melancthon, and Sabinus, Lotichius, and Gerbelius, with whom he lived in great familiarity (f). In 1568 the Emperor Maximilian II sent for him to Vienna, and conferred with him upon several points of Religion, and dismissed him with considerable marks of his favour (g). He lost his wife July 15th 1573, and from that time his health began every day to decline, till at last he died April 17th 1574, aged 74 years (h). We shall give Melchior Adamus's character of him in the note [E].

(f) Idem, pag. 262, 263.

(g) Idem, pag. 264.

(h) Idem, ibid.

inferior to few Poets, with respect to invention, ease, propriety, or numbers. Joachimus Camerarius reliquis in juventutem Germanicam meritis adjunxit & Carminis gloriam, præsertim elegiaci, quâ paucis adeò cedit, sive inventionem consideres, sive facilitatem, proprietatem, numerum. Monsieur Huet, afterwards Bishop of Avranches in France, in his Book de claris Interpretibus tells us, that he deserved prodigiously well of Polite Literature, and was the singular ornament of Germany; that his stile is chaste and perspicuous, and if his translation be compared with the Greek original, it will appear to be just and accurate, and never diffuse, except when it is necessary to explain some obscure passages, and that but seldom and to a very small degree. Vir de politiori Literaturâ præclarè meritus Joachimus Camerarius, suæque adeò Germaniæ singulare Ornamentum. Castus sermo & perspicuus, & quem si cum Græcis conferas, sincerum atque sanum, & nonnisi obscurioribus declarandis, idque raro & leviter, excurrentem agnoscas.

[F] We shall give Melchior Adamus's character of him in the Note.] He tells us (16), that our Author was well made in his person, and of firm health, which he endeavoured to preserve by the proper exercises of the body. He was very agreeable and facetious in his conversation among his friends; but at home he was very grave, tho' without any severity, and seldom spoke to his children but in monosyllables. He was a strict lover of truth, and so averse to lying, that he could not bear fiction even in raillery. Sermones, quos Græci Διατριβὰς vocant, ut in conviviis amicorum cum ingenio ferebat, ita domi suæ, sine oris tamen tristitiâ, gravis erat, & liberis, quod aiunt, monosyllabus. Veritatem spirabat semper, & suos ad eam aspirare in omni vitâ cupiebat. A mendacio tantum aberat, ut ne jocosum quidem ferre posset, omnibusque iis, quibus animi sensus sub linguâ potius, quam in linguâ, inimicum se acerrimum & assiduum adversarium profiteretur. (16) pag. 264, 265.

He was very simple and modest in his dress, and never regarded the change of the fashion, tho' it sometimes exposed him to the raillery of his friends. He was never sollicitous to heap up riches, but committed the care of his affairs to his wife and children. And tho' he did not require them to live in a sordid way, yet if he saw any of his family desire things, which were not necessary, he used that expression of Socrates, Learn to want. Opum congerendarum nunquam appetens, rei familiaris curam universam conjugi & liberis commendabat. Sordes nullo imperabat modo; quod si tamen domesticos animadverteret interdum non necessaria expetere, Socraticum hoc in ore habebat, Discè carere. He cultivated a friendship with the most eminent Men of that Age, and particularly Baumgartner, Carolovitius, Melancthon, Peter Victorius, Hadrian Turnebus, and Jerom Wolfius; and he was so warm in his friendships, that the death of any of his friends gave him the most exquisite regret. When he wrote Letters, even to his children, he kept a copy of them. He was so constant in his studies, that he did not discontinue them, even when he travelled; for what he had meditated either on horseback, or at night, he afterwards set down in writing. He applied himself to the French and Italian Languages, when he was far advanced in years; and made some progress in the Hebrew. But with respect to the Greek and Latin Tongues, he was inferior to no Writer of his Age. He had read over with great application the Historians, Poets, Orators, Physicians, Civilians, and Divines in Greek and Latin. Studia nunquam remittebat, ne inter peregrinandum quidem, sed quæ absente Bibliothecâ, vel inter vias, dum equitaret, vel de nocte animo concepisset, arrepto deinde calamo annotabat. Linguam Gallicam & Italicam jam senex attigit, & Hebraicam etiam degustavit. In Græcâ familiam duxit: in Latinâ cessit nemini. Historicos, poetas, oratores, medicos, jurisconsultos, theologos Græcos & Latinos excussit. T.

CAMERON (JOHN) one of the most famous Divines of the seventeenth Century amongst the Protestants of France, was born at Glasgow in Scotland, where he taught the Greek Tongue as soon as he had finished his Course of Polite Literature and Philosophy. Having read Lectures upon that Language for a year, he had a mind to travel into foreign countries, and went to Bourdeaux in 1600, being then a little above twenty years old. The Ministers of that City (a) were so well pleased with his wit, his learning, and his polite behaviour, that they procured him the Mastership of a College for teaching the Greek and Latin Tongue, which they established at Bergerac. They justly wondered, that being so young, he could speak Greek extempore as readily and with as much elegance, as others do Latin. The Duke of Bouillon took him from Bergerac to make him Professor of Philosophy at Sedan. Cameron having performed the functions of a Professor for two years, took his leave of the Duke, and went to Paris, and from Paris to Bourdeaux, where he arrived the latter end of the year 1604. The Church of that City resolved to provide for his maintenance during four years, whenever he would go to study Divinity, and he promised that at the end of that term he would serve that Church in the quality of a Minister. During these four years he was Tutor to the children of the Chancellor of Navarre (b); the first year at their father's house at Paris, the two following at Geneva, and the fourth at Heidelberg. In the year 1608 the Church of Bourdeaux recalled him, and chose him to fill up the place of a Minister, whom she had lately lost (c). He served that Church for ten years following with so much reputation, that the University of Saumur judged him worthy to succeed Gomarus in the Professorship of Divinity. He accepted their office, and performed all the functions of his post with wonderful success till the year 1630, when the University was almost entirely dispersed by the civil war, which the difference of Religion occasioned [A]. He retired into England with his family,

(a) They were two, the one called Renaud, was a Frenchman, the other, named Primerose, was a Scotsman.

(b) His name was Calignon.

(c) It was Monsieur Renaud.

[A] He accepted the Professorship of Divinity at Saumur, and performed the functions of it... till the University was ... dispersed by the civil war, which the difference of Religion occasioned.] He began his lectures June the 13th, 1618 (1), but he was not installed till two months after (2); the Synod of Poitou made some objections against his being admitted, because he was of Piscator's opinion concerning the Imputation of Christ's righteousness. But this opposition was declared void by the National Synod held at Alez in the year 1620. Take notice

(1) Blondel, Actes Authentiques, pag. 15.

(2) August the 18th 1618.

mily, and ſettled at London, where he obtained leave to teach Divinity at home; but he did not continue long in this ſtation, for King James gave him the Maſterſhip of a College, and made him Profeſſor of Divinity at Glaſgow [B]. This favour did not ſuit his taſte; he had not been a full year at Glaſgow but he longed to ſee France again, and returned to Saumur with his whole family, and read private Lectures there, for the Court had forbidden him to teach publickly. Having paſſed thus a year at Saumur, he went to Montauban towards the latter end of the year 1624, having been choſen Profeſſor of Divinity in that City; but he did not enjoy that employment a long time; as he would not be of the reigning party, he expoſed himſelf to a thouſand vexations, which did not end but with his life in the year 1625 [C]; he was then about forty ſix years old. He had notice of what follows. When Du Pleſſis Mornay had been deprived of the government of Saumur 1621 (3), Cameron retired to Paris, and was conducted to a houſe called l'Ile, near Orleans, where he had a conference with Tilenus, who had declared himſelf for the Arminian party. An account of this diſpute was immediately printed at Leiden, and received with an incredible applauſe. Cameron repreſented to the National Synod, held at Charenton in 1623, that he was out of employments, and had not wherewithal to maintain his family, ſince the King would not for the preſent give him leave to take again upon him the functions either of a Miniſter or of a Profeſſor. Hereupon the Aſſembly granted him a thouſand livres (4). Some time after the King gave him leave to ſerve the Church as he had done before. Thus Blondel relates this affair: but his great memory has not been very exact on this occaſion. It is true indeed, that when Cameron left Saumur in 1621, he went to Paris, but he did not continue long there, for he ſoon retired to London; nor was it from Paris that he was conducted to l'Iſle, in order to confer with Tilenus; nor had he that conference after the diſperſion of the Univerſity of Saumur. The whole affair paſſed in the following manner. Cameron having been acquainted that Daniel Tilenus deſired to confer with him concerning the Doctrines of Grace and Free-will, they appointed the time and place when and where they ſhould meet; accordingly Cameron went from Saumur to Orleans, where he arrived April the 18th 1620. Tilenus did not come till five days after. The conference was held at l'Iſle a country-houſe of Monſieur Groſlot near Orleans, and laſted from April the 24th to the 28th of the ſame month (5). The account of this diſpute, which is printed amongſt Cameron's works, is intitled, Amica collatio de gratiæ & voluntatis humanæ concurſu in vocatione, & quibuſdam annexis, inſtituta inter Cl. V. Danielem Tilenum & Johannem Cameronem. It was printed at Leiden in 1621 without the Approbation of the Profeſſors of Divinity, who on the contrary diſliked ſome paſſages in it (6).

[B] King James gave him the Maſterſhip of a College . . . at Glaſgow.] It is pretended that Cameron was very kindly received by the Biſhop of Ely and by the other Court-Biſhops; becauſe in his expoſition of theſe famous paſſages, Thou art Peter, and tell it unto the Church, he had approved the Hierarchy. It was for this reaſon that they recommended him to King James, and that the King, by the advice of the Biſhop of Ely ſent him into Scotland, and gave him the place which Trochoregius had, a man whom the Prelates did not at all like; wherefore they were glad to take him from Glaſgow, where he taught Divinity, and to confer that employment with the Maſterſhip of the College on Cameron (7). This rendred Cameron a little odious to the Puritans; ſo that finding himſelf a ſtranger in his own Country, he ſoon reſolved to return into France. The Author, who tells us this, quotes a Scots Writer, who cenſures and confutes John Cameron more than once in a Book publiſhed in 1637 againſt the Ceremonies of the Church of England. The ſame Author obſerves that King James, tho' he was very generous, never gave any thing to Cameron but good words and fair promiſes, which made this Miniſter boaſt, that he enjoyed the King's friendſhip; This I can affirm, he uſed to ſay to his friends, the King is my friend (8).

[C] His vexations ended with his life in 1625.] The Author of the Icon Johannis Cameronis has omitted the tragical circumſtances of Cameron's death; perhaps from a principle of charity towards the city of Montauban, and even towards the whole party of the Reformers in France; for after all it is a blemiſh in their reputation, that ſo great a man ſhould have been treated as he was, and that the villain, who attempted to murther him, ſhould not, for ought we know, have been puniſhed as he deſerved. I would readily leave this particular in the darkneſs, under which the Author of the Icon thought fit to bury it; but what would this avail now, ſince Peter du Moulin has publiſhed it to the whole world, and ſince it is inſerted in the works of Andrew Rivet? Let us ſay then, that Cameron having declared himſelf too openly againſt the party, which preached up the civil war, expoſed himſelf to the hatred of a great many perſons, amongſt whom there was a paſſionate villain, who gave him ſo many blows, that he left him for dead. Cameron retired to Moiſſac, a town in the neighbourhood of Montauban; but finding that the change of air neither reſtored his health, nor removed his ſadneſs, he returned to Montauban, where he continued to pine away, and ſoon after died with grief. Here follow the words of my Author. Cum ibi incurſaret obvios, & popularis æſtus torrenti obniteretur, increpant eos, in quos incidebat, tantum odium populi in ſe contraxit, ut a cive quodam, homine cerebroſo, pugnis & fuſtibus horrendum in modum cæſus pænè animam efflaverit. Dicebat autem verberanti, Feri miſer, pectus nudum diſlocato thorace objicient. Sic male acceptus ceſſit Montalbano, & ſe recipit Moſſacum, quod eſt oppidum in proximo, ut corpus malè affectum refocillaret. Indè paulò poſt rediit Montalbanum, ubi paucis poſt diebus ex animi ægritudine diem clauſit, & tranquille obdormivit in Domino (9). According to William Rivet (10), it was not whilſt Cameron received the blows that he ſhewed his naked breaſt, and ſaid, Strike, ſtrike, villain; it was when he was threatened to be killed; the perſon who threatened him did not heſitate long, but ſeizing him immediately, threw him down, and would certainly have killed him, had not a woman ſtept between them, and covered his body with her own. Eorum uni, qui mortem interminatus eſſet, laxatis continuò thoracis fibulis, pectus renudatum objicienti, dixerit, feri, miſer. Quo dicto a miſero illo violenter in terram dejectus, interfectus fuiſſet, ni mulier accurrens Cameroni jacenti innixa, corpus ejus corpore ſuo contegens, a' ictibus prohibuiſſet. This is what he got by preaching moderation in a city, where the Emiſſaries of the Duke de Rohan encouraged the inhabitants to take up arms. Who would have thought that a Scotſman would have expoſed himſelf to blows for the ſake of Paſſive Obedience and Non-Reſiſtance? They were not well acquainted with Cameron's character, who would make him paſs for a man full of the maxims which he learned in his own country, and according to which he made no difference between an abſolute Authority and Tyranny (11). Du Moulin does not ſay when Cameron was ſo ill treated; but it is eaſy to conjecture it, if it be remembred, that he died either in the year 1625, according to the Author of his Icon, or in the beginning of 1626, according to Blondel (12). Let us obſerve, that tho' he always declared that he honoured and revered the Authority of Kings (13), yet Tilenus accuſed him publickly of being a ſeditious man, and an enemy of Monarchy, and of having preached republican principles at Charenton, which, added Tilenus, obliged him to make his eſcape. Upon this Cameron wrote a very fine Letter to King James, in which he declares, that this accuſation is entirely falſe and groundleſs; he did not deny, that the mob at Paris ſearched after him, in order to kill him, and that he went away ſecretly at the earneſt deſire of his friends: but he maintained, that the Magiſtrates had not the leaſt thought of bringing him into trouble, and that he obtained a very good paſſport, which he ſhewed at Dieppe to thoſe who required it. He alledges his witneſſes for all this.

(3) Blondel, Actes Authentiques, pag. 17.

(4) Ibid.

(5) See the Preface of the Amica Collatio, amongſt Cameron's Works.

(6) See Rivetus, Oper. tom. 3. pag. 845. and Cameron's Works, pag. 709. edit. 1692.

(7) De Elienſis conſilio ab eo rege in Scotiam miſſus eſt, at pulſo Roberto Bodio a Trocho-regia olim in Salmurienſi ſchola Profeſſore digniſſimo, viro certè Doctiſſimo qui Epiſcopis nimium Orthodoxis vel purus videretur in Glaſcuenſi Gymnaſii Præfectura ſuccederet. Guil. Rivetus, Epiſt. Apologet. ad Tho. Roſſellum, in Operib. And. Riveti, tom. 3. pag. 900. See alſo Du Moulin, in his book intitled, De Moſis Amyraldi Libro Judicium, pag. 228.

(8) Sed ab amico Rege, Principe alioqui profuſo, rediit vacuus. Idem, Guil. Rivet. Ibid. Concerning the reproaches made to Cameron, ſee Blondel's Anſwer in the Actes Authent. pag. 45, 46.

(9) Du Moulin, de M. Amyraldi Libro judicium, pag. 229.

(10) Guil. Rivet. in Oper. A. Riveti, tom. 3. pag. 898.

(11) See the Hiſt. de l'edit. de Nantes, tom. 2. pag. 191.

(12) Blondel, Actes Authentiques. pag. 17.

(13) Pro certo habeo tum ſacris edoctus literis, tum recta Ratione adductus, & ipſa admonitus experientia & rerum uſu, Regum Authoritate illa ſumma, quæ nullius hominum, ſolius Dei judicio obnoxia eſt, ſemel contempta, neque Deum ritè coli, neque Eccleſiæ pacem, Reipublicæve otium conſtare ulla ratione poſſe. Sed nec aliter ſenſi unquam. Nam ex puero . . . Poſtquam vero ad Paſtoris munus primum, tum deinde Profeſſoris Sacrarum Literarum ſum vocatus, publicè privatimque, pro concione, in ſcholis, in congreſſibus, ubi res & occaſio poſcebat, eam profeſſus ſum, & pro virili parte defendi. Cameron. Oper. pag. 713. edit. Genev. 1692.

had been twice married. The Churches took care of his family [D]. He was a man of a great deal of wit and judgment, had a happy memory, was very learned, a good Philoſopher, of a chearful temper, and ready to communicate not only his knowledge, but even his money (d) [E]; he was a great talker, a long Preacher [F]; little acquainted

(d) Taken from the Icon Joh. Cameronis, which is prefixed to his Works.

[D] The Churches took care of his family.] His firſt wife was of Tonneins, and was married to him in 1611. He had by her four daughters and one ſon, who lived but two years; ſhe died at Saumur in March 1634. He married his ſecond wife at Montauban, but he had no children by her. Three of his daughters by his firſt wife ſurvived him, and it was in their behalf, and in conſideration of his writings, that the National Synod, held at Caſtres in 1626, paſſed an Act, the tenor of which is, that in order to honour the memory of the late Mr. Cameron the ſum of ſeven hundred livres was granted to his children, with another ſum, which the Sieur du Candal is to give them yearly, till the meeting of the next National Synod. And the Aſſembly entreats the Province of Anjou to procure the printing of the laſt volume of Cameron's Theological Works, promiſing that the Aſſembly would take into conſideration the expences, which were neceſſary for the printing of that volume (14). I have ſaid already, that in 1613 the National Synod granted Cameron the ſum of a thouſand livres (15).

(14) See Blondel, Act. Authent. pag. 17.

(15) Blondel, ibid. and Will. Rivet. in Oper. And. Riveti, tom. 3. pag. 900. aſſert it.

[E] He was ready to communicate not only his knowledge, but even his money.] The Learned do not always care to relate in company what they know; and there have been ſome Profeſſors who kept the ſolutions of the greateſt difficulties for thoſe diſciples only, who could pay a certain price for them. This was not Cameron's character: he uſed to tell all that he knew to the firſt perſon who deſired to be inſtructed by him. Doctrinæ ſuæ non minus quàm τῶν χρημάτων καὶ βιωτικῶν κοινωνικὸς, & liberalis largiter; volentes à ſe diſcere nil celabat, quin facile quicquid ſingulare aut inconditum habuit, iis communicabat (16). This however is more common, than to ſee a learned man, who generouſly aſſiſts thoſe who are in neceſſity. Cameron was ſo little ſcrupulous in that reſpect, that he went beyond the bounds of generoſity, and was even prodigal. A φιλαργυρίᾳ & μικρολογίᾳ alieniſſimus, imò verò pecuniæ minus & pro fortunæ ſuæ conditione nimius contemptor, & in erogando ſupra modum facilis, ne profuſum dicam (17). i. e. "He was very far from avarice and the love of money; nay, he had a wonderful, and, conſidering his circumſtances, an exceſſive contempt for money, which he uſed to give away too eaſily, not to ſay, in a prodigal manner." Some Divines, who were no friends to him, have blamed him for his want of œconomy; they ſaid, that he diſperſed his money like water, and that he thought it below him ever to bargain in ſhops or inns; he always gave the price he was aſked, and never ſaid a word to have the leaſt farthing bated. This gave his enemies an opportunity of putting him in mind of the time, when he was maintained in Scotland at a public expence, for which he was to do the ſame low ſervices, which are required of thoſe, who are ſervitors, as he was. Exigua hæc ei ſumma fuit (18). Nam ſuæ originis oblitus, & ejus temporis immemor, quo in eorum numerum cooptatus, qui viginti quinque Marcarum annua penſione pauperum aliquot civium filiis deſtinata (for poorens citizens ſoones *, ut habet formula conceſſionis) fruerentur, ea conditione ut, inter ſe diſtributis temporibus, tintinnabulum pulſarent, præceptoribuſque famularentur in libris deferendis quum ad templum irent; vel iis diebus, quibus ludebatur, arma ut vocabant, campeſtria, hoc eſt Arcus, Pharetras, Sclophas, &c. portarent; ejus temporis, inquam, immemor, regius amicus (19), de imperio & regno theologico, cujus altas in animis diſcipulorum fixerat radices, tantùm cogitans, pecuniam ut aquam profundebat. Et de taberna ſi quid emeret, aut ſi hoſpiti expenſa numeraret, de poſtulato precio quicquam demere, aut vel verbulo intercedere, ſe indignum cenſebat (20). i. e. "This was but a ſmall ſum for him: (the thouſand livres granted by the Synod in 1623.) for having forgotten his origin and the time, when he was admitted to enjoy the penſion of twenty five marks, deſigned for poor Citizen's ſons (as it is ſaid in the Grant) upon condition, that they ſhould by turns ring the bell, and wait on their Teachers at church, carrying their books; or on holy-days, carry the arms, as the bows, quivers, guns, &c.

(16) In Icone Joh. Cameronis.

(17) Ibid.

(18) That is, the thouſand livres, which he obtained from the National Synod in 1623.

* Thus theſe words are ſpelt in all the French editions of Bayle's Dictionary.

(19) See the Remark [B] quotation (8).

(20) Guil. Rivetus, in A. Riveti Operib. pag. 900.

forgetting, I ſay, that time, this friend of the King, thinking of nothing but his Theological Empire and Kingdom, which he had rooted very deep into his diſciple's mind, he threw his money away like water. If he bought any thing at a ſhop, or paid his reckoning at an inn, he thought it below him to bate any thing of the price they aſked him, or to ſay the leaſt word by way of bargain."

[F] A great talker, a long Preacher.] The Author, who tells us this, adds (21), that Cameron would not be interrupted. Nunquam erat ſeſſus loquendo, indefatigabilis ſermocinator, qui vel Bollanum enecaret tædio. Nam ſi nactus eſſet hominem, qui ei præberet aures attentas, a ſummo mane uſque ad veſperam ſermonem ſine intermiſſione proſecutus fuiſſet. Cum eſſem Lutetiæ, me ſæpe inviſebat, habens ſemper Milleterium comitem, affixum ejus lateri, & admiratorem. Mihi aſſidens ordiebatur ſermonem infinitæ longitudinis. Ego vero ſummo cum ſilentio aures ei accommodabam. Nam interloquentem non patiebatur. Cumque mihi ſemel contigiſſet pauca verba interfari, ille corrugans frontem ex indignatione dixit, ne me obturba; laiſſes moy parler. Demitto auriculas, &c. Loquebatur autem de ſuis dictis aut factis; narrabat quos ſermones habuiſſet cum illo mercatore aut Cauſidico, aut Theologo, & qua occaſione; & quomodo ab eo digreſſus ad eum miſiſſet carmina a ſe raptim conſcripta, quæ memoriter recitabat, non ſine audientium tædio (22). i. e. "He was never tired with ſpeaking, and was an indefatigable Preacher, who would have tired even Bollanus to death. For if he happened to meet with a man, who would hear him, he would talk from morning till night without interruption. When I was at Paris he viſited me often, accompanied by Milletiere who never left him, and was his admirer. I hearkened to him in a great ſilence: for he could not bear to be interrupted; and as I once happened to drop a word, he frowned, and ſaid with indignation, don't interrupt me, let me ſpeak. Whereupon I humbly ſubmitted, &c. He uſed to talk of what he had ſaid or done: he related what diſcourſe he had had with ſuch a Merchant, ſuch a Lawyer, ſuch a Divine, and how having left him he compoſed immediately ſome verſes, which he recited, not without tiring his hearers." Du Moulin adds, that the Divines of England, who ſaw Cameron, were extremely fatigued with his inexhauſtible talk. Eos diſſentientes & adverſos expertus eſt: nam præter novitatem Dogmatum, non ferebant illud Cameronis ἀμετροεπὲς et ἀδυρόγλωσσον, & incredibilem loquendi libidinem (23). i. e. "He found by experience that they (the Engliſh Divines) were not of his opinion, nor favourable to him; for beſides the novelty of his doctrines, they could not bear his continual chattering and talkative temper."

(21) Du Moulin in Judicio de Amyraldi Libro.

(22) Idem, ibid. pag. 212.

(23) Idem, ibid

His manner of preaching was diſliked on many accounts; for beſides that his ſermons laſted two full hours, he uſed to digreſs and ramble from his text, and entertained his audience upon ſubjects, of which they underſtood nothing, and which he ſeemed to deliver like an Enthuſiaſt. Whilſt he was a preaching, he unbuttoned his coat, ſpread his handkerchief about him like a napkin, and uncovered his head. Cauſæ cur ejus conciones non eſſent acceptæ in vulgus, hæ erant: quod ſuas conciones in duas horas extenderat, quod in longas & intricatas digreſſiones excurrens quaſi enthuſiaſmo abreptus diceret non intelligibilia; quod aliquando media in concione ſolveret fibulas thoracis, & præ ſe ſudarium quaſi mappam extenderet. Quandoque etiam inter concionandum caput nudaret, & pileum poneret ſuper ſuggeſtu (24). He did not know that he tired his audience; on the contrary, he imagined that they were extremely pleaſed with his eloquence: but having one day prevailed upon a tradeſman to tell him freely, how his Sermons were eſteemed, he learnt a piece of news which vexed him prodigiouſly. Since you force me, Sir, ſaid the honeſt tradeſman, to tell you what are the diſcourſes and the opinion of your flock, I muſt own, that your Sermons are not at all ſuited to the taſte of the people; they never hear you preach, but they are prodigiouſly tired (25). Cameron, (24) Du Moulin, in Judicio de Amyraldi Libro, pag. 225, 226. See alſo what Blondel obſerves upon this ſubject, Actus Authent. pag. 45, 46.

(25) Profecto, Domine, tuæ conciones non ſunt ad Populi guſtum, & te populus audit maximo cum tædio. Du Moulin, in Judicio de Amyraldi Libro, pag. 225.

(f) Bezæ magnus poteſt appellari, quem quidem in ſuis prælectionibus vocat doctiſſimum interpretem, ſemper tamen ſe opponens ejus ſententiæ. Molinæus, in Judicio de Amyraldi Libro.

(g) From the ſame Molinæus, ibid.

ed with the works of the Fathers (e), obſtinate in his opinions [G], and ſomewhat troubleſome. He frankly owned to his friends, that he found ſeveral things ſtill to reform in the Reformed Churches [H]. He took a delight in publiſhing particular opinions, and in going out of the beaten road; he gave inſtances of it when he was ſtill but a youth. It was in his Theſes De Tribus Fœderibus, which he publiſhed and maintained at Heidelberg, being yet but a Propoſant *; he mixed ſome novelties in all the Theological queſtions, which he examined; and when in explaining ſome paſſages of the holy Scripture, he met with ſome very great difficulties, he took very zealouſly all opportunities to contradict the other Divines, and eſpecially Beza (f); for he pretended that they had not penetrated into the very marrow of that Science (g). It was from him that Monſieur Amyraut

(e) In Lectiones Patrum hoſpes, & inſolens. Petrus Molinæus in Judicio de Amyraldi Libro.

* A candidate for the Miniſtry, who having been once examined, is admitted to preach, but not to adminiſter the Sacraments.

meron, who expected quite another anſwer, retired with the utmoſt grief. This diſcourſe had extremely vexed him; he grieved at it for ſeveral days, he grew pale and dull, and could not forbear telling his Collegue the cauſe of his melancholy. His Collegue (26), who was his intimate friend, took the right method to comfort him. What is become of your courage? ſaid he, do you mind the opinion of a fool! Are you vexed at ſuch a trifle? Be perſuaded, that all the people of faſhion in your congregation, who have any learning, hear you with a great deal of pleaſure, and reap a conſiderable benefit from your Sermons. This plaiſter did very much allay the pain, but did not heal the wound entirely; Cameron's uneaſineſs returned upon him, and he had his recourſe to a new enquiry; he propoſed to a Lawyer the ſame queſtion he had aſked the tradeſman, and received the ſame anſwer; which made him quite deſperate, he reſolved to leave Bordeaux, and to employ all his intereſt in order to procure to himſelf a more agreeable condition ſomewhere elſe (27).

(26) It was Primeroſe.

(27) From Du Moulin, in Judicio de Amyraldi Libro.

[G] Obſtinate in his opinions.] This appeared in the National Synod held at Tonneins in 1614. In that Synod Cameron refuſed to ſubſcribe the article concerning juſtification; upon which ſeveral of the members voted that the laws of the eccleſiaſtical diſcipline ſhould be put in execution againſt him; but the Synod, in order to do nothing raſhly, reſolved to ſend him a deputation of two Miniſters, namely Andrew Rivet Secretary to the Synod, and another Miniſter named Bouchereau. They intreated him to conform to the determinations of the Synod; but he anſwered, that he would rather die, than alter his opinion. All that they could get from him, was, that he promiſed he would never teach his private opinion either by word of mouth, nor in writing. Rivet prevailed upon the Synod to be ſatisfied with a promiſe, which they were accordingly, in conſideration of the many ſervices, which a man of Cameron's talent would do to the Church (28). It is pretended that he contracted that obſtinacy by having been in his youth addicted to the ſect of the Ramiſts (29).

(28) See Lewis Du Moulin, in his preface to his Paræneſis ad Ædificatores Imperii in Imperio. See alſo Guil. Rivet. Epiſt. Apolog. ad Roſſil, in Operib. Andr. Riveti, tom. 3. pag. 898.

(29) Guil. Rivet. Ibid. pag. 897.

[H] He found ſeveral things ſtill to reform in the Reformed Church.] Let us quote the words of the great du Moulin. Fuit ingenio inquieto, ſemperque aliquid novi animo volutabat & nominabat, nec diſſimulabat inter amicos (quorum ego unus eram) multa eſſe in religione noſtra quæ cuperet immutata (30). i. e. "He was of "a reſtleſs ſpirit, and always invented and ſaid ſome"thing new; and he uſed to confeſs amongſt his friends "(of whom I was one) that there were ſeveral things "in our Religion, which he wiſhed were changed." Obſerve that he did not think, that the time for this new reformation was yet come. "Id ipſe profitetur Epiſtola "ad Ludovicum Capellum, ubi ait, multa ſibi occur"rere, quæ promere & Chartæ committere nec ani"mus ejus, nec temporis ratio patiebatur (31)." i. e. "This he owns himſelf in a Letter to Lewis Cappel, "when he ſays, that he had thought of ſeveral things, "which he had no mind to publiſh nor to write "down, nor was it yet time to do it." He thought that St. Peter was the foundation of the Church; and he could not bear thoſe who maintained, that one cannot be ſaved in the Church of Rome. It vexed him, that he durſt not ſpeak more freely, and that the Miniſters, who had the greateſt power and credit, made themſelves formidable to the innovators; conquerens quod paucos haberet συμφρονοῦντας & approbatores ſuæ ſententiæ, non eſt, inquit, qui tantam vim ſuſtineat. Et paulo poſt, Nos in ea tempora incidimus, quibus ne in doctrinæ quidem methodo ἀπὸ τῶν δοκίτων εἶναι τυλοῦ fas eſt diſcedere. Non obſcurè ſugillans, & naſo ſuſpendens optimos quoſque Paſtores Eccleſiarum noſtrarum (32), i. e. "He complained that few per"ſons approved and admitted his opinions. Who can "reſiſt ſuch a violence, ſaid he; and a little after, We "happened to live in thoſe times, in which it is not per"mitted to differ, no not even in the method and way "of teaching, from thoſe who pretend to be the Pillars "of the Church. Thus bantering and ridiculing all "the moſt eminent Paſtors of our Churches." It has been reported, that his character as a Miniſter, for which he had from his heart a very great veneration, ſeemed to him an obſtacle againſt his enquiring after truth, and publiſhing what he thought true. He imagined, that if he had not been a Miniſter he might have been more at liberty to ſpeak his mind, and that he could have done it in a more uſeful manner. But the fear of being excommunicated and depoſed ſtopped his mouth, and reſtrained his pen. The Author who publiſhed theſe things, did a great injury to Cameron's memory. For as this Author had been very intimate with Cameron, and came very near to the opinions of the Roman Catholics, till having been excommunicated by the Proteſtants he openly embraced the Popiſh Religion, it was believed, that he began to be perverted by Cameron's truſting him with his moſt private opinions. Poſtquam vir præſtans rebus humanis exemptus, res accidit, quæ Cameronis famæ magnam labem inuſſit. Nam paulò poſt Cameronis obitum, Milleterius ejus Achates & individuus comes, ſemper pendens narrantis ab ore, peperit monſtra, quæ ſub Cameronis diſciplina conceperat. Edidit enim librum in Molinæum, nihil tali expectantem; quo defendit merita & juſtificationem per opera, & de Sacramento Euchariſtiæ ſic loquitur, ut qui in Tranſubſtantiationem eſſet pronior, & de Eccleſia Romana honorifice loquitur, dicens eum omnia Fidei Chriſtianæ capita pura & illibata conſervaſſe; etſi in quibuſdam à recto tramite aberret. Profitebatur autem ſe hæc omnia habere a Camerone viro incomparabili .... Verba ejus ſunt, p. 26, 27. "Quod appellat "Cameroniſmum, eſt elucidatio ſolida plurimarum dif"ficultatum; quam nobis reliquit ſummum illud in"genium non minus raræ pietatis quam doctrinæ. "Fateor cum laude quam ei debeo, eum mihi viam "delineaſſe, & me ejus veſtigiis inſtitiſſe. Et paulo "poſt. Scio eum ad eundem ſcopum, quem mihi pro"pono, collineaſſe, eumque ſuſcepturum fuiſſe id quod "animo conceperat, ſi Miniſter non fuiſſet. Sed expe"rientia ſimilis zeli, quo poſt obitum ſuum condemna"tur, efficiebat ut provideret ſi tale quid ſuſcepiſſet, "mox ſequuturam exauthorationem cum anathemate "ſuper caput ipſius. O quoties cum ea de re age"remus, mihi in aurem dixit, tanquam amicorum "intimo, ſe utilius talento, quod à Deo acceperat, ni"ſi Miniſter fuiſſet, uſurum fuiſſe. Non quod pro"feſſionem illam animitus non proſequeretur honore, "ſed ob conſequentiam eorum, quæ credebat à ſe uti"lius fieri poſſe, ſi liberior fuiſſet." Nempe hæc eadem ſunt, quæ ipſe Cameron ſcripſit Cappello, ante à nobis citata, ubi ait, ſe multa habere, quæ promere & chartæ committere, temporis ratio non patiebatur (33). i. e. "After the death of this eminent man, there hap"pened a thing which very much blemiſhed Cameron's "reputation. For ſoon after his death Milletiere, "his conſtant friend and attendant, who was very "attentive to all that he ſaid, brought forth thoſe "monſters, which he had conceived under Cameron's "diſcipline. For he publiſhed a Book againſt du Mou"lin, who expected nothing like it; wherein he main"tains the merit of good works, and the juſtifi"cation by works; and ſpeaks of the Sacrament "of

(30) Du Moulin, in Judicio de Amyraldi Libro, pag. 211.

(31) Idem, ibid.

(32) Idem, ibid. pag. 224.

(33) Du Moulin, in Judicio de Amyraldi Libro, pag. 230.

Amyraut learned the doctrine of univerſal Grace [I], which occaſioned ſo many diſputes in France. He loved to meditate, but not to write down his meditations, ſo that he would never have printed any thing, nor put any thing in a condition to be publiſhed, had he not, in a manner, been forced to it (b). It would have been a great loſs; for we have very good things of him [K]. When he was a Miniſter at Bourdeaux, he publiſhed a Letter, which was condemned to be burnt by a decree of the Parliament [L] of that City.

(b) In Icone Joh. Cameronis.

" of the Lord's Supper in a manner which ſeems to " favour Tranſubſtantiation; he alſo ſpeaks very ho- " nourably of the Church of Rome, ſaying that ſhe " has kept entire all the articles of the Chriſtian Re- " ligion, tho' in ſome points ſhe has gone aſtray. " He declared that he had learnt all this from that in- " comparable man Cameron. His words in p. 26, and " 27, are as follow. What he calls Cameroniſm is a " very good explication of ſeveral difficulties, which was " left me by that great wit no leſs eminent for his piety, " than his learning. I gratefully acknowledge that " he ſhewed me the way, and that I follow his ſteps. " And a little after he ſays. I know, that he had the " ſame deſign that I have, and that he would have " performed it, had he not been a Miniſter. But the " experience he had of ſuch a zeal like that, by which " he is condemned after his death, made him foreſee, " that if he undertook any ſuch thing, he ſhould be im- " mediately depoſed and excommunicated. O how of- " ten did he tell me as an intimate friend, when we " talked together of theſe matters, that if he had not " been a Miniſter, he would have made a much better " uſe of the gifts, he had received from heaven! Not " but that he had a very great veneration for his pro- " feſſion, but he thought that if he had been more at " liberty he could have done things of greater importance. " This is what Cameron wrote himſelf to Cappel, " and what we have quoted above, namely, that he " had ſeveral things, which it was not yet time to " publiſh or to write down." Here follows what a Divine of London wrote to a Miniſter of Nerac. We have ſeen Mr. Cameron paſſing through this city, he is a man of a deep melancholy, and capable of maintaining an hereſy (34).

(34) Vir eſt profundæ melancholiæ, & qui par eſſet hereſi tuendæ. Molinæus, ibid.

[I] It was from him that Monſieur Amyraut learned the Doctrine of univerſal grace.] Never had a diſciple more veneration for his maſter, than Monſieur Amyraut had for Cameron. It was ſaid, that he imitated even Cameron's voice, and a certain motion of his head, and that when he made a ſpeech to Lewis XIII, the King took him for a foreigner, or at leaſt, found that he had a foreign accent. Is totum imbibit Cameronem, & ſupra omnes alios eum exacte imitari ſedulo annixus eſt, imo vel etiam in geſtu demittendi capitis (25), & in pronunciatione adeo, ſeu vocis tono & modulatione quadam, ſic perfecte imitari didicit, ut homo Gallus a glorioſiſſimæ memoriæ Rege Ludovico XIII, judicii magni & admirandæ imaginationis Principe, extraneus habitus ſit. Cum enim anno 1631 a Synodo Nationali cum aliis ad Regem delegatus eſſet, & apud Majeſtatem ejus verba feciſſet, Rex qui vultu indicavit viri facundi brevem orationem ſibi gratam fuiſſe, ad magnatem pone ſtantem converſus, ſubmiſſiore voce dixit, extraneus eſt. Illo vero reſpondente Gallum eſſe, in tractu Salmurienſi natum; atqui, (replicavit Regia Majeſtas) peregrini aliquid in ejus pronunciatione obſervari. Quod ex Collegatis unum qui audiverat, quùm Carentonum rediiſſet, narrare memini (36). i. e. " He " was a great admirer of Cameron, and laboured " more than any body elſe to imitate him in every " thing, even in his manner of holding his head; " and he had ſo well acquired his voice and pronun- " ciation, that King Lewis the XIIIth, a Prince of a " great judgment and wonderful wit, took him for a " foreigner, For when in the year 1631 the Natio- " nal Synod ſent him with ſome others to the King, " and he had delivered an Oration before the King; his " Majeſty diſcovered by his looks that he approved " the ſhort diſcourſe of that eloquent man; but turn- " ing to a Nobleman, who ſtood behind him, he told " him ſoftly, He is a ſtranger; upon which the No- " bleman anſwered that he was a Frenchman, born " near Saumur: But, replied the King, I have obſerved " ſomething of a Foreigner in his accent. I remember " that one of the Deputies told this, when he was " returned to Charenton."

(35) Compare this with what has been ſaid of Alexander. Citatiorem greſſum Leonidæ (he was Alexander's Tutor) vitium fuiſſe ferunt, ex ipſius conſuetudine id hæſiſſe Alexandro, quod poſtea, cum enixè vellet corrigere, non potuerit. Freinſhemius, in Supplementis Q. Curtii, lib. 1. cap. 2. i. e. " It is ſaid " that Leonidas " (Alexander's " Tutor) had " too quick a " gate; which " defect Alex- " ander imitated " from him, and " could not af- " terwards get " rid of it."

(36) Guil. Rivetus, in Operib. Andr. Rivets, tom. 3. pag. 896.

[K] We have very good things of him.] His Theological Lectures upon very important ſubjects have been publiſhed at Saumur in three volumes in 4to. The firſt volume was printed in 1626, and the two others in 1628. Lewis Cappel, his diſciple, had the care of this edition. He alſo compoſed the Icon Johannis Cameronis (37), which I have quoted above. Some years after theſe three volumes were reprinted at Geneva; they added to them whatever could be found of this Author's Miſcellaneous Pieces, ſome of which, that had been publiſhed in French (as ſeven Sermons upon the VIth Chapter of St. John's Goſpel) were tranſlated into Latin. All this made one volume in folio. Frederick Spanheim, who was then Profeſſor of Divinity at Geneva, took care of this Edition, and added a Preface to it. They did not forget to print with it the anſwer (38), which Cameron wrote to a letter of Epiſcopius. The ſame Lewis Cappel publiſhed in 1632 Cameron's Myrothecium Evangelicum.

(37) Colomiés, Bibliotheque Choiſie, pag. 73.

(38) See upon this Epiſtol. 633 Præſtant. & Erudit. Viror. edit. 1684.

[L] He publiſhed a letter, which was condemned to be burnt by a decree of the Parliament.] In the year 1617 the Parliament of Bourdeaux condemned two Captains, accuſed of piracy, to death. As they were of the Proteſtant Religion, they petitioned to be referred to the Chambre mipartie *, but the Parliament rejected their petition, under this pretence, that the privileges granted by the Edict (of Nantz) were not deſigned for pyrates (39). They went to the place of execution with ſo much courage, and gave ſuch proofs of a Chriſtian Reſignation, that Cameron thought it was proper to honour their memory by a ſhort account of what paſſed at their death. It was caſting an indirect reflection upon the Parliament, to write a Book in praiſe of thoſe, whom the Parliament had condemned: he even dropt ſome reflections which were directly levelled againſt that body, becauſe the Proteſtants pretended their privileges had been infringed. So that the Parliament revenged itſelf upon the work, till an opportunity ſhould offer to be revenged upon the Author himſelf. The French Mercury relates ſeveral circumſtances concerning this fact. The two Captains were broken alive upon the wheel June the 20th, having each of them a paper Crown upon their heads, on which were written the following words. Captains of Pirates, traitors and rebellious to the King, and their remains were put upon the towers along the port of Bourdeaux . . . . This Parliament having given Cameron leave to comfort them in priſon, before they were taken out of it, and at the place of execution, but not in their way to it, this Miniſter publiſhed afterwards a libel by way of letter (40), which he entitled, Conſtance, Foy, & Reſolution à la mort des Captaines Blanquet & Gaillard. i. e. " The Conſtancy, Faith, " and Reſolution of the Captains Blanquet and Gail- " lard at their death." This coming to the knowledge of the Parliament, an exact enquiry was made after the libel or letter, and a decree was paſſed, by which it was ordered, that the libel ſhould be burnt by the common executioner. By the ſame decree Cameron was ſtrictly forbidden for the future to write or publiſh ſuch letters, calculated to raiſe a ſedition, to miſrepreſent the decrees of the Parliament, to exaſperate the King's ſubjects againſt the Sovereign Courts of Judicature, and to render his Officers deſpicable; under the penalty of being exemplarily puniſhed and proſecuted as a perturbator of the public peace (41). See in the Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantz (42), the Proceedings of the ſame Parliament againſt Cameron and his fellow-Miniſter Primeroſe in 1615.

* A Court of Juſtice, in which the Judges were one half Roman Catholicks, and the other half Proteſtants.

(39) Hiſtoire de l'Edit. de Nantes, tom. 2. pag. 195.

(40) Written to Palinier, Miniſter of Mornac, and dated June the 21ſt 1617.

(41) Mercure François, tom. 5. pag. m. 39, 40.

(42) Tom. 2. pag. 195.

CAMILLUS (MARCUS FURIUS) was the firſt who rendered the family of Furia very illuſtrious. He triumphed four times, was five times Dictator, and was honoured honoured with the title of the ſecond Founder of Rome; in a word, he acquired all the glory a man can gain in his own country. During his Cenſorſhip he found means to oblige all the ſingle men of Rome to marry the widows of thoſe who had been killed in the war; he employed for that purpoſe the moſt friendly perſuaſions, and when they proved ineffectual, he made uſe of a fine. He was created Dictator the tenth year of the ſiege of Veii (a), and had the glory of putting an end to it by the taking of that City, the ancient rival of Rome. When he ſaw the Ruins of Veii, he ſaid a thing very remarkable [A]. He returned triumphant to Rome, but his triumphal Chariot drawn by four white horſes appeared an innovation too proud [B]; and as ſome time after he rendered ineffectual the prayers of the people, who deſired that part of the inhabitants of Rome might be tranſported to Veii, this drew upon him the hatred of his fellow Citizens, who ſoon found an opportunity to be revenged. He had voted the tenths of the ſpoil of Veii to Apollo, and forgot to lay them by. The Senate being acquainted by the Aruſpices or Diviners, that the Gods were angry, ordered that every ſoldier ſhould reſtore the tenth of his portion of the ſpoil. This exaſperated the people extremely againſt Camillus. The Roman Ladies did on this occaſion a very generous action [C]. Some time after the war againſt the Faliſci broke out (b), and it was then that Camillus did the noble action mentioned by Moreri (c); the enemies were ſo charmed with it, that they voluntarily ſubmitted to the Romans; by which means the ſoldiers were deprived of the ſpoil they expected; this gave the people a new opportunity of exclaiming againſt Camillus; at laſt they loſt all patience when Camillus had cauſed the propoſition of ſending ſome of the inhabitants to Veii, to be entirely rejected. Lucius Apuleius one of the Tribunes proſecuted him, to make him give an account of the ſpoils taken at Veii. Camillus prevented his condemnation, and baniſhed himſelf voluntarily (d); he was condemned to pay a very large fine. It was during his baniſhment that he performed the moſt noble action he ever did; for inſtead of rejoicing at the devaſtation of Rome by the Gauls, and of joining with them in order to be revenged of the injury his Country had done him, he exerted all his wiſdom and courage to drive the enemy away, and yet kept with the utmoſt ſtrictneſs the ſacred Law of Rome, in refuſing to accept the Command, which ſeveral private perſons offered him (e). He waited for the orders of the people, who were repreſented by the few inhabitants of Rome, who ſtill held out in the Capitol. But before this he had raiſed troops in the place of his baniſhment (f), and had gained ſome advantages over the enemy. The Romans, who were beſieged in the Capitol created him a Dictator in the year 366, in which poſt he acted with ſo much bravery and conduct, that he entirely drove the army of the Gauls out of the territories of the Commonwealth. This conſiderable ſervice, together with ſeveral other victories he gained afterwards, could not however ſecure him from the injuries of the Tribunes; for even during his Dictatorſhip in 389, they ſent a common Officer to ſummon him, who even ventured to lay hands upon him. He appeared before the people attended by the whole Senate; and as after great diſputes, the affair was determined in favour of the people (g), Camillus was conducted home with great ſhouts and acclamations; he

(a) This was A. U. 359, according to Calviſius.

(b) A. U. 361.

(c) He ſent back to the beſieged their children, whom their School-maſter had delivered to him.

(d) A. U. 365.

(e) See Valerius Max. lib. 4. cap. 1. num. 2.

(f) He was retired to Ardea.

(g) The people required that one of the Conſuls be of a Plebeian family.

[A] When he ſaw the ruins of Veii, he ſaid a thing very remarkable.] It appears from a thouſand paſſages in the Ancients, that the Heathens imagined, there were ſome Deities, who were jealous of the proſperity of men, and therefore never failed to ſend ſoon or late ſome great misfortune to thoſe who had gained ſome conſiderable advantage. Camillus being full of this thought could not behold the happineſs of Rome in the ſpoil of Veii, without fearing thoſe unhappy compenſations, which that kind of Gods were pleaſed to make between good and evil. Therefore he prayed, that if the proſperity of Rome was to be ballanced by ſome misfortune, he alone, and not his Country, might ſuffer it. Can there be any thing more heroical than this? What a great mind did he not diſcover on this occaſion? Dictator Camillus, capta Vejorum urbe, præcones edicere jubet, ut ab inermi turba abſtineatur; is finis ſanguinis fuit; dedi inde inermes cœpti, & ad prædam miles permiſſu Dictatoris diſcurrit; quæ cum ante oculos ejus aliquanto ſpe atque opinione major, majoriſque pretii rerum ferretur, dicitur manus ad cœlum tollens precatus eſſe Dictator, ut ſi cui hominum Deorumque nimia ſua fortuna populique Romani videretur, ut eam invidiam lenire ſuo privato incommodo, quam minimo publico populique Romani liceret (1). i. e. "The city "of Veii being taken, Camillus the Dictator ordered "the public Criers to declare, that the ſoldiers ſhould "not moleſt the unarmed multitude. This put an "end to the bloodſhed; and all they who were unarmed began to ſurrender: and the ſoldiers were permitted to plunder. When Camillus beheld the "ſpoils, which were more conſiderable than was "expected, it is ſaid, that lifting up his hands to "heaven, he prayed the Gods, that if his happineſs "or that of the Romans ſeemed too great either to "men or Gods, their envy might be ſatisfied by his "own private misfortunes, rather than by the leaſt "evil, that might fall upon the State." Plutarch obſerves, that when Camillus beheld the devaſtation of ſo flouriſhing a City, he fell a crying before he made his prayer. Ἀλώσης δὲ τῆς πόλεως κατὰ κράτος, καὶ τῶν Ῥωμαίων ἀγόντων καὶ φερόντων ἄπειρόν τινα πλοῦτον, ἐφορᾷ ὁ Κάμιλλος ἀπὸ τῆς ἄκρας τὰ πραττόμενα, πρῶτον μὲν ἰσχὺς ἐδάκρυσεν, εἶτα μακαριδεὶς ὑπὸ τῶν παρόντων, ἄνοιξε τὰς χεῖρας τοῖς Θεοῖς καὶ προσευχόμενος εἶπε (2).

(1) Livius, lib. 5. cap. 21. See alſo Plutarch. in Camillo, pag. 131, F. and Valerius Maximus, lib. 1. cap. 5. num. 2.

(2) Plutarch. in Camillo, pag. 131, F.

[B] His triumphal Chariot drawn by four white horſes, appeared an innovation too proud.] According to Plutarch never had a General triumphed thus before him, nor was the example ever followed afterwards; ſo much were people perſuaded, that ſuch a Chariot belonged only to the ſovereign Maſter of Gods and Men. Τὰ τὰ ἄλλα σοφῶς ἐθριάμβευσε, καὶ τέτριππον ὑποζευξάμενος λευκοπῶλον ἁρμα, καὶ διελάσας τῆς Ῥώμης, ἐδοκεῖ τοῦτο ποιήσαι τοῖς ἡγεμόσι προτερον, οὐ ὕστερον. ἦν γὰρ ἀγῶνίας τὸ τοιοῦτον ὄχημα, τῷ βασιλεῖ καὶ πατρὶ τῶν Θεῶν ἐπιφημισμένον (3).

(3) Idem, ibid. pag. 132. C.

[C] The Roman Ladies did on this occaſion a very generous action.] Notwithſtanding all the complaints, every one was obliged to contribute his ſhare for accompliſhing Camillus's vow; but as it was reſolved to ſend a golden veſſel to Delphos, and that there was no gold in the city, the Magiſtrates were at a loſs how to get the veſſel made. The Roman Ladies delivered them out of their perplexity; they met together, and reſolved to conſecrate all their jewels for the making of the veſſel. To acknowledge this ſacrifice, the Senate granted them the honour of funeral Orations, which till that time the men only had enjoyed (4).

(4) Ibid. pag. 143, B.

(b) From Plutarch in the Life of Camillus.

he died of the plague the following year (b). There has been said a thing which is very glorious to him, namely, that wherever Camillus was, there was Rome: the Latin words which I quote (i) express this in a much stronger manner. He left sons behind him, who were preferred to high posts in the Commonwealth [D]; but his descendants lived afterwards in obscurity to the time of Tiberius [E]. It has been found that Tacitus was not very accurate when he made this observation (k). The glory of this family fell to the Distaff, that is to the women, and continued thus till the time of St. Jerom [F].

(k) See the Remark [E].

(i) Tarpeia sede peruſta Gallorum facibus Veioſque habitante Camillo. Illic Roma fuit. Lucan. Pharſal. lib. 5. ver. 27. That is, "When Gallic flames the burning City felt, At Veiæ Rome with her Camillus dwelt." Rowe.

CAMOENS

[D] He left ſons, who were preferred to high poſts in the Commonwealth.] Spurius Furius Camillus, one of them, was created Prætor, the ſame year that this office was eſtabliſhed at Rome, namely in 389, when the Conſulſhip began to be divided between the Patricians and the Plebeians (5). His brother Lucius Furius Camillus appears oftener in Hiſtory. He was created a Dictator in the year 403 ſince the building of Rome; and becauſe he reſtored the Conſulſhip to the Patricians he gained their favour ſo much, that they procured him to be choſen Conſul the next year. He vanquiſhed the Gauls, and it was during his Conſulſhip, that Marcus Valerius in a ſingle combat againſt a Gaul, vanquiſhed him by the aſſiſtance (6) of a raven (7). Glandorpius pretends, that this L. Furius Camillus was Conſul eleven years later, A. U. 411 (8); but Sigonius proves this to be falſe, by the Tables of the Capitol, in which the Conſul Lucius Furius Camillus, who triumphed in the year of Rome 415, is called the ſon of Spurius and grandſon of Marcus. This Camillus, who was Conſul in the year 415, had Caius Mænius for his collegue; they both triumphed, and, by a privilege then very ſeldom granted, they obtained, that their ſtatues ſhould be placed in the Forum (9). I omit the other actions of this Lucius Furius Camillus; they who deſire to know them may conſult Livy.

(5) Livius, lib. 7. init.

(6) Valerius was for this reaſon ſurnamed Corvinus.

(7) Sigonius, in Faſtis, ex Livio.

(8) Onomaſtic. pag. 364. The year 417 which he ſets down, is the 415th according to Sigonius.

(9) Livius additum triumpho honorem ſcribit, ut Statuæ Conſulibus, rara illa ætate res, in foro ponerentur. Sigon. in Faſtis ex Livio; he alſo quotes Eutropius, and Plin. lib. 34. cap. 5.

[E] His deſcendants lived in obſcurity.] We read in Tacitus, that Furius Camillus Proconſul of Africa under Tiberius obtained the triumphal ornaments, for having vanquiſhed the Numidians; upon which the Hiſtorian obſerves, that ſince the famous Camillus, the deliverer of his Country, to this Proconſul of Africa, none of that family ever commanded armies, beſides the ſon of the Deliverer. He adds that the Proconſul of Africa was not eſteemed a great Warrior, for which reaſon Tiberius very much commended him before the Senate. Fuſi Numidæ, multoſque poſt annos Furio nomini partum decus militiæ. Nam poſt illum recuperatorem urbis, filiumque ejus Camillum, penes alias familias imperatoria laus fuerat. Atque hic, quem memoravimus, bellorum expers habebatur; eò pronior Tiberius res geſtas apud Senatum celebravit, & decrevere patres triumphalia inſignia, quod Camillo ob modeſtiam vitæ impune fuit (10). Lipſius pretends that Tacitus was ignorant of two triumphs in the family of Furia. P. Furius, ſays he (11), triumphed over the Gauls, in the year 530, and Lucius Furius Purpureo alſo triumphed over the Gauls in 553. Father Strada alſo objects theſe two triumphs to Tacitus; and that he may not appear barely to tranſcribe Lipſius, he quotes Polybius and Oroſius for the victory of P. Furius, and Plutarch for the triumph of the ſame Furius; and Livy and the Capitoline Tables for the triumph of 553 (12). It is certain that according to Polybius the Romans gained a great victory over the Gauls under the Conſulſhip of P. Furius and C. Flaminius; it is alſo certain, that he obſerves that the Conſuls entered with an army into the country of the enemy (13); but when he deſcribes the battle, he mentions only the Conſul Flaminius, and does not ſay, that either of the Conſuls triumphed. 'Tis not therefore a great accuracy, to quote Polybius as a voucher for the victory of P. Furius. The other Hiſtorians quoted by Strada are ſtill leſs proper to prove his aſſertion; for Oroſius aſcribes the whole victory to Flaminius (14), and does not ſay a word of Furius. As for Plutarch, he ſays that the Conſuls Flaminius and Furius led the army into the country of the Inſubrian Gauls, and that the Senate being acquainted, that there had been ſomething irregular in their election, wrote to them to come back immediately to lay down their office; but that Flaminius did not open the Letter till he had routed the enemy; and that he was like to have been deprived of the honours of a triumph, becauſe he did not ſhew more regard to the Senate's Letter (15). Plutarch adds, that as ſoon as Flaminius had triumphed, he and his collegue were deprived of the Conſulſhip. All this ſeems to hint, that Furius commanded ſome ſeparate body of troops, which did not vanquiſh the enemy; however that be, there is nothing in Plutarch, that can prove, that Furius triumphed. Father Strada has better ſucceeded in the quotations concerning the Triumph of L. Furius Purpureo.

(10) Tacit. Annal. lib. 2. cap. 52. ad ann. Ro. 770.

(11) Lipſ. in Tacit. Ibid.

(12) Fam. Strada, Proluſionum Academicarum, lib. 1. Proluſ. ii. pag. m. 50.

(13) Polyb. lib. 2. cap. 32, 33.

(14) Oroſ. lib. 4. cap. 13.

(15) Plutarch. in Marcello, circa init. pag. 199.

But it ſeems to me, that in order to cenſure Tacitus rightly, we ought to know two things; firſt what he means by Furium nomen, ſecondly, what he means by imperatoria Laus. If his ſenſe be, that ſince the ſon of the great Camillus, to the time of Tiberius, none of the Houſe of Furia commanded armies; he has not been ſufficiently criticized upon by Lipſius, and by Famianus Strada; they might have objected to him C. Furius Pacilus Conſul of Rome in 502, who commanded ſome time in Sicily (16). But if Tacitus meant only the deſcendants of the Great Camillus, the cenſure of theſe two Authors is of no weight. For neither the Conſul of the year 530, nor he who triumphed in 553 were of the branch of Camillus; one was ſurnamed Philo, and the other Purpureo. To act rightly, they ſhould have objected to Tacitus a grandſon of the great Camillus.

(16) Polybius, apud Sigon. in Faſtis.

[F] The glory of this family fell to the diſtaff, . . . and continued thus till the time of St. Jerom.] I don't pretend to ſay, that the women deſcended from Camillus ſignalized themſelves in the wars; I ſpeak only of a glory ſuitable to their ſex. Chaſtity and continence were ſo well kept by the Ladies of that family, that ſcarce one widow amongſt them ever married again. This is what St. Jerom tells us, in a Letter to a Lady, who was deſcended from Camillus; and who aſked his advice concerning the deſign ſhe had formed of continuing a widow all her life-time. Obſervas literis, & ſuppliciter deprecaris ut tibi reſcribam, imo ſcribam, quomodo vivere debeas, & viduitatis coronam illæſæ pudicitiæ nomine conſervare (17). She was the daughter of a Lady who lived in continency, tho' ſhe was married. Gaudet animus, exultant viſcera, geſtit affectus, hoc te cupere eſſe poſt virum, quod ſanctæ memoriæ mater tua Titiana multo tempore fuit ſub marito. Exauditæ ſunt preces & orationes ejus; impetravit in unica filia, quod vivens ipſa poſſederat. Habes præterea generis tui grande privilegium, quod exinde a Camillo vel nulla vel rara veſtræ familiæ ſcribitur ſecundos noſſe concubitus; ut non tam laudanda ſis, ſi vidua perſeveres, quam execranda, ſi id Chriſtiana non ſerves, quod per tanta ſæcula gentiles fœminæ cuſtodierunt. Taceo de Paulâ, de Euſtochio, ſtirpis veſtræ floribus, ne per occaſionem exhortationis tuæ illas laudare videar (18). i. e. "You deſire me to write to you how you ought to live, and to "keep the Crown of widowhood chaſte and untainted. "I am pleaſed from my heart, and rejoice exceedingly, that you ſhould deſire to be after the death of "your huſband, what Titiana your mother of bleſſed "memory was, even during the life of her huſband. "Her prayers have been granted: ſhe has obtained "for her only daughter, what ſhe enjoyed herſelf in "her life time. Conſider beſides, the great privilege "annexed to your family; for it is written that ſince "Camillus none or very few of that family married "again. So that you will not ſo much deſerve "to be praiſed, if you continue a widow, as you "would be abhorred, if being among Chriſtians you "could not keep that continence, which Heathen wo"men have kept for ſo many centuries. I will not "mention Paula nor Euſtochium to you, thoſe flowers "of your family, leſt I ſhould be thought to have "made uſe of this exhortation to you in order to "praiſe them."

(17) Hieronymus ad Furiam, de Viduitate ſervanda.

(18) Idem, Ibid.

☞ CAMOENS (LUIS DE) a very famous Poet, was a Portugueze, and born in Liſbon [A] (a), about 1517 (b), or rather 1526, or 1527, of Simon Vaz de Camoens, and Anne Macedo (c). His family was very antient, and had made a conſpicuous figure [B]. His father was a Captain of a Ship, and when our Poet was very young, was ſhipwreck'd on the Coaſt of Goa, and caſt away, together with his little fortune (d), ſo that our Camoens was unfortunate from his infant years. He ſtudied in the Univerſity of Coimbra [C], and afterwards came to Liſbon, where he firſt made himſelf known by ſome verſes in an amorous ſtrain, which were approved by the Court, and won him the favour of ſome Ladies of the greateſt quality (e). He was as agreeable in his perſon as in his converſation and writings [D]. His too amorous complexion, like that of Ovid, occaſioned his being baniſhed the Court [E]. It is not exactly known whither he retired after this; but it is generally thought that he withdrew to Santaren, the place of his mother's birth, and where ſome of his relations lived, as he himſelf ſeems to hint in one of his beautiful Elegies (f). Camoens growing weary of an unactive life, and being naturally very brave, he went to Ceuta in Africa, where a war was carrying on between the Portugueze and Moors. Here he ſignalized himſelf on many occaſions, and ſhewed, that he could entwine the lawrels of Mars with thoſe of the Muſes. He diſplayed his valour chiefly in a ſea-fight, when, ruſhing upon the moſt dreadful dangers, he loſt his right eye (g). He wrote ſeveral beautiful pieces during his ſtay in Africa [F]. Our

(a) Nicholas Antonio, Bibliotb. Hiſpan. tom. 2. pag. 20.
(b) La Luſiade du Camoens, traduit de Portugais, par M. du Perron du Caſtera. vol. 1. pag. 20. of La Vie de Camoens, Amſterdam 1735, 12mo. If Camoens lived but 52. or 53 years, as he died in 1570, he conſequently muſt have been born, not in 1517, but in 1526, or 1527.
(c) Bibliotb. Hiſp. ibid.
(d) La Luſiade du Camoens, vol. 1. pag. 24. dans ſa Vie.
(e) Ibid. pag. 25.
(f) Ibid. pag. 30.
(g) Bibliotb. Hiſpan. ubi ſupra, and La Luſiade du Camoens, pag. 31.

[A] Born in Liſbon.] This is what we are told by Nicholas Antonio (1); but a late French Writer (2) ſays, that the Portugueze themſelves are not agreed upon the place of his birth; ſome making him a native of Coimbra, and others of Santaren. However, he inclines to believe that our Poet was rather born in Liſbon, becauſe Emanuel de Correa, his intimate friend, who had lived a great many years with him, declares, that he was born in that city (3).

[B] His family was very ancient and had made a conſpicuous figure.] Nicholas Antonio, in the page abovementioned ſays, Camoens ex nobili parente Simone . . natus. His family came originally from Spain; and it appears from ancient Records, that it flouriſhed in Galicia, under the name of Caamans, before the end of the tenth Century (4). That name was changed to Camoens in 1370, when Vaſco Perez de Camoens having been diſgraced in his own country, fled to Portugal, to the Court of Don Ferdinand, who made him a Privy-Councellor, and gave him ſeveral Lordſhips (5). His fortune afterwards changed; and dying, he left two ſons, who divided the family of Camoens into two branches, the eldeſt of which made ſo conſpicuous a figure, that ſome of the Blood Royal of Portugal did not ſcruple to marry into it (6). The younger branch never made any figure, except by giving birth to our Author, in which however it will be immortalized (7).

[C] He ſtudied in the Univerſity of Coimbra.] Here he not only applied himſelf to the Claſſics, but alſo to Philoſophy. Literas autem Latinas & Philoſophiam doctus Conimbricæ (8). We may form a judgment of the progreſs he made in this place, from the beauty and excellence of his compoſitions, and the deep erudition that adorns every page of them. The learned languages had nothing hidden with regard to Camoens; the moſt remote antiquity was preſent to his eye; and, as to Phyſicks, he was perfectly well verſed in them, as taught in that Age (9). Nicholas Antonio is more particular in the character he gives of Camoens. He tells us, that he was born a Poet; that his compoſitions were eaſy, copious, lively and ſublime; that he ſet all his thoughts in the moſt learned and ſtrongeſt light, either in lyric or epic numbers; he ſinging as happily the delights of Love, as the acts of heroes, as is allowed by all perſons of taſte of all nations. In his deſcriptions of perſons and places, art ſeems to rival nature. His ſimiles are very juſt. His Epiſodes beautiful, and tho' very various, they yet are all relative to the chief ſubject. He was exceedingly well verſed in the ancient Poets, and had a great knowledge of antiquity, as appears from all his compoſitions. Ad Poeſim verè natum, facile, copioſum, ſublime, vividum, & quod omnia mentis cogitata (erant autem hæc plurima, inſigniaque) diſertiſſimis atque animi plenis exprimeret ſive lyricis ſive epicis verſibus. Æqualem enim ubique plauſum tam amatorii luſus pathetice, ac ſuaviter, quàm fortia Ducum facta ſublimiter, ac pro argumenti Majeſtate utraque vero ingenioſiſſimè ab eo pertractata, non intra Luſitaniæ duntaxat limites, ſed ubi ſenſus boni & perfecti eſt omnino aliquis, reportavere. In Geographicis & Proſopographicis deſcriptionibus naturam ferè æquavit arte; comparavit valde appoſitè; atque epiſodiorum varietatibus, veluti amœnis quibuſdam ab incepto diverticulis factorum ſeriem fabellarum digreſſiunculis, abſque tamen ſummæ, quâ res geſtas carmine complexus eſt, fidei jacturâ pulcherrimè diſtinxit. Præterquam quod eruditum ſe eſſe prodidit ſatis ſuperque in omnium veterum Poetarum, antiquitatiſque & graviorum etiam diſciplinarum cognitione. Adeo in ejus carminibus omnia hæc emicant atque eruditorum mentes feriunt authorique eorum arctiſſima reddunt complexione devinctas (10).

[D] He was as agreeable in his perſon as in his converſation and writings.] He had large lively eyes, that ſeemed expreſſive of nothing but love and pleaſure (11). He had fair hair, a ſpacious forehead, a Roman noſe, a fine ſet of teeth; lips as red as coral, a full face, a fair complexion heightened by red, which diffuſed over his whole countenance a florid air of health. He was finely ſhaped, of a middle ſtature, and a ſmiling aſpect. In ſhort, his whole perſon was ſo agreeable, that this alone ſpoke very advantageouſly in his favour (12). The picture of Camoens, as drawn by Nicholas Antonio, is not ſo flattering. Mediocri ſtatura fuit, & carne plenâ, capillis uſque ad Croci colorem flaveſcentibus, maximè in juventute. Eminebat ei frons & medius naſus cætera longus, & in fine craſſiuſculus (13).

[E] His too amorous complexion, like that of Ovid, occaſioned his being ſent into baniſhment.] Some Ladies of the higheſt diſtinction had a paſſion for Camoens; which was enough to ruin him in a country, where the men are ſo extremely jealous. We do not directly know the Ladies who were the objects of his affection; and it is very probable that the families to which they were related, uſed their utmoſt endeavours to ſuppreſs the remembrance of theſe amours. Our Poet himſelf mentions thoſe Ladies under fictitious names; ſometimes under that of the beautiful Violante, and at other times under that of the lovely Natercia, which ſome ſuppoſe to be the beautiful Catherine of Almada his relation, and that it is ſhe who is hinted at in one of his ſonnets which begins thus,

Liſo paſtor num campo verde
Natercia crua Nympha ſo buſcav (14).
That is,
The ſhepherd Liſus, in a flow'ry mead,
Sought his too cruel, tho' ador'd, Natercia.

[F] He wrote ſeveral beautiful pieces during his ſtay in Africa.] Among the reſt he compoſed a Sonnet, in imitation of Petrach. It is an excellent deſcription of the evils which love made him ſuffer; and it appears from the following lines, that he conſidered that paſſion as the only cauſe of his misfortunes.

Fes me deixar ô patrio ninho amado
Paſſando ô longo mar, que ameçeando, &

Agora

(1) Bibliotheca Hiſpan. vol. 2. pag. 20. col. 1.
(2) Du Perron de Caſtera, prefixed to his Tranſlation of the Luſiad, vol. 1. pag. 19, 20. of his Vie du Camoens, Amſterdam 1735, 12mo. Idem, pag. 20.
(3) Doct. Joan. Salgado in Nobiliar. Galic. quoted in la Vie du Camoens, pag. 21. prefixed to La Luſiade, par Du Perron de Caſtera.
(4) Ibid. pag. 21, 22.
(5) Ibid. pag. 22, 23.
(6) Ibid. pag. 23.
(7) Nic. Antonio, ibid.
(8) Luſiade du Camoens, pag. 25.
(9) Luſiade du Camoens, vol. 1. pag. 27, 28.
(10) Nicholas Anton. ibid. ut ſupra.
(11) Manuel de Faria in Vita Poet. quoted in La Luſiade du Camoens, pag. 26.
(12) Manuel Severin. and Manuel de Correa, cited in La Luſiade du Camoens, pag. 26.
(13) Bibliotb. Hiſpan. ibid. ut ſupra.
(14) Luſiade du Camoens, vol. 1. pag. 27, 28.

Our valiant Poet now obtained leave to return to Court, where he flattered himſelf with the hopes of being rewarded for his military toils; however, he met only with ingratitude, and fortune was as cruel to him on this occaſion, as in moſt other incidents of his life. To add to his infelicity, his former flame broke out anew, which raiſing the jealouſy of ſeveral perſons, he thought it prudent to leave Liſbon voluntarily, for fear leſt he ſhould be baniſhed a ſecond time [G]. Accordingly he embarked for India, where he arrived ſafe at the time that Don Alonzo de Norogna was Viceroy there. Here he found his countrymen engaged in a war againſt the King of Pimenta, who had diſpoſſeſſed the people of Cochin and Porca, their Allies, of ſome Iſlands. Our martial Poet, immediately after his landing, reſolved to ſhare in the glory of this expedition; and it is affirmed that he behaved on this as on all other occaſions, with the utmoſt bravery; but at the ſame time had ſo much modeſty as to make only a tranſient mention of it in his writings (b). We find that the Portugueze gained the victory. He engaged in a ſecond expedition the year following [H]. At his return from it he lived happily for ſome time in Goa, the Muſes forming his chief employment and delight. But happening afterwards to write ſome ſatyrical pieces, he was baniſhed to China by Don Franciſco Barreto, at that time Viceroy of the Indies [I] (i). Our Poet was not altogether unfortunate in his exile, he being ſent to Macao in a conſiderable employment (k). In theſe remote regions he compleated his admirable Poem entitled the Luſiad, the firſt Cantos of which he had compoſed in his youth, in his native country [K] (l). Having got a little money in his poſt, he went on board a ſhip with the deſign of returning to Goa; hoping to meet with a kind reception from Don Conſtantine de Braganza the new Viceroy of the Indies. His voyage was very unfortunate, the ſhip being caſt away in a dreadful ſtorm, and himſelf eſcaping with nothing but his Poem, with which he ſwam to ſhore [L] (m). The Camboyans who inhabit the banks of the river Mecon, ſuccoured our Poet with the utmoſt humanity, and he reſided for ſome time among them; but having an opportunity of ſailing to Goa, he returned to that City, where Don Conſtantine de Braganza, the Viceroy, honoured him with his friendſhip; but the government of this

(b) La Luſiade du Camoens, vol. 1. pag. 35, 36.

(i) Ibid. pag. 39. and Bibliothec. Hiſpan. ibid.

(k) La Luſiade du Camoens, pag. 41.

(l) Ibid. pag. 41. See the Note [X] where ſome account is given of the Luſiad. The Portugueze are called Luſiads, (according to the fabulous writers) either from Luſus the 17th King of Spain, or from Luſus, the ſon and companion of Bacchus, who conquered India.

(m) Bibliotb. Hiſpan. ibid. and La Luſiade du Camoens, pag. 42, 43.

Agora experimentando à furia rara
De Marte, que co os olhos quis que logo
Viſſe, è tocaſſe o acerbo fruto ſeu &c.

That is,

" Thou, Cupid, mad'ſt me fly my much-lov'd coun" try,
" And tempt the horrors of the boundleſs ocean.
" To thy fierce enmity alone is owing,
" That now I want an eye.——

[G] For fear leſt he ſhould be baniſhed Liſbon a ſecond time.] Notwithſtanding the loſs of his eye, he ſtill was ſo much the idol of the fair, that many were jealous on that account. This prompted him to leave Liſbon, which he did in great diſguſt, and with a firm reſolution never to return back to it, as appears from the following words of Scipio Africanus repeated by Camoens: Ingrata patria non poſſedebis oſſa mea (15). i. e. " Ungrateful Country! thou ſhalt not " poſſeſs my aſhes." Nicholas Antonio does not mention this return of our Poet to Liſbon; and he obſerves, that the loſs of his eye had diſfigured him very much. Luminis tamen orbitate ſpecies totius oris non parum dehoneſtabatur (16).

(15) Idem, pag. 33, 34.

(16) Bibliotb. Hiſpan. ubi ſupra.

[H] He engaged in a ſecond expedition the year following.] This was under Captain Emanuel Vaſconcellos in the ſtraits of Mecca. It was here he had a ſight of Mount-Fælix, and all that part of Africa which he has deſcribed ſo beautifully, in one of his ſongs in the Italian taſte, where he bewails his own misfortunes and the abſence of his miſtreſs (7).

(17) La Luſiade du Camoens, vol. 1. pag. 37.

[I] He was baniſhed to China, by the Viceroy of the Indies.] Camoens had been ſo imprudent, as to compoſe ſome Pieces in which he ſtrongly ſatyrized ſeveral perſons of the greateſt diſtinction in Goa. However, he looked upon this puniſhment as very unjuſt; ſo that, in one of his Poems, he deſires nothing more, in order to revenge himſelf of Don Franciſco Bareto and to cover him with eternal infamy, than to immortalize the memory of his rigour.

A Pena deſte deſterro
Que eu mais deſejo eſculpida
Em pedra, ou em duro ferro (18).

(18) Idem, pag. 39, 40.

It is however a juſtice due to this viceroy, to obſerve, that he is highly applauded in Hiſtory, for his adminiſtration.

[K] The Luſiad, the firſt Cantos of which he had compoſed . . . . in his native Country.] Thus, ſays the late Author of the life of Cameons, " this piece, which " is very little inferiour to the Æneid, was, like that " Poem, the fruit of many years labour, but with this " difference; Virgil was bleſſed with the ſmiles of " fortune whilſt he was compoſing the Æneid, where- " as the whole life of Camoens was an uninterrupted " ſeries of vexations and calamities. Hence we have " the greater reaſon to admire his ſtrength of mind; " which enabled him to trample, as it were, upon " fortune, and kept his genius from drooping; a " rare and unuſual circumſtance (19)."

(19) Idem, pag. 41, 42.

[L] Eſcaping with nothing but his Poem with which he ſwam to ſhore.] This dreadful ſtorm aroſe when they were off of Camboia. The ſhip was ſwallowed up by the waves, and Camoens ſwam with his Luſiad and other Poems (20), as far as the * Mehon in the gulph, where this river, one of the largeſt in China, empties itſelf into the ſea (21). Nicholas Antonio obſerves, that this famous Poem had the ſame fate with the Commentaries of Julius Cæſar, the Hero as well as the Poet being oblig'd to ſave themſelves and their works by ſwimming. Hoc enim clariſſimum ingenii ſui monumentum ſive effectum ſive jam eo tempore perfectum, lævâ, ut quondam Cæſar Julius, elatâ, dum remigio dextræ utitur, exitio eripuit (22). " Thus heaven would have " theſe celebrated works to be ſaved from ſhipwreck " by their Authors, who reſembled one another in ele- " vation of genius and the nobleſt acquirements; in " intrepidity in the moſt formidable dangers, in great- " neſs of ſoul, and in the calamities which befell " them." Camoens has eternized the remembrance of this incident, in the tenth Canto of his Luſiad, where he makes Thetis ſay, by way of prediction,

(20) Nichol. Antonio, ubi ſupra, ſays, that Camoens ſaved nothing but his Luſiad; jacturâ omnium, præterquam quod ſui Luſiadum, . . . operis factâ.

* Or rather Mecon.

(21) La Luſiade du Camoens, pag. 42.

(22) Bibliotb. Hiſpan. ubi ſupra.

Eſte receberà placido è brando
No ſeu regaço o Canto, que molhado
Vem do Naufragio triſte e miſerando,
Dos proceloſos baxos eſcapado
Das fomes dos Perigos grandes (23).

(23) La Luſiade du Camoens, pag. 43, 44.

Thus tranſlated by Sir Richard Fanſhaw.

" Upon his * ſoft and charitable brim
" The wet and ſhipwreckt SONG receive ſhall he,
" Which, in a lamentable plight ſhall ſwim
" From ſhoals and quickſands of tempeſtuous ſea,
" (The dire effect of exile) when on him
" Is executed the unjuſt decree;
" Whoſe repercuſſive lyre ſhall have the fate
" To be renowned more than fortunate.

* The River Mecon.

this Nobleman was very ſhort; and the calm and eaſe which Camoens had enjoyed under the ſhade of his protection, vaniſhed like a dream. Scarce had Count Redondo ſucceeded Don Conſtantine, but our Poet's enemies accuſed him of male-adminiſtration in the exerciſe of his employment abovementioned, ſo that he was thrown into priſon [M]. Having afterwards obtained his liberty he ſailed for Sofala, with a * Gentleman who was appointed Governor of a fortreſs in that Kingdom, and had made him very advantageous offers. However the promiſes of this man came to nothing, he having taken our Poet with him, with no other view but to divert himſelf by the delightful converſation of Camoens in that wild country. But this was not all, for he treated Camoens with great inhumanity [N], ſo that he at laſt left the Indies, and returned again to Liſbon in 1569 (n), after having been ſixteen years abſent from Portugal, and devoted to a military life (o). Beſides the deſire he had to ſee again his native country, there was a ſtill ſtronger motive for him to reviſit it, and this was to preſent his Luſiad to King Sebaſtian, though but a child (p). But notwithſtanding he had deſerved ſo well from his King and Country, by his admirable compoſitions, he yet had not an opportunity of riſing to any tolerable condition of life (q); ſo that after paſſing ten years more in the extremes of miſery, with ſcarce a bed to lie on, he died in 1579, at upwards of fifty years of age (r). The late French Tranſlator of the Luſiad, differs from Nicholas Antonio on this occaſion, he aſſuring us, that King Sebaſtian, as a reward for our Poet's dedicating the Luſiad to him, gave him a yearly penſion of four thouſand Reals (amounting to about fourteen hundred French Livres); but upon condition that he ſhould ſpend the remainder of his days at Court; an evident proof of the high eſteem which this young Auguſtus had for his Virgil (s). This penſion, and the ſmiles of Majeſty, would have enabled Camoens to ſpend his later days in peace and comfort, had it not been for the troubles which broke out in Portugal; for King Sebaſtian, being too ſtrongly hurried away by his valour, carried his arms into Africa, and was killed fighting againſt the Moors in the battle of Alcazer (t). Cardinal Don Henriquez aſcending the Throne of Portugal, and being very far advanced in years, he was not able to ſuppreſs the inteſtine feuds and civil broils which at that time infeſted Portugal. In this tumult and confuſion the voice of Camoens was not heard, and his penſion was cut off; after which his life was truly miſerable [O]. He left no children behind him, having always lived a ſingle life (u). The younger branch of his family was extinct in him. He was buried privately in St. Anne's Church, and an Epitaph was inſcribed over his grave [P]. Afterwards two Latin Epitaphs were compoſed in his honour, and placed over his tomb [Q]. Many Poems were addreſſed

* Peter Barreto.

(n) La Luſiade du Camoens, pag. 47, 48.
(o) Biblioth. Hiſpan. ubi ſupra.
(p) Idem, ibid.
(q) Idem, ibid.
(r) Idem, ibid. According to the French Tranſlator de la Luſiade du Camoens, he died in an Hoſpital, or in a poor lodging he had hired. See the Note [O].
(s) La Luſiade du Camoens, pag. 48, 49.
(t) Idem, pag. 48, 49, 50.
(u) Biblioth. Hiſpan. idem, ibid.

[M] He was thrown into priſon.] The new Viceroy had the higheſt eſteem for Camoens, yet this could not ſecure him from a priſon, to which he was dragged like a criminal, tho' he had nothing to reproach himſelf with, as to the execution of his office, which he eaſily proved to the confuſion of thoſe who envied him. However, his creditors, (for he had contracted ſome debts) all laid their actions againſt him to a man; by which means he was detained a conſiderable time in priſon (†). This is but too often the fate of thoſe who labour under the like misfortune.

(†) La Luſiade du Camoens, pag. 46.

[N] He treated Camoens with great inhumanity.] When the Governor brought him into this country, ſo far from endeavouring to make his life eaſy, he rendered it as uncomfortable as poſſible. Camoens was ſoon diſguſted at this barbarous uſage, which made him again wiſh for his native country; and tho' he had ſwore never to return thither, he nevertheleſs reſolved to go on board a ſhip that was bound for Liſbon, on which occaſion, ſome Portugueze Gentlemen of great diſtinction, were very deſirous of having him go along with them. The Governor exaſperated at Camoens for his deſign of leaving him, was ſo baſe as to demand two hundred crowns for his board and other particulars; and even threatened to impriſon him, in caſe he refuſed payment. The unhappy Camoens would never have eſcaped out of the clutches of this miſer, had he not been ſatisfied by the Gentlemen above hinted at, who then carried Camoens with them to Liſbon (24).

(24) Idem, pag. 46, 47, 48.

[O] After which his life was truly miſerable.] His grief at the barbarous treatment he met with, encreaſed his other infirmities; ſo that at laſt, being deſtitute of all ſuccour, he was obliged to ſhelter himſelf in an hoſpital; or, according to ſome Hiſtorians, in a poor hovel, whence he writ the following remarkable words, which were the laſt that came from his pen. Quem ouvio dizer nunca que em tam pequeno Teatro, como o de hum pobre leyto, quis eſſe à fortuna repreſentar tam grandes deſaventuras? e eu, como ſe ellas nam baſtaſſem, me ponho abinda de ſua parte, porque procurar reſiſtir à tantos males, pareceria eſpecie de deſavergonhamento. i. e. "Wretched fate! to be thus lying on a miſerable bed, a true theatre of miſery! Did fortune ever exhibit ſuch tragical, ſuch cruel adventures as mine? but I myſelf will join with that ſavage Goddeſs, as tho' her fury were not ſufficient to cruſh me; for the bare attempting to combat ſuch an uninterrupted ſeries of calamities would be next to inſolence (25)." Camoens bewails the little encouragement given by the great men of Portugal to merit, and his ill fortune, in the moſt pathetic ſtrains, in the fifth Canto of his Luſiad, which is thus tranſlated by a modern hand.

(25) Cited in La Luſiade du Camoens, vol. 1. pag. 50, 51, 52.

Mournful I ſpeak it, to my Country's ſhame,
Want of excitement keeps its genius low:
Our rude and boiſt'rous Lords are deaf to fame,
And ſeem, as careleſs to be known, as know.
Dull and of groſs deſires, their empty pride,
Dark and contracted, taſtes not what is writ;
For how alas! ſhould lameneſs learn to ſtride?
Or he, who underſtands not, cheriſh wit!
Bleſt let the Muſes be, by thoſe I ſing,
That I, for no reward, but honour, born,
Have, for my Country's Glory, touch'd the ſtring,
And laugh her titled arrogance to ſcorn.
While on the fame of Luſitania bent,
Your Charms, ye Nymphs of Tagus, I reveal,
Fortune the frame of my proud hope has rent,
And drags me friendleſs at her Chariot Wheel.
Degraded, at another's board to eat,
A rock of want! ſurrounded by my woes;
Ingratitude itſelf, unmov'd I meet,
And riſe, the ſtronger, againſt envy's blows.
See, Nymphs! what learned Lords your Tagus boaſts!
What Patrons of the noble arts we find!
Such is their worth, who fill the public Poſts!
And ſuch the prize, that crowns a generous Mind (26)!

(26) The Plain-Dealer, being ſelect Eſſays on ſeveral curious Subjects, num. 16. vol. 1. London 1730, 8vo.

[P] An Epitaph was inſcribed over his grave.]

Here lies Lewis de Camoens,
Prince of the Poets of his time.
He lived poor and miſerable, and died ſuch,
Anno Domini, 1579.

[Q] Two Latin Epitaphs were compoſed in his ſed to his memory, in Latin, Italian, Spaniſh and Portugueze, and among others, a Sonnet by the famous Taſſo [R]. Camoens wrote a great many Pieces beſides his Luſiad, as Songs, Sonnets, Epigrams, Eclogues, Elegies, Satyrs, Odes *, and Comedies [S]. Philip II King of Spain was ſenſible of his great merit; inſomuch that when he had conquered Portugal, upon his enquiring into the affairs of that Kingdom, he aſked very earneſtly after Camoens, intending to ſettle a handſome penſion upon him: and was deeply afflicted at hearing that he was dead (w). With regard to his character, he was affable in ſociety, and kind to his inferiors; reſpectful, without debaſing himſelf, towards ſuch great men as treated him with affability; and free, without pride, towards thoſe who uſed him arrogantly. His converſation was upon ſublime or gay ſubjects, according to the genius and inclination of thoſe with whom he was in company. He was modeſt in proſperity, patient in adverſity, and ſupported good or ill fortune with an equal temper. We have already taken notice of his valour. His intrepidity was not the effect of an impetuous diſpoſition or a brutal fury; but aroſe from a greatneſs of ſoul, that had a full ſenſe of true Glory, and which at the ſame time made Camoens ſeek it leſs for his own ſake than for that of his Country. This noble principle alone prompted him to celebrate the exploits of his Countrymen, in ſpite of the ingratitude with which they repaid his learned toils. His affliction to ſee liberty breathe its laſt in his native Country, after King Sebaſtian's death, haſtned his end, as appears from a paſſage in one of his Letters [T].

* All theſe leſſer Pieces have been frequently printed together in Liſbon in 4to, and entitled Rimas de Luis de Camoens.

(w) Bibliotb. Hiſpan. idem, ibid.

Camoens

his honour.] The firſt is a kind of Dialogue between the Monument and the paſſenger, and was written by Don Emanuel de Souza Coutino, one of the greateſt genius's in Portugal. He therein declares, that the genius of Ovid, Virgil, Sophocles and Pindar were united in Camoens: he expreſſes his wonder at his being able to compoſe pieces of ſo various a kind: ſays, that the ſcepter of Poeſy was juſtly ſwayed by Camoens: that he had brought Helicon into Portugal, and made it a perfect Elyſium: and concludes with aſſerting, that he ſurpaſſed Orpheus, and would have performed ſtill greater wonders, had the Greek been his native language.

Quod Maro ſublimi, quod grandi Pindarus alto,
Quod Sophocles, ſuavi Naſo quod ore canit,
Mœſtitiam, riſus, horrentia prælia, amores,
Juncta ſimul, cantu ſed meliore damus.
Quiſnam Author? Camonius. Unde hic protulit illum?
Lyſia in Eoas imperioſa plagas.
Unus tanta dedit? Dedit, & majora daturus,
Ni celeri fato corriperetur, erat.
Ultimus hic choreis Muſarum præfuit, illo
Plenior Aonidum nobiliorque chorus.
Flos veteris, virtuſque novæ fuit ille Camoenæ,
Debita jure ſibi ſceptra poëſis habet.
In Luſitanos Heliconis culmina tractus
Tranſtulit, antra, lyras, ſerta, fluenta, Deas.
Currere Caſtalios noſtrâ de rupe liquores
Juſſit, & invito prata virere ſolo.
Cerne per incultos Tempe jucunda receſſus,
Cerne ſatas ſterili ceſpite veris opes.
Omnibus occidui tibi rident floribus horti,
Non ego jam Lyſios credo, ſed Elyſios.
Orpheus attonitas dulci modulamine cautes
Traxit, & ab ſtygio ſquallida monſtra freto
Mæonios, Lodoice, ſacro cum culmine montes,
Pieridum trahis, cœlituumque choros.
Sunt majora tuæ Orphæis miracula vocis,
Attica, quid faceres, ſi tibi lingua foret (27)!

(27) La Luſiade du Camoens, vol. 1. pag. 53, 54.

As theſe Epitaphs are partly hiſtorical, the learned reader will not be diſpleaſed at the length of them; and for this reaſon I ſhall introduce another from Nicholas Antonio, eſpecially as his work is but in few nds.

Naſo elegis, Flaccus lyricis, epigrammate Marcus,
Hic jacet heroo Carmine Virgilius;
Enſe ſimul, Calamoque auxit tibi, Lyſia, famam:
Unam nobilitant Mars & Apollo manum.
Caſtalium fontem traxit modulamine, at Indo
Et Gangi telis obſtupefecit aquas.
Lyſia mirata eſt, quando aurea Carmina lucrum
Ingenii, haud gazas, ex oriente tulit.
Sic bene de patria meruit dum fulminat enſe
At plus dum calamo bellica facta refert.
Hunc Itali, Galli, Hiſpani vertêre Poëtam,
Quælibet hunc vellet terra vocare ſuum.
Vertere fas, æquare nefas, æquabilis uni
Eſt ſibi, par nemo, nemo ſecundus erit (28).

(28) Bibliotb. Hiſpan. ubi ſupra.

This Epitaph, which was not put up till ſome years after Camoens's death, was written by the learned Father Matthew of Cardoſo, a Jeſuit, Profeſſor in the Univerſity of Ebora. He ſays, that Camoens poſſeſſed the various talents of the famous Poets of Antiquity: That Mars had put the ſword, and Apollo the pen, into his hand: That Portugal was ſurprized at the rich treaſures (his Compoſitions) which Camoens brought from India: That all Nations would naturalize this Poet, and have him ſpeak their language: That they might tranſlate, but could never equal him.

[R] A Sonnet by the famous Taſſo.] It was wrote ſome years after the Luſiad appeared in public, and before his Jeruſalem was ſent to preſs: and will be an everlaſting monument of the veneration which this great Italian Poet had for Camoens. It is addreſſed to Vaſco de Gama.

Vaſco, le cui felici, ardite antenne
In contro al ſol, che ne riporta il giorno
Spiegar' le vele, è fer' colà ritorno,
Dove egli par che di cadere accenne:

Non più di te per aſpro mar ſoſtenne
Quel, che fece al Ciclope oltraggio, è ſcorno:
Ne chi turbo l'Arpie nel ſuo ſoggiorno,
Ne diè più bel ſeggetto à colte penne.

Et hor quella del colto, è buon' Luigi
Tant' oltrè ſtende il glorioſo volo
Che i tuoi ſpalmati legni andar' men' lungi.

Und' a quelli, à cui s'alza il noſtro polo,
Et à chi ferma in contra i ſuoi veſtigi
Per lui del corſo tuo la fama aggiunge (29).

(29) Opera di Taſſo.

This is a very noble compliment, the ſenſe of which is; "Thou Vaſco, braving the horrors of the deep, "carriedſt thy ſhips to the moſt diſtant regions where "the Sun riſes. Neither the exploits of Ulyſſes who "defied the Cyclops, nor of Jaſon who drove away "the Harpies, were comparable to thine. But how "great ſoever thy fame be, thou art obliged for it "chiefly to Camoens, whoſe admirable voice has "ſpread farther than thy ſails: and it is wholly ow-"ing to his Muſe, that thy name has reached the moſt "remote Countries."

[S] And Comedies.] Theſe are the amours of Philodemus and Amphytrion, imitated from Plautus (30). This does not agree exactly with Nicholas Antonio, who tells us, that he wrote ſome Comedies according to the genius of thoſe times; and was ſaid to have tranſlated Plautus's Amphytrion and other Comedies into Portugueze (31).

(30) La Luſiade du Camoens, vol. 1. pag. 62.

(31) Bibliotb. Hiſpan. ibid.

[T] From a paſſage in one of his Letters.] It is as follows: Em fim accabarey à vida, è verram todos que fuy tam afeiçoado à minha patria, que nam ſomente me contentei de morrer nella, mas de morrer com ella (32). i. e. "I ſhall at laſt finiſh my courſe, and the whole "world ſhall know how tenderly I loved my country.

(32) Cited in La Luſiade du Camoens, pag. 64, 65.

Camoens was naturally jocoſe, and often very humourous in his gayer moments [V]. He was never idle, but was for ever either ſtudying or compoſing; and neither priſons, the moſt barbarous climates, or the moſt cruel misfortunes could damp the fire of his genius. His intimate friends aſſure us, that he was very ſober, and would never drink to exceſs (x). The writer from whom I borrow this character of our Poet, is not a little partial to him, as appears from what follows. With regard to his amours with ſome Ladies of diſtinction, this was only a tribute he paid to youth and the Portugueze blood, which is naturally inclined to love (y). Camoens is accuſed of ſome errors which contributed to his calamities. The firſt was his ſatyrical vein, which ſometimes carried him to ſuch lengths, that he did not ſpare perſons of the higheſt diſtinction, not excepting Kings; and his cenſure was ſometimes unjuſt. His ſecond error was a too great extravagance and profuſion. He would be ſo overjoyed at the leaſt ſucceſs, that he fondly imagined he was then raiſed above all the future inſults of fortune; when, hurried along by this wild notion, he would throw away his money by handfulls, and ſo ſquandred what would otherwiſe have ſecured him from the dreadful poverty into which he fell in his later days (z). The laſt cited Author makes a very humane reflection on this occaſion [W]. The Luſiad, the ſubject of which is the diſcovery of the Eaſt-Indies by the Portugueze, and the Hero of it the famous Vaſco de Gama [X], has gained our Poet a name, (x) La Luſiade du Camoens, vol. 1. pag. 66.

(y) Idem, pag. 66, 67.

(z) Idem, pag. 67, 68, 69.

" It will be found that I was reſolved, not only to " die in its boſom, but with it."

[V] Was often very humourous in his gayer moments.] It is ſaid that Camoens paſſing thro' one of the ſtreets of Liſbon by a China Shop, and hearing the maſter of it murther ſome of his Verſes as he ſung 'em: Immediately he flew into the ſhop, and after breaking ſeveral pieces of China, he cried: Friend, you maim my works, and I demoliſh your goods; this is but tit for tat. However he paid for the damage he had done (33). The like incident is related of a Greek Author. The laſt cited French Writer obſerves, that as our Poet imitated ſo carefully the Antients in things of a majeſtic kind, he alſo might have imitated them in their gayer flights (34). One was certainly much more laudable than the other.

(33) Idem, pag. 65.

(34) Idem, pag. 66.

[W] Makes a very humane reflection on this occaſion.] " Such, ſays he, is the condition of human nature; " ſome ſpot ever diſfigures the picture of our virtues. " The moſt perfect are thoſe who have the feweſt im- " perfections: however, this ought not to prevent our " admiring theſe great Genius's, as well as the maſter- " pieces of great Painters, which notwithſtanding " ſome blemiſhes are yet highly eſteemed by all " judges (35)."

(35) Idem, pag. 69.

[X] The Luſiad . . .] Emanuel the ſecond, King of Portugal, being deſirous of diſcovering a new way to the Eaſt-Indies, by the Ocean, ſent Velaſco de Gama (36) with a Fleet in the year 1497, to that undertaking, which being new, was accounted raſh and impracticable, and which of courſe gained him a great reputation when it ſucceeded. Camoens followed Velaſco (Vaſco) de Gama in that dangerous voyage, led by his friendſhip to him, and by a noble curioſity, which ſeldom fails to be the character of men born with a great imagination. He took his voyage for the ſubject of his Poem; he enjoyed the ſenſible pleaſure which nobody had known before him, to celebrate his friend, and the things which he was an eye-witneſs of. He wrote his Poem, part on the Atlantic Sea, and part on the Indian Shore. . . . Such a new ſubject managed by an uncommon Genius, could not but produce a ſort of epick Poetry unheard of before (37). The Engliſh Tranſlator of the Luſiad is of opinion, that the poetical rapture in Petronius hinted to Camoens the manner of conducting his Luſiad. The Tranſlator in queſtion prefixed a verſion of Petronius's little Poem, to that of the Luſiad, on which occaſion he ſays, Only making ſo much uſe thereof (Petronius's piece) as to ſhew the rule and model, which indubitably guided our Camoens in the raiſing his great building; and which, except himſelf, that I know of, no Poet ever followed that wrought in great, whether antient or modern: For, to ſay no more, the Greek Homer, the Latin Virgil, our Spencer, and even the Italian Taſſo . . . are in effect wholly fabulous; and Lucan, tho' worthily admired, is as much cenſured by ſome on the other ſide, for ſticking too cloſe to truth (38). There (39) no bloody wars are fought, no Heroes wounded in a thouſand different ways: no woman enticed away, and the world overturned for her cauſe; no Empire founded; in ſhort, nothing of what was deemed before the only ſubject of Poetry. The Poet conducts the Portugueze Fleet to the mouth of the Ganges, round the coaſts of Africk. He takes notice in the way of many Nations who live upon the African Shore. He interweaves artfully the Hiſtory of Portugal (40). We are told the ſubject of the Luſiad, in the two firſt Stanzas of it, as tranſlated by R. Fanſhaw Eſq; (afterwards Sir Richard).

(36) Here Mr. de Voltaire is in an error; it ſhould be Vaſco de Gama. The words followed Velaſco ſeem a little ambiguous. Mr. de Voltaire could not mean that Camoens accompanied Vaſco de Gama in his diſcovery, ſince that was made before our Poet was born.

(37) Voltaire's Eſſays on the Epic Poetry of the European Nations, pag. 71, 72. 2d edit. London 1728, 12mo.

(38) The Poſtſcript to the Tranſlation of the Luſiad, or Portugal's Hiſtorical Poem, by Richard Fanſhaw, Eſq; London 1655.

(39) In the Luſiad.

(40) Voltaire's Eſſays on the Epic Poetry &c. pag. 72, 73.

Arms, and the men above the vulgar file,
Who from the Weſtern Luſitanian Shore
Paſt even beyond the Trapobanian Iſle (41),
Through Seas which never ſhip had ſail'd before:
Who brave in action, patient in long toil, Beyond what ſtrength of human nature bore.)
'Mongſt Nations, under other Stars, acquir'd
A modern Scepter which to Heaven aſpir'd.

II.

Likewiſe thoſe Kings of glorious memory,
Who ſow'd and propagated where they paſt
The Faith with the new Empire, making dry
The breaſts of Aſia, and laying waſte
Black Africk's vicious Glebe, and thoſe who by Their deeds at home left not their names defac'd,
My ſong ſhall ſpread where ever there are men,
If wit and art will ſo much guide my pen (42).

(41) Now called Ceylan, and by others thought to be Sumatra.

(42) The Luſiad, or Portugal's Hiſtorical Poem, pag. 1.

The ſimplicity of the ſubject of the Poem is raiſed by ſome fictions of different kinds. . . . When the Fleet is ſailing in ſight of the Cape of Good-Hope, called then the Cape of the Storms, a formidable ſhape (43) appears to them, walking in the depth of the Sea; his head reaches to the clouds; the ſtorms, the winds, the thunders and the lightnings hang about him; his arms are extended over the waves. It is the guardian of that foreign Ocean unplough'd before by any ſhip. He complains of his being obliged to ſubmit to fate, and to the audacious undertaking of the Portugueze, and foretells them all the misfortunes which they muſt undergo in the Indies. . . . I believe that ſuch a fiction would be thought noble and proper in all Ages and in all Nations (44). Mr. de Voltaire has here given us a noble deſcription of this airy form. Camoens calls it ADAMASTOR (45). It is in the fifth Canto, and forms one of the nobleſt epiſodes that was ever introduced in an epic Poem. Preparatory to it, a thick cloud is ſuppoſed to riſe over the æther, which eclipſes the luſtre of the Stars; and at the ſame time a horrid ſound is heard. After this Prelude, the Phantom (Adamaſtor) riſes, whoſe ſize is declared to be infinitely more enormous than that of the Coloſſus of Rhodes. He is particularly deſcribed: He ſpeaks, and his thundering voice ſeems to riſe out of the deep abyſs. . . After exclaiming againſt the Portugueze for their unheard of boldneſs, in thus daring to brave all the horrors of an Ocean unploughed before; he tells them in a prophetic ſtrain the dreadful calamities which would befal them, and all who ſhould venture afterwards on thoſe Seas. Among other illuſtrious perſonages who ſhould come thither, he ſpeaks of a Gentleman (46) and his much loved Lady.

(43) Or rather Figure, or Phantom.

(44) Voltaire's ut ſupra, pag. 73.

(45) The late French Tranſlator of the Luſiad ſuppoſes this imaginary Being to be Mahomet. See his Reaſons (which perhaps are not very natural) vol. 2. pag. 163, & ſeq.

(46) Don Emanuel de Souza, or Sepulveda, Governor of Diu in India, who, with all his family, was caſt away off the Cape of Good Hope.

To

a name, which in all probability will deſcend to lateſt poſterity. It has borne a great number of impreſſions, been tranſlated into many Languages [Y], and illuſtrated by various Commentaries [Z]. Father Rapin has made ſome ſevere reflections on it [AA]. Mr. de Voltaire has applauded and cenſured it [BB]; and his Criticiſms have been anſwered

To this far-diſtant Region next ſhall come
A lover, with the nympth his ſoul adores.
Ill fated both: for after they've eſcap'd
The ſtorms and dreadful ſurges, both ſhall reach
A barbarous Land.

Here, continues our Poet, they ſhall be plunged into a ſeries of calamities, the bare recital of which makes me my ſelf almoſt ſhudder: They ſhall ſee their offſpring die with hunger; their dear children, who had been ſo tenderly brought up in the midſt of delights, and form'd as it were for happineſs; they themſelves ſhall be ſtript naked by the inhuman ſavages: the huſband ſhall ſee the body of his darling wife, her beautiful and charming body, expoſed to the inclemencies of the weather; parched in the day-time by the burning rays of the Sun; and froze in the night by the piercing cold. In fine, after ſuffering the moſt unheard of afflictions, theſe unhappy lovers ſhall expire in each others arms; ſhedding at the ſame time over each other a flood of tears, which might melt the moſt obdurate hearts (47). Adamaſtor here relates his own ſtory to Vaſco de Gama: ſays, that he is the brother of Enceladus and Briareus; that, fired by ambition, he had ſailed over the Ocean in queſt of Neptune, in order to combat that God. That happening to ſee the charming Thetis wantoning, quite naked, on the ſea-ſhore, he was ſeized with the ſtrongeſt paſſion. That all his endeavours to pleaſe her being vain, he employed Doris to ſpeak in his behalf; when Thetis promiſing on a certain night to ſooth his paſſion; he, all in raptures, flew to the rendezvous, where imagining he ſaw his much loved object, he extended his arms to embrace her, but was deluded, it being nothing but a rock; and that at laſt, after roving up and down the Ocean in a frantic manner, he had been metamorphoſed into the Cape of Good-Hope, where they then were (48).

(47) Extracted from the Luſiad, Canto 5.

(48) Ibid.

[Y] It has born a great number of impreſſions, and been tranſlated into many languages.] It was firſt printed at Liſbon in 1572 (49), which edition was followed by a great many others. It has been tranſlated into ſeveral languages. A French Verſion was made of it upwards of an hundred years ago (50). There are two tranſlations of it into Italian, four into Spaniſh, and one into Latin, by Thomas de Faria a Carmelite, Biſhop of Targa in Africa. This Tranſlator having concealed his name, and not informing the Public that it was a tranſlation, many were thence induced to believe, that it had been writ originally in Latin (51).

(49) Conſequently ſeven years before the Author died.

(50) The laſt French Verſion, (ſo often mentioned here) is in 3 vol. 12mo, and was publiſhed this year, 1735.

(51) Biblioth. Hiſpan. pag. 21. and Jugemens des Savans, par Baillet, pag. 100. tom. 4. Amſterdam 1725, 4to.

[Z] Illuſtrated by various Commentaries.] Firſt by Emanuel Correa, whoſe Notes are but ſhort, and which were enlarged by Peter Mariz: Afterwards by Gomez de Tapia; but the moſt conſiderable Commentaries are thoſe of Emanuel Faria de Souſa, written in the Spaniſh Tongue, and printed at Madrid in 1639 in two vol. folio, and are ſaid to abound with great erudition, but are thought a little too prolix. Another volume, in folio, in defence of thoſe Commentaries, was publiſhed the year after in the laſt mentioned city. The abovementioned Faria de Souſa left behind him, at his death in 1650, eight volumes more of Notes, on the other Works of Camoens (52).

(52) Idem, ut ſupra.

[AA] Father Rapin has made ſome ſevere reflections on it.] Speaking of the Diction of Poeſy, which ought to be clear, natural, and harmonious; and ſaying that one of the greateſt vices in writing is obſcurity, he goes on thus: It is in this that Camoens, whom the Portugueze call their Virgil, is faulty; his verſes being ſo very obſcure, that they ſeem all to contain ſo many myſteries (53). Saying that, to write a fine epic Poem, the Author muſt obſerve a proportion in his deſign, juſtneſs in the thought, and not launch into random digreſſions, he accuſes Camoens of failing in theſe particulars (54). Cenſuring the heterogeneous mixture of Deities and other machines in ſome epic Poems, he ſays that Camoens introduces very extravagantly Venus, Bacchus and other Pagan Deities in a Chriſtian Poem, blending in this injudicious manner the Heathen fables with our Religion (55). He paſſes the following general cenſure on the Luſiad. Camoens, who is the ſole heroic Poet among the Portugueze, has only expreſſed the haughtineſs of his Countrymen, in his Poem on the Conqueſt of India; for he is vehement in Compoſition, but has very little conduct or diſcernment (56). How different is this character from the following! "The "Luſiad may be conſidered as one of the fineſt "Poems extant, after Homer and Virgil... Its ſub- "ject is grand, and worthy of the Epopea.. the uni- "ty of the principal action and that of the Hero are "perfectly obſerved in it; we perceive art in the "whole conduct of it, a ſublime allegory, ſeveral "well-contrived epiſodes, paſſions expreſſed with "ſtrength and delicacy, and lively deſcriptions; in "fine, diction varied ſuitably to the ſubject, now eaſy "and plain, then rapid and majeſtic; always in- "chanting, and never diſfigured with a play of words, "whoſe falſe ſplendor ſometimes vitiates the fineſt Com- "poſitions of the Italians and Spaniards (57)." Father Rapin ſays afterwards, that Camoens is far from being natural in his Paſtorals and other little Pieces (58).

(53) Reflexions ſur l'Eloquence, la Poëtique &c. par le Pere Rapin, pag. 142. tom. 2. Amſterdam 1686.

(54) Idem, pag. 162.

(55) Idem, pag. 173.

(56) Idem, pag. 179.

(57) La Luſiade du Camoens, ut ſupra, vol. 1. Preface, pag. vi, vii.

(58) Reflexions ſur l'Eloquence, la Poeſie &c. pag. 202.

[BB] Mr. de Voltaire has applauded and cenſured it.] We have already taken notice of ſome encomiums beſtowed by him on the Luſiad (59). Here follow ſome others. "Camoens was a ſtrong inſtance of the irre- "ſiſtible impulſe of nature, which determines a true "genius to follow the bent of his talents, in ſpite "of all the obſtacles which could check his courſe.... "His infancy loſt amidſt the idleneſs and ignorance "of the Court of Liſbon (60); his youth ſpent in "Romantic loves, or in the wars againſt the Moors; "his long voyages at ſea, in his riper years; his miſ- "fortunes at Court, the revolutions of his country; "none of all theſe could ſuppreſs his genius..... "Camoens in Portugal ſteered a new courſe, and ac- "quired a reputation which laſts ſtill among his "countrymen, who pay as much veneration to his "memory, as the Engliſh to Milton (61)." Here follow ſome cenſures. I. "There is another fiction "(ſays Mr. de Voltaire) which would perhaps have "pleaſed the Italians as well as the Portugueze, but "no other nation beſides: it is an inchanted iſland, "called the iſland of Bliſs *, which the fleet finds "in her way home, juſt riſing from the ſea, for their "comfort and for their reward: Camoens deſcribes "that place, as Taſſo did ſome years after his iſland "of Armida. There a ſupernatural power brings in "all the beauties, and preſents all the pleaſures which "nature can afford, and which the heart may wiſh "for; a Goddeſs enamour'd with Velaſco (Vaſco) de "Gama, carries him to the top of a high mountain, "from whence ſhe ſhews him all the Kingdoms of "the earth (62), and foretels the fate of Portugal, "After Camoens hath given a looſe to his fancy, in "the laſcivious deſcription of the pleaſures which "Gama and his crew enjoyed in the iſland, he takes "care to inform the reader, that he ought to un- "derſtand by this fiction, nothing but the ſatisfaction "which the virtuous man feels, and the glory which "accrues to him by the practice of virtue.... But "the beſt excuſe for ſuch an invention is, the charming "ſtile in which it is delivered, (if we may believe "the Portugueze;) for the beauty of the elocution "makes ſome amends for the faults of the Poet, as "the colouring of Rubens makes ſome defects in his "figures paſs unregarded (63)."

(59) In the note [X].

(60) The other writers who have wrote on Camoens, don't ſay this.

(61) Voltaire, Eſſays, ut ſupra, pag. 71.

* This is a miſtake of Mr. de Voltaire. Camoens does not call it the Iſland of Bliſs.

(62) The hint of this ſeems to be taken from the Devil's carrying our Saviour to the pinacle of the Temple &c.

(63) Voltaire's Eſſay, ut ſupra, pag. 74, 75. This fiction is in the 9th Canto of the Luſiad.

The next cenſure amounts to much the ſame with what Father Rapin had before taken notice of (64).

"II. There is another kind of machinery conti- "nued throughout all the Poem, which nothing can "excuſe in any country whatſoever; it is an injudi- "cious mixture of the Heathen Gods with our Reli- "gion. Gama in a ſtorm addreſſes his prayers to "Chriſt, but it is Venus who comes to his relief; "the Heroes are Chriſtians, and the Poet a Heathen. "The main deſign which the Portugueze are ſuppoſed "to have, (next to the promoting of their trade (65),) "is to propagate Chriſtianity, yet Jupiter, Bacchus, "and Venus, have in their hands, all the manage- "ment

(64) See the note [AA] above, citation (55).

(65) A ſly innuendo.

swered by a late French Writer [CC]; Mr. de Voltaire afterwards gives his opinion of the " ment of the voyage. So incongruous a machinery, " casts a blemish upon the whole Poem; yet shews " at the same time, how prevailing are its beauties, " since the Portugueze like it with all its faults.

" III. Camoens hath a great deal of true wit, and " not a little share of false; his imagination hurries " him into great absurdities. . . . I remember that " after Gama hath related his adventures to the King " of (66) Melinda, now, says he, O King, judge if " Ulysses and Æneas, have travelled so far, and un- " dergone so many hardships. As if that barbarous " African, was acquainted with Homer and Vir- " gil (67).

(66) A Kingdom whose Capitol is of the same name. It is in Africa, not far from Mombaza. Its inhabitants were very kind to Vasco de Gama, and furnished him with Pilots, when he sailed to discover the East-Indies.

(67) Voltaire's Essay, ut supra, pag. 76.

[CC] Mr. de Voltaire's criticisms have been answered by a late French writer.] I. With regard to the island of Bliss (as Mr. de Voltaire calls it), the critic answers, " Venus is going to conduct the Portugueze " into a delicious island: The pleasures they are to " taste in it, tho' painted in the strongest colours of gal- " lantry, will yet be no other but that spiritual plea- " sure, that inward satisfaction, which proves the re- " ward of great men when they have succeeded in their " noble projects; the Sea-Nymphs shall represent " the virtues, as they have represented them on other " occasions. . . . Whatever Mr. de Voltaire's opinion " may be, I do not find any incongruity in this. It " was always the privilege of Poetry to employ cor- " poral images, in order to raise us to the knowledge " of things purely metaphysical or moral; not only " the Greek and Latin Authors, but also David in his " Psalms, and Solomon in his Song, abound with " such allegories; we there see, in every page, the " pleasures of the mind expressed by those of the body. " Now is it not rashness to assert that Camoens has " erred in following such guides (68)? I believe this criticism will not be able to invalidate Mr. de Voltaire's censure of this passage in the Lusiad. This island is represented as the most delicious spot in the universe; the flowers, the meads, the groves, the rivulets, the harmony of the birds are inchanting, and above all the Nereids who come ashore on it to sooth the toils of the Portugueze; in a word, the colouring glows with as much warmth and beauty as that of Titian. But whether the pleasures the Portugueze meet with in this island are adapted to raise the mind to spiritual things will appear from the following specimen of them, which I have translated from the Lusiad. " He said, " when immediately the Portugueze run with greater " swiftness than stags, after the Nereids, whose charms " had captivated their hearts. The Nereids dart " into the groves . . . . they shriek as they fly; but " that moment they look back on the Portugueze, " with such an agreeable smile as belies their fear: " Zephyr wantons in the ringlets of one of the Ne- " reids; he raises gently the flowing robe of another; " the beauties he reveals and hides the same instant, " are so many delicious objects which inflame the de- " sires of the pursuers. Some of the fugitive Nymphs " fall voluntarily on the verdant turf, and their coun- " tenances shew, that they would not be displeased to " have their lovers fall down by them: farther off, " the Portugueze find some Nereids who are quite " naked, and bathing in the stream: they at first " shriek; their affliction seems so sincere, that one " would not imagine they had waited in expectation " of being thus surprized: one feigning to sacrifice her " modesty to her fears, rises swiftly out of the water, " and flies into a neighbouring thicket, whilst the eye " that pursues her charms, fixes on the roses and lillies " which she refuses to the hand that strives so eagerly to " stop her. . . . Several of the Portugueze plunge into " the silver waves with their clothes on, when the pas- " sion that pervades all their faculties, pants to be im- " mediately gratified, insomuch that the least delay ap- " pears to them an age (69)." Here is a voluptuous picture! fit indeed to be hung up in the temple of Venus, or Mahomet's Paradise. . . . Camoens took the hint of this island from that of Andicheva, which Gama and his companions discovered some days after their departure from Calicut. According to Barros, they put in there, in order to get water and repose themselves, it being an inchanting place and very fruitful. II. As to the injudicious mixture of the Heathen Gods with our Religion, with which Mr. de Voltaire and Father Rapin accuse Camoens: this critick seems, if I mistake not, to answer very lamely. Among other reasons to defend Camoens in opposition to Mr. de Voltaire, he gives the following. " If Boileau is " allowed to introduce, in his Lutrin, Chicane and " Pleasure who are Goddesses of his creation; I would " fain know why Camoens should be forbid to employ, " in his Lusiad, the names of Phœbus and Thetis, " who are already known to the Poets. The allegory " is equal on both sides; and it ought to serve for " a pass-port to the Poet of the (†) Tagus, no less " than to him of the (70) Seine (71)." There is no Reader of taste but sees the weakness of this reasoning. The Lutrin is a burlesque Poem, and as such, Chicane and Pleasure were proper and beautiful machines; but it is far otherwise with a serious epic Poem like the Lusiad. Hence it will be found that the critick lays too much stress on the allegory; and consequently had no reason to suppose, that under Jupiter, Camoens shadowed God the Father, under Bacchus the Devil, under Venus the Christian Religion which protects the Portugueze in their voyage, under the fatal Sisters or Destinies the Cœlestial Venus, under Mars, our Saviour, under Mercury the Messenger-Angels, and so on. One would rather conclude, that these are faults in the Lusiad; and that they were owing, not so much to the Author as to the age he lived in. We find our Chaucer and all the great Poets of those times, blending in this injudicious manner, the Christian and Heathen systems. III. With regard to Mr. de Voltaire's censuring Camoens, for supposing the King of Melinda very well versed in the Grecian Story and Mythology, the critick answers, (among other reasons,) as follows. " Is " it not well known that the Indians had anciently " a correspondence with the Greeks? Did not the Gre- " cian Philosophers travel into every part of the East, " in order to consult the Magi and the Brachmans? " And was it not from them that Pythagoras borrowed " the doctrine of the transmigration of souls? Is it " not likewise universally agreed that Alexander the " Great had a strong passion for Literature, that he " conquered India and made some stay in it? . . . . " We may suppose that his Courtiers, and Officers, " most of whom were Macedonians, imitated their " Monarch in his love for learning. This being " granted, we may naturally conclude, that during " Alexander's stay in India, the nations of it learned " Mythology History, &c; at least after his departure, " since he left a great number of Greeks in the ci- " ties founded by him in India (72). . . . Had not the " Indians also a correspondence with the Romans (73)? " . . . But that which argues chiefly in favour of Ca- " moens, is the invasion of Spain by the Moors and " Arabians. They applied themselves to learning " when settled in the last mentioned country, and " nature having endued them with genius, they made " a swift progress: They translated the best Greek " and Latin Authors into their language; illustrated " them with Commentaries, and writ others of their " own invention. Some centuries after being drove " out of Spain, they carried into Africa and Asia the " several sciences that they had learnt in Europe. With " this knowledge, can Camoens be supposed to have " clashed with verisimilitude or even truth, in intro- " ducing a Moorish King, speaking of Pirithous or " any other subject borrowed from the Grecian Mytho- " logy (74)? Mr. de Voltaire's error proceeded from " his supposing this King an ignorant and savage Afri- " can; whereas he was an Arabian, and as such des- " cended from a nation who had cultivated very assi- " duously all parts of polite literature (75)." This critic is afterwards a little severe. " The mistake, " into which Mr. de Voltaire's great precipitation led " him, ought to serve as a lesson; and teach us, that " there is always less hazard in applauding, than in " blaming great men (76);" but he atones in some measure for the censure he had past, in saying immediately after. " Have we not great reason to dread " the quicksands and rocks in sailing on the ocean " of criticism, when we see so good a vessel shipwreck'd " upon it (77)?

(†) Camoens.

(70) Boileau.

(71) La Lusiade du Camoens, vol. 1. pag. 63.

(72) Idem, pag. 172, 173.

(73) Idem, pag. 174.

(74) Idem, pag. 175, 176.

(75) Idem, vol. 2. pag. 175.

(76) Idem, pag. 177.

(77) Idem, ibid.

(68) La Lusiade du Camoens, tom. 3. pag. 138.

(69) Lusiad, Canto 9.

the Poem in general [DD], and takes notice of two of the happieſt thoughts in it [EE]. Camoens has a fling at our Henry VIII, in one of his Cantos [FF]. We have a tranſlation of this noble Poem by Sir Richard Fanſhaw, but a new one is very much wanted.

[DD] Mr. de Voltaire afterwards gives his opinion of the Poem in general.] The Luſiad, "in my opinion, "is full of numberleſs faults and beauties, thick ſown "near one another; and almoſt in every page, there "is what to laugh at, and what to be delighted with "(79)." This character is very different from thoſe we have quoted from other Authors. Mr. de Voltaire, ſpeaking of Taſſo, ſays, "Torquato Taſſo began his "Jeruſalem, when Camoens was finiſhing his Luſiada, "he uſed to ſay, that the only rival he feared in Eu-"rope was Camoens. His fear (if ſincere) was very "ill-grounded; for he was as far ſuperior to him, as "that Portugueze Poet excelled the Poets of his own "Country (80)." But Sir Richard Fanſhaw ſays in the Dedication of his verſion of the Luſiad, that Camoens might juſtly have ſaid of Taſſo, if he had not ſeen my Luſiad, he had not excelled it.

(79) Voltaire's Eſſay, ut ſupra, pag. 76.

(80) Idem, pag. 77.

[EE] Takes notice of two of the happieſt thoughts in it.] "Theſe, ſays Mr. de Voltaire, I muſt take notice of, "for the likeneſs which they bear to two moſt cele-"brated paſſages (81) of Waller and Sir John Den-"ham. . . Waller ſays in his Epiſtle to Zelinda.]

(81) Or rather Thoughts.

"Thy matchleſs form will credit bring "To all the wonders I ſhall ſing.

"Camoens ſays, ſpeaking of the voyages of the Ar-"gonauts and of Ulyſſes, that the undertaking of the "Portugueze ſhall give credit to all thoſe fables, in "ſurpaſſing them. . . Sir John Denham, in his Poem "on Cooper's Hill, ſays to the Thames;

"O could I flow like thee, and make thy ſtream
"My great example, as it is my theme;
"Tho' deep, yet clear; tho' gentle, yet not dull,
"Strong without rage, without o'erflowing full.

"Camoens addreſſes the Nymphs of Tagus in the "like manner: "O Nymphs, if ever I ſung of you, "inſpire me now with new and ſtrong lays; let my "ſtyle flow like your waves; let it be deep and clear "as your waters &c. (82)." Mr. de Voltaire however obſerves, that neither Mr. Waller or Sir John Den-ham ought to be conſidered as Plagiaries on this occa-ſion (83). I cannot ſay how Camoens has expreſſed the firſt thought; but with regard to the ſecond, the ingenious Mr. de Voltaire ſeems to have aſcribed more to Camoens than he really ſays; there not being that beautiful contraſt in his addreſs to the Nymphs of the Tagus, as in Sir John Denham's lines to the Thames, and which form the great beauty of the Engliſh lines. This will partly appear from the tranſlation of the Verſes in queſtion of Camoens, by Sir Richard Fan-ſhaw.

(82) Voltaire's Eſſay, pag. 76, 77.

(83) Idem, pag. 77.

And you (my Tagus' Nymphs,) ſince ye did raiſe
My wit t'a more than ordinary flame;
If I in low, yet tuneful verſe, the praiſe
Of your ſweet river always did proclaim;
Inſpire me now with high and thundering lays;
Give me them clear and flowing like his ſtream:
That to your waters Phœbus may ordain
They do not envy thoſe of Hippocrene (84).

(84) The Luſiad, or Portugal's Hiſtorical Poem, pag. 2.

[FF] Camoens has a fling at our Henry VIII.] It is in the beginning of the 7th Canto, where he ſpeaks of the ſupetiority of the fame and glory of his country-men, over that of other Nations. On this occaſion he hints chiefly at our Monarch's immoderate love of the Fair-Sex, and his carrying on war againſt the Ro-man Catholics.

Fair England's Monarch, tho' he ſtile himſelf
King of Jeruſalem, ſtill lets the Turk
Oppreſs the city ſanctified by Heaven.
Plung'd in delights, amid the Northern ſnows,
He vainly riots in Aſſyrian pleaſures.
And, if he draws the ſword, 'tis ever aim'd
At truth's bleſt followers. I.

☞ CAMPANELLA (THOMAS) a famous Italian Philoſopher in the beginning of the ſixteenth Century, was born at Stilo in Calabria September the 5th 1568 (a), and not about the year 1564, as Monſieur Baillet tells us in his Enfans Celebres (b). He ſhewed in his infancy what might afterwards be expected from him. He learned with a prodigious quickneſs all that is uſually taught children; and at the age of thirteen he was a perfect maſter of the antient Orators and Poets, and wrote Diſcourſes and Verſes with great facility upon the ſubjects which were propoſed to him. This is the account which he gives us himſelf in his Latin Diſſertation to Gabriel Naudé concerning his own books, and the right method of ſtudying [A]. When he was fourteen years and an half old, his father propoſed to have ſent him to Naples to ſtudy the Law under Julius Campanella; but he having other views, entered himſelf into the Order of the Dominicans [B]. He was afterwards ſent to the Monaſtery of San-Giorgio, in order to go through a Courſe of Logic and Philoſophy [C]. We may judge of the progreſs which he made there by this

(a) Sir Thomas Pope Blount, Cenſura celebriorum Authorum, pag. 936. edit. Genevæ 1694, in 4to, and Niceron, Memoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſtoire des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 7. pag. 67. edit. Paris 1729.

(b) Num. 67. Jugemens des Savans. tom. 5. pag. 70. edit. Amſterd. 1725, in 4to.

[A] This is the account, which he gives us himſelf in his Latin Diſſertation . . . . concerning his own Books, and the right Method of ſtudying.] This Diſſertation is intitled, Thomæ Campanellæ de libris propriis & rectâ ratione ſtudendi Syntagma ad Gabrielem Naudæum Pariſinum; and was publiſhed by Elzivir at Amſterdam 1645 in 12mo in a Collection of Diſſertations upon the Method of ſtudying, intitled, Hugonis Grotii & aliorum Diſſertationes de ſtudiis inſtituendis. In the firſt chapter Artic. 1. he has the following paſſage, from whence we have extracted what we have ſaid above in the Text of this Article. Equidem quinquennis adhuc Literulis ac Pietati adeò ſtudioſam operam dedi, ut quicquid Parentes & Avi & Concionatores de divinis eccleſiaſticiſque rebus dicerent, & quicquid Pædagogi docerent, animo conderem. Animo decimo tertio decimo Grammaticorum Dogmata ac verſificatoriæ Artis ita percepe-ram, ut quicquid liberet, proſâ ac metro poſſem eloqui, multaque carmina tunc edidi, haud tamen nervoſa.

[B] He enter'd himſelf into the Order of the Dominicans.] He tells us in the Syntagma quoted in the preceding Note, that he was induced to enter into that Order by hearing an eloquent Preacher of it, from whom he had learned the principles of Logic, and eſpecially by reading the Hiſtory of St. Thomas Aquinas and Albertus Magnus, with which he was greatly affected. Anno quaſi decimo quarto cum dimidio, accidit ut Parens Neapolim me vocatum à Julio Campe-nallâ Juriſprudentiæ Lectore, mittere vellet; ſed eodem tempore religionem Dominicanorum, cum ex eâ Concionatorem eloquentem audiviſſem, Logiceſque ab eodem princi-pia præguſtâſſem, maximè autem ſancti Thomæ & Alberti Magni hiſtoriâ affectus fuiſſem, profiteri volui.

[C] He was afterwards ſent to the Monaſtery of San-Giorgio, in order to go through a courſe of Logic and Philoſophy.] He tells us in his Syntagma that he recited there publicly before a great Aſſembly an Oration in heroic verſe, and an Hymn in ſapphic meaſure, when the Governor of that town entered upon his office, and that he wrote a great number of Verſes, which where inſcribed in the churches and upon the tri-umphal arch there. Miſſus igitur poſtea ad Cœnobium ſancti;

this fact which is related of him. His Profeſſor having been invited to diſpute upon ſome theſes, which were to be maintained by the Franciſcans, but finding himſelf indiſpoſed, ſent our Author in his room, who perfectly anſwered the expectations of his maſter, and diſputed with ſo much ſubtilty and force, that every body was charmed with him, and cried out that the genius of Teleſius was tranſmigrated into him. Campanella had never before heard of that Philoſopher, and this was the occaſion of his reading him afterwards, and even entering into his ſentiments (c). When his Courſe of Philoſophy was finiſhed, he was ſent to Coſenza to ſtudy Divinity. But his peculiar inclination was to Philoſophy, to which he confined his whole time and application. He began then to form to himſelf a new plan of ſtudy, and to ſhake off the yoak of authority, which reſtrained all the Philoſophers of that age. He called in queſtion the doctrine of his Maſters, and found it to be falſe in ſo many points, that he fell into a kind of Pyrrhoniſm, which led him to doubt of the moſt uncontroverted matters of fact. He confeſſes himſelf, that he doubted whether there ever was ſuch a man in the world as Charlemagne. This is the uſual effect of obliging men to blind obedience: by demanding too much, all is loſt; for mankind will never reſign their reaſon to be governed like beaſts †. He reſolved not to confine himſelf to any particular Author, but to extract whatever was good in each of them promiſcuouſly (d). At Altomente he employed the leiſure which he enjoyed there, in reading the works of the antient Philoſophers, and even thoſe of the modern, eſpecially of Teleſius, and formed particular ſyſtems, which muſt undoubtedly appear very ſtrange at a time when Ariſtotle's doctrines paſſed for inconteſtable truths. He was but twenty two years of age when he began to write; and notwithſtanding his youth he thought himſelf able to ſupport the attacks, which his new ſyſtems would infallibly expoſe him to (e). In 1590 he went to Naples in order to publiſh ſome of his works, where an old Profeſſor of his Order being jealous of his reputation, conceived a mortal hatred againſt him, and endeavoured to ruin him [D]. The works which he publiſhed [E] made a prodigious noiſe in the world, and the novelty of his opinions raiſing

(c) Janus Nicius Erythræus, Pinacoth. 1. pag. 41. edit. Lipſiæ 1712 in 12mo.

† Bernard, Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, for the year 1705.

(d) Niceron, pag. 69.

(e) Idem, pag. 69, 70.

ſancti Georgii Oppidi, Logicam & Philoſophiam auditurus, orationem metro heroico atque hymnoſapphico, cum dominus oppidi auſpicia dominii primum adiret, in populorum & vicinorum frequentiâ à me compoſitam recitavi, multaque carmina, cum in Eccleſiâ noſtrâ, tum in triumphali Arcu per me condita adhuc viſuntur inſculpta. He wrote likewiſe ſeveral Lectures in Logic and Natural Philoſophy in a very diſtinct and compendious method. But afterwards being anxious, becauſe he thought that the genuine truth was not to be found in the Peripatetic Philoſophy, he examined all the Greek, Latin and Arabian Commentators upon Ariſtotle, and began to heſitate more and more with regard to their doctrines; upon which he reſolved to enquire whether what they have aſſerted is to be read likewiſe in the world, which he found wiſe men had ſtiled the living Book of the Deity. But as the Doctors could not ſatisfy the objections, which he brought againſt their principles, he determined to run over all the writings of Plato, Pliny, Galen, the Stoics, and the followers of Democritus, and eſpecially thoſe of Teleſius, and to compare them with the original Book of the World, in order to diſcover by this compariſon what truth or falſhood was in the copies of it. Deinde cum eſſem anxius, quod veritas non ſincera, ſed potius falſitas pro veritate, in Peripato verſari mihi videbatur, Ariſtotelis Commentatores Græcos atque Latinos, Arabeſque examinavi omnes, & hæſitare magis cœpi in dogmatis eorum, ideoque perſcrutari volui, an quæ dixerunt ipſi, in mundo etiam legantur, quem codicem eſſe Dei vivum ex doctrinis ſapientum intellexi. Cumque Doctores meis argumentis ſatisfacere non poſſent, quæ contra ipſorum Lectiones promebam, ſtatui ipſe libros omnes percurrere Platonis, Plinii, Galeni, Stoicorum, & Democriticorum, præcipuè verò Teleſianos, ac cum mundi codices primario conferre, ut ex originali & autographo, quid veri exemplaria habent, & quid falſi, agnoſcerem (1).

(1) Syntagma, ubi ſupra.

[D] Where an old Profeſſor of his Order being jealous of his reputation conceived a mortal hatred againſt him, and endeavoured to ruin him.] He had raiſed himſelf a prodigious character at Naples by this circumſtance, that paſſing by a Convent of the Recollets, and ſeeing a great number of people going in and out, he had the curioſity to enquire what was the occaſion of it; and hearing that ſome theſes in Philoſophy were diſputed there, he went in with the reſt, and having obtained leave to diſpute, he acquitted himſelf to ſo much advantage, that he received the applauſes of the whole Aſſembly, and the Monks of his Order carried him away in triumph to their Convent. Some time after he was preſent at a diſputation in Divinity, where an ancient Profeſſor of his Order having ſaid ſomething, which appeared very judicious, our Author highly commended him for it. But the old man, jealous perhaps of the glory, which Campanella had gained, ſpoke to him in a very contemptuous manner, and bid him be ſilent, ſince it did not belong to a young man, as he was, to interpoſe in queſtions of Divinity. This fired Campanella, who anſwered, that as young as he was, he was able to teach him, and upon that attack'd what the Profeſſor had advanced with ſo much force, that every body adjudged to him the victory. The Profeſſor being exaſperated at this, accuſed our Author to the Inquiſition, as if he had gained by magic that vaſt extent of learning, in which he had not received any previous inſtruction. Illud verò ſui nominis famam ſupra quam dici poſſet, in immenſum auxit, quod cum illis Diſputationibus Theologorum quoddam placitum in contentionem certamenque deductum eſſet, ac multa doctè argutèque in utramque partem eſſent allata, neſcio quod docti cujuſdam ex ſuo ordine ſenis dictum, utpote verum, cum plauſu excepit, & in cœlum laudibus extulit. At ſenex iratus, Tace ſis, inquit, nec te immiſce: de Theologicis hic rebus ambigitur, quas tu ne primoribus quidem labris attigiſti. Quo hominis inprimis iracundi dicto exarſit ille, nec tulit: Ac vide, inquit, quam ego ſim harum rerum ignarus & rudis, ut poſſim te decem annos in diſciplina habere, ac poſtea adigere, ut fatearis te nihil ſcire vel intelligere. Ac reprehenſum ſenis illius Argumentum, & ſanctorum Patrum ſacrarumque Literarum teſtimoniis confirmatum, tanquam amentatam haſtam, ita cœpit ingenii lacertis ac viribus intorquere, ut omnium conceſſu fuerit judicatum, à Campanella ſemper omnes, illo autem die etiam ipſum a ſeſe ſuperatum. Quæ victoria magnos illi in omnem vitam bellorum tumultus excitavit. Primum a ſene illo, cujus contumaciam retuderat, apud Quæſitores Fidei accuſatus, quod tantam vim doctrinæ, cujus ne literam quidem didiciſſet, ex inferorum fontibus hauſtam ebibiſſet (2).

(2) Jan. Nicii Erythræi, Pinacotheca 1. pag. 42, 43. edit. Lipſiæ 1712.

[E] The Works, which he publiſhed.] We ſhall give a Catalogue of them as follows. I. Philoſophia ſenſibus demonſtrata, & in octo diſputationes diſtincta adverſus eos, qui proprio arbitratu, non autem ſenſata duce naturæ philoſophati ſunt: ubi Errores Ariſtotelis & Aſſeclarum ex propriis dictis & naturæ decretis convincuntur, & ſingulæ imaginationes pro eâ a Peripateticis fictæ prorſus rejiciuntur, cum verâ defenſione Bernardi Teleſii. Naples 1591 in 4to. Teleſio of Coſenza had publiſhed at Naples in fol. in 1587 a work intitled, De rerum Naturâ juxta propria principia Libri IX; in which raiſing a great many prejudices againſt him at Naples, he removed to Rome, where he was not received in a better manner; ſo that he went from thence to Florence, and preſented ſome of his works to the Grand Duke Ferdinand I, who was the Patron of Men of Letters. He did not continue there long, but reſolved to go to Padua. As he paſſed through which he attacked very ſtrongly the blind ſubmiſſion, which was then paid to the authority of Ariſtotle. James Anthony Marta ſollicitous for the reputation of that ancient Philoſopher undertook an Anſwer to this Book. But Campanella having read Teleſio's work was convinced of the truth of his ſentiments, and being charmed with the liberty in Philoſophy, which he endeavoured to introduce, immediately reſolved to deſend him againſt the attacks of his antagoniſt (3). Campanella's Book conſiſted of eight Diſputations; 1. Of the Principles of natural Bodies. 2. Of the Formation of the Fœtus in the Womb. 3. Of the Heaven and World. 4. Of the Elements. 5. Of the Uſe of the oblique Courſe of the Sun. 6. Of the Mixture of the Elements. 7. Of the Qualities of them. 8. Of Things moving and moveable. In this Book he examined the whole Peripatetic Philoſophy, and confuted Marta's Propugnaculum Ariſtotelis, and ſhewed that this Writer was ſo far from defending that Philoſopher, as he had pretended, that he even injured his cauſe. Hic totam Philoſophiam Peripateticam in examen adduxi, Philoſophorum priſcorum & Medicorum decretis, ſimulque Naturæ placitis, & ſenſu conſutavi Propugnaculum iſtius Auctoris, ſic ut quem defendere profitebatur, hunc potius offendere palam oſtenderim (4). Father Niceron (5) tells us, that in this Book he treated his antagoniſt in a more dogmatical way, than was ſuitable to his age, ſince he was not then twenty two years old; and ſuch a manner of writing was more likely to raiſe him enemies, than to make Converts to his opinions. II. Prodromus Philoſophiæ inſtaurandæ, id eſt, Diſſertationis de Natura Rerum compendium ſecundum vera principia ex ſcriptis Thomæ Campanellæ præmiſſum. Francfort 1617 in 4to pagg. 86. Tobias Adam, who publiſhed this piece, wrote the preface to it (6). III. De ſenſu rerum & Magia Libri IV. mirabilis occultæ Philoſophiæ, ubi demonſtratur mundum eſſe Dei vivam ſtatuam, benèque cognoſcentem, omneſque illius partes partiumque particulas ſenſu donatas eſſe, alias clariori, alias obſcuriori, quantum ſufficit ipſarum conſervationi, ac totius in quo conſentiunt, & fere omnium naturæ Arcanorum Rationes aperiuntur. Tobias Adam recenſuit, & nunc primum evulgavit. Francfort 1620 in 4to pagg. 371. Iidem Libri correcti & defenſi à ſtupidorum incolarum Mundi calumniis. Paris 1636 in 4to pagg. 229. He publiſhed this latter edition himſelf, and dedicated it to Cardinal Richelieu. He endeavours in this Book to prove, that all the bodies which appear to us immoveable and inſenſible, are indued with ſenſe; and that the ſtars, elements, plants, and even dead carcaſſes, and in ſhort, every thing elſe in the world are ſenſible. We are not therefore to be ſurprized after this, that he aſcribes intelligence and reaſon to brutes, and aſſerts, that they have an intelligible language among themſelves. The inſtances, which he brings to prove this, are very curious and amuſing, but as Father Niceron (7) obſerves, contain no ſolid proof in them. He tells us himſelf in his Syntagma (8) above quoted, that he wrote this Book in Italian and Latin, and that Tobias Adam publiſhed it at Francfort in 1618. Athanaſius the Rhetorician, a Greek Prieſt of Conſtantinople, who lived at Paris at the ſame time when Campanella did, and who died March the 13th 1663, aged ninety two years, wrote a large treatiſe in Greek againſt this work of our Author, which treatiſe is ſtill in manuſcript in the Library of Monſr. de Coiſlin, and was never printed; but an Abridgment of it was publiſhed in Latin under the following title: D. Athanaſii Rhetores Preſbyteri Byzantini Anti-Campanella in compendium redactus, adverſus Librum de Senſu Rerum & Magia. Paris 1655 in 4to (9). Mr. Robert Burton in his Anatomy of Melancholy having obſerved (10) that Kepler ſuppoſed the planets to be inhabited, tells us, that Campanella in the 4th Chapter of his ſecond Book de Senſu Rerum ſubſcribes to this opinion. "That they are inhabited, ſays Mr. Burton, he certainly ſuppoſeth, "but with what kind of Creatures he cannot ſay; "he labours to prove it by all means; and that there "are infinite worlds, having made an apology for Galileus, and dedicates this treatiſe of his to Cardinal "Cajetanus." IV. Apologia pro Galileo Mathematico Florentino, ubi diſquiritur utrum ratio Philoſophandi, quam Galileus celebrat, faveat ſacris Scripturis, an adverſetur. Francfort 1622 in 4to pagg. 58. In this Apology for Galileo, the Mathematician of Florence, which was publiſhed by Tobias Adam, he enquires whether that Writer's ſcheme of Philoſophy is agreeable to the Scriptures or not. V. Realis Philoſophiæ Epilogiſticæ partes quatuor, hoc eſt, de Rerum Naturâ, hominum moribus, politicâ, cui Civitas Solis adjuncta eſt, & œconomicâ, cum annotationibus Phyſiologicis a Tobiâ Adamo nunc primum edita. Quibus accedunt Quæſtionum partes totidem ejuſdem Campanellæ contra omnes Sectas veteres novaſque ad naturalem ac Chriſtianam Philoſophiam hiſce Libris contentam confirmandam. Francfort 1623 in 4to pagg. 508. This Book is divided into four parts, and contains a ſyſtem of Natural Philoſophy, Ethics, Politics, and OEconomics, with Phyſiological Notes by Tobias Adam, and ſeveral queſtions of Campanella againſt all the ancient and modern Sects, in confirmation of the Natural and Chriſtian Philoſophy contained in this work. He tells us in his Syntagma (11) that this Book was written at firſt in the Italian language; and that the City of the Sun, which is annexed to the political part of it, contains the idea of the Commonwealth much more excellent than that of Plato's or any other Author's. Adjecique Ideam Reipublicæ, quam voco Civitatem Solis, longè præſtantiorem quam ſit Platonica aut alia quæ vis. Gabriel Naudæus in his Bibliographia Politica, affirms that this Piece is full of new and ſublime ſentiments, and beſides the Philoſophical ſpeculations in it contains many things, by which Commonwealths may be adminiſtered in a better manner, and even the men themſelves improv'd in their manners. Civitatem Solis delineavit, eâ cogitationum novitate & ſublimitate ſenſuum, ut præter Philoſophicas Speculationes multa etiam contineat, quæ Reipublicæ melius adminiſtrari poſſent, & homines ipſi meliores evadere. Herman Conringius likewiſe in his Book De Civili Prudentia (12) obſerves, that this tract is a valuable one, tho' much inferior to Sir Thomas More's Utopia. Thomæ Campanellæ Civitas Solis laude quidem digna, multum eſt tamen infra Th. Mori Utopiam. Naudæus in his Bibliographia Politica above quoted obſerves with regard to the Syſtem of Ethics, which is publiſhed in our Author's Realis Philoſophia Epilogiſtica together with his Natural Philoſophy and Politics, that tho' this treatiſe is not written in ſo elegant a ſtyle as to pleaſe the Ciceronians, yet it contains ſo many noble ſentiments and acute reflections, that it muſt be highly approved of by all true Philoſophers. Amicus etiam noſter Thomas Campanella juxta doctrinam ſuarum Primalitatum Ethicam novam compoſuit, quæ ſub Epilogiſmi nomine cum Philoſophiâ ſuâ Naturali & Politicâ typis commiſſa fuit a Tobia Adamo, ſtylo quidem non ita compto delineata, ut Ciceronianis arridere poſſet, ſed eâ nobilitate cogitationum, rationumque ſubtilitate, ut omnibus ſapientiæ Myſtis non poſſit eſſe non ſummopere gratiſſima. VI. Atheiſmus triumphatus, ſeu contra Antichriſtianiſmum. Rome 1631 fol. pagg. 182. Paris 1636 in 4to pagg. 273. This ſecond Edition contains likewiſe Diſputatio contrà murmurantes in Bullas Sexti V. & Urbani VIII. adverſus judiciarios, &c. He tells us in his Syntagma (13), that he gave the Atheiſmus triumphatus to Scioppius in the year 1608, when he was ſent by Pope Paul V to procure his liberty, and that Scioppius gave it that title, whereas himſelf had before intitled it, Recognitio Religionis ſecundum omnes ſcientias contra Anti-Chriſtianiſmum Machiavelliſticum. He publiſhed the ſecond edition of it himſelf, and made ſeveral alterations in it. It is ſaid, that Campanella under the pretence of confuting the Atheiſts in this work, in reality had a deſign to ſerve their cauſe, by furniſhing them with arguments, which they had never thought of before, and anſwering them in a very weak manners;

(3) Niceron, Memoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſt. des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 7. pag. 76, 77. edit. de Paris 1729.

(4) Campanellæ de Libris propriis & rectâ ratione ſtudendi Syntagm. cap. 1. Articul. 1.

(5) Pag. 77.

(6) Niceron, pag. 78.

(7) Pag. 79.

(8) Cap. 1. Artic. 3.

(9) Niceron, pag. 79.

(10) Part 2. Sect. 2. Memb. 3. pag. 255. 7th edit. London 1660, in fol.

(11) Cap. 11. Articul. 3.

(12) Cap. 14.

(13) Cap. 1. Artic. 3.

through Bologna, his writings were ſeized, and carried to the Inquiſition at Rome. However he did not diſturb himſelf much at this affair, but continued his journey (f). He continued ſome years at Padua, being employed in inſtructing of ſome young Venetians in his doctrines, and compoſing ſome of his works. Upon his return to Rome he met with a better reception than before, and was honoured with the friendſhip of ſeveral Cardinals. In 1598 he went to Naples, where he ſtaid but a ſhort time, and then viſited his manner; upon which Herman Conringius, as quoted by Sir Thomas Pope Blount in his Cenſura Celebriorum Authorum (14) aſſerts, that his Book ſhould have been intitled Atheiſmus triumphans, and that the ſame judgment is to be paſſed upon it as Barlæus did upon Vanini's Amphitheatrum. Scripſit etiam Atheiſmum triumphatum, qui tamen rectius eſt Atheiſmus triumphans, idemque Judicium de eo ferendum, quod Barlæus de Amphitheatro Vanini tulit. Sorbiere alſo in the Sorberiana (15), ſpeaks in very contemptuous terms of it, and aſſures us, that the only thing which he learned from it was never to read any other work of the ſame Author for fear of loſing his time. VII. De Gentiliſmo non retinendo Quæſtio unica. Utrum liceat novam poſt Gentiles cudere Philoſophiam. Utrum liceat Ariſtoteli contradicere. Utrum liceat jurare in verba Magiſtri. Paris 1636 in 4to pagg. 63. In this Book he treats Ariſtotle and thoſe who follow blindly that Philoſopher, with great ſeverity. VIII. De Prædeſtinatione, Electione, Reprobatione, & auxiliis divinæ gratiæ Cento Thomiſticus. Paris 1636 in 4to pagg. 326. In this work our Author abandons the ſentiments of St. Auſtin and St. Thomas Aquinas, and follows thoſe of Origen. The opinions of the Moliniſts do not pleaſe him more than thoſe of St. Auſtin. He rejects the middle ſcience as uſeleſs and ſubject to many inconveniencies. He is of opinion, that man by the ſtrength of his own nature can put himſelf in a ſtate of recovering Grace; that infants dying without baptiſm are ſaved by the faith of their Parents &c. (16). IX. Aſtrologicorum Libri ſex, in quibus Aſtrologia omni ſuperſtitione Arabum & Judæorum eliminata, Phyſiologicè tractatur ſecundum ſcripturas & Doctrinam S. Thomæ, & Alberti, & ſummorum Theologorum, ita ut abſque ſuſpicione mala in eccleſiâ Dei multâ cum utilitate legi poſſit: Lyons 1629 in 4to pagg. 232. In this book he endeavours to treat of Aſtrology in a Phyſiological manner agreeably to the Holy Scriptures and the Doctrine of St. Thomas Aquinas, Albertus Magnus, and the greateſt Divines, excluſive of all the ſuperſtition of the Arabians and Jews, ſo that it may without any ill ſuſpicion be read to great advantage in the Church of God. This work was ſcarce printed, when the Bookſeller received from Italy a ſeventh Book de Fato ſiderali vitando, which he added to the others, and the whole was publiſhed together at Francfort 1630 in 4to (17). Our Author tells us in his Syntagma (18), that a falſe brother having borrowed this laſt Book, delivered it with the other ſix to a Printer at Lyons in order to be publiſhed, that he might expoſe our Author to the reſentment of Urban VIII, who was a very wiſe Pope, and therefore deteſted Aſtrology; and this brother accuſed Campanella of diſobedience on account of the impreſſion of that Book, and of ſuperſtition on account of the things contained in it; upon which he would not acknowledge the laſt book, as it was not printed by himſelf, and wrote an Apology, which was approved of by two Cenſors, who had been appointed. Item librum de Fato ſiderali vitando, quem mutuatum inſidioſus Frater, unà cum ſex Libris Aſtrologicis, ut odium Urbani VIII ſapientiſſimi Pontificis, eoque nomine Aſtrologiam deteſtantis, mihi conciliaret, Typographo dedit Lugdunenſi, à quo publicatus eſt; ac ſimul me accuſavit inobedientiæ circa impreſſionem, & ſuperſtitionis circa impreſſas res; quare hunc, ut à me minimè impreſſum, pro meo arripere nolui, & apologiam feci, quam delecti duo Cenſores approbavere. Father Niceron tells us (19), that he was ſtrongly poſſeſſed with the belief of Judiciary Aſtrology, and undertook to foretel future events by the means of it. X. Medicinalium juxta propria principia Libri ſeptem. Lyons 1635 in 4to, pagg. 690. This Work was publiſhed by James Gaffarel. XI. Philoſophiæ rationalis partes quinque, videlicet Grammatica, Dialectica, Rhetorica, Poetica, Hiſtoriographia juxta propria principia, ſuorum operum Tomus I. Paris 1638 in 4to. He obſerves in his Syntagma (20), that he wrote this work while he was in priſon at Naples. Father Niceron tells us (21),

(f) Campanellæ de Libris Propriis & rectâ ratione ſtudendi Syntagma ad Gabriel. Naudæum Pariſ. cap. 1. Articul. 2.

(14) Pag. 937. edit. Genevæ 1694, in 4to.

(15) Pag. 70. apud Niceron, pag. 81.

(16) Niceron, pag. 82.

(17) Niceron, pag. 82, 83.

(18) Artic. 4.

(19) Pag. 83.

(20) Cap. 1. Art. 3.

(21) pag. 83.

that this and the following Books of our Author are of very little value. Monſieur Gibert in his Jugemens des Savans ſur les Auteurs, qui ont traité de la Rhetorique, publiſhed the 4th Volume of Monſieur Baillet's Jugemens des Savans at Amſterdam 1725 in 4to obſerves (22) with regard to this work of our Author, that he reduces every thing as far as poſſible to metaphyſical ideas; that he borrows the terms of that ſcience; and that his ſtyle is extremely like that of St. Thomas Aquinas in his Summa Theologiæ. Mr. Gibert remarks likewiſe (23), that Campanella cenſures Ariſtotle's and Cicero's Definitions of Rhetoric, and defines it to be an Art, which is inſtrumental in perſuading men to what is good, and diſſuading them from evil; ſo that, according to him, an Orator, who perſuades men to what is evil, ceaſes to be an Orator. "But he does "not conſider, ſays Monſieur Gibert, that there is ſome"times in the Diſcourſe of ſuch an Orator infinitely "more genius and indeed eloquence, than in a Diſ"courſe, which perſuades us to what is good." He afterwards tells us, that Campanella having rejected Ariſtotle's Definition of Rhetoric, viz. that it is an Extenſion of Logic, aſſerts that it is an Extenſion of Magic; which he founds upon the marvellous in Eloquence, which, ſays he, without any compact with the Devil, without any drug, or potion, turns the mind which way ſoever the Orator thinks proper. This propoſition of his is not intended by him to be underſtood as a figure, in the ſame manner as Horace conſiders the Dramatic Poets as Magicians, in his Epiſtle to Auguſtus (24), when he ſays,

(22) pag. 243.

(23) pag. 244.

(24) Epiſt. lib. 2. Epiſt. 1. ver. 210, &c.

Ille per extentum funem mihi poſſe videtur
Ire Poeta, meum qui pectus inaniter angit,
Irritat, mulcet, falſis terroribus implet,
Ut Magus, & modo me Thebis, modo ponit Athenis.

But he would have it taken in the ſtrict and literal ſenſe; and what he ſays of Rhetoric, he affirms likewiſe of Poetry; and if he founds this only upon the effects of Poetry, it is merely becauſe he cannot ſay more; and it is for the ſame reaſon, that he ſoftens a little his propoſition; Rhethoricam eſſe quodammodo Magiæ portiunculam. Monſieur Gibert concludes with obſerving (25), that he does not pretend to ſay, that there is nothing good in our Author; but only that where he has any thing good, it is not new in him; that he advances ſeveral uncommon obſervations, which are of no value; and that what is good, as well as what is bad in him, is expreſſed in a very diſagreeable ſtyle; as appears from the titles of two or three chapters, De Oratore ex primalitate primâ, De Oratore ex primalitate ſecundâ &c. XII. Diſputationum in quatuor partes Philoſophiæ Realis Libri IV: pro Republicâ Litterariâ & Chriſtianâ, id eſt verè rationali ſtabilienda contra Sectarios; ſuorum operum Tom. II & III. Paris 1637 in fol. XIII. Univerſalis Philoſophiæ, ſeu Metaphyſicarum Rerum juxta propria dogmata partes tres, Libri XVIII; ſuorum Operum Tom. IV. Paris 1638 in fol. XIV. De Monarchiâ Hiſpanicâ Diſcurſus. Printed at Amſterdam by Elzevir 1640 in 24to. This edition is a very bad one, as Lewis Elzevir informs us in the Preface to the edition in 1641, where he tells us, that it had been reprinted at Harderwic in 1640 with the ſame errors. It was publiſh'd likewiſe at Amſterdam 1653 in 12mo. This Book was tranſlated into High-Dutch, and much enlarged by Beſoldus. There was an Engliſh Tranſlation of it printed at London 1654 in 4to. He tells us in his Syntagma (26), that he wrote this Diſcourſe in Italian. He ſhews in it by what method the King of Spain might obtain the Univerſal Monarchy, and points out the defects of the Spaniſh Government. Herman Conringius (27) ſays, that there are curious things in this Book; and that we are not to wonder, if there are ſome errors in it, ſince the Author wrote it in priſon, while he was ſick, and without the help of any Book, the Bible itſelf

(25) pag. 245.

(26) Cap. 1. Art. 3.

(27) De Hiſpan. apud Blount, Cenſur. Celebr. Author. pag. 937. edit. Genevæ 1694, in 4to.

his own country. Some words which had eſcaped him with regard to the government of the Spaniards, and ſome hints concerning a revolt being reported to them, he was ſeized [F], and brought to Naples in 1599, as a criminal againſt the State (g), and put ſeven times to the rack, and ſuffered the moſt exquiſite torments imaginable. He was detained in priſon ſeven and twenty years (b). At firſt he was not permitted to ſee any perſon, or to read or write; but afterwards he had the liberty of ſeeing his friends and ſtudying. He wrote during his confinement ſeveral works (i); and Tobias Adam of Saxony upon his return from Jeruſalem having the curioſity to viſit him, procured ſome of his writings, which he afterwards publiſhed in Germany. The diſgrace of the Duke of Oſſuna, Viceroy of Naples, who had a great eſteem for him, and frequently conſulted him, was the occaſion of his being afterwards more ſtrictly confined, and perhaps prolonged his impriſonment. It appears likewiſe, that the Inquiſition intereſted itſelf in the affair, ſince he tells us himſelf, that the accuſations urged againſt him turned upon Religion, and his new opinions in Philoſophy were objected to him as a crime. At laſt ſeveral perſons of diſtinction ſollicited the Court of Spain in his favour; and Pope Paul V ſent Caſpar Scioppius in 1608 to Naples to procure his liberty; but the affair of the Duke of Oſſuna, which happened at that time, rendered his good offices ineffectual. Pope Urban VIII, who knew him from his writings, was more ſucceſsful in his ſollicitations for him to King Philip IV of Spain (k), by whoſe orders the Duke of Alva ſet him at liberty May the 15th 1626 (l). He went immediately to Rome, where he continued ſome years in the priſons belonging to the Inquiſition; but he was only a priſoner in name, for he had all the liberty which he could deſire [G]. At laſt he was entirely ſet at liberty in 1629; but the Spaniards had too violent a reſentment againſt him, to ſuffer him to continue at reſt. The friendſhip which the Pope ſhewed him, (who made him one of his domeſticks, ſettled a conſiderable penſion upon him, and conferred a great many favours on him,) excited their jealouſy, and the correſpondence, which he had with ſome of the French Nation, gave them new ſuſpicions of him. He diſcovered that they were concerting ſome deſign againſt his perſon; upon which he diſguiſed himſelf like a Minime, and went out of Rome privately in 1634 in the coach of Monſieur de Noailles, Embaſſador of France. He embarked afterwards for France, and landed at Marſeilles in October the ſame year. Mr. Peireſc being informed of his arrival, ſent a litter to bring him to Aix, where he entertained him for ſome months. The year following Campanella went to Paris, where he was received with great civility by Lewis XIII and Cardinal Richelieu, who procured him a penſion of two thouſand Livres (m). The Cardinal often conſulted him upon the affairs of Italy, and is ſaid to have aſked of him once, whether the Duke

(b) Niceron, pag. 73. Mr. Baillet, ubi ſupra, pag. 70. ſays about twenty five years.

(g) Idem, Artic. 3. and Niceron, pag. 72, 73.

(i) Campanellæ Syntagma, Artic. 3.

(k) Niceron, pag. 73, 74.

(l) Campanellæ, Syntagma, Artic. 4.

(m) Niceron, pag. 74, 75, 76.

ſelf being taken away from him. XV. Ecloga in portentoſam Nativitatem Delphini Galliæ. Paris 1639 in 4to. This Poem upon the Birth of the Dauphin of France contains 249 verſes. John Caſalas in his Candor Lilii, ſeu Ordo FF. Prædicatorum à calumniis & contumeliis Petri a Valle-clauſa vindicatus, printed at Paris 1664 in 8vo obſerves (28), that Campanella was cenſured for ſtiling the Dauphin Portentoſe Puer in the ſecond verſe, under pretence that the word Portentoſus is never taken in a good ſenſe; but that he proved the contrary by inconteſtable authorities. XVI. De Libris propriis & recta ratione ſtudendi ad Gabrielem Naudæum. Paris 1642 in 8vo, and in Hugonis Grotii & aliorum Diſſertationes de ſtudiis inſtituendis, printed at Amſterdam 1645 in 24to. Our Author wrote likewiſe a great number of works, which were never printed, many of which are loſt, and others preſerved in ſeveral Libraries. We have a long Catalogue of them in the Bibliotheca Scriptorum Ordinis Prædicatorum.

(28) pag. 273.

[F] Some words, which had eſcaped him with regard to the Government of the Spaniards, and ſome hints concerning a Revolt, being reported to them, he was ſeized.] This is the account of Father Niceron; but Ern. Sal. Cyprianus in his Vita & Philoſophia Tho. Campanellæ (29) tells us, that it is probable that our Author's arrogant manner of defending his own peculiar opinions gave riſe to thoſe bitter accuſations formed againſt him, the conſequences of which proved ſo fatal to him. He was charged with a deſign to introduce a new Religion, and to aſſume to himſelf a kind of Empire; and it was added, that as he ſaw no probability of ſucceeding in either but by arms, he reſolved to bring the Turks into a town on the Gulf of Tarentum, and make them Maſters of the Kingdom of Naples. This accuſation being laid before the Viceroy, Campanella was put into priſon, where for five and thirty hours they tortured him moſt cruelly, examined him at the ſame time, and then condemned him to perpetual impriſonment. Cyprianus is of opinion, that tho' they could not convict him of the crime charged upon him, he could not be cleared from juſt cauſe of ſuſpicion. He was charged among other things with writing the Book de tribus Impoſtoribus, which he ſays was printed thirty years before he was born. There was another thing, of which he could not altogether clear himſelf. He pretended to propheſy of ſeveral changes. If he had ſtop'd here, he might have been treated only as a Viſionary, and ſent to the Hoſpital for a mad-man; but he imitated moſt of the modern Prophets, who, after having foretold ſeveral events, ſometimes fatal to countries, uſe all their efforts to accompliſh their predictions; and to the character of falſe Prophets, which is deſpicable enough in itſelf, they join that of ſeditious and turbulent perſons, which always deſerves puniſhment; and when they cannot bring thoſe changes about themſelves by the force of arms, endeavour to advance them by ſeditious writings, which they induſtriouſly ſpread abroad. Pietro Giannone in the fourth Volume of his Iſtoria Civile del Regno di Napoli (30) tells us, that in the beginning of the reign of King Philip III of Spain, Campanella form'd a conſpiracy in Calabria, which was headed by him, who called himſelf the Meſſiah, and was compoſed for the greateſt part of Friars, Prieſts, and Banditti; and that their deſign was to murder all the Spaniards, ſhake off the Spaniſh yoke, and introduce a Republican Form of Government; to which end they had made an alliance with the Turks, whoſe Fleet commanded by Murath Rays was to ſupport them in the enterprize. But Count Lemos the Viceroy having had timely notice of it from ſome of the conſpirators, by the death of Rinaldo and the other Heads, and the perpetual impriſonment of Campanella, diverted the ſtorm, when it was juſt upon the point of breaking out.

(29) Printed at Amſterdam 1705, in 8vo, pagg. 74.

(30) Printed at Naples 1723 in 4 volumes in 4to.

[G] But he was only a priſoner in name; for he had all the liberty which he could deſire,] Divers reaſons are given for his being thrown into priſon. Some ſay, that in order to reſcue himſelf from the long and ſevere confinement, which he had ſuffer'd under the Spaniards, he had appealed from the Inquiſition in Spain, before which he had been accuſed, to that

Duke of Orleans ſhould ever come to the Crown? upon which Campanella anſwered, that he ſhould never be raiſed to the Throne, Imperium non guſtabit in æternum *. He paſſed the remainder of his life in the Monaſtery of the Dominicans in the ſtreet of Saint Honore, and died May the 21ſt 1639, in the ſeventy firſt year of his age (n). There is variety of judgments concerning our Author [H]; but one point, as Father Niceron obſerves (o), cannot poſſibly be denied, that he had ſeveral very peculiar and bold opinions, and that he abandoned himſelf too much to his imagination. Ern. Sal. Cyprianus in his Vita & Philoſophia Thomæ Campanella (p) tells us, that he was a great follower of St. Thomas Aquinas, but very ignorant of the Greek, Latin, and Hebrew Tongues, and contented himſelf with reading the School-Divines; that being curious to know things to come, he was frequently tormented by the Devil; that ſeveral of his predictions were accompliſhed; and that he made uſe of a young man to exerciſe his magic art, and occaſioned his ruin; upon which ſubjects Cyprianus relates (q) a long paſſage out of Campanella's works, and aſſerts, that he had much commerce with ſpirits.

* Bernard, ubi ſupra.

(n) Niceron, ubi ſupra.

(o) pag. 76.

(p) Printed at Amſterdam 1705, in 8vo, pagg. 74.

(q) pag. 44, & ſeqq.

of Rome, where he expected to be treated with more lenity. Others report, that the Pope, in order to have a pretence to remove him from Naples, had acquainted the King, that ſince Campanella was not convicted of any crime againſt the State, but was at the ſame time accuſed of having vented ſeveral errors in his writings, it was proper that he ſhould come to Rome to give an account of his Faith before the Inquiſition. In that caſe it was neceſſary for him to continue for ſome time under a kind of confinement, in order to give a colour to this pretext (31).

(31) Niceron, pag. 74, 75.

[H] There is a variety of judgments concerning our Author.] Leo Allatius in his Apes Urbanæ (32) tells us, that he began to write at the twentieth year of his age, and did not follow the opinions of others, but applied himſelf wholly to invent new things in almoſt all the ſciences. Scripſit ab anno ætatis vigeſimo, non quæ ab aliis ſcripta erant, ſed in hoc incumbens, ut nova in omnibus ferè ſcientiis excogitaret. Janus Nicius Erythræus in his Pinacotheca (33) having obſerved, that he wrote a prodigious large work upon the Reformation of the Sciences, divided into two Books, each of which is divided into ſeveral parts, informs us that it appears from thence, that the principal ſign of this man of a moſt acute genius was to abandon the ancient methods of learning the ſciences, and to open a new and direct one for that purpoſe. Scripſit ingens Opus de Reformatione Scientiarum decem in Codices diviſum, quorum ſinguli plures in partes diſtribuuntur; unde nihil acutiſſimo ingenio homini tam fuiſſe propoſitum apparet, quam relictis veteribus viis, ad omnium ſcientiarum notitiam, novum atque directum iter aperire. Gabriel Naudæus in his Bibliographia Politica ſtiles him a Man of a very warm and prodigious genius; ardentis penitus & portentoſi vir ingenii. Herman Conringius (34) ſays, that he was a crafty man, without any Religion or Faith, and a zealous adverſary to the doctrines of Machiavel; tho' at the ſame time he taught them in a diſguiſed manner. Campanella iſte homo fuit callidus, ſine ulla religione & fide, Machiavelli dogmatum acerrimus pariter reprehenſor, & fucatus Doctor. And in another place he ſtiles him a Man of an amazing and portentous genius; vir ſtupendi & portentoſi ingenii. Bullart in his Academie des Sciences tells us, that he diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo by his great virtue and learning, that he was deſervedly eſteemed the Prince of the Philoſophers of his age. Cyprianus in his Life abovementioned is of opinion, that at the bottom he had no Religion, but made the pretence of it ſubſervient to his other purpoſes. He obſerves, that Campanella was for extirpating with fire and ſword all thoſe, whom he calls Heretics; and aſſerted that the Emperor Charles V did well to keep his promiſe to Luther, when he went to the Diet of Worms, but that he ought to have cut him off at his return, as well as the Princes, who protected him. He has very exactly diſcovered all the artifices made uſe of by the Pope to ſupport his Authority, which he owns to be a mere human invention; and yet exhorts all Princes to maintain it with all their power, ſince this is the ſureſt method of reducing all the reſt of mankind under ſervitude to them. Never, ſays Cyprianus, did the Devil invent more pernicious Arts, than thoſe of Campanella, to deprive mankind of the liberty purchaſed for them by Jeſus Chriſt. Our Philoſopher ſpeaks very odiouſly of Moſes, and ranks among the Atheiſts Calvin, Luther, and all thoſe, who have ſeparated from the Church of Rome. Cyprianus afterwards treats of his Divinity, his Magic, that is, of his ſentiments of the art of foretelling things to come, and of his Philoſophy. In his works he ſeems very fond of the opinion of the Millenaries. To the ſhame of the Impious, ſays he in the ſixth chapter of his Atheiſmus Triumphatus, I expect upon the earth a prelude of the Celeſtial Paradiſe, a golden age full of felicity, from whence ſhall be excluded unbelievers, who preſume to deſpiſe Godlineſs, with a ſcourge made of the cords of the creatures, as St. Catherine of Sienna ſpeaks. With regard to Campanella's Philoſophy, he was a Sceptic, and truſted very much to ſenſe in matters of Natural Philoſophy. He defined place to be a firſt ſubſtance, incorporeal, immoveable, and fit to receive all kinds of bodies. He conſider'd cold and heat as the two grand Agents, which formed bodies out of matter, heat producing the heavens, and cold the earth. He believed that the world and elements had ſenſe, becauſe that which is compoſed of them has ſenſe, and nothing can be in the effect, which is not in the cauſe. He affirmed that the beaſts ſpoke to each other, ſince without ſuch a communication their Societies could not ſubſiſt. Cyprianus does not think this opinion abſurd, becauſe thoſe creatures appear to underſtand one another, as the chickens do the hen, when ſhe calls them. Mr. Bernard (35) obſerves upon this occaſion, that to ſpeak and ſpeech are equivocal words, and according to the different ſenſe, which is put upon them, the language of beaſts may be granted or denied. If they ſpeak, their language differs from that of men in this reſpect, that the words of beaſts are natural ſigns of their ſentiments; whereas the words of men are only arbitrary ſigns of their thoughts.

T.

(32) Ap. Blount, Cenſur. Celebrior. Author. pag. 936.

(33) pag. 43.

(34) Ap. Blount, pag. 937.

(35) Republique des Lettres, for the year 1705.

CAMPANUS (JOHN ANTHONY) one of the moſt famous Prelates of Italy in the fifteenth Century, was the ſon of a countrywoman, who falling in labour whilſt ſhe was at work in the fields, was delivered of him under a laurel (a) near Capua (b). He was deſtined to be a ſhepherd [A]; but as he diſcovered a great genius, they placed him as a ſervant to the Curate of a Village, who taught him a little of Latin (c). Others ſay, that he was only the Sexton's ſervant (d). He was afterwards Tutor in a conſiderable family

(a) Antonium Campanum ruſtica mulier in agro feſſa opere ſub lauro peperit. Paulus Jovius, Elog. cap. 22. pag. 52, 53.

(b) Nicolo Toppi, Bibliot. Napolit. pag. 24.

(c) Auguſtin. Oldoinus in Athen. Auguſt. pag. 24.

(d) Ædituo Sacerdotis in famulatum & diſciplinam tradidit (mater) Jovius, Elogior. cap. 22.

[A] He was deſtined to be a ſhepherd.] Some ſay, his father put him to that low employment, agro paſcendiſque ovibus ab initio a patre relegatus fuit (1). Others pretend, that he loſt his father and mother, when he was yet but a child, and that his relations deſigned to make him a ſhepherd. Parentibus jam inde a puero orbatus eſt, orbatumque affines, in quorum fide poteſtateque erat, tenuioris fortunæ ſordidis miniſteriis illum exercuerunt, ita ut etiam paſcendo pecori deſtinaretur (2).

(1) Volater. lib. 21. pag. 776.

(2) Auguſt. Oldoin. in Athenæo Auguſto, pag. 24.

family at Naples (e), and by his conſtant application made a very great progreſs in his ſtudies. Beſides his other teachers he ſtudied under the celebrated Laurence Valla (f). Having ſtaid five years at Naples (g), he went to Perugia, where he ſtudied the Law (h), and read publick Lectures upon polite Literature, with ſo much reputation, that he was made a Citizen of that City by a decree of the Senate. Some ſay that he never knew the Greek Tongue (i), but others aſſert, that he made himſelf perfectly maſter of that Language under Demetrius Chalcondylus at Padua (k). Being returned to Perugia he wrote the Hiſtory of the brave Andrew Braccio: that work was very much eſteemed on account of the ſtyle, but it was found to be too much panegyrical [B]. Campanus gained ſo great a reputation, that Pope Calixtus III invited him to Rome to be his Secretary; he was no ſooner arrived at Rome, but the death of the Pope made all his hopes vaniſh away. He gained the favour of Pius II, and was made Steward to the Cardinal of Saxoferrate; ſome time after Pius II gave him the Biſhoprick of Crotona, and afterwards that of Teramo [C]. Paul II made him Arch-prieſt of St. Euſtachius, which is a very good living. He attended Francis Piccolomini, the Cardinal Legate, into Germany, and made ſeveral ſpeeches in the Diets of the Empire. On his return into Italy, the ſame Pope gave him the government of Tuderti. Under Sixtus IV he enjoyed that of Fulgino, and of Cita di Caſtello; but he loſt that employment and the Pope's favour, becauſe it was thought that he had been acceſſary to the revolt which was raiſed in his government. Sixtus was ſo exaſperated againſt him, that he baniſhed him out of all the territories of the Church, and rejected entirely the interceſſion of thoſe who endeavoured to excuſe him. Campanus took this misfortune ſo much to heart, that he paſt all the remaining part of his life in grief, ſometimes at the Court of Naples, ſometimes at Sienna. In vain did he invoke the aſſiſtance of the Muſes, and of the belles Lettres, I mean, that he endeavoured to diſpel his ſadneſs by compoſing ſome works: it was all to no purpoſe; for no ſooner did he diſpoſe himſelf to write, but he felt his grief coming again upon him; this diſpirited him entirely, and as he was alſo ſubject to epileptick fits, he ſunk perfectly under his misfortunes, and died at Sienna July the 15th 1477, in the fiftieth year of his age (l), and was buried in the Cathedral Church (m). He had very much deſired to ſettle in his own country [D], as it appears by his letters. He left ſeveral works [E], which have been publiſhed by Michael Fernus (n), with his Hiſtory

(e) Idem, ibid.

(f) Oldoinus, Athen. Auguſt. pag. 24.

(g) Jovius, Elog. cap. 22.

(h) Oldoinus, Athen. Auguſt. pag. 24.

(i) Græcorum omnium expers Volater. lib. 21. pag. 776.

(k) Græcam eruditionem ubertim potavit. Oldoin. Athen. Auguſt. pag. 24.

(l) And not prope quadragenarius (near forty years old) as Voſſius De Hiſt. Lat. pag. 583 aſſerts, being led into that error by Volaterranus, lib. 21.

(m) Taken from Aug. Oldoinus, Athen. Auguſt. pag. 24, &c.

(n) And not Fermes, as it is in Moreri.

[B] He wrote the Hiſtory of Andrew Braccio; that work was very much eſteemed on account of the ſtile, but it was found to be too much panegyrical.] Here follow the words of Paulus Jovius. Inter multa orationum, & multiplicis ſtyli Opera quæ extant, avidiſſimè Bracii inclyti Ducis Vita perlegitur, digna poſteritate, niſi rerum geſtarum fidem adulationè poëticâ corrupiſſet (3). i. e. "Amongſt the various kinds of works he left "behind him, his Hiſtory of the noble Duke Braccio "is read with the utmoſt pleaſure, and would deſerve "to be tranſmitted to poſterity, had he not corrupted "the truth of hiſtory by a poetical flattery." Andrew Braccio was a very great Captain; he was born at Montone in the Perugiano (4). The inhabitants of Perugia choſe him for their Prince, on account of his courage, and the ſervices he had done them (5): he died in the year 1424 (6). His life written in Latin by our Campanus, was tranſlated into Italian by Pompeo Pallini, that tranſlation was printed at Venice in 4to. in the year 1572 (7).

(3) Jovius, Elog. cap. 22. pag. 53. See alſo Oldoin. Athen. Auguſt. pag. 24.

(4) Leand. Albert. Deſcript. Ital. pag. 136.

(5) Idem, ibid. pag. 100.

(6) Idem, ibid. pag. 136.

(7) See Toppi, Bibl. Napol. pag. 124.

[C] The Pope gave him . . . the Biſhoprick of Teramo.] They who ſay, he was Biſhop of Arezzo, Aretinus Epiſcopus, are miſtaken. Geſner has committed that blunder (8), as well as Peter Opmeer (9) and Voſſius (10), as Leonardo Nicodemo obſerves, who adds that their blunder is probably owing to the word Aprutinus (11). Campanus is ſtiled Epiſcopus Aprutinus in the title page of his life of Andrew Bracio, printed at Bazil in 1545; and he ſtiled himſelf Aprutinus becauſe his Biſhoprick was ſituated in Abruzzo. Voſſius obſerves, that according to Paulus Jovius, he was Interamnatium Epiſcopus, and according to Gyraldus Prætutinorum, ſive Prætutianorum Epiſcopus (12). He reconciles theſe differences very well by obſerving, nempe ſedes Epiſcopalis fuit Interamnii Prætutianorum oppidi, quod vulgo à circumfluâ Nare fluvio Terami, vel Teramo vocatur. i. e. "The "Epiſcopal Sea was at Interamnium, a city of Abruzzo, "which is called Teramo, or Terano from the river "Nare that flows about it." This ſhould have prevented Voſſius from calling him Epiſcopus Aretinus (Biſhop of Arezzo.) Konig is one of thoſe who give him that title (13).

(8) Geſner, in Biblioth. fol. 383, verſo.

(9) Pag. 426. Chronol. apud Leonard. Nicodemum, Addiz. alla Biblioth. Napol. pag. 18.

(10) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 583.

(11) Leonardo Nicodemo, Addiz. alla Bibl. Napolit. pag. 18.

(12) Voſſius. de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 583. He might have added, and according to Volaterano, Præſul apud Præcutinos.

(13) Konig, Bibliotb. pag. 158.

[D] He had very much deſired to ſettle in his own country.] This appears from a paſſage in his letters, which will alſo acquaint us with ſome circumſtances of his life. Dicere de tuis, ſays he to the Alphonſus of Arragon Duke of Calabria and ſon of Ferdinand King of Naples, divinis & præſtantiſſimis laudibus non eſt Epiſtolæ, in qua nihil æque ac brevitas & caſtigatio laudatur. Hoc tantum de me addiderim, natum eſſe hac ætate, in qua tu es, & natum tibi, patri ac Regno tuo, & ad illum & ad te pertinere, haberi rationem de veſtris. Ego ſextumdecimum annum Romana in Cur. dego. Sub Pio Pontifice vixi non ſine aliqua gratia & opinione. Qua de re habuit me odio Paulus, ut habuit cæteros, qui Pii memoria afficerentur. Sixtum vero, quo ſum uſus in Philoſophia præceptore, aliquanto habui propenſiorem. Sed fortuna mea omnis à Regno eſt: quam mihi tu & pater tuus dabitis ſpem, ad hanc erigar, huic inſiſtam. Quare te oro & obteſtor, digniſſime & ſanguine altiſſime Princeps, errantem me tot annos redde jam Patriæ, redde meis, & tandem Campanum Campaniæ redde (14). i. e. "It is not proper to ex- "patiate upon your great and divine virtues in a letter, "in which nothing but brevity and accuracy is re- "quired. This only I ſhall add concerning my ſelf; "I was born in that age, in which you live; and I "was born for you, for your father, and for your "Kingdom; to you and to him I belong, and am "reckoned to be one of your ſubjects. It is now "ſixteen years ſince I lived at the Court of Rome. "Under Pope Pius I lived with ſome favour, and "ſome reputation; for which reaſon Pope Paul hated "me, as he hated all them, to whom the memory "of Pius was dear. Sixtus, who had been my Præ- "ceptor in Philoſophy, was a little more kind to me. "But all my expectations depend from the Kingdom "(of Naples), and I muſt depend upon thoſe favours, "which you and your father will give me room to "hope for. Therefore I moſt earneſtly beg, moſt "worthy and noble Prince, that ſince I have been "wandering for ſo many years, you would now re- "ſtore me to my country, and to my friends, you "would reſtore Campanus to Campania."

(14) Campanus, Epiſt. lib. 8. apud Nicodem. Addiz. alla Biblioth. Napol. pag. 17.

[E] He left ſeveral works.] Leonardo Nicodemo (15) gives a compleat catalogue of all the pieces contained in the collection of our Campanus's works: you will find there ſeveral moral treatiſes, as de Ingratitudine fugienda, de dignitate matrimonii, &c. Several orations, as for inſtance, that which he delivered at Perugia in 1455, when he began to teach polite literature there, the funeral oration of the Duke of Urbino, (15) Leon. Nicodem. Addiz. alla Biblioth. Napolit. pag. 16, 17.

History (o) at large, and full of great encomiums. We must not omit that he had been Corrector of a Printing-house [F], andthat he was very mean in person (p). He ought not to be distinguished from Anthony Campanus [G]. It must be observed, that there have been other Authors named Campanus; the Biographers, who mention them, often omit FRANCIS CAMPANUS, an Italian, who understood polite Literature very well (q). I have seen his Quæstio Virgiliana, printed by Henry Stephens in the year 1567 (r), with Parrhasius's book de rebus per Epistolam quæsitis; the Author dedicated it to Hercules de Gonzaga, Bishop of Mantua in 1536; he was then at Bologna.

I must make one addition to the passage, in which I have observed that he made love-verses [H].

(o) Written by the same Fernus.

(p) Quis in præpinguis simiæ rictu tantam exculti atque habilis ingenii indolem? Jovius, Elog. cap. 22. i. e. "Who would "have expected "so great a wit "and politeness "from that fat "monkey's "face?"

(q) He stiles himself Collensis, that is, if I am not mistaken, born at Collis, near Lucca.

(r) It had been printed at Milan in 1540.

Urbino, those of Cardinal Saxoferrate, of Pope Pius II, &c. nine Books of Letters, some of which have been reprinted in Germany under the direction of Daumius with those of Textor (16); the life of Pope Pius II, eight Books of Elogies and Epigrams, and some Sermons: that which he preached on an Ash-Wednesday seemed very fine to Panigarola, as appears from his own words, which follow. Il Campano nell' Orazione Cinerizia amplifica in tanti modi questa propozitione, che bisogna morire, chè è cosa de maraviglia il considerarlo: e Monsignor Cornelio non cede punto nell' imitazione (17). This Monsignor Cornelio is the Bishop of Bitonto a famous Preacher, who was very active in the Council of Trent: the name of his family was Musso; he has transcribed our Campanus almost word for word with regard to the bisogna morire, we must die (18). Take notice of the following words of Monsieur Menage. Campanus wrote a great many love-verses; he says it himself. Scripsi versus, quorum pars est amatoria; pars amore non vacat ad tria millia. It is in the 46th Letter of the third Book of his Letters. He was a very eminent man with regard to learning .... and also very virtuous (19). See the Remark [H].

(16) See Reinesius's Letters to Daumius, pag. 114, 115.

(17) Panigarola, vel Prædicatore, pag. 404. edit. 1609, apud Nicodem. Addit. alla Biblioth. Napolit. pag. 16.

(18) Nicod. ibid.

(19) Menage, Anti-Baillet, tom. 2. pag. 337.

[F] He had been Corrector of a Printing-house.] Read the following passage from Gabriel Naudé (20). "Rome was one of the first cities, where printing "was used, by the means of one Uldaricus Gallus, "who gave John Anthony Campanus, (who had made "himself Corrector of his Printing-house) an opportuni- "ty of composing in his praise the following Epigrams "quoted by Faernus, and printed at the end of Tully's "Philippics published by the same Uldaricus without "date, but probably before the year 1470.

"Anser Tarpei custos Jovis, unde quod alis
"Obstreperes, Gallus cecidit, alter adest
"Uldaricus Gallus, ne quem poscantur in ipsum
"Edocuit pennis nil opus esse tuis.
"Imprimit ille die, quantum vix scribitur anno,
"Ingenio haud noceas, omnia vincit homo.

(20) Naude, Addit. à l'Hist. de Louis XI, pag. 297, 298.

Mr. Chevillier quotes some of these words, and those in which Monsieur Mentel observes, that two Bishops were at the same time Correctors of Printing-houses at Rome, John Andrew Bishop of Aleria, and Anthony Campanus, Bishop of Teramo (21). You must correct two errors in what he quotes from Mr. Mentel (22). In my opinion, continues he, they should rather be called Authors than Correctors, as will appear from the following account. He relates afterwards, that under Pope Paul II, about the year 1466, two Germans, Conrad Sweynheim, and Arnold Pannarts, came to Rome, where they established the first Printing-house. He relates, what Books they printed till March 1472, and how many copies they work'd off of each Author. He says that it was the Bishop of Aleria, the Pope's Library-keeper, who prepared the Manuscripts of most of those Authors, wrote the Dedications or Prefaces prefixed to some Editions, and corrected the proof-sheets. He adds, that another Printer, named Udalricus (23), came much about the same time to Rome, where he established a second Printing-house (34), in which the Bishop of Terano did all that the Bishop of Aleria did in the first. Udalricus printed with so much diligence, that Campanus, who had undertook to keep the presses a going, by furnishing the necessary copies, and correcting the sheets, could not take the least rest: Cum inquiescere illum assiduis emendationibus non permitteret, says Michael Fernus in the life of Campanus. Observe this conclusion; "It "appears evidently from the account we have given, "that the two Bishops were the Authors of the first "Editions, which were printed at Rome by these Ger- "mans, and that they corrected only their own works "(25)." For my part, I do not think that any reader can infer that, from the foregoing account, for it proves evidently, that the two Bishops performed all the functions of Correctors of Proofs.

(21) Chevillier, Origine de l'Imprimerie de Paris, pag. 198, 199.

(22) Mr. Mentel, pag. 11. de verâ Typographiæ Origine, says ἱπανοδρώτης, and Uldarici, and not as it is in Mr. Chevillier, ἱπτονοδρώτης and Udalrici.

(23) He should have said Uldaricus.

(24) Chevillier, Origine de l'Imprimerie de Paris, pag. 200.

(25) Idem, ibid. pag. 201, 202.

[G] He ought not to be distinguished from Anthony Campanus.] Toppi has committed this blunder twice in his Bibliotheca Napolitana, as Leonardo Nicodemo reproaches him. The abbreviators of Gesner speak of Anthony Campanus, and of John Anthony Campanus as of two writers. Konig is fallen into the same mistake (26).

(26) Konig, Bibl. vet. & nov. pag. 158.

[H] An addition to the passage, in which I have observed, that he made love verses (27).] He has been very severely censured, for having written a very smutty Epigram, so that they join him with Giovanni della Casa. Quæ tamen non deterruerunt in Italia (ô tempora, ô mores) Episcopum quendam Nucerinum. Johan. de la Casa, quin Sodomiæ laudes nefario libro fuerit complexus, uti Conrad. Rittershusius conqueritur, in Novell. lection. Part. 12. Cap. 9. n. 7. Parem quoque Castimoniam & Episcopali scilicet dignitati convenientem gravitatem sapit Episcopi Imbraninensis ad Gravolonum mostupratorem (28) Epigramma, quod longè fœdius & putidius puto, quam ut Commentariis his sit inserendum. Ideoque in id merito insurgit Georg. Erhardus in Symbolis ad Petronium, p. 96 (29). i. e. "Yet these things "did not deter, (oh wicked times!) John della Casa "from writing an encomium upon Sodomy, in an "abominable Book, as Conrad Rittershusius complains. "The Epigram of the Bishop of Terame to Gravo- "lanus savours of the same modesty, and becomes "really the gravity of a Bishop; It is too obscene "and abominable to be here inserted, and George "Erhard was very much in the right to exclaim "against it." It would be difficult to guess, who that Bishop Imbraninensis is, if we did not know, that John Anthony Campanus, Bishop of Teramo, (in Latin no doubt according to some Interamninensis) was the Author of that Epigram. George Erhard, quoted by Salmuth, as we have just now seen, expresses it thus. Joannes Antonius Campanus Epigrammate ad Gravalonum Mastupratorem,

Non damnosa mihi gratis manus ipsa placebit,
Inque meis digitis hermaphroditus eris.

O pudicum virum! At lusit, inquis, in nequam illum fututorem. At non decebat, inquis, illum, cujus est officii severitatem in castigando adhibere, non risum jocumque facere (30). Mr. Saldenus quotes this passage of Salmuth, without correcting the errors of it; nay, he adds some others to them. Parem quoque castimoniam Episcopali gravitati convenientem Episcopo Imbanienfi adscribit Salmuthus, ob Epigramma (inquit) ad Gravolonum mastupratorem missum, longè fœdius & putidius, quam ut Commentariis suis insereret (31).

(27) At the end of the Remark [E].

(28) It should be mastupratorem.

(29) Henr. Salmuth, Comment. in Panciroll. Part. 1. Tit. 47. pag. m. 22. See in Anti-Baillet, tom. 2. pag. 123. the errors in this passage with regard to the character of John della Casa.

(30) Geor. Erhard. Symbol. in Perron. pag. 791. edit. Lugdun. 1615. in 12mo.

(31) Salden. in Otr. Theolog. pag. 160.

☞CANGE (CHARLES DU FRESNE Sieur du), one of the most learned writers in the seventeenth Century, was born at Amiens December the 18th 1610, and descended of an antient and noble family there (a). His Father Lewis du Fresne was Prevôt Roïal of Beauquesne, and his mother's name was Helena de Reli (b). Our Author

(a) Perrault, Hommes Illustres, qui ont paru en France pendant le XVII Siecle, tom. 1. pag. 136. edit. de Paris 1701, in 12mo.

(b) Idem, ibid. and Du Pin, Nouvelle Biblioth. des Auteurs Ecclesiast. tom. 18. pag. 141. ed. Amsterd. 1711.

Author was the youngeſt of five ſons [A], and ſtudied at the Jeſuit's College at Amiens, where his application and the vivacity of his genius ſoon diſtinguiſhed him from the reſt of his companions. He afterwards went to Orleans, where he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Law, and was admitted an Advocate in the Parliament of Paris Auguſt the 11th 1631. He frequented the Bar for ſome time, but without any deſign to confine himſelf to that profeſſion (c). Upon his return to Amiens his natural inclination led him to the reading of all kinds of books, thoſe in polite Literature, Philoſophy, Law, Phyſick, and Divinity, but eſpecially thoſe which treat of ſacred and profane, antient and modern, Greek and Roman, general and particular Hiſtory. However it was not a vain deſire of knowledge, nor any view of making his fortune, that engaged him in this courſe of ſtudy; but from the obligation which he thought himſelf under of procuring himſelf ſome agreeable and honeſt employment; ſo that he ſometimes ſaid to his friends, that he ſtudied merely for his own pleaſure, Mihi cano & Muſis; that was his ordinary expreſſion (d). While his father lived, he never thought of ſeeking out for any other companion (e), but after his deceaſe, he married July the 19th 1638 Catherine du Bos, daughter of Philip du Bos, Treaſurer of France in the Generalité of Amiens, with whom he lived above fifty years in the utmoſt harmony. She ſurvived him, and died July the 19th 1694 (f). In 1645 he purchaſed the place of Treaſurer of France at Amiens, and entered upon it June the 10th of the ſame year (g). Though he was very aſſiduous in the diſcharge of the functions of his office, and in the management of the affairs of his family, yet he ſtill continued his application to his ſtudies, and devoted all his leiſure to them, the fruits of which are the excellent works, with which he has obliged the world [B]. The peſtilence, which in the year 1668 depopulated the City of Amiens and

(c) Du Pin, ubi ſupra.

(d) Idem, ibid. pag. 141, 142.
(e) Perrault, pag. 137.

(f) Du Pin, pag. 142. and Perrault, pag. 137.

(g) Du Pin and Perrault, ubi ſupra.

[A] He was the youngeſt of five brothers.] This we are informed of by Monſr. Du Pin (1); who tells us, that the eldeſt, whoſe name was Hadrian, ſucceded his father in his employment; the ſecond, named John, was an Advocate in the Parliament of Paris, and began a Journal du Palais, and wrote a Commentary upon the cuſtoms of Amiens; Michael and Francis entered themſelves into the Order of the Jeſuits. But Monſr. Perrault in his Hommes Illuſtres, qui ont paru en France pendant le xvii Siecle (2) obſerves, that Monſr. du Cange's father was twice married; and that by his firſt wife he had three ſons, who had all of them the character of men of learning; and that by his ſecond wife he had likewiſe three ſons, the ſecond of whom was our Author, the eldeſt and youngeſt being Jeſuits.

(1) Nouvelle Bibliotheque des Auteurs Eccleſiaſt. tom. 18. pag. 141. edit. Amſterd. 1711, in 4to.

(2) Tom. 1. pag. 136. edit. de Paris 1701.

[B] The excellent works, with which he has obliged the world.] We ſhall give a Catalogue of them. I. Hiſtoire de l'Empire de Conſtantinople ſous les Empereurs François, &c. i. e. "The Hiſtory of the Empire of "Conſtantinople under the French Emperors, divided "into two parts; the former of which contains the "Hiſtory of the taking of Conſtantinople by the "French and Venetians in 1204, written by Geoffrey de Villehardouin in his old ſtyle, with a new "verſion oppoſite to it, reviſed and corrected by the "manuſcript in the King's Library, and illuſtrated "with Hiſtorical obſervations, and a Gloſſary, with "a Continuation of this Hiſtory from the year 1220 "to 1240, extracted from the Hiſtory of France written in verſe by Philip Mouſkes, Canon and afterwards Biſhop of Tournay. The ſecond part contains a general Hiſtory of the moſt remarkable "tranſactions of the French and Latins in the Empire "of Conſtantinople, from the time that they made "themſelves maſters of it, confirm'd by the writers "of thoſe times, and ſeveral chronicles and papers "and other pieces never before printed. By Charles "du Freſne du Cange." Paris, printed at the King's Printing-Houſe 1657 in fol. This work is dedicated to the King. II. Traité Hiſtorique du Chef de S. Jean Baptiſte. i. e. "An hiſtorical Treatiſe concerning "the Head of St. John the Baptiſt." Paris 1666 in 4to. He publiſhed this work in favour of the City, where he was born. He aſſerts in it, that the Head of St. John the Baptiſt having been firſt found in the City of Jeruſalem, and then carried to Conſtantinople, was afterwards diſcovered again in the city of Emeſa, from whence it was tranſported to Comana, and then again to Conſtantinople; and that it was conveyed to Amiens after Conſtantinople was taken by the French. He has inſerted in this Book ſome Greek Treatiſes, which mention the different times, when the head of St. John was diſcovered, and which had never been printed before. As ſeveral other churches pretend to have this head, Monſr. du Cange affirms that thoſe heads belong to ſome other Saints, who bore the name of John. He uſed to ſay with regard to this Book, that he had proved, that if the head of St. John the Baptiſt was any where, it was at Amiens (3). III. Hiſtoire de Saint Louis Roi de France, écrite par le Sire de Joinville, & enrichie de nouvelles Obſervations & Diſſertations Hiſtoriques, & de pluſieurs autres pieces concernant ce Regne tirées des manuſcripts. i. e. "The Hiſtory of "St. Lewis, King of France, written by the Sieur "de Joinville, and illuſtrated with new Remarks and "hiſtorical Diſſertations, and many other pieces re"lating to that reign, taken from manuſcripts." Paris 1668 in fol. Dedicated to the King. Monſr. du Cange in theſe Diſſertations, which are very curious, has ſhewn a prodigious extent of reading; but it appears from hence, that he had not the talent of writing French with any great elegance and propriety (4). IV. Joannis Cinnami Hiſtoriarum de rebus geſtis à Joanne & Manuele Comnenis Libri VI. Græcè & Latinè cum Notis Hiſtoricis & Philologicis Caroli du Freſne D. du Cange, ut & in Nicephori Bryennii & Annæ Comnenæ Hiſtoriam. Accedit Pauli Silentiarii Deſcriptio S. Sophiæ Græcè & Latinè, curâ D. du Cange, cum ejus uberiore Commentario. i. e. "Joannes Cinnamus's ſix "Books of the Hiſtory of the Affairs of John and "Manuel Comnenus, in Greek and Latin, with hiſtorical and philological Notes by Charles du Freſne "Sieur du Cange, with his Notes upon the Hiſtories "of Nicephorus Bryennius and Anna Comnena. To "which is added Paulus Silentiarius's Deſcription of "the Church of St. Sophia, publiſhed by the Sieur du "Cange, with his large Commentary upon it." Paris 1670 in fol. V. Memoirs ſur le Projet d'un nouveau Recueil des Hiſtoriens de France, avec le Plan general de ce Recueil. i. e. "A Memoir upon the Plan "of a new Collection of the Hiſtorians of France, "with the general Plan of that Collection." This piece was inſerted in Father le Long's Bibliotheque Hiſtorique de la France. Some time after our Author had ſettled at Paris, a propoſal was made to Mr. Colbert of collecting the Writers, who at different times had been engaged in the Hiſtory of France, and forming a compleat body of them. That Miniſter was pleaſed with the deſign, and thought Monſieur du Cange more capable than any man of executing it. For this purpoſe he put into his hands a great number of memoirs and pieces in manuſcript. Monſr. du Cange immediately applied himſelf to the work and drew up this Plan, which not being approved of by Mr. Colbert, he was deſired to draw up another. But our Author being perſuaded, that if he had followed the Method preſcribed to him, he ſhould have ſpoiled the whole work, very frankly anſwered, that ſince his attempt was not fortunate enough to pleaſe thoſe in power, he would adviſe them to ſeek out ſome perſons of ſuperior abilities to himſelf; and immediately returned all the papers, which were in his hands. This is the

(3) Du Pin, pag. 142.

(4) Niceron, Mémoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſtoire des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 8. pag. 74, 75. edit. de Paris 1729.

and the parts adjacent, obliged him to remove to Paris. This proved of great advantage to him, for in that city he had the opportunity, which he could no where elſe enjoy, of furniſhing himſelf with a variety of Books as well manuſcript as printed, without which it is impoſſible to bring any conſiderable work to perfection (b). In June 1688 he was ſeized with a retention of urine, which confined him to his bed for fifteen days. Till then he had enjoyed a perfect ſtate of health, and for fifty years had never been troubled with the leaſt indiſpoſition. About the middle of September he relapſed, and prepared himſelf for death with the greateſt reſignation. He died October 23d following in the 78th year of his age (i). Of ten children, whom he had by his wife, there were but three, who ſurvived him, two ſons, the eldeſt of whom was Treaſurer of France at Poitiers, and two daughters (k). The generoſity, with which the King rewarded his merit and valuable labours, was extended after his death to his family, to whom that Prince gave two thouſand livres, in conſideration of the pains, which Monſr. du Cange had taken in the publication of the Chronicon Alexandrinum (l). He was a Gentleman of great humanity and affability, of a lively and agreeable turn of converſation; he ſpoke always with prodigious modeſty of himſelf; never affected any ſuperiority over others, but at the time that he gave proofs of uncommon abilities, by ſolving their difficulties, avoided all dogmatical airs, and propoſed his ſentiments rather as mere conjectures, than as deciſive judgments. He frankly acknowledged, that he was ignorant of many things, and that he was frequently miſtaken. He uſed to ſay, that there was nothing but eyes and fingers neceſſary to compoſe ſuch works as his (m). And notwithſtanding the ſucceſs of them, he was ſo far from being elated with it, that he declared, that his performances were of no great importance, but that he had applied himſelf to the ſearch after ſuch barbarous words, as every one avoided and condemned (n). He was prodigiouſly aſſiduous in the application to his ſtudies, and wrote in a very noble manner, and with great purity of ſtyle (o).

(b) Perrault, pag. 137, 138.

(i) Du Pin, pag. 144. and Perrault, pag. 139.
(k) Perrault, pag. 139.

(l) Niceron, Memoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſtoire des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 8. pag. 72. edit. de Paris 1729.

(m) Du Pin, pag. 144.

(n) Melanges d'Hiſtoire & de Litterature, Par M. De Vigneul-Marville, vol. 1. pag. 167. edit. de Paris 1725.

(o) Du Pin, ubi ſupra.

account of Father Niceron (5). And Mr. Du Pin informs us (6), that the ſcheme propoſed to him was only to make a Continuation of the Hiſtorians publiſhed by Du Cheſne, but that he refuſed that taſk, being of opinion that ſuch a compilation would not do any honour to his Country. V. Gloſſarium ad Scriptores mediæ & infimæ Latinitatis, in quo Latina vocabula novatæ ſignificationis explicantur, complures ævi medii ritus & mores, legum, conſuetudinum municipalium, & Juriſprudentiæ recentioris formulæ & obſoletæ voces, utriuſque Ordinis Eccleſiaſtici & Laici dignitates & officia, &c. enucleantur & illuſtrantur. Paris 1678 fol. 3 Vol. Francfort upon the Maine 1681. fol. 3 Vol. Editio inſigniter aucta Francofurti, fol. 1710. 3 Vol. This Gloſſary, which was two years in the preſs, was received with prodigious applauſe by all men of learning. It is accompanied with an excellent Preface and ſeveral curious Diſſertations, and contains an explication of an infinite number of words, which are neceſſary to be underſtood by thoſe, who read the Writers of the lower Age (7). A new edition of it has been long promiſed with great Additions (8). VII. Lettre du Sieur N. Conſeiller du Roi à ſon ami M. Antoine Wion d'Herouval au ſujet des Libelles, qui de tems en tems ſe publient en Flandres contre les RR. PP. Henſchenius & Papebroch Jeſuites. i. e. "A Letter of the Sieur "N. Counſellor to the King to his friend Mr. Anthony Wion d'Herouval upon the ſubject of the Libels, which from time to time are publiſhed in "Flanders againſt the Reverend Fathers the Jeſuits "Henſchenius and Papebroch." 1682. VIII. Hiſtoria Byzantina duplici Commentario illuſtrata, quorum prior familias ac ſtemmata Imperatorum Conſtantinopolitanorum, cum eorundem Auguſtorum Numiſmatibus & aliquot Iconibus, præterea familias Dalmaticas & Turcicas complectitur: Alter deſcriptionem Urbis Conſtantinopolitanæ, qualis extitit ſub Imperatoribus Chriſtianis. Paris 1680 in fol. This work contains two parts, one of which comprehends the Genealogy of the Emperors of Conſtantinople, and the other an exact deſcription of the State of that City under thoſe Emperors. IX. Joannis Zonaræ Annales ab exordio mundi ad mortem Alexii Comneni Græcè & Latinè, interprete Hieronymo Wolphio, ex recenſione Caroli du Cange cum ejus Notis. i. e. "John Zonaras's Annals from the Creation of "the World to the Death of Alexius Comnenus in "Greek and Latin, tranſlated by Jerom Wolfius, and "reviſed by Charles du Cange, with the Notes of the "latter." Paris 1686 fol. 2 Vol. X. Gloſſarium ad Scriptores mediæ & infimæ Græcitatis. Accedit Appendix ad Gloſſarium mediæ & infimæ Latinitatis, unà cum brevi Etymologico Linguæ Galliæ ex utroque Gloſſario. Paris 1688 fol. 2 Vol. In this Gloſſary he explains the barbarous terms, which are to be found in the Greek Books printed and not printed of the Civilians, Divines, Phyſicians, Chemiſts, and Writers upon Tactics and Politics. To this he has ſubjoined an Appendix to his Latin Gloſſary, with a ſhort Etymologicon of the French Tongue extracted from both Gloſſaries. XI. Chronicon Paſchale à mundo condito ad Heraclii Imperatoris annum vigeſimum. Opus hactenus Faſtorum Siculorum nomine laudatum; deinde Chronicæ temporum Epitomes, ac denique Chronici Alexandrini Commate vulgatum. Nunc tandem auctius & emendatius prodiit cum novâ Latinâ Verſione, & Notis chronicis & hiſtoricis. i. e. "The Chronicon Paſchale from the Creation of "the World to the twentieth year of the Emperor "Heraclius; a work formerly quoted under the title "of the Faſti Siculi, afterwards under that of the ſhort "Chronicle, and at laſt publiſhed with the title of the "Chronicle of Alexandria. But now publiſhed with "Additions and Corrections, and a new Latin Verſion, "and Notes chronological and hiſtorical." Paris 1689 in fol. Monſr. du Cange was engaged in the edition of this book at his death; but Monſr. Baluze compleated and publiſhed it, and prefixed to it an Elogium of our Author. XII. He wrote ſome Notes upon the Byzantine Hiſtory of Nicephorus Gregoras, which are publiſhed in the edition of Mr. Boivin in 1702 in fol. XIII. Father le Long in his Bibliotheque Hiſtorique de la France quotes two works, which Monſr. du Cange left in manuſcript; 1. Hiſtoire de l'Etat & de la Ville d'Amiens & de ſes Comtes, avec un Recueil de pluſieurs Titres concernant l'Hiſtoire de cette Ville, qui n'ont pas encore été publiez. i. e. "An Hiſtory of the State and City of Amiens, &c." Fol. 1 Vol. This Hiſtory was entirely finiſhed (9). 2. Hiſtoire des Principautez & des Royaumes de Jeruſalem, de Chypre, & d'Armenie, & des Familles, qui les ont poſſedez. Fol.

(5) Ibid. pag. 75, 76.
(6) Pag. 142.
(7) Du Pin, pag. 142.
(8) Niceron, pag. 77.
(9) See Niceron, tom. 8. pag. 79. and tom. 10. Part 1. pag. 178.

H.

CANICEUS (JAMES) wrote ſome Love-Letters. I mention this only upon the credit of Agrippa (a), and to excite the curioſity of the learned in order to engage them to find out who this Author was, whoſe name I never met in any Bibliographer; no more than that of James Calandrus, an Author of the ſame ſtamp, according to the ſame Agrippa (b).

(a) Agrippa, de Vanitate Scient. cap. 64. pag. m. 128, 129.
(b) Idem, ibid. pag. 129.

CANINIUS

CANINIUS (ANGELO) was one of the moſt learned Grammarians in the ſixteenth Century. He was born in a ſmall city of Tuſcany, which is called Anglara in Latin [A], and in Italian Anghiari; hence is derived the ſurname of Anglarienſis, which he added his name in the title of his works. Thuanus places his death under the year 1557 (a) [B], and aſſerts that he underſtood the Tongue and the Oriental Languages very well, and taught them at Venice, Padua, Boulogne, Rome, and in Spain; and that he was afterwards Tutor to Andrew Dudithius [C], and alſo read Lectures at Paris, and laſtly, that being entered into the ſervice of William Duprat Biſhop of Clermont (b) [D], he died in Auvergne [E]. Some ſay, he was a Profeſſor in the Univerſity of Paris, and lived in the College of Cambray at Paris, and that this Treatiſe of Helleniſm may truly be ſtiled one of the moſt learned Works, that ever were publiſhed upon the firſt Principles of the Greek Tongue (c). The praiſes, which Scaliger beſtows upon him, ſeem at firſt view to imply a great deal, but after all they ſignify but little. He owns that for a young man he was very learned [F], and that he wrote a good Book concerning Helleniſm. But that he borrowed

(a) Thuan. Hiſt. lib. 19. pag. 346.

(b) Caninius mentions the generoſity of that Biſhop, Præfat. Introduct. in linguam Syriacam & Punicam, as Magius tells us, Epiſt. Dedicat. Tractat. de Equuleo.

(c) Lancelot, Pref. de la Nouvelle Methode Gréque.

[A] He was born in a ſmall city of Tuſcany, which is called Anglara in Latin.] Thuanus did not know, that this is a city of Tuſcany, and miſtook it for a city in the Milaneſe, called in Latin Angleria, or Anglaria; for having ſaid, that Magius was born at Anglara, a city in the Dutchy of Milan, he adds, that this city was alſo the native place of Angelo Caninius (1). Others (2), by a miſtake of the ſame nature, have ſaid that Caninius, Magius, and Peter Martyr Counſellor to Ferdinand and Iſabella, were born at Anglaria, a city of the Inſubres, that is, of the Milaneſe, which is true of Peter Martyr only. We have proved in another place that Magius was of Anglara in Tuſcany: now, he ſays, that Caninius was his countryman (3), whence it follows that Caninius was not of the Milaneſe, as Don Lancelot aſſerts in his Preface to the Methode Greque. Nicholas Antonio, who gives him the ſurname of Anglerienſis, explains it thus, Oppidum Mediolanenſis Ducatus Anghiera eſt, ad oram Lacus Verbani ſive majoris (4). i. e. "Anghiera is "a ſmall city in the Dutchy of Milan, ſituated upon "the bank of the Lake Majour."

(1) Anglara in Inſubribus ditionis Mediolanenſis oppido, quod & nobis Angelum Caninium olim dedit natus. Thuan. lib. 49. ad ann. 1571, pag. 1018.

(2) Quenſtedt, de Patriis illuſtrib. pag. 296.

(3) Magius, Epiſt. Dedicat. Tractat. de Equuleo.

(4) N. Anton. Bibl. Hiſp. tom. 2. pag. 357.

[B] Thuanus places his death under the year 1557.] He had put it under the year 1554 in the former Editions. See the laſt page of the firſt volume of the Paris Edition in 1604 8vo. Whence you will know, why Monſieur Baillet, who made uſe of that Edition in 8vo, ſpeaking of Caninius, ſays, he died in 1557, or rather in 1554 (5). The Reader will meet in the Remark [F] with a quotation, which ſhews that Thuanus knew but very little of this learned Grammarian.

(5) Jugemens des Savans, tom. 4. num. 701. pag. 182. He ſays he was born at Angleria.

[C] He aſſerts, that he was Tutor to Andrew Dudithius.] Du Ryer has given an erroneous tranſlation of the following words of Thuanus. Demum Andreæ Dudithii Pannonii . . . . adoleſcentiæ admotus, Lutetiæ Pariſiorum docuit. He tranſlates them thus, Afterwards, having been choſen to teach Andrew Dudith in Hungary, ... he read lectures at Paris (6). This tranſlation ſuppoſes that Caninius took a journey into Hungary, and makes Thuanus contradict himſelf; for he ſays in another place, that Dudithius ſtudied at Paris under Caninius, after his voyage to England, and before he returned into Hungary. Demum ex Anglia Lutetiam venit, & illic ſub optimo Doctore Angelo Caninio Anglarenſi, non ſolum Græcæ linguæ & Hebraicæ, ſed etiam Orientalium peritiſſimo, denuo intermiſſis per illas peregrinationes ſtudiis operam dedit (7). Here follows a tranſlation of this paſſage as it is in Mr. Teiſſier. From England he came to Paris, where he began his ſtudies again, which his travels made him interrupt, under Angelo Canimo, that excellent man, who was ſo well verſed in the Greek, Hebrew and Oriental languages (8). This error of the preſs, Canimo inſtead of Caninio, may one time or other increaſe the Catalogue of the learned, and give us one Angelus Canimus different from Angelus Caninius, but equally ſkilled in the knowledge of languages. I don't doubt but when Dudithius ſtudied at Paris, Caninius was a Profeſſor there; therefore theſe words of Thuanus, Andreæ Dudithii Pannonii Adoleſcentiæ admotus, Lutetiæ Pariſiorum docuit, which are very exact with regard to the grammatical ſenſe, do not ſeem to be ſo with regard to Hiſtory, for it is not at all probable, that Caninius was Profeſſor in the Univerſity of Paris, and at the ſame time tutor to a young Hungarian Traveller. And yet we muſt ſuppoſe him to have been a Tutor, if we follow the full ſenſe of Thuanus's words, Andreæ Dudithii Adoleſcentiæ admotus. But I do not think, he inſtructed Dudithius otherwiſe, than by his publick and private lectures, which is very different from what we call a Tutor, and from what is ſignified by theſe Latin words, alicujus adoleſcentiæ admoveri. The tranſlation of Thuanus's paſſage is ſomething better in Moreri, than it is in Mr. Teiſſier, ſince the former does not ſend Caninius into Hungary, but only ſent him to Dudithius of Hungary. Yet there is ſtill a great error there; for, to ſay with Thuanus in Moreri, that Caninius, after he had been with Andrew Dudith of Hungary, read lectures at Paris, is to ſuppoſe, that Caninius was Tutor to the young Hungarian, before he taught at Paris; whereas it ſhould be ſaid, that the young Hungarian coming to Paris, and meeting there with a very eminent Profeſſor, named Caninius, he ſtudied under him.

(6) Apud Teiſſier, Eloges tires de Mr. De Thou, tom. 1. pag. 131.

(7) Thuanus, Hiſt. lib. 96. ad annum 1589.

(8) Apud Teiſſier, tom. 2. pag. 103.

[D] He entred into the ſervice of William Duprat, Biſhop of Clermont.] As Thuanus does not enter into particulars, it will be proper to relate what Caninius himſelf tells us in a Dedication to William Duprat, in the year 1553 (9). We learn from thence that Caninius was at Paris that ſame year 1553; that when he returned from Spain into France with a Minim called Simon Guichard, they both ſtopt in the Dioceſe of Clermont; and that he received a great many favours from the Biſhop, to whom he dedicates his Book; that going to Paris, he fell ſick on the road, and ſpent almoſt all the money he had; that at laſt he arrived at Paris without knowing any perſon there; but that the recommendatory letters of that Prelate had procured him a lodging, and the other neceſſaries of life. We know by this account, that he was under the generous protection of that Biſhop, before he read lectures at Paris, and we may conjecture about what time he began his lectures. Let us obſerve that the Dedication of his Helleniſm, is dated from the College of Cambray at Paris Auguſt the 29th, 1555. I am far from ſaying that Thuanus was miſtaken. Caninius may poſſibly have left off his teaching, and retired into the family of the Biſhop of Clermont, and that may have been the laſt ſcene of his life.

(9) Prefixed to his Inſtitutiones linguæ Syriacæ.

[E] He died in Auvergne.] Some ſay, it was at Seville in Spain. And this is what Nicholas Antonio ſuppoſes, in the place where he mentions him (10); for he has made a long catalogue of foreign Authors, who lived a long time in Spain, or who died there. He quotes Francis Forerius a Dominican Friar, who in his Preface upon his Commentaries upon Iſaiah acknowledges, that he has been Caninius's diſciple. Nicholas Antonio knew but very few particulars concerning Caninius; the only work he aſcribed to him, is Diſquiſitiones in Locos aliquot Novi Teſtamenti obſcuriores, ex Hebraicæ & Æthiopicæ linguarum Originibus, which have been printed at Antwerp, ſays he, with the Quinquagenæ of Antonius Nibriſſenſis.

(10) Biblioth. Hiſpan. tom. 2. pag. 357.

[F] Scaliger owns that for a young man he was very learned.] This expreſſion may ſeem ſurprizing, if it be conſidered, that Scaliger made uſe of it long after Caninius's death, and that Thuanus does not repreſent him as a man who died very young; for he makes him wander a long time over Italy and Spain, teaching in ſeveral places the Oriental Languages (11), before he ſettled at Paris. But appears from another paſſage of the Scaligerana, that Scaliger thought Caninius lived but thirty ſix years (12). I do not lay much ſtreſs upon that paſſage; for Scaliger had ſaid juſt before, that Caninius died at the age of thirty two, which

(11) Iis perdecendis diu in Italia, Venetiis, Patavii, Bononiæ, Romæ, atque in Hiſpania vagus. Thuan. lib. 19. pag. 346.

(12) Prima Scaligerana, pag. 47.

rowed the beſt obſervations in it from Vergara, and from all the other Writers upon that ſubject, and alſo added to them ſomething of his own (d). Faber of Saumur, who prefers Caninius before all the other Grammarians, that are or ever were in being, openly explodes that accuſation, and obſerves, that that work may be called the Treaſure of Helleniſm, and that it was printed at Paris in the year 1555, in 4to (e). Other learned men have beſtowed the ſame encomium upon Caninius's Greek Grammar [G]. His other works are not very numerous [H]. It is very probable, that Jerom Caninius of Anghiari, the Author of an Italian Tranſlation of Tacitus, publiſhed with the Aphoriſm of Alamos (f) and printed at Venice in 1620, was of the ſame family with our Caninius.

(d) Scaligerana, pag. m. 42.

(e) Notis in Prima Scaligerana.

(f) Nicol. Antonius, Biblioth. Hiſpan. tom. 1. pag. 140.

(13) According to Valerius Andreas, Bibl. Belg. pag. 683, he lived 42 years, but 49 according to Bullart in his Acad. des Scienc.

(14) Epitr. Franç. à Scaliger. pag. 329.

(15) It ſhould rather have been from Angleria upon the Lake Majour.

(16) Quenſtedt, de Patriis illuſtr. pag. 296. See Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, tom. 4. pag. 112.

which is not true (13). I have not yet been able to find out how many years Caninius lived. It is not an eaſy thing to give an account of his life; Thuanus, who found it very difficult, applied himſelf to Scaliger. "In the courſe of my Hiſtory, ſays he (14), I "do willingly ſay ſomething of the perſons eminent in "the Republic of Letters, under the year of their "death; amongſt them I very much deſired not to "omit Angelus Caninius, for he deſerves, I think, that "his name ſhould be tranſmitted to poſterity; but I am "at a loſs where to find ſome account of him. Firſt, "I do not certainly know, where he was born: he "ſtiled himſelf Anglarenſis, I do not know whether "it is from a village upon the lake Como (15), or "from another place. He was ſtill alive in 1553, "and lived in France. He travelled all his life time, "now in Spain, then here. If you know any thing "of him, and in what year he died, I deſire you "would write it to me."

[G] The learned have beſtowed encomiums upon Caninius's Greek Grammar.] Here follow the words of a German Author. In Grammatica Græca, quicquid vetuſtiſſimi Scriptores de Græcæ Linguæ ratione præcipiunt, atque adeò omnia, quæ ad dialectos intelligendas, & Poetas penitus cognoſcendos pertinent, facili methodo exponuntur (16). i. e. "He has explained in his "Greek Grammar, in an eaſy manner all the rules, "which the moſt ancient Authors give for underſtanding the Greek tongue, and conſequently, for having a true notion of the dialects, and for underſtanding the Poets."

[H] His other works are not very numerous.] He tranſlated into Latin Simplicius's Commentary upon Epictetus's Manual; that tranſlation was printed at Venice in 1546, folio. He alſo wrote Inſtitutiones linguæ Syriacæ, Aſſyriacæ, atque Thalmudicæ, una cum Æthiopicæ atque Arabicæ collatione, quibus addita eſt ad Calcem Novi Teſtamenti multorum locorum Hiſtorica enarratio, Pariſii, apud Carolum Stephanum, 1554, 4to. De locis Scripturæ Hebraicis Commentarius.

Mr. Crenius has procured of late a new Edition of two Works of Caninius. Read what follows. Angeli Caninii Anglarenſis ΕΛΛΗΝΙΣΜΟΣ, copioſiſſimi Græcarum Latinarumque vocum Indicis acceſſione per CAROLUM HAUBOESIUM locupletatus. . . . Accedunt plurimorum verborum Originum explicatio, Regulæ quædam breves de Ratione Syntaxeos, & loci aliquot Novi Teſtamenti cum Hebræorum originibus conlati atque explicati. THOMAS CRENIUS recenſuit, emendavit, & Notis ac Præfatione, in qua de claris agitur ANGELIS, auxit. Lugduni Batavorum, apud Fredericum Haaring, CIↃ IↃCC, 8*vo*.

CAPET (HUGH) King of France, the firſt of the third race. A great many particulars might be ſaid on this ſubject; but I ſhall content my ſelf with obſerving, that Dante the Poet publiſhed a very ridiculous falſity, in ſaying that Hugh Capet's father was a Butcher [A]. It is ſaid that Francis I flew into a terrible paſſion, upon [A] Dante the Poet publiſhed a very ridiculous falſity, in ſaying that Hugh Capet's father was a Butcher.] Should I ſet about refuting this Poet, it would be mere loſs of time, and only abuſe the reader's patience. It will be ſufficient to give the moſt uſual conjecture of Authors who have mentioned this particular, viz. that the only motive of Dante's publiſhing this impoſture, was, to revenge himſelf on Prince Charles of Valois, (ſprung from this Prince) for the treatment he had met with from him. Pope Boniface VIII, at the requeſt of one of the Parties which divided the Republic of Florence at that time, got Charles de Valois, brother to Philip the Fair, King of France, to go and compoſe the diſturbances of that City. The faction in which Dante was engaged at that time, was the weakeſt. Accordingly he was driven from Florence with many more, and all his goods and chattels were confiſcated. He took the ſtrongeſt vengeance in his power, by exclaiming in his writings againſt the Kings of France, who had favoured the oppoſite faction; and, among other things, he ſatyrized them for their extraction. He feigns that Hugh Capet owns that his father was a Butcher, figliuol fui d'un Beccaio di Parigi (1); and confeſſes himſelf to be the root of a Plant which has done great miſchief to Chriſtendom.

(1) Dante in his Purgatory, Canto 20. pag. m. 282.

I fui radice de la mala pianta,
Che la terra Chriſtiana tutta aduggia
Si che buon frutto rado ſe ne ſchianta.
That is,
"I was the root of that malignant Plant,
"Which ſpreads, o'er Chriſtendom, a deadly ſhade,
"So that it ſeldom throws out wholeſome fruit (2)."

(2) Ibid.

A Canon of Paris, Balthazar Grangier by name, dedicating to Henry IV his Tranſlation, in French Verſe, of Dante's Hell, Paradiſe and Purgatory, tells this Prince that he muſt not take the word Butcher in a literal ſenſe; for Dante, who during his exile reſided a long time in this city of Paris, was not ignorant of our forms of ſpeaking. When a Prince cauſes juſtice to be executed with ſome rigour againſt a great number of malefactors, we ſay he made a great butchery or ſlaughter; and thus our ſaid Poet calls Hugh the great Count of Paris (father of the abovementioned Hugh Capet, great Juſticiary of the Gentlemen and other malefactors and rebels,) Butcher of Paris, as I ſhew more amply in my Annotations; and as ſome of our Annaliſts juſtly remark on this paſſage. This explication is very near as ridiculous as the falſity advanced by Dante. He certainly took the word Butcher in a literal ſenſe. I don't know whether he invented or borrowed this ſtupid fiction from ſome Libelliſt; but 'tis written that many have publiſh'd it: ſo true it is, that no lie, how abſurd ſoever it be, but is tranſcribed out of one book into another, and deſcends to poſterity. Lie boldly: publiſh the moſt chimerical ſtuff in nature, may we ſay to the moſt contemptible Gazetteer in Europe, for people enough will be found to copy your traſh; and ſuppoſing you ſhould happen to be contemned at one time, yet certain conjunctures will ariſe, in which it will be the intereſt of ſome people to raiſe you from your oblivion (3). We find in the Annals of Papyrius Maſſo, a paſſage which informs us that ſeveral Authors have related this particular mentioned by Dante. Itali quidam Hugonem humili genere natum ſcripſere ſeu ignorantia, ſeu odio. Dantes poeta illum Pariſienſis Beccai filium fuiſſe canit, quæ vox lanium ſonat. Is Florentia à Carolo Valeſio pulſus Philippum Pulchrum & Francos oderat, ut rectè in mentem venerit Volaterrano, Dantis opinionem refellere, etſi Ricordanus & Villaneus in Hetruſcis Annalibus id quoque à pluribus literis mandatum affirmant (4). i. e. "Some "Italian Authors, out of ignorance or hatred, declare "that Hugh was born of obſcure parentage. Dante "the Poet ſays, in his writings, that he was a Butcher's "ſon of Paris. This Poet being baniſhed Florence "by Charles de Valois, hated Philip the Fair and the "French, as Volaterranus juſtly obſerves, where he "refutes Dante's aſſertion; altho' Ricordanus and "Villani affirm, in their Annals of Tuſcany, that "many Writers have related the ſame particular." Read the following remark.

(3) See citation (68) of the Article CALVIN.

(4) Papyr. Maſſo, Annal. lib. 3.

upon hearing that Dante had related ſuch a circumſtance [B].

[B] 'Tis ſaid that Francis I flew into a terrible paſſion, upon hearing that Dante had related ſuch a circumſtance.] "The paſſage of Dante being read and "explained by Lewis Alemanni an Italian before "Franci I, the King was exaſperated at the impo-"ſture, and thereupon commanded it to be taken "from him, and was upon the point to prohibit the "reading of it in his Kingdom." Paſquier, after ſaying theſe words, advances a conjecture which is as idle as what I have now related. To excuſe this Author, ſays he (5), I would ſuppoſe that he, by the word Butcher, meant that Capet was ſon to a great and valiant Warrior. . . According to this way of ſpeaking I have read that Oliver de Cliſſon was generally called the Butcher by our Countrymen, becauſe he did not ſpare any of the Engliſh who fell into his hands, but cut every one of them to pieces. He adds, that the Proteſtants uſed to give the name of Butcher to Francis of Lorrain, Duke of Guiſe. Had Paſquier examined what preceded and followed the verſe of Dante, he would not have thought this Poet meant to ſay, that Capet was ſon to an illuſtrious and brave Warrior; for a perſon who ſpeaks thus of another, does not do it out of contempt; and it is manifeſt that Dante intended to defame Hugh Capet. On ſome occaſions an Hiſtorian ought to content himſelf with barely relating matters. Had Paſquier only obſerved, that Francis I was exaſperated againſt Dante, and that the ſilly aſſertion of this Poet, though written merely by the by, and without thought, it yet ſerved as a foundation to many Authors; in that caſe Paſquier would have merited applauſe. He cites Francis de Villon, who delighted more in taverns and ſuch like places than in good Books (6), who ſays ſomewhere in his writings,

Si feuſſe des Hoirs de Capet
Qui fut extrait de Boucherie.

That is,

"Were I the heir of Capet, ———
"Who from a paltry Butcher trac'd his lineage.

He adds, that Agrippa, . . . inſtructing meraly on this fundamental error, declaims impudently againſt the genealogy of our Capet (7). But how irrational ſoever Paſquier's conjecture may be, it nevertheleſs has been approved by Bullart. Stephen Paſquier, ſays he (8), explaining this great Poet's thought in a more juſt and rational manner, is of opinion, that he employs this word by way of metaphor; and, by the word Butcher, means that Capet was ſon to a valiant Warrior. Mr. Bullart had declared juſt before, that this paſſage of Dante gave Francis I ſo much offence, that he commanded the Book to be taken away from him, and was going to prohibit it in his Kingdom. I know a man, who aſſerts, that this is miſunderſtanding Paſquier's words; "for, ſaid "he, the words of this Author ſignify, that Fran-"cis I commanded to have the paſſage which "relates to Hugh Capet expunged from Dante's "Poem. It would be very ſtrange ſhould Fran-"cis I have given orders for taking away a "Book which diſpleaſed him. Why did he not "throw it upon the ground? He would have been as "indolent as a Sybarite (9), had he commanded ano-"ther to deliver him from this burthen, his indolence "might then have been ſo extreme, as to command "one of his people to drive from his face a fly which "had ſtung him; and to have the victuals put into "his mouth, to eaſe him of the trouble of lifting up "his hand to it." But with ſubmiſſion to this reaſoning Gentleman, Francis I, notwithſtanding his bluntneſs and martial vigour, he yet might command a Book to be taken from him, which gave offence. He himſelf did not hold the Book, but in all probability an Italian Maſter of Languages who was reading to him. The truth of the matter is, a very ingenious Italian Refugee (10) was reading this Poet to Francis I, which clears up the difficulty at once.

(5) Paſquier, Recherches, lib. 6. cap. 1.

(6) Ibid. lib. 4. cap. 1.

(7) In his book on the Vanity of the Sciences, in the chapter of Nobility.

(8) Academy of Sciences, tom. 2. pag. 307.

(9) See in Athenæus, book 12. pag. 530. a ſtrange example of the indolence of a Sybarite.

(10) Aloiſio Alamanni. I mention him in the article MACHIAVEL, remark [C].

CAPYCIUS (SCIPIO) in Italian Capece, ſprung from an antient family of Naples (a), gained great reputation in the ſixteenth Century by the works he wrote [A]. He was very much eſteemed by Iſabella Villamarini Princeſs of Salerno; and he beſtowed great encomiums on her [B]. His chief Poem is that wherein he has argued philoſophically on the principles of Nature. It was printed at Venice in 1546 by Paulus Manutius, with (a) Lorenzo Craſſo, Elog. tom. 2. pag. 176.

[A] He gained great reputation . . . by the works he compoſed.] Moſt of theſe are Poems. He wrote one in proſe Magiſtratuum Regni Neapolitani cum Romanorum Magiſtratibus comparatio. Of the four Elegies he publiſhed, the firſt was inſcribed to Andrew Perrinot, Cardinal and Viceroy of Naples; the ſecond to Cardinal Jerom Seripand; the third to John Baptiſt Gaſtaldi Marquis of Caſſano; the fourth treats of the Miſeries of the Author, and thoſe of the Age he lived in (1). Some of his Epigrams are of his own invention, and others are imitations from the Anthologia. His Poem on the Life of Chriſt has never appeared in print, which was owing to the negligence of a friend, who poſſeſſed the manuſcript after the Author's death, and did not take care to publiſh it (2). See in the following remark the account which is given of the two beſt Poems of Capycius.

(1) Nella quarta finalmente deplora le miſerie ſue, e del ſecolo, Lor. Craſſo, Elog. tom. 2. pag. 178.

(2) Extracted from Lorenzo Craſſo, ibid.

[B] He was very much eſteemed by Iſabella Villamarini . . . . and he beſtowed great encomiums on her.] I appeal for this to the teſtimony of Paulus Manutius, who relates that this Lady, having preferred the ſtudy of Literature to all other employments, was the moſt learned, and at the ſame time the nobleſt and moſt beautiful woman then living; and hence it was that ſeveral Poets, particularly Capycius, had made her the chief object of their Elogiums. This conſideration alſo induces Paulus Manutius to think, that in inſcribing the Poems of Capycius to that Princeſs, ſhe will look upon them as a very agreeable preſent; and honour him with her eſteem. Paulus Manutius is ſo eloquent, that his beautiful Latin deſerves a place here. Effeciſti ſtudio tu quidem, ſed ingenio magis, ut cum eſſes omnium nobiliſſima, omniumque pulcherrima (quorum alterum majorum tuorum, maximèque viri tui, Principis omni laude cumulati, magnis rebus teſtata virtus, alterum benigniſſima tibi natura dedit) eadem & ſis & habearis omnium doctiſſima. Hinc illa ad te colendam ſingularis omnium propenſio, hinc multorum Poetarum, quibus graviſſima regum bella magni operis argumentum ſuppeditare poterant, ad te canendam traducta ingenia. Hinc Capicius ille tuus, tuarum laudum laudatiſſimus præco, qui te admiratur unam, qui obſervat, qui cùm de te multa & vera prædicavit, ita concludit, unam habere, quæ optabilia ſint, omnia. . . Hoc opus, & quia ſcriptum eſt à tui ſtudioſiſſimo, & quia verſibus te dignis, id eſt luculentiſſimis, non herclè dubito, quin à me miſſum avidè accipias, ſic inquam, ut de iſto me munere ames plurimum (3). i. e. "So happy are the effects of your "ſtudies, or rather of your genius, that you who are "the moſt noble, and moſt beautiful, (the former "of which you owe to the great virtue and glorious "acts of your anceſtors, and particularly of the "Prince your Conſort, on whom the higheſt applauſes "have been beſtowed; and for the latter you are in-"debted to the indulgence of nature) are at the "ſame time the moſt learned Lady in the world. "Hence proceeds the ſtrong inclination which all men "have to honour you; hence it is that many Poets, "neglecting to ſing the mighty wars of Kings, leave "thoſe exalted Themes to celebrate your praiſes: "Hence your Capicius, the moſt applauded herald of "your praiſes, who admires and reveres you only; "who after ſaying the moſt juſt and fineſt things of "you, concludes thus, that in you alone every excellen-"cy is united. . . This work, being written by one who "had the higheſt veneration for you, and his very ele-"gant Verſes being worthy ſo great a Patroneſs, I don't "doubt but that you'll very readily accept the offer, "and honour me with your eſteem upon that account." This we find prefixed to a Poem de Principiis Rerum, printed at Venice anno 1546, with another Poem entitled de Vate maximo libri tres (4), and which had been

(3) Paul. Manutius, Epiſt. Dedicat. Poematis Capycii de rerum principiis ad Iſabellam Villamarinam Salernitani Principis conjugem. This Dedication of Manutius has been printed ſeparately with his other Prefaces, at Paris 1579, and elſewhere.

(4) See Nicodemo, Addizz. alla Biblioth. Napol. pag. 226.

with another Poem of the ſame Author on St. John Baptiſt (b). Gyraldus has been cenſured for ſpeaking of Capycius as an indifferent Poet [C].

been already printed, for Geſner mentions it in a work publiſh'd by him in 1545. Scipionis Capycii viri doctiſſimi de Vate maximo libri tres erudito carmine conſcripti, quod cum veterum etiam majeſtate conferri queat, ut habet inſcriptio. Joannis Oporinus excudit nuper (5) Baſileæ cum aliis quibuſdam Chriſtianis Poematiis (6). i. e. "The very learned Scipio Capycius's piece de "Vate maximo, in three books, written in learned "Verſe, which may vie in majeſty with the ancient "Poets, as the title declares. It was lately printed, "together with ſome other Chriſtian Poems, at Baſil "by Jo. Oporinus." Nicodemus muſt therefore be miſtaken, when he ſays that, with regard to theſe two Poems, that this edition of Manutius is the firſt (17); he ſhould have affirmed this only of the work entitled de Rerum Principiis. He confutes Father Oldoini, for ſaying that Cardinal Pompey Colonna (8) has greatly applauded Iſabella Filomarini, wife to the Prince of Salerno. The foundation of this criticiſm is, that the Lady of this Prince was called Iſabella Villamarini. She is ſo called by Manutius, as alſo by Niphus, and that on an occaſion which deſerves to be known. He ſays that this Lady was ſo paſſionately fond of the Prince her huſband, that ſhe was reſolved to accompany him into the field; but the Prince would not comply with her requeſt, becauſe of the great dangers and hazards of it. Being thus ſeparated from the huſband whom ſhe idolized, ſhe paſt all her days in the deepeſt affliction, but her nights were pleaſant. This Lady ſaw the Prince for ever in her dreams; ſhe talk'd with, and was careſſed by him; and this made her wiſh for one long night, and that the Sun might never riſe again. But this will appear much more beautiful in the original Latin. Id quod in Iſabella Villamarina Salerni principe, quæ flos redolentiſſimus noſtri ævi eſt puellarum, corporiſque & animi formæ ſingulare exemplum, eſt videre. Hæc cùm Ferrandum Sanſſeverinum conjugem flagrantiſſimè deperiret, unaque in militiam proficiſci arderet, quia ab eo ob pericula & labores fuit denegatum, nullam teſtatur Heroinæ religioſiſſimæ, aut raram eſſe noctem, quia cum dulciſſimo vino in ſomnis non conjunctiſſime vivat, fabuletur ac delicietur, ut omnibus votis exoptaret perpetuas eſſe noctes; (cum illum totos dies ſuſpiret) & in Epimenidem transformari; quæ de Alceſte & Laodamia fabulata eſt vetuſtas (9). The Book whence theſe particulars are extracted, was finiſhed the third of November 1529. This doubtleſs is the Lady who was ſo much applauded by Cardinal Pompey Colonna; and thus Father Oldoini is miſtaken only in ſuppoſing that Filomarini and Villamarina are the ſame. Jerom Ruſcelli, who has beſtowed very great applauſes on this Princeſs of Salerno, calls her Iſabella Vigliomarina. Here follows a fragment of the Elogium. "She poſſeſſes, ſays he, ſo many more "than human beauties both in her body and mind, "that nature exhauſting all her ſtrength (10) might "perhaps be able to form a woman equal to that Prin-"ceſs, either wholly or in part; but could never "form a woman to ſurpaſs her in ever ſo little a de-"gree." Sanſovino alſo calls her Iſabella Vigliamarina (11).

To revive this ſubject, Capycius makes the air to be the principle of all things, and he refutes the Atomiſts and thoſe who admit four elements; and ſuch as ſay, with Thales, that all bodies owe their exiſtence to water, or, with Heraclitus, that they proceed from fire (12).

[C] Gyraldus has been cenſured, for ſpeaking of Capycius as an indifferent Poet.] He deſerves, ſays he, ſome place among the Poets (13). Nicodemo looks upon this praiſe as too faint (14), and he oppoſes to ſo jejune an encomium, what Petrus Bembus and Manutius have written to the advantage of Capycius, tho' he at the ſame time thinks, that they applaud him too much (15). He cites Gaddi, who thinks the judgment of Gyraldus too ſevere (16). See Mr. Baillet, in Tom. III of his Judgment on the Poets, numero 1277; and the two Epiſtles (17), which are prefixed to Donatus's Virgil, publiſh'd anno 1535.

(5) i. e. anno 1542.
(6) Geſner in Biblioth. folio 592.
(7) Nicodemo, Addiz. alla Biblioth. Napolet. pag. 226.
(8) See the article of this Cardinal, about the end of the Text.
(9) Auguſt. Niphus, de Amore, cap. 102. pag. 426. edit. Pariſ. 1645.
(10) Per fare un eſtremo delle ſue forze. Ruſcelli, Lettura ſopra un ſonetto del Marcheſe della Terza, folio 40.
(11) In his Work on the families of Italy, folio 200 verſo.
(12) Lorenzo Craſſo, Elogii, tom. 2. pag. 177.
(13) In aliquo Poetarum numero cenſendus eſt. Gyraldus, Dial. II. de Poetis ſui temporis, apud Leon. Nicodemi, Addiz. alla Biblioth. Napolet. pag. 225.
(14) Nicodemus, ibid.
(15) Ibid. pag. 226.
(16) Gaddi, de Scriptor. non Eccleſ. tom. 1. pag. 14.
(17) See Nicodemo, Addiz. alla Biblioth. Napol. pag. 127, 128.

CAPILUPUS (CAMILLUS) a native of Mantua, lived in the ſixteenth Century. He wrote a book intitled, The Stratagem (a), in which he relates not only what was perpetrated at Paris during the maſſacre on St. Bartholomew's day, but alſo the artful preparations which preceded that horrid maſſacre; and which, by a long ſeries of intrigues, drew the Huguenots at laſt into the ſnare. This work, publiſhed at Rome anno 1572 (b), was tranſlated into French ſoon after. It is blended with a great number of falſities (c). The Court of France muſt neceſſarily have been diſpleaſed at ſuch a relation, ſince it endeavoured to perſuade the world that it was not premeditated (d). Camillus Capilupus is ranked among the Latin Poets. He had two brothers, one of whom named Hippolytus was Biſhop of Fano (e); and the other, who was called LELIUS, made himſelf famous by ſome Cento's of Virgil. Thuanus, cited by Moreri, informs us of this particular. I alſo will take ſome notice of him in the remark [A]. It is to be obſerved, that Moreri has cited very improperly the 22d book of Thuanus, and Miræus, with reſpect to Camillus Capilupus.

(a) Thuan. lib. 52. pag. 1089.
(b) Idem, ibid.
(c) Idem, ibid.
(d) Sanè ingeniоſi ſunt Itali & Hiſpani, qui hæc tradunt, dum nobis profundam ſuam calliditatem & præpoſteram prudentiam in hoc facto affingere conantur; quod tamen noſtri aulici tanquam ex occaſione natum, neque ante præmeditatum tam artificioſè excuſarunt. Thuan. lib. 52. pag. 1089.
(e) Teiſſier, Addit. aux Eloges, tom. 1. pag. 179.

[A] I will take notice of Lelius Capilupus in the Remark.] The manner in which he applied the expreſſions of Virgil, to repreſent things which the Poet never dreamt of, cannot be enough admired. Thuanus (1), Poſſevinus (2), Ghilini (3), and ſeveral others, have very happily repreſented his ſkill in this particular. He died at Mantua (4) the third of January 1560, aged 62 and 15 days (5). The Cento he made againſt the Monks is inimitable. It is annexed to Naogeorgus's Regnum Papiſticum. It was not inſerted in the Edition that was made in Rome, of his Cento's anno 1590. They had been prohibited, but at that time were allowed to be printed, after making all the Caſtrations they thought proper (6). JULIUS CAPILUPUS his nephew, added ſeveral Cento's of his own compoſing. He had a peculiar talent for this ſpecies of writing, and ſurpaſſed even his uncle therein, if we may credit Poſſevinus (7), who adds, that Julius Roſcius Hortinus having explained the rules of Auſonius by examples, inſerted them in this Edition. Miræus (8), and Moreri after him, pretend that this Roſcius procured it; but Poſſevinus would induce us to think otherwiſe. I know not whether the Cento of Lelius Capilupus againſt women be among them. It is a very ingenious, but too ſatyrical piece, and is found in the collection entitled Baudii Amores, printed at Leyden in 1638. I am to obſerve, that Camillus, Hippolytus, Lelius, and Julius Capilupus were not brothers, as ſome writers have aſſured (9). Their Italian Poems are inſerted in the Deliciæ Poetarum Italorum. Teiſſier informs us, that Hippolyto Capiluppi excelled in ſatyrical Poetry (10); but others affirm that he, as well as Julius and Camillus, excelled in the Elegiac: alio atque alio carminum genere famam ſuam propagarunt, floridiores tamen elegiaco (11). Theſe are Borrichius's words, who may be charged with a conſiderable omiſſion; for he did not know that Julius Capilupus had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his Cento's, Borrichius mentioning only thoſe of Lelio.

(1) Thuan. lib. 16. ſub fin. pag. m. 583.
(2) Poſſevin. Bibl. Select. lib. 17. cap. 24. pag. 437.
(3) Ghilini, Teatr. tom. 1. pag. 145.
(4) The place of his birth.
(5) Ghilini's Teatro, tom. 1. pag. 145.
(6) Poſſevin. Bibl. Select. lib. 17. cap. cap. 24. pag. 437.
(7) Idem, ibid.
(8) Aubert. Miræus, de Scriptor. Sæc. 16. pag. 99.
(9) Baillet, Jugem. ſur les Poetes, tom. 2. num. 1300. pag. 277.
(10) Teiſſier, Addit. aux Eloges tom. 1. pag. 179.
(11) Borrichius, Diſſert. de Poetis, pag. 96.

CAPISTRAN (JOHN) a Franciſcan Friar (a) lived in the fifteenth Century. He was born in the village of Capiſtran in Italy, anno 1385 (b). He acquired prodigious reputation by his zeal, his eloquence, and the regularity of his manners. He was ſent into Bohemia, in order to labour at the converſion of the Huſſites [A]; and he preached a Cruſade againſt the Turks in Germany, in Hungary [B], and in Poland (c). His eloquence ſeconded ſo happily the valour of Hunniades, that he contributed greatly to the victories which the Chriſtians gained over Mahomet, and particularly to the famous battle of Belgrade in 1456. Theſe two men divided ſo evidently the glory of the victories which were gained, that it was thought there was a kind of jealouſy between them; for in the relations which Capiſtran made of the victory of Belgrade, no notice was taken of John Hunniades; and the relations of the latter did not make the leaſt mention of Capiſtran. The conjecture or reflection of Æneas Silvius on this head is extremely judicious [C]. Capiſtran died a little after the victory laſt mentioned (d), and was buried at Willak in Hungary. We are told, that many miracles were wrought at his tomb, and that his prayers put a ſtop to the miracles of a lay-brother (e). He was canonized in October 1690 by Pope Alexander VIII. He had before been beatified by Gregory XV. He wrote ſome books [D]. Some very ſurprizing effects are related of his eloquence [E]. His corps about an hundred years after being buried, had been removed

(a) Not a Dominican, as is aſſerted by Leunclavius, Pandect. cap. 133. cited by Guillet, Hiſt. of Mahomet II. tom. 2. pag. 431.

(b) Labbe, de Scriptor. Eccleſ. tom. 1. pag. 518.

(c) Guillet, Hiſt. de Mahomet. tom. 1. pag. 288.

(d) The 3d of October 1456. He was 71 years of age. Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. tom. 1. pag. 519.

(e) See the remark [E] ad finem.

[A] He was ſent into Bohemia, to labour at the converſion of the Huſſites.] It is ſaid that his labours were very ſucceſsful; and that he at laſt required them, as a proof of the ſincerity of their converſion, and by way of penance for their errors, to take up arms and march againſt Mahomet. It is on this occaſion that Chalcondylas (*) has ſpoken of Capiſtran and the Bohemians from incorrect memoirs; he ſaying that thoſe people worſhipped the God Apollo, and that Capiſtran won them from that Idolatry (1).

(*) Chalcond. lib. 8.

(1) Guillet, Hiſtoire de Mahom. II. tom. 1. pag. 314.

[B] He preached a Cruſade againſt the Turks . . . in Hungary.] The French Author whom I cite in the preceding remark obſerves, that as Capiſtran was a Picentine born, he had been admired in his own country for the beauty of his Italian; but that this tongue was of no ſervice to him in Hungary, he not being underſtood there: ſo that he had little ſucceſs in preaching the Cruſade there; he not having brought more than five hundred men, under the ſtandard of the Crucifix (2). Methinks this made him equally unfit to preach in Germany and Poland, and to convert the Huſſites. Read the laſt Remark.

(2) Guillet, ibid.

[C] The conjecture of Æneas Silvius . . . . is extremely judicious.] He is firmly perſuaded, that it was a ſecret thirſt of fame, which prompted both to be ſilent on this occaſion; and he obſerves farther that mankind can with much greater eaſe renounce riches and pleaſures, than the praiſe and honour of their fellow-creatures. Each aſcribed the glory to God, and acknowledged that to him they owed the victory; but at the ſame time each appropriated to himſelf the honour of having been the inſtrument of heaven. Ambition and vanity will not prevent men from acknowledging a thing is entirely owing to God; they are not afraid of ſuch a rival; and they refuſe to creatures like themſelves any ſhare in their reputation; and with theſe they decline all competition. Here follow the words of Æneas Silvius, who was afterwards Pope Pius II. Auctores victoriæ tres Joannes habiti, legatus Cardinalis, cujus auſpicio res geſta eſt, Huniadis & Capiſtranus, qui prælio interfuere. Verùm neque Capiſtranus Huniadis, neque idem Capiſtrani Huniades mentionem fecere in eis Literis, quas ambo, obtenta victoria, ſive ad Romanum Pontificem, ſive ad amicos ſcripſere; per ſuum quiſquam miniſterium Deum dediſſe Chriſtianis victoriam affirmavit. Avariſſima honoris humana mens, facilius Regnum & opes, quàm gloriam partitur. Potuit Capiſtranus Patrimonium contemnere, voluptates calcare, libidinem ſubigere, gloriam verò ſpernere non potuit, &c. (3). He ſpeaks to much the ſame effect in another Book. Huniades & Capiſtranus huic bello interfuere, uterque rem geſtam ſcripſit, neque alterius mentionem fecit; alteruter ſolidam ſibi rei geſtæ laudem uſurpavit. Ingens dulcedo gloriæ, facilius contemnenda dicitur, quam contemnitur. Spreverat Capiſtranus ſæculi pompas, fugerat delicias, calcaverat avaritiam, libidinem ſubegerat, contemnere gloriam non potuit. Qui ſummo Pontifici bellum, atque exitum Belli deſcribens, nulla Huniadis, nulla Cardinalis facta mentione, totum ſuum eſſe dixit, quod geſtum erat, quamvis Deum in primis victoriæ confeſſus fuerit auctorem. Nemo eſt tum Sanctus, qui dulcedine gloriæ non capiatur. Facilius Regna Viri excellentes, quam gloriam contemnunt, &c. (4). The endeavours which Guillet employed, in order to excuſe theſe two great men, are very praiſe-worthy; but ſtill, this muſt not induce us to believe, that he has juſtified them well. Some, ſays he (5), have aſcribed this ſilence to a ſecret jealouſy that each of them harboured; whence it was ſaid of Capiſtran, that of all the vanities of the world, there was but one (the thirſt of praiſe) which he had not yet trampled under foot. But to excuſe theſe two great men, we may ſay, that each of them would aſcribe this triumph to God only; and that neither would furniſh the other with a ſubject for vanity, in oppoſition to the modeſty and humility enjoined by Chriſtianity. This is aſcribing to them a ſtrange kind of charity. Each acknowledged himſelf to be the inſtrument of heaven (6). He therefore did not fear aſcribing to himſelf a ſubject for vanity; or elſe he choſe to run the hazard of committing a crime, rather than expoſe his companion to it; or laſtly, he was diffident of his friend's modeſty, but not of his own; and even this would be an act of vanity. They who endeavour to apologize for the mutual ſilence of theſe two great men, by ſaying, that one was not the other's Hiſtoriographer; and that each contented himſelf with relating ſuch things as he himſelf had executed (7), employ a very weak reaſon. If Marſhal de Brezé and de Chatillon had ſent to Lewis XIII a relation of the battle of Avein, in which one of them ſhould have made no mention of the other, might not a perſon pronounce very ſafely, that jealouſy was the motive of this ſilence?

(3) Æneas Silvius, Hiſtor. Europæ, cap. 8. pag. 403. edit. Baſil. 1571.

(4) Idem, Hiſt. Bohemiæ, pag. 138.

(5) Guillet, Hiſtoire de Mahomet, tom. 1. pag. 330, 331.

(6) Per ſuum quiſquam miniſterium Deum dediſſe Chriſtianis victoriam affirmavit. Æneas Silvius, Hiſtor. Europæ, pag. 403.

(7) Uterque videtur ea infami nota liberandus quia neuter agebat alterius Hiſtoricum, ſed quilibet de iis quæ per ſeipſum tractaverat, atque perfecerat, commonebat Pontificem. Th. Raynaudus. Hoploth. Sect. 2. Serie 3. cap. 11. pag. m. 368.

[D] He wrote ſome Books.] Speculum Clericorum. De Poteſtate Papæ & Conſilii. De pœnis Inferni & Purgatorii. Another piece againſt the Huſſites, and particularly againſt John de Roqueſane their Biſhop (8) &c.

(8) Bellarm. de Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt.

[E] Some very ſurprizing effects are related of his eloquence.] He went to Nuremberg in 1452, and was there received in great pomp by all the Clergy. He cauſed a pulpit to be ſet up in the middle of the great ſquare, and there preached for ſome days, in ſo forcible a manner againſt vice, that he obliged the inhabitants to make a pile of their cards and dice, and afterwards ſet fire to them (9), which being done, he exhorted them to take up arms againſt the Turks. The year after he went to Breſlaw in Sileſia, and there inveighed ſtrongly againſt cards and dice; and commanding a pile to be made of them all, he ſet fire to it. But the power of his eloquence was not confined merely to the doing this execution on inanimate things, he exerting his power in a moſt dreadful manner over the Jews; and cauſed a great number of them to be burnt in all parts of Sileſia, upon pretence of their behaving irreverently towards the conſecrated bread. He uſed to preach two hours in Latin, after which another uſed to repeat Capiſtran's Sermons in the language of the country (10).

(9) Compare this with chap. 19. ver. 19. of the Acts of the Apoſtles.

The following Latin paſſage enumerates ſeveral particulars. Johannes Capiſtranus in Germaniam deſcendit, prædicans magno zelo verbum Dei, in Auſtria, Bavaria, Suevia, Thuringia, & Saxonia. Nam in civitate Magdeburgenſi, in novo foro, maxima ad illam confluente multitudine, cùm eſſet Germanicæ linguæ non ignarus, (10) Ex Theatro Pauli Freheri, pag. 89.

removed to another Monaſtery, when the Turks took Sirmiſch; but it was torn to pieces, and thrown into a well, when the Proteſtants plundered that Monaſtery (f).

(f) Ilthuanffi, Hiſt. Hungar. lib. 10. apud Spondan. ad ann. 1456. num. 6.

rus, Latino ſermone prædicabat Latinis in tertiam horam, populo ſolis geſtibus ejus, quos antè non viderat, ſatis vehementer permoto. Aderat ex Germanis ſui Ordinis Fratribus vir æquè doctus, qui poſt illum non minore tempore dicens interpretabatur populo, quæ ille dixiſſet. Moti ſunt omnes, & uſque adeò permoti, ut fœminæ abuſum in ornatu, viri ludos, quibus tempora perdunt, ſcacorum alearumque in unum contulerint, & in eodem loco igne ſubdito concremârint. Fertur idem aliquot ſanitatis ſigna feciſſe, ut vulgo eſt creditum. Sed eſt in ea re ſæpè loquacior fama. Hoc conſtat, virum fuiſſe incredibilis in vita & moribus auſteritatis & ſanctitatis. Sed eſt ſpiritus ille torrens, quo tum commotus populus, illa quæ diximus, fecit, ut non diù perſeveret. Facilè redit res in abuſum, ut eſt hodiè cernere per omnes terras & urbes (11). i. e. "John Capiſtran went into "Germany, preaching very zealouſly the word of "God in Auſtria, Bavaria, Schawaben, Thuringia "and Saxony. For being in the new market of the "city of Magdeburg, and a multitude flocking "about him, altho' he was not ignorant of the Ger-"man language, he yet preached upwards of two "hours in Latin to thoſe who underſtood the tongue; "the people being ſtrongly affected, merely by the "force of his action, they having never ſeen ſuch "geſtures before. There was preſent on this occaſion a "German, of the ſame Religious Order with Capiſtran, "a man as learned as himſelf, who interpreted in the "ſame time as Capiſtran had employed, his Latin to "the multitude. All the auditors were moved to ſo "prodigious a degree, that the women taking off "their ſuperfluous ornaments, and the men bringing "gaming tables and dice, at which they uſed to miſ-"pend their time; they made a pile of the whole, "and burnt them in that place. It is vulgarly re-"ported, that Capiſtran performed ſome miraculous "cures, but fame often exceeds the bounds of truth "on theſe occaſions. This is certain, that he was a "man of incredible auſterity and holineſs in his life "and manners. But this ſpirit, which then moved "the people to all theſe things, was like a flood, "and ſo not laſting. Matters of this nature eaſily re-"turn to their former abuſes, as is ſeen in every part "of the earth." The reader will obſerve 1ſt, that, according to the Author whence theſe particulars are extracted, Capiſtran's eloquence produced this great reformation, not in Nuremberg, but in Magdeburg. 2dly, That this reformation was but of ſhort continuance. 3dly, That with regard to Capiſtran's miracles, we muſt not give too much credit to common fame. 4thly, That with reſpect to the auſterity of his life, there is no room to doubt of it, it being an undoubted fact. Capiſtran could not be afraid of thoſe ſatyrical flings which are thrown out againſt jolly Preachers, who aſſiduouſly exhort their flock to faſt and mortify the fleſh; for he was a little, lank creature, made up of nothing but ſkin and bones. This is the deſcription which Hertmannus Scheydel, who had ſeen Capiſtran, gives of him (12). Capiſtranum puſillum corpore Nurmbergæ vidi, ætate ſenectâ annos quinque & ſexaginta natum, ſiccum, aridum, exhauſtum, ſola cute, nerviſque & oſſibus compactum, lætum tamen & in laborem fortem; ſine intermiſſione ſingulis diebus prædicantem, altas ac profundas materias abſolventem. i. e. "I ſaw Capiſtran at Nuremberg. He was then three-"ſcore and five, ſhort, extremely lean, emaciated, "and a compoſition of mere ſkin and bones, but at "the ſame time chearful and very laborious: he ne-"ver failing to preach every day, and to explain the "moſt profound matters."

(11) Alb. Krantzius, Saxon. lib. 11. cap. 35. pag. m. 841.

(12) In ſexta mundi ætate, apud Sadulium Comment. in Vitam S. Franciſci, pag. 260.

I muſt not omit, that his Prayers wrought as great an effect as his Sermons. It was theſe ſuſpended the Miracles which were wrought at the grave of one Thomas of Florence (13), who had been a lay-brother in a Franciſcan Monaſtery. There were ſome apprehenſions, that whilſt endeavours were uſed to get St. Bernardin canonized, the Miracles of the Lay-brother might retard the affair; for which reaſon Capiſtran addreſſed a very fervent Prayer to him, in order that they might be ſuſpended. He was heard. Thomas of Florence, that he might not put a ſtop to the affair, nor give occaſion to any obſtacles or delays, ſuſpended his miraculous virtue; and did not reſume it, till after St. Bernardin had been canonized. Spondanus relates the incident thus. Memoria dignum eſt, ſays he (14), quod Chronicon refert Minorum (*); cùm eo tempore quo de canonizatione Bernardini ageretur, Reate defunctus quidam Thomas Florentinus ejuſdem ordinis Laïcus, miraculis etiam fulgeret, ne inde aliquâ ratione Bernardini negotium retarderetur, Joannem de Capiſtrano inſignem alium ejuſdem Ordinis Patrem antè Thomæ ſepulchrum proſtratum, orâſſe ut tamdiù à miraculis edendis abſtineret, quoad Bernardini canonizatio perfecta eſſet; Thomamque ceſſâſſe, atque eâ factâ rurſum continuâſſe. This is not the only proof that may be given, of the regard which the Saints have one for the other. St. Germain ſhewed St. Martin a complaiſance, that has all the air of human politeneſs. "The relicks of St. "Martin having been carried thorough all parts of "France, arrived at Auxerre, and being depoſited in "St. Germain's Church, wrought a great many Mi-"racles. The Monks of Auxerre, being perſuaded "that St. Germain was as great a Saint as St. Martin, "inſiſted upon half the offerings (which were very "conſiderable) made on that occaſion. But the Prieſts "of St. Martin declared, that as their Saint alone, "wrought all the Miracles, all the offerings ought to "be his. To juſtify that what they aſſerted was no-"thing but the truth, they deſired that a ſick per-"ſon might be laid between the two ſhrines of St. "Germain and St. Martin, and that it would then "appear which of them wrought the Miracle. Ac-"cordingly a leper was brought, who was ſoon healed "on that ſide which lay towards the ſhrine of St. "Martin, but not on that turned towards St. Ger-"main; and after this, the diſeaſed part being turned "towards St. Martin's ſhrine, it alſo healed. It is "not, ſays Cardinal Baronius, that St. Germanius was not "as great a Saint as St. Martin, and wrought a great "number of Miracles: but becauſe St. Martin had fa-"voured him with a viſit, he ſuſpended the power "with which God was pleaſed to endow him, in or-"der to give the better reception to his gueſt (15)."

(13) It may be obſerved on this occaſion, that ſome Saints have ceaſed their miracles, becauſe they were forbid to perform any. See Mr. Baſnage, Hiſt. de l'Egliſe, tom. 2. pag. 1283.

(14) Spondan. ad ann. 1444, num. 22. pag. m. 911.

(*) Chron. Min. lib. 2. Part 3. cap. 28.

(15) Bourſault, Lettres Nouvelles, pag. 397, 398. edit. de Hollande, 1698.

CAPISUCCHI. A Roman family, which has given birth to ſeveral illuſtrious perſons in theſe laſt ages, as will be ſeen in the following articles; and as appears more at large from the Hiſtory which Vincenzo Armanni publiſhed of that family, and from the genealogy written by Ughelli. See alſo Father Tarquin Gallucci, in his firſt book De Bello Belgico.

CAPISUCCHI (BLASIUS) Marquis of Monterio, General of the Pope's forces at Avignon, about the end of the ſixteenth Century, was famous for his courage and his ſkill in the military arts. He performed a very remarkable action at the ſiege of Poitiers in 1569 (A). Pope Pius V has expreſly named this action in a Bull (a); others relate it with too many rhetorical flouriſhes [B]. This Roman Gentleman was at that

(a) Strada, de Bello Belg. Dec. II. lib. 5.

[A] He performed a very remarkable action at the ſiege of Poitiers in 1569.] The Proteſtants were beſieging Poitiers, and had already thrown a bridge over the river, in order to make an aſſault. Capiſucchi, with two other good ſwimmers, plunged into the river; and getting under the bridge cut in various places that which faſtened the pieces of it together (1), this ſoon made the whole bridge ſink into the water, which was of great ſervice to the beſieged.

(1) Davila, lib. 5.

[B] Some relate it with too many rhetorical flouriſhes.] According that time in the company of Fuzilleers under Paul Sforza, brother to the Marquis of Santa-Fiore (b); and afterwards ſerved in the Low-Countries under the Duke of Parma (c), who ſent him to ſuccour Colen in 1584, during the war which was carried on againſt Gebhard Truchſes, a Proteſtant Elector, and married. Capiſucchi ſignalized himſelf in that Country [C]. He was afterwards made Lieutenant-General of the Duke of Florence's forces, and commanded thoſe of the Pope at Avignon and in the Comté Venaiſſin (d). In the Archives of the Vatican is preſerved a volume of his Letters, written to Cardinal Aldobrandini, nephew of Clement VIII. He had a brother called Camillo (D).

(b) Davila, lib. 5.

(c) Strada, de Bell. Belg. Dec. II. lib. 5. ad ann. 1584.

(d) Proſp. Mandoſius, Bibliotb. Romana, pag. 226.

According to Famianus Strada, this action was much more glorious, than Davila will allow it to be. The latter relates, that whilſt the ſwimmers were getting in the night-time under the bridge, in order to looſen it in ſeveral places, the beſieged alarmed the enemy ſeveral times, and made a ſally under the command of Fervaques, with a great diſcharge of the artillery; by which means they employed the beſiegers ſo much, that they did not perceive the breaking down of their bridge. Thoſe who furniſh'd Father Strada with the particulars of this action, did not find any thing wonderful in it; they thought it better to expoſe Blaſius Capiſucchi to a furious diſcharge of the ſmall arms; and to raiſe him above that Horace, who was one of the three Worthies of ancient Rome, in the war againſt Porſenna. Here follow the words of that eloquent Hiſtorian. Ob iteratas Colonienſium ac Septemviri literas, addiderat Blaſium Capiſuccum, quem paulo ante ſclopetariorum equitum, mox & lancearium turmæ præfecerat; commendatum a fama præclari facinoris, quo in Pictavienſi obſidione, quum Hugonoti ad invadendam urbem flumini pontem injeciſſent, ipſe aquis immerſus crebra inter hoſtium miſſilia grandi cultro pontem intercidit, atque aditum ſubeuntibus interrupit. Veteris illius Romani patria non indignus, niſi quod ille poſt ſectum aliorum opera pontem tum fluminis periculum ſubiit urbis ſuæ ab hoſtibus jam ſecurus; hic à diſcrimine in aquis exorſus ſuis pontem manibus perfregit, hoſtibus à patria ſubmotis aliena, meritus ut facti memoriam Romanus Pontifex ſanctioribus literis inſeruerit (2). i. e. "Upon "the repeated Letters of the inhabitants of Colen and "of the Elector, he joined Blaſius Capiſucchi, on "whom he had a little before beſtowed the command "of a troop of horſe-muſketeers, and afterwards that "of a company of pikemen; an officer who was fa"mous for the glorious action he atchieved at the "ſiege of Poitiers, when the Huguenots having "thrown a bridge over the river in order to aſſault "the town, Capiſucchi plunging into the waves a"midſt the uninterrupted vollies which were diſcharg"ed by the enemy, cut down the bridge and ſtopt "the paſſage of thoſe who were going over it. An "exploit certainly not unworthy his illuſtrious coun"tryman Horatius Cocles; but with this difference, "that Cocles did not plunge into the river, till others "had cut down the bridge, and his own city (Rome) "was ſecured from the attempts of the enemy; "whereas Capiſucchi plunging into the ſtream at the "beginning of the danger, drove the enemy from a "place belonging to a foreign Nation: an exploit "which has been thought worthy of being recorded in "the Pontifical Bulls." He cites in the margin a Bull of Pope Pius V dated the 10th of May 1567. He does not mark the year exactly, ſince the ſiege did not happen till two years after; but that is the leaſt error. He declares, that the bridge was broken down tho' the beſiegers let fly their ſmall-ſhot, and were already got upon it, in order to enter the city. This has more the air of an Orator than of an Hiſtorian, ſince Davila relates the contrary.

(2) Strada, de Bello Belg. Dec. II. lib. 5. pag. m. 305.

[C] The Duke of Parma ſent him to ſuccour Colen.. he ſignalized himſelf in that Country.] Blaſio Capiſucco mandavit ut cum ſua lancearium turma... per Agrippinenſem Provinciam ac præcipuè per Bonnenſem agrum infeſtis ſignis excurreret,... quod ille prævia ſui fama quæ multa per eos Rheni tractus, ſtrenuè ac feliciter peregit, &c (3). i. e. "He commanded Blaſius Capi"ſucchi to march his company of pikemen into the "territory of Colen, and that of Bon, and to com"mit hoſtilities, eſpecially in the latter.... This he "performed with prodigious bravery and ſucceſs, by "the great fame he had before acquired in the Coun"tries lying about the Rhine."

(3) Strada, de Bello Belg. Dec. II. lib. 5. pag. m. 301.

[D] He had a brother called Camillo.] This CAMILLO CAPISUCCHI, Marquis of Puy-Catin, was a famous Warrior in the ſixteenth Century. He gave ſeveral proofs of his valour at the famous battle of Lepanto, which occaſioned Don John of Auſtria, two years after, to give him the command of four hundred Gentlemen on board his ſhip, at the expedition of Tunis (4). He often ſignalized himſelf in the wars of the Low-Countries, where the Duke of Parma gave him a regiment of foot in 1584 (5). After ſeveral Campaigns in ſo inſtructive a ſchool, he was raiſed to the command of the Pope's forces, which he did with great reputation in Hungary; where he died in the beginning of November 1597, of a ſickneſs he had got by endeavouring ſtrenuouſly to prevent the breaking down of a bridge ſituated on the Danube. He was then in his ſixtieth year. He underſtood perfectly the Mathematicks and Fortifications; and wrote a work de Officio Præfecti Caſtrorum; which his heirs have ſtill in manuſcript. In the Archives of the Vatican ſeveral of his Letters are kept, written by him to Cardinal Aldobrandini nephew of Pope Clement VIII. His monument and epitaph are at Vienna in the Church of Sainte Croix (6). The exploits he performed in France under the Duke of Parma, are written very much at large by William Dondini the Jeſuit; in the Hiſtory of the Expeditions which that Duke was ordered to undertake, in favour of the League.

(4) Idem, ad ann. 1584.

(5) Idem Strada, paſſim.

(6) See the Bibliotb. Romana of Proſper Mandoſio.

CAPISUCCHI (JOHN ANTHONY) Cardinal of St. Pancratius, and afterwards of Santa Croce or the Holy Croſs of Jeruſalem, and laſtly of St. Clement, roſe by degrees to the Purple or Cardinalate. He was a Canon of the Vatican, and afterwards Auditor of the Rota under Pope Paul III. He was created Cardinal and Biſhop of Lando, by Paul IV; who alſo gave him an employment in the Inquiſition. He was Prefect of the ſignature of Grants under Pius V, and Governor of Gualdo, and the Pope's Legate. He died January the 29th, 1569, in his 54th year. He publiſhed Conſtitutions for his Dioceſe, and a Synod (a).

(a) Ex Bib. Rom. Proſperi Mandoſii.

CAPISUCCHI (PAUL) became famous in the ſixteenth Century for ſeveral employments he enjoyed, and negotiations performed by him. He was a Canon of the Vatican, Referendary of both ſignatures, Auditor of the Rota, Biſhop of Neocaſtro, Vicar-General of Clement VII and of Paul III, Prefect of the Signature of Grants, and Vice-Legate of Umbria. He pacified the diviſions which had broke out in Perugia, and again reduc'd this City to the allegiance it owed the Pope. He was as fortunate at Avignon under Paul III, ſince by his wiſdom and authority he cruſhed the ſeveral Factions which divided that State, and diſpoſed all the inhabitants of it to peace and fidelity. It was he whom Clement VII appointed to examine and report the important and critical affair of Henry VIIIth's divorce. He was at that time Dean of the Rota (a); and we find by the

(a) Palavic. Iſtor. del Concil. lib. 2. cap. 17.

the volume of his Deciſions, that he did not favour the King of England's deſign; ſince he declares in two of his Deciſions, that Henry had incurred the Pope's cenſures, for divorcing Katherine of Arragon, and marrying another woman, in ſpite of the prohibitions of the Holy See; and that Queen Katherine ought to be reſtored to her former dignity. He publiſhed ſeveral very uſeful Conſtitutions concerning the Troubles of Perugia and Avignon, in the Government of which he was Vice-Legate, and the Clerks of his Dioceſe. He died at Rome anno 1539 at ſixty years of age, and was buried in the vault belonging to his family by John Anthony Capiſucchi his nephew, Cardinal of St. Prancratius mentioned above (b).

(b) Ex Biblioth. Romana Proſperi Mandoſii.

CAPISUCCHI (RAYMUND) raiſed to the Purple by Pope Innocent XI, the firſt of September 1681, was ſon to Paul Capiſucchi, Marquis of Puy Catin. At fourteen years old he entered among the Dominicans, and afterwards taught Philoſophy publickly in Rome. Innocent X appointed him Secretary to the Congregation of the Index, and ſoon after to that of the Examination of Biſhops; and in 1654 created him Maſter of the Sacred Palace (a). Raymund Capiſucchi wrote ſeveral works [A].

(a) Extracted from Proſper. Mandoſii, Bibl. Rom. Centur. V. pag. 299, 300.

Alexander the VIIth removed him from the employment of Maſter of the Holy Palace, as I have obſerved elſewhere (b); and it was thought that his diſgrace would be attended with more dangerous conſequences. However this ſtorm blew over; the Pope acknowledged his innocence (c), and offered him a Biſhoprick; but finding that Capiſucchi choſe to live a conventual life, rather than be made a Biſhop, he raiſed him to the ſecond employment, both as to honour and authority among the Dominicans.

(b) In Note [C] of the Article (Vincent) BARON.

(c) See Father Baron, Apologet. tom. 2. lib. 5. pag. 343, & ſeq.

[A] Raymund Capiſucchi wrote ſeveral Works.] Here follow the titles of them. Controverſiæ Theologicæ, Scholaſticæ, Morales, Dogmaticæ, Scripturales, ad mentem Divi Thomæ Aquinatis reſolutæ. There is a ſecond edition of them reviſed and enlarged by the Author. Appendices ad Controverſias ſupradictas. Vita beati Joannis Chiſii. Cenſura ſeu Votum ad Librum de Cultu & Veneratione Sanctorum Veteris Teſtamenti. Diſcurſus de gradu virtutum in Sanctis canonizandis requiſito. The Bibliotheca Romana of Proſper Mandoſius, whence what I have here given is extracted, gives a liſt of ſeveral works of this Author which were ready for the preſs. There is one piece de Contritione & Attritione; and another de Opinione probabili. Some Controverſial Writers have obſerved, that Father Capiſucchi had approved the expoſition of the Biſhop of Condom, tho' it contained opinions different from thoſe of the Approver. See l'Examen des Methodes propoſées par Meſſieurs de l'Aſſemblée du Clergé de France en l'année 1682 (1).

(1) Mr. Baſnage who was at that time Miniſter in Roan, and has been ſo at Rotterdam ever ſince the year 1685, is Author of that excellent Work. It was printed at Rotterdam in 1684 for Henry de Graef, tho' the title ſays, à Cologne, chez Pierre Marteau. Capiſucchi's Extracts are in pag. 313, 315.

CAPPADOCIA, a country of Aſia, ſituate between Cilicia, Armenia, Colchis, the Euxine Sea, Paphlagonia, Galatia, &c. (a), was ſucceſſively divided in ſeveral manners. Ariarathes, who was the firſt King of it [A], reunited the Cataones and the Cappadocians. The Perſians divided this Kingdom into two Satrapies. The Macedonians preſerved this diviſion [B], and partly by force, and partly by conſent, ſuffered them to be converted into two Kingdoms, of which the one was called Cappadocia ſimply, or Great Cappadocia,

(a) Strabo, lib. 12. init.

(1) Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 368.

[A] Ariarathes . . . was the firſt King of it.] Strabo, who ſays this (1), does not tell us when this ſame Ariarathes lived, and we find in Diodorus Siculus ſome room to doubt whether the firſt King of Cappadocia was ſo named. We find there that Atoſſa, the ſiſter of Cambyſes the father of Cyrus, was wife to Pharnaces King of Cappadocia, and that ſhe bore him a ſon who was named Gallus (2). This laſt was father of Smerdis, and grandfather of Artames, and great grandfather of Anaphas, who left a ſon of the ſame name, who was father of a very brave Prince named Datames. He, being ſlain in battle by the Perſians, left the Kingdom to his ſon Ariamnes, who poſſeſſed it fifty years, and had two ſons, Ariarathes and Holophernes. They both reigned in Cappadocia, and loved one another tenderly. ARIARATHES, having joined the Perſians in the expedition againſt Egypt, acquired a great deal of glory there, and returned home loaded with honours by King Ochus. He left two ſons, ARIARATHES and Aryſas. The eldeſt ſucceeded his uncle Holophernes, who having no children of his own had adopted him. Here are, therefore, a great many Princes who reigned in Cappadocia before Ariarathes the firſt of that name. Moreri, who places but ſix between Pharnaces and him (3), has not reckoned right; and ſince he ſays their names are not known, it is plain he had not read Diodorus Siculus. I do not know whether Appian had read him, or whether he judged him unworthy of credit; but I know well enough that he declares he cannot tell for certain whether Cappadocia had particular Kings before the time of Alexander, or whether it was a Province of the Perſian Monarchy (4).

(2) Diodorus Siculus, in Eclogis, lib. 31. pag. m. 1164.

(3) Moreri, at the Word Cappadoce.

(4) Appianus, in Mithridaticis, pag. m. 117.

[B] The Perſians divided this Kingdom into two Satrapies. The Macedonians preſerved this diviſion.] It is Strabo who ſays this (5). But we have juſt now heard Diodorus Siculus, who ſpeaks of Cappadocia as of a country governed by a ſingle King independent of Perſia. I acknowledge he ſays that Anaphas had ſo much courage that he rather choſe to abandon the government of Cappadocia, than to pay a tribute to the Perſians; and I believe, at the bottom, that the Kings of Cappadocia were tributary to thoſe of Perſia; but however he does not ſpeak of that kind of dependance; he ſays nothing which inſinuates that Cappadocia contained any Satrapies of the Perſian Monarchy, and he ſays all that is neceſſary to induce one to be of another opinion. Let us proceed to the other part of this remark. He obſerves that Ariarathes King of Cappadocia had maintained himſelf in the poſſeſſion of his Dominions while Alexander ſubdued Perſia, and employed himſelf in other expeditions which prevented his thinking of him (6). Quintus Curtius notwithſtanding ſays that Conqueror made himſelf Maſter of Cappadocia, and that he left a Governor there, when he departed thence in queſt of Darius (7). But it muſt be ſuppoſed that Governor did not maintain himſelf there long; for we read in the ſame Q. Curtius that after the death of Alexander, Eumenes was charged with the defence of Cappadocia ſo far as Trapezus, and to make war againſt Ariarathes who was the only perſon who refuſed to ſubmit. Et bellum cum Ariarathe gereret: ſolus hic detrectabat imperium (8). Appian thinks it probable that Alexander left the Cappadocians under the government of their own Princes, in conſideration of a certain tribute (9). He adds that the Hiſtorian Hieronymus ſays that Conqueror did not ſo much as enter into the Country. Mithridates, in his harangues, boldly aſſerted that Cappadocia was one of thoſe parts of Aſia which neither Alexander nor his ſucceſſors had touched (10). However that be, let us reſume the thread of Diodorus Siculus's narration.

(5) Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 368.

(6) Diodor. Sic. lib. 18. pag. 920.

(7) Quint. Curtius, lib. 3. cap. 4.

(8) Idem, lib. 10. cap. 10. See Freinſhemius on this paſſage; he ſhews that we ſhould read Ariarathe, and not Arbate.

(9) Appianus in Mithridat. pag. 117.

(10) Juſtinus, lib. 38. cap. 7. pag. m. 560.

After Alexander's death, his ſucceſſors would not ſuffer Cappadocia to be free from the Macedonian yoke. Perdiccas entred it with a great army, and found Ariarathes prepared to defend himſelf, having thirty thouſand foot, and fifteen thouſand horſe. A battle was Cappadocia, and the other was called Pontus, or Cappadocia Pontica (b). Great Cappadocia was divided into ten Provinces, and continued ſo in Strabo's time, and under King Archelaüs, after whom it was reduced into a Province of the Roman Empire (c). This country abounded in horſes, aſſes, and mules (d), and it is even ſaid that the mules there were not barren (e). It was from thence they had thoſe horſes which were ſo peculiarly deſtined for the Emperor's own perſon, that the Conſuls themſelves were forbidden to make uſe of them (f). It alſo furniſhed a great number of ſlaves [C], falſe witneſſes, and tranſparent ſtones [D]; but money was very ſcarce there [E]: they made excellent bread there (g), and the beſt Bakers in the world were thoſe of this country (h). The Romans, when they granted their friendſhip to thoſe who reigned

(b) Idem, ibid. pag. 368.

(c) Idem, ibid. pag. 367 & 368.

(d) Lloyd cites ſeveral Authors for this. See alſo Bochart's Phaleg, Book 3. chap. 11.

(e) Theophraſtus vulgo parere (mulas) in Cappadociâ tradit, ſed eſſe id animal ibi ſui generis. Plin. lib. 8. cap. 44. pag. m. 216.

(f) Bochart. Phaleg, lib. 3. cap. 11.

(g) Athen. lib. 3. pag. 113.

(h) Idem, ibid. pag. 112.

was fought: Perdiccas gained it: Ariarathes was taken priſoner, and crucified with ſeveral others; and the government of Cappadocia was given to Eumenes. Let us take notice here of a fault of Juſtin's. He ſays that Perdiccas's victory over Ariarathes brought no advantage to the conqueror, becauſe the vanquiſhed retired into the city, killed their wives and children, burned their houſes, and threw themſelves into the midſt of the flames (11). He confounds things. What he relates paſſed in Piſidia, at the ſiege of Iſaura, after Cappadocia had been reduced to obedience by the defeat and execution of Ariarathes (12). We ſhall ſee below (13) that the Macedonians kept this country but a very little while.

(11) Ibid. lib. 12. cap. 6.

(12) See Diodorus Sicul. lib. 18. cap. 22. pag. 926. and the Juſtin Variorum of Grævius, pag. 309.

(13) In the Remark [I].

[C] This country . . . furniſhed . . . a great number of ſlaves.] This appears from the following words of Cicero: Cappadocem modo abreptum de grege venalium diceres; i. e. "You would take him for a Cappadocian juſt bought in the Slave-market (14);" and by this paſſage of Perſius:

(14) Cicero, in Orat. poſt reditum in Senatu, folio 170. A.

Vende animam lucro, mercare, atque excute ſollers
Omne latus mundi, ne ſit præſtantior alter
Cappadocas rigida pingues plauſiſſe cataſta (15).

That is,

"Go, miſer, go, for lucre ſell thy ſoul,
"Truck wares for wares, and trudge from pole
" to pole:
"That men may ſay, when thou art dead and gone,
"See what a vaſt eſtate he left his ſon!
"How large a family of brawny knaves,
"Well-fed, and fat as Cappadocian ſlaves!

Dryden.

(15) Perſius, Sat. 6. ſub fin.

Hither may be referred what Horace ſays, that the King of Cappadocia was deſtitute of money tho' very rich in ſlaves:

Mancipiis locuples eget æris Cappadocum rex (16).

(16) Horat. Epiſt. 6. lib. 1. ver. 39.

Mr. Dacier obſerves, that when Lucullus was in Cappadocia, an ox was ſold but for . . . ſix pence, and a man for no more than four and twenty pence (17). Take notice that the ſlaves of this country, thoſe of Cilicia, and thoſe of Crete, paſſed for ſad raſcals, and occaſioned the proverb tria cappa peſſima. See the Prolufions of Famianus Strada (18).

(17) Dacier, on this paſſage of Horace, tom. 8. pag. m. 327.

(18) Lib. 3. Plautina II, pag. m. 485.

[D] . . . And of falſe witneſſes, and tranſparent ſtones.] It is ſaid the Cappadocians accuſtomed themſelves from their infancy to indure pain, and that they tortured one another to harden themſelves againſt the puniſhments to which their falſe teſtimonies might one day expoſe them, and alſo to raiſe the price of their perjuries in proportion to the degree of conſtancy they had acquired. This is the ſenſe which I give the following words of the Scholiaſt on Perſius: Vel quia Cappadoces dicerenter habere ſtudium naturale ad falſa teſtimonia proferenda: qui nutriti in tormentis a pueritia equuleum ſibi facere dicuntur, ut in eo ſe invicem torqueant, & cum in pœna perdurarent, ad falſa teſtimonia ſe bene venundarent (19). Theſe people out-did the Grecian Nation, tho' they were exceedingly addicted to this vice, if we may believe Cicero, who attributes to them the having given occaſion to that way of ſpeaking, Lend me your teſtimony, and I will return it you. He expreſſes the ill qualities of the Grecian Witneſſes ſo eloquently, that I cannot forbear preſenting that fine deſcription to be read here. Hoc dico de toto genere Græcorum; tribuo illis literas, do multarum artium diſciplinam, non adimo ſermonis leporem, ingeniorum acumen, dicendi copiam: denique etiam ſi qua ſibi alia ſumunt, non repugno. Teſtimoniorum religionem, & fidem, nunquam iſta natio coluit: totiuſque hujuſce rei quæ ſit vis, quæ autoritas, quod pondus, ignorant. Unde illud eſt? Da mihi teſtimonium mutuum: num Gallorum? num Hiſpanorum putatur? totum iſtud Græcorum eſt: ut etiam qui Græcè neſciunt, hoc quibus verbis a Græcis dici ſoleat, ſciant. Itaque videte quo vultu, qua confidentia dicant: tum intelligetis qua religione dicant. Nunquam nobis ad rogatum reſpondent, ſemper accuſatori plus quàm ad rogatum: nunquam laborant, quemadmodum probent quod dicunt; ſed quemadmodum ſe explicent dicendo. . . . Græcus teſtis cum ea voluntate proceſſit, ut lædat, non jurisjurandi, ſed lædendi verba meditatur. Vinci, refelli, coargui putat eſſe turpiſſimum; ad id ſe parat, nihil aliud curat. Itaque non optimus quiſque, nec graviſſimus, ſed impudentiſſimus loquaciſſimuſque deligitur. i. e. "This I ſay of the whole Grecian race: "I allow them to have learning, I grant them to be "ſkilful in ſeveral arts, I deny them neither delicacy "of ſpeech, ſharpneſs of wit, nor copiouſneſs of expreſſion: and, to ſay no more, whatever other valuable "qualifications they may aſſume to themſelves, I will "not diſpute. But the ſacred obligation of an oath, "and ſincerity in giving evidence, has this Nation "never regarded; being utterly ignorant what force, "what authority, what weight there is in this matter. Whence is that ſaying, Lend me your teſtimony? Is it thought to owe its original to the Gauls, "or to the Spaniards? it is wholly from the Grecians; "ſo that even they who underſtand not Greek, know "in what words this is uſually expreſſed by them. "Therefore obſerve with what countenance, with "what aſſurance they ſpeak: ſo ſhall ye perceive with "what regard to truth they ſpeak. They never return us an anſwer to what is aſked, but always anſwer the accuſer more than the queſtion: they never trouble themſelves how to make out what they "ſay, but how to expreſs themſelves in ſpeaking. . . . "A Grecian Witneſs, when he appears with intent to "do miſchief, conſiders not the words of his oath, "but thoſe which may be miſchievous. To be foiled, "to be refuted, to be convinced, he thinks moſt ignominious; this he prepares againſt, and cares for "nothing elſe. So that not the beſt man, or the "graveſt, but the moſt impudent and loquacious is "pitched upon (20)." This brings to my mind certain ſtories which I have heard a hundred times, that there is a Province in France (21) where the Gentlemen write to one another, I deſire you to lend me your witneſſes for a few days, and where people are to be met with who when they are aſked, What trade are you of? anſwer, Sir, I am a witneſs at your ſervice.

(19) Schol. Perſii in hæc verba Sat. 6. ver. 77. Cappadocas rigida pingues plauſiſſe cataſta.

(20) Cicero, Orat. pro L. Flacco, circa init. fol. m. 150, A.

(21) See the Treatiſe of Mr. de Brieux on the Original of certain Proverbs.

As to the tranſparent ſtones which were found in Cappadocia, I ſhall only cite Pliny. Hiſpania hunc (ſpecularem lapidem) olim citerior tantum dabat, nec tota, ſed intra centum millia paſſuum circa Segobricam urbem: jam & Cypros & Cappadocia, & Sicilia, & nuper inventum Africa: poſtferendos omnes tamen Hiſpaniæ & Cappadociæ, molliſſimis, & ampliſſimæ magnitudinis, ſed obſcuris. i. e. "This ſtone" (he ſpeaks of the Lapis ſpecularis or Talc) "formerly the hither "Spain alone furniſhed, and not the whole country "neither, but only that which lies within an hundred "miles round the city Segobrica: at preſent it is alſo "had from Cyprus, Cappadocia, and Sicily, and "from Africa where it has been lately found out: "yet they are all inferior to thoſe of Spain and Cappadocia, which are very ſoft, and exceeding large, "but obſcure (22)." He adds that in the reign of Nero there was diſcovered in Cappadocia a ſort of ſtone hard as marble, white and tranſparent (23), which they called Phengites. Nero made great uſe of it in his buildings (24); and Domitian, fearing conſpiracies, and deſirous of ſeeing what was done behind him, cauſed the galleries where he uſed to walk to be ſet round with it (25).

(22) Plin. lib. 36. cap. 12. pag. 331.

(23) Tranſlucent etiam quæ partes fulvæ incidurant venæ. Plin. lib. 36. cap. 22. pag. 332.

(24) Idem, ibid.

(25) Sueton. in Domit. cap. 14.

[E] Money was very ſcarce there.] The verſe of Horace reigned in Cappadocia, comprehended the inhabitants therein [F], I mean they received the King and the People jointly into their alliance. They did not act in the same manner with regard to the Kings of other Nations; for they declared them their friends, without making any mention of the People (i). This might induce one to believe that the inhabitants of Cappadocia lived under a mixed Government, partly Aristocratical, and partly Monarchical; but I have some difficulty to be persuaded of it. What is very certain is that they could not live without a King [G]. There were a great many Magi in their country, and a great many places of devotion [H]. It must not be concluded from hence that this is peculiar to rude, ignorant, and brutish Nations; for, in matter of superstition, they equalled neither the Greeks nor the Romans, and there are some Nations in the world, which are barbarous and stupid to such a degree, as to have no Religion at all. We shall see in the Remarks part of the History of the Princes who have reigned in Cappadocia [I]. They usually resided at Mazaca (k), a city situated under the mountain

(i) Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 372.

(k) Idem, ibid. pag. 371.

Horace which has been quoted above (26), is a proof of this. Mr. Dacier fortifies it from the cheapness of oxen and men, and by saying that the Cappadocians paid their tribute to the great King in horses and mules (27). He forgets not Cicero, who speaking of Cappadocia, and its King Ariobarzanes, says, Mehercule ego ita judico, nihil illo regno spoliatius, nihil rege egentius. i. e. "I am really persuaded there is nothing "more destitute of money than that Kingdom, nothing "poorer than its King (28)." Cicero was then Governour of Cilicia. He observed that Ariobarzanes was too much loaded with debts to be able to pay Brutus and Pompey both at once. He paid every month to the agents of the latter thirty three Attic talents, and this was not sufficient to discharge the interest. He was obliged to impose taxes, which he did by the direction of Appius (†); for he had no ordinary revenues; and he exhausted what was brought in by those taxes in such a manner, that he could pay nothing to his other creditors (29). Alii neque solvit quicquam nec potest solvere: nullum enim erarium, nullum vectigal habet. Appii (30) instituto tributa imperat, ea vix in fœnus Pompeii quod satis sit efficiunt (31). Though he was very poor (32), yet at length he paid near one hundred talents to Brutus in one year, and he promised to pay two hundred to Pompey at the end of six months (33).

(26) Citation (16).

(27) Dacier, Rem. sur Horace, tom. 8. pag. 327.

(28) Cicero, Epist. I. lib. 6. ad Atticum, pag. 569.

(†) See Citation (30).

(29) Idem, ibid.

(30) It was he who had governed Cilicia before Cicero.

(31) Cicero, Epist. 1. lib. 6. ad Atticum, pag. 569.

(32) Erat enim rex perpauper. Idem, ibid. Epist. 3. pag. 612.

(33) Idem, ibid. pag. 613.

[F] The Romans, when they granted their friendship to those who reigned in Cappadocia, comprehended the inhabitants therein.] The first King of Cappadocia who had the advantage of being declared a friend of the Roman people, had followed the party of Antiochus King of Syria. He asked pardon of the Commonwealth for it after that Monarch's defeat, and offered to expiate his fault by a sum of money. He was condemned to pay two hundred talents; but at the intreaty of Eumenes King of Pergamus his son-in-law, he obtained a considerable abatement; he got off for half that sum, and was admitted into the friendship of the Romans. Legati . . . . ab Ariarathe rege Cappadocum venerunt ad veniam petendam tuendamque pecunia noxam quod auxiliis Antiochum juvisset. Ei CC talenta argenti sunt imperata . . . . (34). Ariarathes rex parte dimidia pecuniæ imperatæ Eumenis beneficio, cui desponderat per eos dies filiam, remissa, in amicitiam est acceptus (35). After that time, he faithfully followed their party with his son-in-law. See the margin, you will there find his dispositions in the war which they made on the last King of Macedon (36).

(34) T. Livius, lib. 38. pag. m. 732.

(35) Idem, ibid. pag. 733.

(36) Ariarathes Cappadocum rex, præterquam quod Romanis suo nomine auxilia pollicitus erat, ex quo est junctus Eumeni affinitate in omnia belli pacisque se consociaverat consilia. T. Livius, lib. 42. pag. 820.

[G] . . . They could not live without a King.] The Royal Family being extinct, they refused the permission, which the Roman People would have given them, to be free, and sent Embassadors to Rome, to declare that liberty was insupportable to them, and to ask a King. Προσδευσάμενοι τὴν μὲν ἐλευθερίαν παρητοῦντο, οὐ γὰρ δύνασθαι φέρειν αὐτὴν ἔφασαν. βασιλέα δ' αἰτοῦσιν αὐτοῖς ἀποδοθῆναι. Missis legatis libertatem repudiaverunt ut quam sibi dicerent esse intolerabilem, regem sibi dari postulaverunt (37). The Romans were surprized at such a taste, and gave them leave to confer the Kingdom on whom they should think good. They chose Ariobarzanes, whose posterity failed in the third generation: after which Archelaüs, who was not at all related to that family, was created their King by Mark Antony (38). It is of them that one might say, O homines ad servitutem natos! i. e. O men born to slavery! After all, it is plain that a Monarchy was fitter for them than a Commonwealth: a certain turn of mind is necessary not to abuse liberty, and all people have not that turn. Observe that Justin assures us it was the Roman Senate who chose Ariobarzanes. Cappadoces munus libertatis abnuentes, negant vivere gentem sine Rege posse, atque ita Rex illis a Senatu Ariobarzanes constituitur (39). Mithridates maintained that the Romans granted the Cappadocians their liberty, only to affront him; he added, that they opposed the desires of the people who asked Gordius for their King, for no other reason than because Gordius was his friend. Libertatem etiam in contumeliam sui à Senatu ultro delatam Cappadociæ quam reliquis gentibus abstulerunt: deinde populos Cappadocum pro libertate oblatâ Gordium Regem orantes ideo tantum quoniam amicus suus esset, non obtinuisse (40). He is in this point less unworthy of credit than Strabo; for what likelihood is there that the Romans left the election of a King to the discretion of the Cappadocians at such a conjuncture?

(37) Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 372.

(38) Extracted from Strabo, ibid.

(39) Justinus, lib. 38. cap. 2.

(40) Idem, ibid. cap. 5. pag. 557.

[H] There were a great many Magi, and a great many places of devotion.] A Parenthesis of Strabo furnishes us with a proof of it. Ἐν ᾗ τῇ Καππαδοκίᾳ (πολὺ γάρ ἐστι τὸ τῶν μάγων φῦλον, οἱ καὶ Πύραιθοι καλοῦνται. πολλὰ δὲ καὶ τῶν Περσικῶν Θεῶν ἱερά) οὐδὲ μαχαίρᾳ θύουσι, ἀλλὰ κορμῷ τινὶ ὡς ἂν ὑπέρῳ τύπτοντες. In Cappadocia (etenim maxima est ibi magorum multitudo qui Pyræthi vocantur, & multa Persicorum Deorum templa) non cultro sed stipite quodam mactant tanquam malleo verberantes. i. e. "In Cappadocia (for there are "great numbers of Magi, who are called Pyræthi, "and many temples of the Persian Gods) they do not "kill their sacrifices with a knife, but knock them "down with a club, as with a mallet (41)." I have elsewhere (42) spoken of the devotion of the Cappadocians for the Bellona of Comana, and for the Diana of Castabala (43). Let us say here that they had a Priesthood of Jupiter in a place called Dacia, which was very famous (44). The Temple of Apollo at Cataone was had in veneration throughout all Cappadocia: the image which was seen in that place was an original from whence many copies were taken for the other cities (45). The Jupiter of the Venasians scarce yielded to the Bellona of Comana: his Temple was situated in a fertile place, which brought the Chief Priest a yearly revenue of fifteen talents. This office was for life. There were full three thousand persons destined for the service of that God, and maintained in his Temple (46). Plutarch observes that the Romans had learned of the Cappadocians the worship of a Goddess which was the Moon, or Minerva, or Bellona (47). Add to all this what Maximus Tyrius says, that a Mountain was the God, the oath, and the statue of the Cappadocians: Ὄρος Καππαδόκαις καὶ θεὸς καὶ ὅρκος καὶ ἄγαλμα: Mons Cappadocibus & Deus & jusjurandum est & statua (48). If he meant to say they had no other God than a mountain, he was very much mistaken.

(41) Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 504.

(42) In the Article COMANA.

(43) See the Remark [A] of the Article COMANA, at the end.

(44) Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 369.

(45) Idem, ibid. pag. 370.

(46) Idem, ibid.

(47) Plut. in Sylla, pag. 457. B.

(48) Maxim. Tyrius, Orat. 38. pag. m. 385.

You will find in a work of Buonarotti that Mount Argæus was the Symbol of the city of Cæsarea in Cappadocia in all her medals (49), and that the height of that Mountain rendered it almost inaccessible; which induced the people of the neighbourhood, and particularly those of Cæsarea, to adore it as a kind of Deity. See also the 892d page of Baron Spanheim's Dissertation de præstantia & usu Numismatum.

(49) Hist. des Ouvrages des Savans, Sept. 1700, pag. 393. in the Extract of the Osservationi istoriche sopra alcuni Medaglioni antichi.

[I] Here is part of the History of the Princes who reigned in Cappadocia.] Let us finish what we began in the preceding Remarks.

I. We have conducted the Reader to the time of Perdiccas, who, after the death of Alexander, again reduced Cappadocia under the Macedonian yoak. We have seen that he made ARIARATHES expire on a cross.

mountain Argæus, and which followed the Laws of Charondas explained by a Singer, who was choſen for that function (l). This city was built on the river Melas, which diſcharges itſelf into the Euphrates. A King of Cappadocia having ſtopped up the mouth of this river drowned all the adjacent country, after which he made ſeveral Iſlands there in imitation of the Cyclades. He there ſpent one part of his life in a childiſh manner (m); but theſe amuſements occaſioned him diſgrace and detriment. The river broke down the dams made at its mouth; the waters returned into their channel, and the Euphrates having received them overflowed, and made incredible devaſtation in Cappadocia. The Galatians, who inhabited Phrygia, ſuffered a great many loſſes by this inundation, croſs. That unfortunate Prince left a ſon named, like him, ARIARATHES, who eſcaped into Armenia, and recovered the Kingdom ſome time after; for ſo ſoon as he knew of the death of Perdiccas, and that of Eumenes, and of the employment which other wars gave to Antigonus and Seleucus, he entered Cappadocia with the troops which Ardoates King of Armenia furniſhed him with; he defeated Amyntas the General of the Macedonians, killed him, and drove them out of the country. He left the Kingdom to ARIARATHES his eldeſt ſon, who made an alliance with the King of Syria Antiochus Theos; for he married Ariarathes his eldeſt ſon to Stratonice the daughter of that Antiochus. He had ſo great an affection for his ſon, that he admitted him a partner in his throne. ARIARATHES having reigned alone after his father's death, left his Dominions when he died to his ſon ARIARATHES, who was yet very young. This laſt married Antiochis the daughter of Antiochus the Great (50), a ſubtle woman, who finding herſelf barren, had recourſe to a ſuppoſititious birth. She made her huſband believe ſhe had had two boys, which were named one Ariarathes, and the other Holophernes. Her ſterility was removed ſome time after: ſhe had two daughters, and afterwards a ſon, who was named Mithridates. She confeſſed the fraud to her huſband, and procured the eldeſt of thoſe ſuppoſed ſons to be maintained at Rome with few attendants, and the other of them to be ſent into Ionia. The legitimate ſon took the name of ARIARATHES, and was educated after the Grecian manner. His father, who was ſingularly beloved by him, deſirous of giving him ſenſible proofs of his reciprocal affection, would ſurrender his whole Kingdom to him; but the ſon oppoſed it, and repreſented to him that the ordinary courſe required he ſhould not reign during the life of thoſe who had given him birth. He reigned after his father's death, and was a very honeſt and worthy man: he addicted himſelf much to the ſtudy of Philoſophy, which made Cappadocia, unknown before that time to the Greeks, become the agreeable reſidence of ſeveral learned men (51). This is what we find in the fragments of Diodorus Siculus.

(l) Αἰρέμενοι καὶ νομωδὸν ὃς ἐστιν αὐτοῖς ἐξηγητὴς τῶν νόμων καθάπερ οἱ παρὰ Ῥωμαίοις νομικοί. Legum decantatorem deligunt, qui ipſis eſt legum interpres ut Romanorum ſunt juriſconſulti. Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 371.

(m) Διατρίβει ἐν αὐτοῖς παιδικῶς μειρακιώδως. Puerilem ibi in morem vitæ partem exegit. Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 371.

(50) Appian, in Syriacis, pag. m. 59. obſerves that Antiochus gave his daughter Antiochis in marriage to Ariarathes King of Cappadocia, when he prepared himſelf for the war againſt the Romans. This therefore was about the year of Rome 560.

(51) Extracted from Diodorus Siculus, in Eclogis, lib. 31. pag. m. 1164, 1165.

II. There are other fragments of the ſame Hiſtorian, which inform us, that Orofernes expelled his brother ARIARATHES from the Kingdom of Cappadocia, and after that act of violence reigned in a tyrannical manner. He put ſeveral perſons to death, he committed a hundred extorſions, he confiſcated the eſtates of the greateſt Lords, and even pillaged a Temple of Jupiter, which from time immemorial had been out of the reach of ſuch attempts, and was ſituate at the foot of the mountain Ariadne (52). We learn from Polybius, that Attalus King of Pergamus re-eſtabliſhed Ariarathes on the throne of Cappadocia (53), and encouraged him to demand back from the inhabitants of Priene the four hundred talents which Orofernes had intruſted with them, and to lay waſte their lands, becauſe they would not part with that ſum (54). In effect, they actually kept it, and returned it to Orofernes; but this fidelity expoſed them to ineſtimable damage (55). Obſerve that Attalus, who reſtored Ariarathes, was brother to Eumenes, and that it was the firſt action of his reign (56). This gives us ſome lights in point of Chronology; for we know the aforeſaid Eumenes died in the year of Rome 596, and that Attalus reigned after him. It would not be reaſonable therefore to ſuppoſe that the two brothers Ariarathes and Orofernes were the ſons of Ariarathes the Philoſopher, whoſe mother was daughter to Antiochus the Great who died in the year 567 of the foundation of Rome (57); for, ſince that daughter of Antiochus did not eſpouſe the King of Cappadocia till about the year 560 (58), it is not poſſible that about the year 597 her ſon's ſons ſhould be men grown as they are repreſented to us. She had not theſe two daughters till after a barrenneſs which had induced her to ſuppoſe two boys (59). How then could her ſon be the father of an Ariarathes, and of an Orofernes, who before the end of the VIth Century of Rome acted what is read of them in Hiſtory?

(52) Diodor. Sic. in Excerptis a Valeſio publicatis, pag. 335, 336.

(53) Polybius, in Excerptis à Valeſio editis, pag. 168.

(54) Idem, ibid. pag. 172.

(55) Idem, ibid.

(56) Idem, pag. 168.

(57) Calviſius, ad ann. Mundi 3764, pag. m. 302.

(58) See Appian in Syriacis, circa init. pag. m. 59.

(59) Diodor. Sicul. in Eclog. lib. 31. pag. 1165.

III. We learn from Juſtin, that Demetrius King of Syria undertook to reſtore Orofernes. He had a ſiſter whom Ariarathes had refuſed to marry, and for that reaſon he bore that King of Cappadocia a great deal of ill will. Demetrius . . . . Ariarathi regi Cappadociæ propter faſtiditas ſororis nuptias infeſtus, fratrem ejus Orofernem per injuriam regno pulſum ſupplicem recepit (60). He gladly hearkened therefore to the requeſt which Orofernes made him to reinſtate him in the throne, from which his brother had unjuſtly driven him: but when he diſcovered that this Orofernes ſought to dethrone him, he cauſed him to be impriſoned; and if he had not been afraid that by killing him he ſhould free Ariarathes from the apprehenſions of a fraternal war, he would not have been ſatisfied with impriſoning of him, but would have put him to death without remiſſion. Take notice that the beginning of his reign anſwers to the year of Rome 592; it muſt be ſuppoſed therefore that he had reigned four or five years when he granted a retreat to Orofernes, and engaged to reſtore him. He actually did reſtore him, if we believe Appian (61), and expelled Ariarathes; which did not pleaſe the Roman people, who had rather the two brothers ſhould have reigned together. Juſtin does not at all agree with Appian; for he places Ariarathes among the Princes who ſet up a ſuppoſititious ſon of Antiochus, and ſupported him ſo vigorouſly that Demetrius loſt his crown and life by that intrigue (62). But both theſe Hiſtorians are in the right in one ſenſe, for Polybius aſſures us that Demetrius expelled Ariarathes by the reſtoration of Orofernes, and afterwards Orofernes by the reſtoration of Ariarathes (63). However it be, I imagine this Ariarathes to be the ſame with him who loſt his life in the war againſt Ariſtonicus, in ſupport of the Roman cauſe. That war was ended in the year 623 (64). I am alſo of opinion that he ought not to be diſtinguiſhed from Ariarathes the Philoſopher, or if he ought, we muſt ſay, that after the death of that Monarch, the favourer of learned men, the two ſons which Antiochis had ſuppoſed pretended to the Crown, and mutually expelled each other from the throne, and in a word, that they are the ſame Ariarathes and Orofernes of whom Polybius, Juſtin, Appian, &c. make mention. For my part, I ſhould rather think that Orofernes diſputed the throne with the legitimate ſon of Antiochis, than that he diſputed it with the other ſuppoſititious brother. The legitimate ſon, the Prince who loved Philoſophers, and drew ſo many learned men to his court, would not have had the leiſure to deſerve what Diodorus Siculus ſays of him, if he had died before Eumenes, and had before that time left the throne vacant to his two pretended brothers. It was he therefore who had Orofernes for his rival. Pray obſerve in Appian that it was not certain that this Orofernes was brother to the Prince with whom he diſputed the Crown. Demetrius acceptis mille talentis pulſo Ariarathe Holophernem ejus, UT FEREBATUR, fratrem in regnum induxit. i. e. "Demetrius, having received a thouſand talents, expelled Ariarathes, and ſet Holophernes, who WAS REPORTED to be his brother, on the throne (65)." There is great probability, therefore, that Ariarathes gave out he was a ſuppoſed ſon.

(60) Juſtin. lib. 35. init.

(61) Appianus, in Syriacis, pag. m. 79.

(62) Juſtin. lib. 35. cap. 1.

(63) Polyb. lib. 3. cap. 1. pag. m. 175.

(64) See Sigonius in Faſtis.

(65) Appian. in Syriac. pag. 79.

The ſons of that Ariarathes who was ſlain in the war of Ariſtonicus, obtained of the Roman People dation, and inſiſted to be indemnified from them. They demanded three hundred talents of this King of Cappadocia, and referred themſelves to the judgment of the Romans. He was alſo obliged to indemnify the Cilicians, who had ſuffered loſſes when the river Carmalus, which he had alſo ſtopped up, broke down its damns (n). The negligence of Strabo is inexcuſable: he is ſatisfied with ſaying that this Prince was named Ariarathes. Would a good Writer be ſuffered at this time of day to tell us gravely that Charles King of (n) Idem, ibid.

Lycaonia and Cilicia, in acknowledgment of their father's ſervices (66). They were ſix brothers, and ſome of them of the age of puberty; for which reaſon their mother, poſſeſſed by an abominable ambition, apprehending ſhe ſhould not long enjoy the Regency, deſtroyed five of them by poiſon. She had treated the youngeſt in the ſame manner, if the vigilance of his relations had not preſerved him from her fury. The people placed him on the throne, after having ſlain Laudice (67): that was the name of this unnatural mother. The new King took the name of ARIARATHES, and married Laudice the ſiſter of Mithridates, and had children by her. He was killed by the order of that ambitious brother-in-law (68); and immediately Nicomedes King of Bithynia ſeized on Cappadocia, and married Laudice. So ſoon as Mithridates knew it, he ſent an army into Cappadocia, drove out the garriſons of Nicomedes, and reſtored the Kingdom to his nephew the ſon of the ſame Ariarathes whom he had cauſed to be aſſaſſinated by one Gordius. He intreated the young King whom he had juſt reinſtated, and who was named ARIARATHES, to recall Gordius. In caſe that were granted him, he hoped to rid himſelf of the ſon by the hand of the ſame aſſaſſin who had murdered the father; and if it were refuſed him, he would be furniſhed with a pretence to make diſturbances. Ariarathes, not enduring that his uncle ſhould intereſt himſelf in the reverſing of the ſentence of baniſhment pronounced againſt Gordius, and plainly ſeeing the deſign of this contrivance, prepared himſelf for war. He raiſed a very ſtrong army by the aſſiſtance of his neighbours. Mithridates met him with equal forces (69). The armies being in view of each other, he demanded a conference with his nephew; for in the uncertainty of the event of a battle, he reſolved on a piece of treachery. He hid a dagger under his cloaths, and when, according to the cuſtom uſed among Kings in ſuch caſes, they ſelt the lower part of his belly, he ſaid to the man whom Ariarathes had truſted to make that ſearch, and who was acquitting himſelf of the office in a very ſtrict manner, Take care you do not touch a weapon of another ſort than that which you are ſearching for: by this jeſt he concealed the preparatives of his treachery, and having taken Ariarathes aſide as if it were to diſcourſe with him in private, he killed him in ſight of the two armies. Cùm ferrum occultatum inter faſcias gereret ſcrutatori ab Ariarathe regio more miſſo, curioſius imum ventrem pertractanti, ait, caveret ne aliud telum inveniret, quàm quæreret. Atque ita riſu protectis inſidiis ſevocatum ab amicis velut ad ſecretum ſermonem, inſpectante utroque exercitu, interficit (70). He made a preſent of Cappadocia to his ſon, who was but eight years old; he named him ARIARATHES, and gave him Gordius for his Governour.

(66) Juſtin. lib. 37. cap. 1.

(67) Idem, ibid.

(68) Idem, lib. 38. cap. 1.

(69) He had 80 thouſand foot, 10 thouſand horſe, and 600 ſcythed chariots. Juſtin. ibid.

(70) Idem, ibid.

IV. The Cappadocians, not able to bear the oppreſſions of Mithridates's Lieutenants, revolted, and ſent for ARIARATHES the brother of the laſt King, and ſet him on the throne. Mithridates attacked and defeated him, and drove him out of the Kingdom. Affliction threw this young King into a languiſhing diſtemper of which he died ſoon after. Then Nicomedes ſuborned a handſome youth, and obliged him to ſay he was brother to the two laſt Ariarathes, and to demand the Kingdom of the Romans on that foot. He ſent Laudice his wife to Rome, there to declare that ſhe had three boys by her firſt huſband. Mithridates having diſcovered this fraud, oppoſed it with another: he diſpatched Gordius to Rome, to aſſure the Senate that the child which he had created King of Cappadocia had for his father the ſame Ariarathes who loſt his life in the war againſt Ariſtonicus. The Senate plainly ſaw that each of theſe Princes ſought to uſurp a Crown by means of a ſuppoſed child; for which reaſon they ordered Mithridates to renounce Cappadocia, and Nicomedes to quit Paphlagonia, and that thoſe two nations ſhould govern themſelves as they ſhould think beſt. It was then that the Cappadocians anſwered they could not live without a King, as has been ſeen above. The Senate gave them ARIOBARZANES (71).

(71) Extracted from Juſtin. lib. 38. cap. 1, & 2.

V. This new Prince did not enjoy his dignity quietly: Appian relates that Mithraas and Bagoas expelled him out of Cappadocia, and ſet up Ariarathes (72). The Romans cauſed Ariobarzanes to be reinſtated (73). He was expelled a little after by an army which Mithridates ſent into Cappadocia to place his ſon Ariarathes on the throne (74). Sylla having obtained ſome ſignal advantages over Mithridates forced him to reſtore Cappadocia (75). Some time after, at the inſtigation of the ſame Prince (76), that Kingdom was invaded by Tigranes, who drew from thence three hundred thouſand men to whom he gave lands in Armenia. Ariobarzanes, who had eſcaped to Rome before the invaſion (77), was not re-eſtabliſhed till Pompey had ended the Mithridatic war in 690 (78). See how Cicero complains becauſe a Prince their ally enjoyed not his dominions (79). Obſerve that according to Plutarch Cappadocia was twice reſtored to him by Sylla; firſt, when Sylla after his Prætorſhip was ſent into that country to replace Ariobarzanes on the throne (80); and ſecondly, after the victories which he obtained over Mithridates during and after his Conſulſhip (81). This will be diſcuſſed towards the end of the following Remark, and the confuſed accounts of Appian and Juſtin will be rectified. Let us not forget I, that Pompey conſiderably enlarged the dominions of Ariobarzanes, when he replaced him on the throne of Cappadocia (82): II, that the ſon of Ariobarzanes ſucceeded to all that fine inheritance (83).

(72) Appian. in Mithridat. pag. 118.

(73) Idem, ibid.

(74) Idem, ibid. pag. 120.

(75) Idem, ibid. pag. 144, 145.

(76) Idem, ibid.

(77) Juſtin. lib. 38. cap. 3.

(78) Appian. in Mithridat. pag. 163.

(79) Cicero, in Orat. pro Lege Manilia.

(80) Plutarch. in Sylla, pag. 453.

(81) Idem, ibid. pag. 466.

(82) Appian. in Mithridat. pag. 163.

(83) Idem, ibid.

VI. He did not keep it long: for he had been killed when Cicero in the year 702 went to command in Cilicia. He who reigned then in Cappadocia was grandſon to Ariobarzanes the Iſt of that name, and ſaw himſelf threatned to be killed as his father had been. A conſpiracy was formed againſt him in favour of Ariarathes his brother; but Ariarathes declared to Cicero that he did not give his conſent to the plot. Dixit (Ariobarzanes) ad ſe indicia manifeſtarum inſidiarum eſſe delata, quæ eſſent ante adventum meum occultata, quòd ii qui ea patefacere poſſent, propter metum reticuiſſent: eo autem tempore, ſpe mei præſidii, compluris ea quæ ſcirent audacter ad ſe detuliſſe: in his amantiſſimum ſui, ſumma pietate præditum, fratrem, dicere ea, quæ is me quoque audiente dicebat, ſe ſollicitatum eſſe ut regnare vellet: id vivo fratre ſuo accidere non potuiſſe: ſe tamen ante illud tempus eam rem nunquam in medium propter periculi metum protuliſſe. Quæ cum eſſet locutus, monui regem ut omnem diligentiam ad ſe conſervandam adhiberet; amicoſque patris ejus avique judicio probatos hortatus ſum, regis ſui vitam, docti caſu acerbiſſimo patris ejus, omni curâ cuſtodiâque defenderent. i. e. " He (Ariobarzanes) ſaid, " that he had informations given him of plots which " were manifeſtly carried on, and had been concealed " before my arrival, becauſe thoſe who were able to " diſcover them held their tongues through fear: but " then, in hopes of my protection, a great many had " boldly acquainted him with what they knew: that " among theſe his brother, who was very tender and " affectionate to him, ſaid what he alſo repeated " in my hearing, that he had been ſollicited to ac- " cept the Crown; which could not be done while " his brother was living: yet that he had never diſ- " cloſed this affair before that time, for fear of danger. " Which things when he had ſpoken, I adviſed the " King to take all proper precautions for his own " ſafety; and exhorted thoſe who had been approved " friends to his father and grandfather, and had been " taught by his father's moſt unhappy fate, to de- " fend their King's life with the utmoſt aſſiduity and " vigilance, of France, or Pope John, repaired a highway? Could a reader be able to discover this Charles, or John, among the Kings, or the Popes of that name? They have ventured in Moreri to determine which Ariarathes this was. Perhaps they were in the wrong, and more than in many other things which have been said without exactness [K], the detail of " vigilance (84)." Cicero at his departure from Rome, had received orders to favour and protect Ariobarzanes with all possible care. Never had the Senate given such a commission for any King: this was therefore a very glorious testimony of affection to him. Read these words of Cicero (85): Cùm vestra auctoritas intercessisset, ut ego regem Ariobarzanem Eusebem & Philorhomæum (86) tuerer, ejusque regis salutem, incolumitatem, regnumque defenderem, regi regnoque præsidio essem: adjunxissetque, salutem ejus regis populo senatuique magnæ curæ esse, quod nullo unquam de rege decretum esset a nostro ordine: existimavi me judicium vestrum ad regem deferre debere, eique præsidium meum & fidem & diligentiam polliceri: ut, quum salus ipsius incolumitas regni mihi commendata esset a vobis, diceret, siquid vellet. The order of the Senate was faithfully executed. Cicero made use of the authority of his office, his forces, and his counsels, to the advantage of Ariobarzanes, and thereby, and by shewing himself not to be corrupted, and even inaccessible to that Prince's enemies, he saved his Crown for him, and even his life. Ariobarzanes operâ meâ vivit, regnat. Ἐπαρῳδῷ, consilio & auctoritate, & quod insidiatoribus ejus ἀπρόσιτον me non modo ἀδεκτον præbui, regem, regnumque servavi (87). He hindred the Priests from disturbing him (88). This was a master-stroke.

VI. Before we proceed any further, let us take notice of two faults of a learned Commentator. He supposes that the Prince here meant was the son of Ariobarzanes the Ist (89), and that he was honoured by the Senate with the title of King, when Cicero was Consul (90). He cites for the last particular these words of Cicero. Ariobarzanem . . . . Senatus per me regem appellavit, mihique commendavit; i. e. " The " Senate have by me given Ariobarzanes the title of " King, and recommended him to my care (91)." But this relates to the time when Cicero was sent into Cilicia, and not to his Consulship. Besides, there is no likelihood that Ariobarzanes I was dead at the time of that Consulship. There was no occasion, therefore, as yet to acknowledge another Ariobarzanes for King. As to the first mistake, it proceeds from Manutius's not having perceived, as other Critics have done, that we should read amicosque patris ejus avique judicio probatos in the passage quoted above (92). We have no ground to suppose that any son or nephew of that Ariobarzanes whom Cicero protected ever reigned in Cappadocia; and yet this family was not extinct till the third generation (93): it is reasonable, therefore, to take him who was on the throne when Cicero went to govern Cilicia, to be grandson to the first Ariobarzanes.

VII. He brought some troops to Pompey (94) which fought against Cæsar at the battle of Pharsalia. This doubtless was the reason why Cæsar put him under contribution. It is certain that he exacted sums of money of him; for that Prince caused it to be represented that he should become insolvent, if Pharnaces continued to plunder Cappadocia. Rex Deiotarus ad Domitium Calvinum, cui Cæsar Asiam finitimasque provincias administrandas tradiderat, venit oratum ne Armeniam minorem regnum suum, neve Cappadociam, regnum Ariobarzanis, possideri vastarique pateretur a Pharnace: quo malo nisi liberarentur, imperata se facere, pecuniamque promissam Cæsari non posse persolvere. i. e. " King Deiotarus came to beg of Domitius Calvinus, " to whom Cæsar had committed the government of " Asia and the bordering Provinces, that he would " not suffer the lesser Armenia, his own Kingdom, or " Cappadocia, the Kingdom of Ariobarzanes, to be " possessed and ravaged by Pharnaces; assuring him " that if they were not freed from that hardship, they " could not perform what was commanded them, or " pay the money they had promised to Cæsar (95)." Cæsar was then in Egypt: he departed thence to reduce Pharnaces to reason. He passed thro' Cappadocia, and made some regulations there which persuade us that Ariobarzanes and his brother Ariarathes lived in no great union. He ordered the latter to obey: he plainly saw that Ariobarzanes was afraid of his heir, and that the heir was not quite proof against the desire of succeeding him too soon: Fratrem Ariobarzanis Ariaratem, cum bene meritus uterque eorum de Rep. esset, ne aut regni hæreditas Ariaratem sollicitaret, aut hæres regni terreret, Ariobarzani attribuit; qui sub ejus imperio ac ditione esset (96). It may be inferred from hence, that Ariobarzanes had no children, and that therefore the reading frater would be better than that of filius in this passage of Cicero: Ariarathes Ariobarzanis filius Romam venit. Vult, opinor, regnum aliquod emere à Cæsare, nam quomodo nunc est, pedem ubi ponat in suo non habet. i. e. " Ariarathes, the son of Ari- " obarzanes, is come to Rome. He has a mind, I " suppose, to buy some Kingdom of Cæsar, for as " matters stand with him now, he has no where to " set his foot in his own (97)." This shews us that Ariarathes, after Cæsar's regulations, had no longer any share of authority in Cappadocia. When Cæsar had vanquished Pharnaces, he gave one part of Armenia to our Ariobarzanes (98). This made the murderers of Julius Cæsar believe, some years after, that the King of Cappadocia did not favour them. He did not declare himself openly against their party, but he refused to enter into alliance with them. This conduct gave them just grounds to mistrust him, so that Cassius resolved to keep no measures with him: he attacked him, and having taken him prisoner, put him to death (99). This was in the year of Rome 712. We have seen elsewhere (100) that ARIARATHES was disturbed in the succession of Cappadocia, and that the cause was decided to his prejudice in the year 713; and that having found means to appeal from that sentence, he was quite expelled in the year 718, after which Archelaus reigned in Cappadocia: he was the last who reigned there.

The confusion which is found in comparing the ancient Historians together is infinite. I shall mention some instances of it in the following Remark.

[K] In Moreri . . . many things have been said . . without exactness.] I. It is a mistake to suppose, as I have already observed (101), that between Pharnaces the first King of Cappadocia, and Ariarathes the first of the name, there were but six Kings. II. And that we know not their names. III. Archelaüs did not obtain that Crown after an Ariarathes brother to the Ariobarzanes who had been restored by Pompey, but after an Ariarathes grandson of that Ariobarzanes (102). IV. Since in the Article of Cappadocia ten Kings are set down who were named Ariarathes, it is wrong to say elsewhere (103), that Ariarathes the second had seven successors of his name. V. In the battle against Perdiccas, the Horse of Ariarathes II were but fifteen thousand (104), and not twenty thousand. VI. Ariarathes the fifth, who furnished Antiochus with troops against the Romans, was not brother-in-law, but son-in-law to that Antiochus. VII. There is no proof that it was he who caused the entrance of the river Mela into the Euphrates to be stopped. VIII. It should not have been omitted that the works which were made in that place fell to ruin; for this omission renders the rest of the narration wholly unintelligible. One cannot comprehend those works to have been the cause of the overflowing of the Euphrates; they being infinitely more likely to prevent than to cause it. And if the Euphrates did overflow, tho' the waters of the Melas discharged themselves into it no longer, one does not comprehend how the King of Cappadocia could be obliged to repair the damages of the inundation. IX. The Roman Senate did not order him to pay three hundred talents: they gave judgment as to the demand which the Galatians made of that sum, but it is not known what their determination was. It is more probable that they moderated the pretensions of the complainants, than that they supported them in their whole demand. X. Why is it thought sufficient to cite Polybius and Livy (105), who say nothing of this? It would have been more proper to cite Strabo. XI. Nobody says that the city of Ariaratha

(84) Cicero, Epist. 2. lib. 15. ad Famil. pag. m. 381, 382.

(85) Idem, ibid. pag. 380, 381.

(86) The Medals give these two titles to this King: they signify Pious, and a Friend to the Romans. See Græv. Variorum on this passage of Cicero.

(87) Cicero, Epist. 20. lib. 5. ad Atticum, pag. m. 542, 543. See also Epist. 2. & 4. lib. 15. ad Famil. pag. 383, 389.

(88) Idem, Epist. 4. lib. 15. ad Famil. pag. 389. I have set down his words in the Remark [D] of the Article COMANA, at the end.

(89) Paulus Manutius in Cicer. Epist. 2. lib. 15. ad Famil. pag. m. 159.

(90) Idem, ibid.

(91) Cicero, Epist. 17. lib. 2. ad Famil. pag. 115.

(92) Citation (84).

(93) Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 273.

(94) Cæsar, de Bello Civili, lib. 3. pag. m. 307.

(95) Hirtius, de Bello Alexandr. pag. 390.

(96) Idem, ibid. pag. 409.

(97) Cicero, Epist. 2. lib. 13. ad Attic. pag. 395.

(98) Dio, lib. 42. pag. 234.

(99) Idem, lib. 47. pag. 395.

(100) In the Text of the Article ARCHELAUS King of Cappadocia.

(101) In the Remark [A], Citation (3).

(102) See the preceding Remark Num. vi. at the end.

(103) At the word Ariarathes.

(104) Diodor. Sicul. lib. 18. cap. 16. pag. m. 290.

(105) The 5th Book of Livy is cited: they should have cited the 38th and 42d.

of which may be ſeen in my Remarks, as well as the cenſure of ſome errors of Juſtin and Appian. Cappadocia, generally ſpeaking, was nothing leſs than a country of wit and learning: yet ſome very famous Authors have ſprung from thence. Strabo and Pauſanias are of this number. One would believe above all things that the Cappadocians were ratha (106) was founded after the inundations of the Euphrates, and the payment of the three hundred talents: why is it aſſerted in Moreri? XII. He who built the city of Ariarathia was ſon-in-law to Antiochus (107): the Continuator of Moreri ought not therefore to have attributed that foundation to the Ariarathes to whom he aſcribes it; for he conſiders him as the brother-in-law of Antiochus: tho', in reality, this pretended brother-in-law of Antiochus was his ſon-in-law, yet it does not thence follow that he built Ariarathia; for his father Ariarathes was ſon-in-law to Antiochus Theos (108). It is he perhaps who was intended to be ſpoken of in Stephanus Byzantinus.

Let us make a digreſſion here, to obſerve that Pinedo has there made a very uſeleſs Commentary: he has cited a paſſage of Strabo, which informs us that Ariarathes the firſt King of Cappadocia joined the Catаones with the Cappadocians (109). What help is this for the underſtanding of the words of Stephanus Byzantinus? and ſince he cited that paſſage, why did he not cite the other where Strabo mentions a more modern Ariarathes? Berkelius, another Commentator on Stephanus, has endeavoured to comment his text in a better manner; but he has not ſucceeded well. He at firſt imagined Ariarathes the ſon-in-law of Antiochus had married the daughter of Antiochus Soter; but afterwards, he obſerved that Demetrius the brother of Antiochus made war on Ariarathes, propter faſſiditas ſororis nuptias (110). His opinion therefore is, that the founder of Ariarathia had married the ſiſter of Demetrius, and afterwards ſent her back becauſe he diſliked her. I anſwer that the Latin words have a more general ſenſe, and that it is more natural to take them for a refuſal of marriage, than for a divorce. I add, that a Prince who had married the ſiſter of Demetrius would not have been the ſon-in-law of Antiochus; for Demetrius was ſon to Seleucus Philopator, the ſon of Antiochus the Great. My third remark againſt Berkelius is, that he did not know that Diodorus Siculus makes mention of two Kings of Cappadocia named Ariarathes, and ſons-in-law, the one to Antiochus Theos, and the other to Antiochus the Great. Let us return to Moreri.

The XIIIth fault is to ſay that Mithridates drove out Nicodemus, who had ſeized Cappadocia. It ſhould have been Nicomedes King of Bithynia. XIV. Mithridates did not cauſe his nephew to be ſlain by a young man (111): he ſlew him himſelf, as I have related above (112). XV. The XXXVIIIth Book of Juſtin ought to have been quoted, and not the thirtieth. XVI. The ſucceſſor of him who was killed by Mithridates was his brother, and not his ſon. XVII. The reign of Mithridates's ſon ought not to have been omitted; his reign, I ſay, anterior to the election of Ariobarzanes. XVIII. This ſon of Mithridates ſhould have been placed under the word Ariarathes, and not under Ariathes; for when his father placed him on the throne of Cappadocia, in the room of his nephew whom he had killed, he made him take the uſual name of the Kings of that country, viz. that of Ariarathes (113). XIX. The conqueſt of Cappadocia by Ariarathes did not give Mithridates a jealouſy which induced him to poiſon him. Cappodocia had been conquered long before, when that Ariarathes commanded a body of troops for his father in Europe (114); and if he was poiſoned by Mithridates, as is pretended, it was on ſome other jealouſy (115). XX. There is no likelihood that Ariobarzanes was placed on the throne towards the year 644 of the foundation of Rome (116). I ſhall prove it below. XXI. It was he whom Mithridates drove out of Cappadocia, and whom Sylla reſtored. Why then do they come and tell us this of his ſon? XXII. He was not immediately attacked by Tigranes (117). He had been already re-eſtabliſhed more than once, before Tigranes attacked him. XXIII. It is not true that Sylla defeated the army of Tigranes. XXIV. Juſtin, whoſe 30th book is all along falſly quoted, no where ſays that Ariarathes the ſon of Mithridates was vanquiſhed by Ariobarzanes; XXV. nor that the latter, by the aſſiſtance of Pompey, conquered Sophene, Gordene, and part of Cilicia; XXIV. nor that after thoſe victories and conqueſts he ſurrendred the crown to his ſon Ariobarzanes, to paſs the reſt of his life in repoſe. Not only Juſtin ſays nothing of all theſe things, but I do not believe any one good Author ſpeaks of them. Appian ſays only that Ariobarzanes was gratified with thoſe countries by Pompey (118). Is this to be the conqueror of them? XXVII. It ſhould have been known that at the time it is pretended Ariobarzanes vanquiſhed Ariarathes ſon of Mithridates, that is to ſay, after Tigranes had been vanquiſhed, that ſame Ariarathes was dead (119).

Let us ſee whether it be true that his election was made in the year 644. I aſſure my ſelf that if you conſider well all the things which paſſed from the war of Ariſtonicus to that election, you will find four and twenty years will ſcarce be ſufficient. Ariarathes dying during that war, which laſted two or three years, more or leſs, and ended in 623, all his ſons, except only the youngeſt, were poiſoned by their mother. The ſon who eſcaped was ſet on the throne, and being aſſaſſinated by the intrigues of Mithridates, left two ſons who reigned one after another. The eldeſt vigorouſly oppoſed Mithridates, he aſſembled a very numerous army, he commanded it himſelf, when he was killed by Mithridates, who had demanded a private conference with him. All this ſhews he was not a child. Cappadocia was afterwards under the adminiſtration of Gordius, Governor of the new King, the ſon of Mithridates. This Government was ſo harſh, that the ſubjects revolted: the brother of the late King was recalled, he reigned; but he was defeated by Mithridates, and conſtrained to quit the country. He lived not long after that; and Nicomedes being informed of his death, ſuborned a youth who pretended to be the lawful ſucceſſor. His wife took a journey to Rome to ſupport the fraud. Mithridates diſpatched Gordius to the Romans, to oppoſe that impoſture with another. The Senate ended all theſe diſputes, by granting a full liberty to Cappadocia. Their preſent was rejected: that people would needs have a Prince, and they had Ariobarzanes (120). It is impoſſible, according to this, that his election could be made in the year of Rome 644. I ſhould not have repeated all this detail, if beſides its being neceſſary as a proof of Moreri's XXth fault, I had not ſeen that it would afford us an occaſion of criticiſing Juſtin.

He ſays that Laudice, widow of that Ariarathes who was killed in the war againſt Ariſtonicus about the year of Rome 622, poiſoned five of her ſons, and that the youngeſt would have had the ſame fate, if the relations had not preſerved him from the violence of that unnatural mother. He obſerves that the fear of not enjoying the regency long, becauſe ſome of her ſons were adult, incited her to commit that inhuman action (121). It is difficult to diſcover that he argues juſtly: for if by reaſon of that fear ſhe endeavoured to diſpatch the youngeſt of her ſons, it neceſſarily follows that he wanted not much of being at age; and in that caſe, the eldeſt ſon would have been of full age, which would have excluded Laudice from the regency. If you ſay the eldeſt ſon was not yet of age, but that he wanted not much of it, you will be forced to grant me that the age of the youngeſt did not nearly threaten the Regent's ambition. She might have hoped for an adminiſtration of ſufficient length, not to put him to death ſo ſoon. Juſtin therefore has not reaſoned juſtly on the motives of this cruel woman. An infinite number of like faults might be found in that Author, and in the beſt Writers, if a man would take the pains to collect them. I believe, for my part, that all the ſons of Laudice were adult, and I take this to be the reaſon why ſhe tried to get rid of all of them at once. What makes me judge thus of their age is that the youngeſt left two ſons who reigned in Cappadocia, and who, by the manner in which they are ſpoken of, lived at leaſt twenty years. Now it is certain that Ariobarzanes had already been diſpoſſeſſed in the year of Rome 659; for it was in that year that Sylla reſtored him (122). Some time paſſed between (106) It ſhould be Ariarathia.

(107) Stephanus Byzantinus, Voce Ἀριαράθεια.

(108) Diodor. Sicul. in Eclog. lib. 31. pag. m. 1164, 1165.

(109) Pinedo in Steph. Byzant. pag. 107.

(110) Berkelius in Steph. Byzant. pag. 164.

(111) The Author was deceived by theſe words of Juſtin, lib. 38. cap. 2. Sollicitatoque juvene ad colloquium, &c.

(112) In the preceding Remark, Num. III. Citation (70.)

(113) Juſtin. lib. 38. cap. 1. pag. 549.

(114) Plutarch. in Sylla, pag. 458. C.

(115) Idem, in Pompeio, pag. 639. A.

(116) Moreri, at the Word Ariobarzanes.

(117) The Continuator of Moreri, at the ſame Word.

(118) Appian. in Mithridat. pag. m. 163.

(119) Appian. in Mithridat. pag. m. 129, ſpeaks of Areathias a ſon of Mithridates, as of a man who having ſubdued Macedonia, marched againſt Sylla; but he died of ſickneſs. It is he without doubt whom Plutarch names Ariarathes.

(120) All this Narration is taken from Juſtin, Book 38.

JUSTIN criticiſed.

(121) Timens ne non diutinam regni adminiſtrationem adultis quibuſdam potiretur. Juſtinus, lib. 38. cap. 1. pag. 540.

(122) See Sigonius, in Faſtis, ad annum 659. folio m. 106 verſo.

were unfit to become Orators [L]; but St. Baſil, and St. Gregory Nazianzen, have been an exception to this rule. It has been obſerved that the horſes of Cappadocia improved as they grew old [M].

CAPRIATA

tween the death of the laſt Ariarathes and the election of Ariobarzanes: in that interval the pretenſions of the two ſuppoſed children were produced at Rome; a Decree of the Senate alſo intervened. Let us add that ſome time paſſed between the election of Ariobarzanes and his deprivation, and between his deprivation and his re-eſtabliſhment. Since therefore he was reſtored in the year 659, there is a great deal of likelihood that the laſt Ariarathes aged about twenty did not die before the year 654: judge whether it be probable that his father was but a little child when Laudice would have murdered him about the year 623.

APPIAN and Juſtin criticiſed.

I ſhall in this place examine whether Appian has related the adventures of Ariobarzanes as he ought. His relation is as follows, The Romans ordered Mithridates to ſurrender Cappadocia to Ariobarzanes: he obeyed, but Mithraas and Bagoas expelled Ariobarzanes, and gave the Kingdom to Ariarathes. The Romans ſent an Embaſſy into that country to reſtore Ariobarzanes. Manius Aquilius was the head of that Embaſſy: Lucius Caſſius, who commanded in Aſia, and Mithridates received orders from Rome to aſſiſt the Embaſſadors. Mithridates, being diſguſted with the Romans, gave them no aſſiſtance: but notwithſtanding Caſſius and Aquilius reſtored Ariobarzanes, and adviſed him, as well as Nicomedes King of Bithynia, to make incurſions into the Dominions of Mithridates. Nicomedes, not being able to reſiſt the ſollicitations of the Embaſſadors, committed hoſtilities (123). Mithridates complained of it, and found no redreſs: for which reaſon he had recourſe to arms, he conquered Cappadocia, and gave it to his ſon Ariarathes (124), The Embaſſador he ſent to the Roman Generals ſpoke very haughtily, and received an anſwer yet more haughty (125). The conſequence was that Mithridates beat the Romans, and even took Manius Aquilius the chief of their Embaſſy priſoner, and that Sylla vanquiſhed him, and forced him to accept a diſadvantageous peace (126). The reſtoration of Ariobarzanes was one of the conditions of the treaty (127): it was at firſt executed imperfectly (128), and afterwards very fully (129). The invaſion of Cappadocia by Tigranes happened ſome years after (130). Sylla was no longer living. Lucullus retook Cappadocia (131), Mithridates recovered it (132), and at laſt Pompey re-eſtabliſhed Ariobarzanes (133).

(123) Appianus, in Mithridat. pag. 118.

(124) Idem, ibid. pag. 120.

(125) Idem, ibid. pag. 121.

(126) Idem, ibid. pag. 122.

(127) Idem, ibid. pag. 141.

(128) Idem, ibid. pag. 143.

(129) Idem, ibid. pag. 144.

(130) Idem, ibid.

(131) Idem, ibid. pag. 150, 151.

(132) Idem, ibid. pag. 156.

(133) Idem, ibid. pag. 163, 168.

I obſerve I, that Appian is inexcuſable in ſpeaking of the invaſion of Mithraas and Bagoas, without telling us who they were, and what Ariarathes it was whom they placed on the throne of Cappadocia. II. He deſerves blame for having ſaid nothing of the commiſſion given to Sylla to reſtore Ariobarzanes. This was in the year of Rome 659. Sylla commanded then in Cilicia. He ſays it himſelf in Appian, ſpeaking to Mithridates. In Cappadociam ego reduxi Ariobarzanem ex S. C. cum præeſſem Ciliciæ: idque feci te cedente autoritati populi. i. e. "I brought Ariobarzanes "back into Cappadocia by order of the Senate when I "was Governor of Cilicia: and this I did you your-"ſelf ſubmitting to the authority of the people (134)." This renders our Hiſtorian the leſs excuſable; for ſince he was no ſtranger to this diſcourſe of Sylla, he was obliged to inform himſelf concerning the re-eſtabliſhment of Ariobarzanes, and to place it where good Chronology required. His omiſſion would have been leſs to be found fault with, if he had not known what Sylla ſaid to Mithridates. Take notice Plutarch obſerves that Sylla, after his Prætorſhip, was ſent into Cappadocia under the ſpecious pretext of reſtoring Ariobarzanes, but in reality to curb Mithridates who formed great deſigns (135). Conſult Sigonius, and he will clear up all this to you (136), but do not truſt him when he aſſures you that Mithridates cauſed Ariarathes King of Cappadocia, and the ſon of the ſame Ariarathes, who was yet a child, to be ſlain by Gordius. Remember that Mithridates killed that ſon with his own hand, when he was a man grown. My IIId Remark on Appian is, that according to all appearance, he is miſtaken with regard to the invaſion of Mithraas and Bagoas: he ſuppoſes that Mithridates had no hand in it, and even that the Romans ordered him to drive out the uſurper, and to reſtore Ariobarzanes; and that Mithridates being diſſatisfied with the Roman People diſobeyed that order. I doubt not but that invaſion was made by the Generals of Mithridates, and in favour of his ſon Ariarathes whom the Cappadocians had expelled. Juſtin ſays they recalled the brother of their laſt King, and that this brother was vanquiſhed by Mithridates (137); that is to ſay, if I am not miſtaken, by Mithraas and Bagoas, who brought back into Cappadocia Ariarathes their maſter's ſon. Let us ſay in the IVth place, that the Embaſſy of Manius Aquilius ſhould be placed under the year of Rome 663, or thereabouts; and that therefore it concerns not, as Appian ſuppoſes, the firſt reſtoration of Ariobarzanes (138).

(134) Idem, ibid. pag. 139.

(135) Plutarch. in Sylla, pag. 453.

(136) Sigonius, in Faſtis, ad ann. 659.

(137) Juſtin, lib. 38. cap. 2.

Let us add a word againſt Juſtin, who ſuppoſes that Tigranes ſet on by Mithridates was the firſt who expelled Ariobarzanes, and that this was the ſubject of Aquilius's Embaſſy. This is falſe. That Embaſſy was anterior to the great wars of Sylla and Mithridates, which did not begin till the year of Rome 665. Tigranes is never ſeen to appear before the expedition of Lucullus. We muſt ſay therefore that he did not poſſeſs himſelf of Cappadocia, till after Sylla had reſtored Ariobarzanes the ſecond time.

(138) The Epitome of Livy, Book 70, makes mention of the Reſtoration of this Prince by Sylla, and Book 74, of another Reſtoration.

I may be reproached for ſtanding too much on trifling niceties: I would have it be known that I do it, not becauſe I think theſe things are important enough in themſelves, but to inſinuate by ſenſible examples that a man ſhould arm himſelf with diſtruſt againſt what he reads, and exerciſe his genius in diſtinguiſhing of facts. This application inlarges and multiplies the ſtrength of the mind. For which reaſon I believe the pains I have taken will not be uſeleſs to the Reader.

There is ſo little Chronology in the greater part of the Greek and Latin Hiſtorians, that ancient Hiſtory wants to be new-caſt. I dare ſay, that if all the helps which they had in abundance were to be had at this day, much better bodies of Hiſtory would be compiled than thoſe which they have left us.

[L] One would believe the Cappadocians were unfit to become Orators.] It is from hence that Kuhnius has confirmed the opinion of thoſe who ſay that Pauſanias, Author of the Deſcription of Greece, ought not to be diſtinguiſhed from the Sophiſt Pauſanias whoſe Life Philoſtratus has written, and who was one of thoſe pupils whom Herodes Atticus admitted to his greateſt familiarity. To this the Obſervation of Philoſtratus, that the ſaid Sophiſt did not pronounce Greek well, is by no means repugnant: for it was the defect of the Cappadocians, and a defect ſo incorrigible, that a Rhetorician of that country was ſaid to be more rare than a white raven, or a flying tortoiſe. Cui non repugnat, they are the words of Kuhnius in the Preface to the new edition of Pauſanias (139), quod Philoſtratus tradit, quòd Græcam linguam duriùs pronunciârit quàm delicata ejus rotunditas patiebatur. Hoc enim toti Cappadocum nationi commune vitium, oriſque fuit ἰλάττωμα nullâ exercitatione emendandum, ſuti clare indicat notum Epigramma:

(139) That of Leipſic in 1696.

Θᾶττον ἴην λευκὺς κόρακας πλησάς τε χιλώνας
Εὑρεῖν, ἢ δέκιμον ῥήτορα Καππαδόκην.
Rarius alata teſtudine, rarius albo
Invenias corvo Rhetora Cappadocem.

[M] The horſes of Cappadocia improved as they grew old.] "Oppian has obſerved that they are very weak "when young, and that the older they be the ſwifter "they go.

Χραισμότεροι ϗ πίλεσιν ὅσῳ μάλα γηράσκουσι (140).

(140) Suite du Menagiana, pag. 53, of the Dutch edition.

I ſhall add to theſe words of the Menagiana a paſſage of Brantome. The Cardinal de Guiſe has been the only perſon to whom the late King Francis's Proverb might be applied, who uſed to ſay that the Princes of Lorrain were like the courſers of the Kingdom of Naples, which were long and backward in growing, but were excellent when they began to wax old (141).

(141) Brantome, dans l'Eloge de Mr. de Guiſe, tom. 3. des Mémoir. pag. m. 139.

CAPRIATA (PETER JOHN) a Civilian and Hiſtorian, was of Genoa, and lived in the ſeventeenth Century. If Amantius may be credited, he poſſeſſed all the qualities that form the great Lawyer [A]; but we muſt obſerve, that this teſtimony is in a Poem prefixed to one of Capriata's books. In this Poem, all the applauſes which an accompliſhed Hiſtorian could deſerve, are beſtowed upon him. We are not to take in a literal ſenſe, the expreſſions which are uſed in an elogium of this kind; but it is certain that the hiſtorical pieces of this writer are very valuable [B]. He relates the ſeveral tranſactions in a very clear and preciſe manner; he accounts for their ſeveral motives, their inſtruments and conſequences; and he is not guilty, either of the low artifices of a flatterer, or of the malice of an ill-natured cenſor. He boaſts his having obſerved a medium, without being the leaſt partial, either in favour of France or Spain; and declares, that thoſe who do not perceive this impartiality, muſt blame themſelves for it [C]. The Venetians complained of their being treated injuriouſly in his Hiſtory; on which occaſion

[A] If Amantius may be credited, he poſſeſſed all the qualities that form the great Lawyer.] Here follows the beginning of a Poem, prefixed to Capriata's Book:

Qui conſulta patrum, & nodoſi dogmata juris,
Atque vagos Legum anfractus, dubioſque receſſus
Ingenio ſolitus celeri ſcrutarier, & quem
Juriſconſultum inſignem Menochius olim
Teſtatur, ſcriptis commendans laudibus, . . . (1).

(1) Paulus Amantius, in Carmine ad auctorem Hiſtoriæ & ad Librum.

Imitated,

" Thy piercing genius ever trac'd with eaſe,
" The knotty points of Law, however ancient;
" And all the random windings of the Bar:
" Menochius gave the praiſe thy merit claim'd,
" And told the world that thou would'ſt be illuſtrious.

A little after follow theſe lines:

Tu, ſeu jura doces, juris penetralia quærvis,
Seu patronus agis cauſas, dubiumque clientem
Sublevat arguto quem promis pectore, ſenſus,
Unde audet dubiæ melius conſidere cauſæ;
Seu juris reſponſa refers conſulta petenti,
Seu lites dirimis certantes arbiter inter;
Tam ritè & rectè peragi tibi cuncta videntur,
Tam facile, atque brevi interjecto tempore, quantum
Per tardas perfecta moras vix quiſque dediſſet.

The ſenſe is,

" Whether you read Law-Lectures to your Pupils,
" Or plead a cauſe in preſence of the Court,
" So well you trace the hidden ſprings of Law,
" So happily expreſs your cloudleſs ſenſe,
" That all who liſten, ſay — you'll be victorious.
" Whether you give advice; or when you're umpire,
" Juſtice and truth confirm your ev'ry dictate.
" No Lawyer, tho' he ſtudied months on months,
" On ſome perplexing controverted point,
" Could argue better than you do at once."

Here we ſee a man, who was equally ſucceſsful, either in explaining the moſt knotty points of the Civil-Law, in pleading cauſes, in giving opinion, or ending law-ſuits by the way of arbitration. Is it poſſible to give a more glorious character of a Civilian?

[B] The hiſtorical labours of this Writer are very valuable.] Theſe relate to the tranſactions of his own time, and eſpecially in Italy. He publiſhed the two firſt Books in 1626, by way of ſpecimen. I due primi libri dell' Hiſtoria, ſopra i movimenti d'arme ſucceſſi in Italia dall' anno 1613, fino al 1618 (2). i. e. " The " firſt two Books of the wars in Italy, from the year " 1613 to 1618." He had them reprinted at Genoa in 4to, anno 1638, with the ten ſucceeding Books. Theſe twelve Books extend from 1613 to 1634; and were reprinted at Geneva in 1644 in 8vo. The Author publiſhed a ſecond part at Genoa in 1648, which was reprinted at Geneva, in 1650, 8vo. It is intitled dell' Hiſtoria de Pietro Giovanni Capriata, parte ſeconda in ſei Libri diſtinta. Nel primiero dè quali ſi contingono alcuni movimenti d'armi fuor d' Italia ſucceduti. E né cinque ſuſſequenti la continuatione di quei d'Italia dall' anno M.DC.XXXIV. fins al. M.DC.XLIV. i. e. " The Hiſtory of Peter John Capriata, part II, di- " vided into ſix books. The firſt of theſe contains " the relation of ſome wars out of Italy; and the five " following, the continuation of thoſe of Italy, from " anno 1634 to 1644." An Engliſh Tranſlation of all this was printed at London in 1663.

(2) In Thuanus's Catalogue, pag. 305. of Part 1. it is put the Milan edition of 1627, in 8vo.

[C] He declares that thoſe who do not perceive his impartiality between France and Spain, muſt blame themſelves for it.] This is a judicious obſervation, and may be a warning to a great number of readers, who accuſe an Hiſtorian of partiality, for no other reaſon but becauſe they themſelves are very much prejudiced. They are perſuaded, that in caſe he ſpeaks well of thoſe, whom they hate merely from a national prejudice, and from party intereſt, he then is guilty of flattery; and that, if he ſpeaks ill of thoſe whom they love from a like principle, he then is ſwayed too much by a ſpirit of malice. But ſuch readers don't examine themſelves, nor ſee that their own partiality makes them look upon this Hiſtorian as partial. This it is that Capriata repreſents to certain readers, who complained that he had not held the two ſcales even between two crowns; but had applauded too much the actions of ſome Princes, and related as diſadvantageouſly in proportion the actions of ſome others. When the readers, ſays he, are more prejudiced than the writer, they think thoſe praiſes too faint which he beſtows on their favourite party; and thoſe as too ſtrong which they give to the party they abhor. They accuſe him of not cenſuring ſufficiently the latter, and of blaming the former too much; and they form the very ſame judgment, even when the Hiſtory has obſerved the moſt exact impartiality. Their heavy complaints are the effect of their prejudices, and not (as they pretend) of thoſe of the Hiſtorian. But I will quote Capriata's words, as they expreſs the thought much better. Ma perche frà molti affettionati vedatori ſi ſentono qualche più preſto doglienze, che dettrattioni, parendo ad alcuni, che io ſia più dell' una, che dell' altra Corona partiale, e che de Principi nella parte primiera intereſſati; altri venghino innalzati, altri depreſſi più di quel, che la via mezzana, che han gl' iſtoriografi a tenere. Dirò per tanto in riſpoſta, più che in deſeſa di ſimili dogliènze, premieramente, che tanto rieſche difficile tener la via di mezzo allo ſcrittore, quanto al lettore, & che però tanto può l'uno, quanto l'altro trapaſſare la mediocrità, quello nello ſcrivere, & queſto nel giudicare. Imperciocche il lettore tocco per avventura da maggior paſſione, che l'Autore, e però più all' una che all' altra parte inclinante reputerà ſempre corte le lodi, e abbondanti gl' abbaſſamenti della parte, nella quale inclina, & por lo contrario maggiori le lodi, & minori gl' abbaſſamenti delle contrarie, per quanto lo ſcrittore ſi ſia ugualmente con tutti diportato; onde la dogli- enza procederà per avventura piu dalla paſſione di chi legge, che da quella di che ſcrive, conforme al Proverbio Latino,

Arquatis omnia lurida videri (3).

That is,

" All things ſeem yellow to the jaundic'd eye."

(3) Capriata, in the Preface to Part 2. of his Hiſtory.

I have obſerved in another place (4), that it is ſometimes more difficult to be an honeſt man, than to appear ſuch; and I ſay on this occaſion, that it is ſometimes more difficult to appear a faithful Hiſtorian, than to be ſo in reality. I don't pretend to ſay, that it is an eaſy matter to write a Hiſtory which may repreſent, with equal impartiality, the errors and wiſdom, the right and the wrong, the loſſes and advantages of both parties. A man muſt be entirely diveſted of paſſions, he muſt be the wiſe man imagined by the Stoicks, ſuch a one as will never be found, and who exiſts only in the fancy; an Hiſtorian, I ſay, muſt attain to this inſenſibility,

(4) In the Remark [H] of the article AMPHIARAUS.

occaſion he employed a reaſon to juſtify himſelf, that deſerves to be related [D]. He dedicated his work, not to Princes, but to private men, for he was afraid that had he inſcribed inſenſibility, in caſe he will pretend to obſerve, on all occaſions, this juſt medium in writing a Hiſtory. 'Tis not ſufficient that he is the native of a Country which did not join either with France or Spain, during the war in which thoſe two Nations were engaged. Notwithſtanding this neutrality, the writer might favour indirectly, or by his wiſhes one of the parties much more than the other (5). This preference might be inſpired, either by the true intereſt of his Country, or by national caprice. Now it is not poſſible to expreſs, how greatly this prejudices an Hiſtorian againſt the party he hates; how many ſecret paſſions he imbibes which corrupt his judgment; and the habit he contracts of relating with greater joy, the advantages of that party to which he is moſt inclined. I add, that an Hiſtorian may conceive (from his natural diſpoſition) more affection for one foreign Nation than for another; and the ſtate and condition of his fortune may be ſuch, as to make him hope or fear more from one Prince than from another. Theſe all are obſtacles to the perfect impartiality of an Hiſtorian, and the medium he ought to obſerve. Several others might be mentioned; and were we to ſpecify the ſeveral things which biaſs an Author, who ſets about writing the Hiſtory of his own Country, the Catalogue would be very long. We therefore muſt be obliged to confeſs, that to write a Hiſtory with ſtrict impartiality is an extreme difficult taſk.

(5) See in the Lettres Hiſtoriques for October 1702, pag. 374, & ſeq. the fury with which the inhabitants of Rome diſcover their partiality, either for the Emperor, or for France. See alſo the Nouvelles des Cours de l'Europe, for October 1704, pag. 380, & ſeq. and the Lettres Hiſtoriques for the ſame month, pag. 358.

But though an Author could arrive ſo far, as to ſurmount all the obſtacles; the ſnares and ſurprizes of his Paſſions; the prejudices of childhood, the force of preposſeſſion, the bent his mind took before he began to write a Hiſtory; in a word, tho' he ſhould write impartially the good and bad actions of each party, without leaning to either ſide, would he meet with readers of ſo equitable a temper, as to do him the juſtice he deſerves? Will they have taken as much pains as he had done to diveſt himſelf of prejudices of every kind? Will they not be diſpleaſed at reading the ſeveral particulars he relates to the diſadvantage of the party they favour, and to the advantage of that which is odious to them? Will they believe that he has given a genuine account of the ſeveral events? Will they not look upon every circumſtance which claſhes with their prejudices as falſe? Conſequently, it would be much more difficult for ſuch a writer to appear impartial and unprejudiced than to be really ſo.

The difficulties I mention are eſpecially to be feared, in the writing the Hiſtory of one's own times; for readers are tractable in proportion to the remoteneſs of the events; but they are quite unreaſonable with reſpect to modern tranſactions. They give the name of penſioners to the enemy, to ſuch Gazeteers as make the loſſes they ſuſtained leſs than others had declared them to be, and do not weaken their advantages. A numberleſs multitude of people are ſo unjuſt, as to conſider, as favourers of the enemy, thoſe who dare contradict the advantageous news which had been brought. Thus, in a proportionable degree, an Hiſtorian makes himſelf be ſuſpected, at a time that he is truly impartial. Saluſt might have included this among the difficulties of hiſtory-writing; thoſe difficulties I mean, which, according to him, proceed from the ſtate and diſpoſition of the reader's mind. Ac mihi quidem, tametſi haudquaquam par gloria ſequatur ſcriptorem, & auctorem rerum; tamen imprimis arduum videtur res geſtas ſcribere: primum, quod facta dictis exæquanda ſunt: dein quia plerique, quæ delicta reprehenderes, malevolentia & invidia dicta putant; ubi de magna virtute, atque gloria bonorum memores; quæ ſibi quiſque facilia factu putet, æquo animo accipit; ſupra, veluti ficta pro falſis ducit (6). i. e. "Tho' there be not an "equal glory in writing as in atchieving of great actions, yet the compoſing of Hiſtory appears to me "a very difficult taſk; firſt, becauſe events muſt be "equalled by the words which deſcribe them; again, "becauſe moſt readers will look upon the blame which "the Hiſtorian caſts on certain things, as proceeding "from envy and malice. And, where the Hiſtorian "relates ſuch a brave and glorious exploit, as the reader thinks he himſelf could have performed, that "he aſſents to readily; but every thing above this, "he conſiders as the mere reſult of the writer's inven- "tion, and conſequently rejects it as falſe."

(6) Salluſtius, in Præfat. Belli Catilinarii.

To return to Capriata, I obſerve that he exhibits (7), as an example of his impartiality, the particulars he wrote concerning the two wars of Montferrat. The Duke of Mantua being attack'd in the firſt of theſe wars by the Duke of Savoy, was ſupported by the King of Spain; but in the ſecond, he was attacked by the latter Prince, and ſupported by the King of France. Now our Author, who had applauded the King of Spain with reſpect to the firſt war, cenſures him for the ſecond; and was ſo laviſh of his applauſes on the conduct of Lewis XIII, that his words were tranſcribed by a French Author. Che un Cavaglier Franceſe dell' ordine dello ſpirito, nel ſuo Politico Chriſtianiſſimo, dato alle ſtampe, ſi compiacciuto per pompa di quella Reggia attione di regiſtrarlo parola per parola, ſenza piro nominar l'Autore (8). i. e. "A French Knight "of the Order of the Holy Ghoſt, in a printed work "of his entitled, The moſt Chriſtian Politician, was ſo "pleaſed with the ſplendour of this royal action, that "he copied it word for word, but without naming "the Author." I alſo prove his impartiality and independence, by a Latin Epigram he gives us; and which had been publiſhed by an Author (9), who was not perſonally known to him. Here follows part of it:

(7) In the Preface to Part 2.

(8) Capriata, ibid. The Author of The moſt Chriſtian Politician, is not a plagiary, he declaring, pag. 202. of the edit. of 1645, in 12°, that what he had there related, was borrowed from an Italian Writer.

(9) Paganinus Gaudentius, in the Treatiſe intitled, Obſtetrix Librorum.

Detegis arcanos Regum ſenſuſque Doloſque,
Nec Belli cauſas præteriiſſe finis,
Venalem renuis laudando obtrudere palpum
De nullo erectus dicere vera times;
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
Gallus & Hiſpanus nullo diſcrimine habentur?
Nec tibi tractatur molliter Emanuel.

That is,

"Still you diſcloſe the ſecret arts of Kings,
"Their frauds; and cauſes of their wars relate.
"Flattery would never prompt you to be venal;
"But nobly bold, you dare to ſpeak the truth.
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
"Impartially you treat or French or Spaniard,
"Nor can Emanuel move your equal mind."

But it would have been to no purpoſe for Emanuel to have rendred himſelf worthy of ſuch an Elogium with regard to a prejudiced reader; for ſuch a one would never perceive his impartiality; and if we may aſſert, that a perſon who ſets about writing an Hiſtory ought to be diveſted of all prejudice; we may alſo aſſert, that a reader ought to be ſo, in order to form a proper judgment of the compoſition of an Hiſtorian. Of all kinds of writing, Hiſtory is that to which we may moſt juſtly apply the following ſentence; Pro Captu Lectoris habent ſua fata libelli. i. e. "The fate of a "Book depends on the reader's capacity or under- "ſtanding."

[D] The Venetians complained of being ill treated in his Hiſtory; on which occaſion he employed a reaſon to juſtify himſelf, that deſerves to be related.] Andrew Balbo, a noble Venetian, was at Genoa when the firſt part of Capriata's Hiſtory was publiſhed. That Gentleman made his complaints, in the moſt polite terms, to the Author, who, among other particulars, made the following anſwer. No juſt complaints can be made of my being wanting in reſpect to the Republic of Venice, with regard to the wiſdom of its government (10); if I have written the ſucceſſes of the ſeveral wars, in ſuch a manner as has given offence, it was not my fault; for I was obliged to relate them according to truth; and we cannot expect that the deſcription of ſuch things as gave us pain when they happened, can give us any pleaſure in the reading. Quanto poi a ſucceſſi delle Guerre tanto di mare, quanto di terra, non havendole recato guſto quando ſuccedettono, e impoſſible che glie el recchino quando ſi deſcrivono, onde non v' hà colpa lo Scrittore, ſe conforme al vero i rappreſenta. It would doubtleſs be an irregularity, ſhould the events themſelves be diſagreeable, and the hiſtory of them give us new pleaſure. None but lying writers can produce this ſtrange confuſion of the nature of things.

(10) Capriata, Preface to Part 2. of his Hiſtory.

inſcribed it to a ſovereign power, the publick would have been apt to ſurmiſe, that he had not obſerved faithfully the Laws preſcribed to Hiſtorians [E].

They are like certain Cooks, who make ſo excellent a ſauce to the moſt inſipid meats, and ſuch as are the hardeſt to digeſt, and they are eat with pleaſure. An unfaithful Hiſtorian either ſuppreſſes ill ſucceſſes, or covers them with ſo large a detail of petty, advantageous circumſtances, that they become imperceptible to the reader. He cannot diſcover the wound, under the multitude of glaring plaiſters which they apply to it.

Capriata repreſented alſo, that he was not either a ſubject of the Commonwealth of Venice, or its penſioner; and nevertheleſs, that he had been more tender of it than ſome Venetian Writers, whom it had puniſhed, both in their perſons and their works, at the ſame time that it permitted the ſale of his Hiſtory. E ſe V. S. anderà paragonando i noſtri ſcritti con quei d'alcuni Veneti Scrittori troverà, che, come con maggior verità, coſi con riſpetto maggiore ho i ſucceſſi poco felici del armi Venetiani repreſentato, havendo nelle coſe dubbie ſempre nella più benignà interpretatione inclinato. In maniera, che le noſtre opere ſono publicamente, nella ſteſſa Citta di Venetia, vendute, lette, & con applauſi non minori che altrove, ricevate, dove quelle de' loro Scrittori rimanondo affato ſterminato, non compaiono in luce; e gl' Autori ne ſtati ſono puniti, & puniti ancora i Capitani, che mal ſi diſportarono ne ſiniſtri incontri dell' arme, & delle publiche fattioni (11). All theſe particulars were fitter to juſtify the Author, rather than to remove the uneaſineſs with which the impartiality and ſincerity of his pen filled the Venetians. People don't care to have truth ſpoke of them publickly (12).

(11) Ibid.

(12) Obſequium amicos, veritas odium parit. Terent. And. Act. 1. Sc. 1. i. e. "Flattery "procures "friends, and "truth raiſes "enemies.

[E] He was afraid, in caſe he had inſcribed his work to a ſovereign power, the public would have been apt to ſurmiſe, that he had not faithfully obſerved the laws preſcribed to Hiſtorians.] He dedicated the firſt part of his Hiſtory to Ottaviano Raggi, auditor of the Chamber to Pope Urban VIII; and the ſecond to Charles Emanuel Durazzo Referendary to both Signatures; and declared the reaſons which prevented his dedicating them to ſome Prince. There is no Prince, ſays he, but is concerned in the Kings I relate; hence it might be imagined, that what I have related to the advantage of the Potentate to whom I ſhould dedicate my work, would be mere flattery; or, that I ſhould affront him, by the relation of ſuch particulars as are not to his advantage. It might alſo be ſuſpected, that a deſire of ingratiating my ſelf with a Monarch, was either a bridle to check, and keep me ſilent; or elſe a ſpur, to make me exceed the bounds of truth. Eſſendovi tutti (Principi) o tanto o quanto intereſſati, non pareſce adulatione quel, che il corſo ordinario delle coſe ſuccedute portaſſe di poco loro guſto, e ſodisfattione: E per che ancora neſſuno haveſſe occaſione di far concetto, che il deſiderio d'acquiſtarmi la gratia di quel Principe, haveſſe ſervito di freno, per farmi tacere, o di ſtimolo per i ſcrivere più abbondantemente, contro quel, che l'obbligo di fidele, e ſincero ſcrittore mi poteſſe perſcrivere (13). Nothing can be more judicious than theſe reflexions; for as laudable as the ſincerity of an Hiſtorian would be, who ſhould have juſtly cenſured the conduct of a Monarch, and related faithfully the ignominious ſucceſs which had accompanied it; ſo much in proportion would be his imprudence, ſhould he dedicate his work to him. Beſides, it is cuſtomary for an Author to flatter and cajole a ſovereign Prince, when he dedicates his work to him. He aſpires at a penſion, or ſome other reward; hence he knows what to write and what to ſuppreſs. He has had an eye to this in every part of his Hiſtory, where he ſpeaks of that Prince's actions. To dedicate ſuch a work to ſuch a Prince, what is it elſe but plainly ſhewing that the writer, from the very beginning, has given up his liberty, and is looking out for a maſter? at leaſt, will not this be the opinion of the public?

(13) Capriata, Epiſt. Dedic. to Part 1. of his Hiſtory.

CARACCIOLI. Moreri has ſpoken of ſeveral illuſtrious perſons of this family, but omitted the chief Seneſchal of Naples, who perhaps was the firſt conſiderable Nobleman of his branch. He was called John Caraccioli; and though born a Gentleman, he was obliged to turn writer in his youth (a), on account of the unhappineſs of his circumſtances. He was ſo fortunate as to pleaſe Joan II Queen of Naples: this opened him the way to preferment; for the lovers of this Queen were not barely eſteemed; they went on to enjoyment, and afterwards were raiſed to the higheſt poſts, according as they pleaſed her, and exerted themſelves on this occaſion. The manner in which it is ſaid this Princeſs made Caraccioli the firſt advances, is ſingular enough [A]. He at laſt met with the fate ſo common to ſuch minions; he engaged in too many intrigues, and became odious to a Lady who had a great aſcendant over the Queen. Some declare that he was ſo inſolent as to uſe very injurious expreſſions in ſpeaking to the abovementioned Queen, and that he even gave her a box on the ear, upon her refuſing him the Principality of Salerno (b). He gave occaſion to his being ſuſpected of ſeveral ſecret practices againſt

(a) Brantome, Vie des Dames illuſtres, pag. m. 398.

(b) Spondanus, ad ann. 1432, num. 18. pag. m. 816.

[A] The manner in which Joan II, Queen of Naples, made Caraccioli the firſt advances is ſingular enough.] Here follows Brantome's relation of it. "The firſt "opportunity the Queen ever had to ſpeak of her "paſſion to him, was this; he was very much afraid "of mice; ſo one day while he was playing at cheſs "in her wardrobe, ſhe herſelf cauſed a mouſe to be "ſet before him; and he, ſcampering about for fear; "firſt ſtumbling againſt one, then againſt another, run "in at the Queen's chamber door, and fell juſt upon "her; by this means the Queen diſcovered her flame "to him, and they ſoon made up matters together. "A little after ſhe created him her chief Seneſchal (1)." Let thoſe who will believe this tale: and however it be, it is not unlikely, that of all love-declarations, the verbal one is the moſt painful to Ladies of ſo exalted a rank.

(1) Brantome, Dames Illuſtres, pag. m. 399.

This muſt not be wondered at; perſons can better command their tongues than ſeveral other ſigns which diſcover the paſſion that burns in their boſom (2). For this reaſon, ſhame more eaſily hinders a woman from diſcloſing her flame in words, theſe being arbitrary ſigns invented by man, than from diſcovering in her face, by natural ſigns, the deſires which engroſs her ſoul. And as the men are generally very dexterous in diſcovering thoſe ſigns, and ſoon take advantage of them, women have ſeldom occaſion to mention by word of mouth what they require from men; and they are ſo ſeldom reduced to the neceſſity of making ſuch a declaration, that they do not acquire, by ſeveral trials, a facility of expreſſing themſelves on that ſubject. If a woman perceives that the other ſigns are not perfectly underſtood, ſhe will rather write to her lover, than reveal her paſſion in words. We have an inſtance of this above (3) in the deſcription Ovid has given us of Byblis's paſſion. It is to be obſerved that in an affair of this kind, a Queen has not the advantage which other women enjoy; becauſe ſhe is attended by perſons, who on account of their inferiority, dare not to make her a declaration of love: ſhe therefore muſt make the firſt advances, and firſt diſcover her tender pangs. Other women, generally ſpeaking, will be attacked; and even when they wiſh to be conquered, they ſtand on the defenſive, and glory in it (4); whereas a Queen is obliged to attack, and to be expoſed to the ſhame of acting againſt all the rules of decency. I do not ſpeak of the danger of her not being underſtood; ſhe herſelf is poſſeſſed of methods to free herſelf from that peril, ſhe never failing to diſcover the ſtate of her ſoul one time or other. Our

(2) Vulnus alit venis, & cæco carpitur igne. Virgil Æneid. lib. 4. ver. 2.

(3) In note [B] of the Article BYBLIS.

(4) Pugnabit primo fortaſſis, & improbe, dicet; Pugnando vinci ſed tamen illa volet. Ovid. de Arte amandi, lib. 1. ver. 667.

againſt the State; for it was he who adviſed Alphonſo King of Arragon to return to Naples (c), which he had left for no other reaſon but becauſe he could not carry off forcibly from thence Queen Joan, who had adopted him her ſon. The reader may judge how ſtrongly this Queen muſt hate for ever after the party of her ungrateful ſon. Nevertheleſs Caraccioli undertook to make this very party triumph in the Kingdom of Naples. His machinations were diſcovered; and, to fruſtrate them, confidence was ſeemingly repoſed in him; and upon this ſpecious pretence he was allured into the Queen's preſence, who, by the advice of her female favourite, cauſed him to be put to death in Auguſt anno 1432 (d) [B]. In the beginning of the rupture between Alphonſo of Arragon, and Joan Queen of Naples; Caraccioli, who was ſent to viſit this Prince who feigned an indiſpoſition, was impriſoned (e), but releaſed ſome time after (f). See Paſquier, chap. 16. du VI Livre des recherches de la France.

(c) Mariana, lib. 21. cap. 5.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(f) Idem, ibid.

(e) Simulat rex valetudinem. Joannes Caracciolus Seneſcallus majori apud reginam gratia & auctoritate quam honeſtum eſſet, ad inviſendum accedens capitur. Mariana, lib. 20. cap. 13.

Our Jane of Naples tried ſo many methods, that, without being forced to breath the words, I love you; or to expreſs herſelf in ſuch plain and courſe terms as were addreſſed to Joſeph the Patriarch (5), ſhe diſcovers her fond wiſhes. A Queen runs very little danger of being refuſed. The advantages which thoſe who acquieſce with her deſires would gain, and the evils to which ſuch perſons would be expoſed, did they not anſwer the firſt advances of a Queen (6) generally compel them to gratify her.

(5) Gen. xxxix. 7.

(6) See note [C] of the article FAUSTA.

[B] This Queen, by the advice of her favourite, had him put to death.] Mariana relates it thus: Princeps concilii autor Cobella Rufa Antonii Sueſſæ Ducis conjux, quæ præcipuum gratiæ & auctoritatis locum apud Reginam nacta erat, eoque implacabili odio in Caracciolum ferebatur (7). i. e. "The perſon who chiefly adviſed "this, was Cobella Rufa, the Duke of Sueſſa's Lady, "who was moſt in favour, and had the greateſt au- "thority with the Queen, and for that reaſon ſhe bore "an implacable hatred to Caraccioli." Obſerve, that according to ſome Authors, this Queen rather connived at Caraccioli's murther, than commanded it (8). She pardoned the murtherers; confiſcated the eſtate of the deceaſed, and branded his memory. He did not take this Princeſs to be his enemy, for he no ſooner heard the falſe and inſidious meſſage ſent him by the aſſaſſins viz. that he muſt immediately wait upon the Queen, who was ſeized with an apoplectic fit, but he ſtarted up and opened his chamber door, being half naked. Upon this the murtherers ruſhed in, and killed him the 27th of Auguſt, on which day he had ſolemnized, with great pomp, his ſon's nuptials (9).

(7) Marian. lib. 25. cap. 5.

(8) Non tam jubente quàm non negante regina. Spondanus, ad ann. 1442. num. 18.

(9) Extracted from Spondanus, ibid.

CARACCIOLI (JOHN ANTHONY) ſon to John Caraccioli Prince of Melphi, Marſhal of France, &c. was Biſhop of Troies in the 16th Century, and turned Calviniſt publickly, anno 1561. See Moreri's Dictionary, but take notice that Thuanus's words are there diſguiſed. He is made to ſay what he never ſaid (a); and a remarkable circumſtance ſpecified by him is omitted, viz. that the Proteſtants acknowledged Caraccioli for Biſhop, after he had publickly embraced their Religion [A]. This deſerves to be examined.

(a) This is eſpecially viſible in the later editions, where the Editors have printed in Italic, thoſe words which it is pretended are from Thuanus.

CARBO

[A] The Proteſtants acknowledged Caraccioli for Biſhop, after he had publickly embraced their Religion.] Thuanus relates, that a doubt was raiſed in the mind of this Biſhop, on account of his not having been elected by the ſuffrages of the Church, nor by thoſe of the people: that for this reaſon he aſſembled the Elders of the Proteſtant Conſiſtory; in order that they might enquire and conſult in a pious and wiſe manner, whether they would elect and acknowledge him for Biſhop. He declared, that he would have no favour ſhewn him; and that if he were not judged qualified for that office, he would very willingly reſign it. This affair having been debated, he was unanimouſly elected, and re-ordained; took his ſeat as Biſhop, and preached often; till the other Prelates fearing this example would be of ill conſequence, prevailed upon the King to have him deprived of the Epiſcopal dignity. Ei ſcrupulus injectus eſt de vocatione ſuâ, quod non Eccleſiæ neque populi ſuffragiis electus eſſet; itaque Proteſtantium Eccleſiæ ſeniores evocat, ut pie ac prudenter deſpicerent, an ſe eligere vellent, ac pro Epiſcopo habere; neque quidquam gratiæ darent; nam ſi minus idoneum exiſtimarent, ſe libenter loco ceſſurum. Ita re inter eos deliberatâ, omnium conſenſu electus & denuo ordinatus loco Epiſcopi ſedit, in concionibus publicè ad populum, quibus eorum doctrinam ſequebatur, habendis aſſiduus, donec præſules exemplum veriti apud Regem pervicerunt ut dignitate moveretur (1). Ought Moreri to have omitted this circumſtance? We ſhall ſoon ſee, that it does not agree with Beza's relation; and that nevertheleſs Thuanus has only copied Peter Martyr, who had been on the ſpot.

(1) Thuanus, lib. 28. pag. m. 569. vol. 1. C. ad ann. 1561.

One of the Preſbyterian Miniſters who were baniſhed England anno 1662, publiſhed an apology in which he refutes a work written by Durel (2), in favour of Epiſcopacy. I have read in that apology the anſwer which was made to Durel, who had proved by this example of Caraccioli Biſhop of Troies, that the Proteſtants of France did not condemn Epiſcopacy. It was objected to him, that if they had acknowledged this proſelyte as a real Biſhop, it was becauſe they underſtood, by the word Biſhop, a Miniſter of God's word; and not a perpetual Preſident in the aſſembly of Miniſters or Preſbyters; and ſtill leſs in the ſignification of a Prelate, who regulates all things without the advice of the Preſbyters (3). It moreover added, Inceſſit animum boni viri ſcrupulus, an poſſit munus paſtoris obire, eo quod non haberet Eccleſiæ & populi confirmationem ſeu electionem, inde (utar ipſiſſimis verbis Petri Martyris in Epiſtola ad Bezam.) "Seniores Ec- "cleſiæ Reformatæ accerſivit, rogavitque, ut pie ac pru- "denter deſpicerent, an eum vellent eligere, & confir- "mare, ac pro Epiſcopo habere, quod ſi judicarent faci- "endum, ſe daturum operam, ut ſicut cæpit ita pergeret, Eccleſiam ſibi commiſſam docendo & hortando, "pro viribus ædificare, & augere, ſin verò exiſtima- "rent illum minus idoneum ad tantum munus, libere "atque apertè dicerent, ſe autem paratum eſſe loco ce- "dere, modo ei liceat in Eccleſiâ Reformatâ vivere, jux- "ta Sanctam Evangelii Diſciplinam. Rogavit ut ea "de re mature in Eccleſiâ deliberarent; quod cum fac- "tum eſſet, ab omnibus unanimiter ut verus Epiſcopus "agnitus eſt & receptus Nov. 16. 1561 (4). i. e. "Carraccioli (that good man) doubting whether he "could take upon him the exerciſe of the paſtoral "functions, as he had not been confirmed or elected "either by the Church or the People, he thereupon "(to uſe the very words of Peter Martyr in his letter "to Beza) aſſembled the Elders of the Reformed "Church, and deſired them to conſider piouſly and "prudently, whether they would elect, confirm and "receive him as Biſhop; which if they ſhould think "proper to do, he would uſe his endeavours to pro- "ceed as he had begun; and by inſtructing and ad- "moniſhing the Church committed to his care, and "would increaſe and edify it to the utmoſt of his "power; but that in caſe they thought him incapable "of exerciſing ſo weighty a charge, they then ſhould "ſpeak their minds freely and openly, in which caſe "he was ready to reſign; he deſiring nothing more, "than to be permitted to live in the Reformed Church, "according to the Holy Rules enjoyned by the Goſpel. "He entreated them to deliberate ſeriouſly in the "Church, on this affair; which being done he was "unanimouſly acknowledged to be a true Biſhop, "and accordingly was received as ſuch the 16th of "November 1561." Thus we find Thuanus and Peter Martyr agree exactly in their relation; we therefore

(2) He was at that time Miniſter of the Savoy in London, which is an Epiſcopal Church.

(3) Apologia pro Miniſtris in Anglia (vulgo) nonconformiſtis, pag. 163. edit. 1665.

(4) Idem, ibid.

CARBO (a) (LEWIS) Author of ſeveral works of Rhetoric, Philoſophy, and Divinity, lived towards the end of the ſixteenth Century. He was not a Lawyer, as Konig affirms, but a Divine; and was even Profeſſor of Divinity at Perugia. Servilius Treus, a native of Udino, was one of Carbo's good friends, and adviſed ſeveral perſons to purchaſe the Rhetoric which Carbo had publiſhed. This reaſon, among others, determined Carbo to dedicate to him his Introductio in Logicam [A], printed at Venice, anno 1579, in 8vo. An Author cannot but be very well pleaſed to have his works recommended.

(a) He takes à Coſtacciaro, for his ſurname.

muſt not think it ſtrange, that Durel ſhould aſſert that Caraccioli was acknowledged as a true Biſhop by the Proteſtants of France; for who could better prove this than Peter Martyr, who, after the conference of Poiſſy, paſſed by Troies, on purpoſe to ſee the Biſhop, who publickly declared himſelf a Proteſtant (5)? Nevertheleſs the Author of the abovementioned apology, charges Durel with being guilty either of a fraud or negligence, and in order to prove this, he compares his words with the following paſſage taken from the Hiſtorian of the Proteſtant Churches of France.

(5) Thuanus, lib. 28. ad ann. 1561.

" About the end of September, Meſſire Anthony " Caraccioli, Biſhop of Troies, coming back from " the conference of Poiſſy, where he had reaped no " benefit; and being alſo ſollicited by ſome Princeſſes " and other Ladies of the Court, he appeared before " the Conſiſtory of the Church of Troies, acknow- " ledging his errors in a ſolemn manner, and deſiring " to be admitted to the Miniſterial Functions. Upon " this the opinions were divided, ſome thinking it " would be a great advantage to have him on their " ſide; while others ſuſpecting him, and not without " cauſe, his fickleneſs and lewd life till then being " but too well known; at laſt, they agreed to aſk the " advice of the Miniſters, who were ſtill aſſembled at " Poiſſy, and being a little perplexed with this af- " fair, becauſe of ſeveral circumſtances which were " ſpread concerning it, ſent to deſire the advice of " the Church of Geneva, whoſe judgment is inſerted " in the Latin anſwers of Calvin (6). In the mean " time, the famous Peter Martyr paſſed thro' Troies, " in his return from Poiſſy to his Church at Zurich, " by whoſe (Peter Martyr's) advice, the Biſhop hav- " ing abjured his errors, and ſigned his confeſſion of " faith, and promiſed to reſign his Biſhoprick; he " was admitted into the Miniſtry, but not without " being oppoſed by one of the Miniſters called Peter " le Roy. Nevertheleſs having quitted his Biſhoprick, " on condition of having certain penſions which the " Queen procured him, Caraccioli began to preach, " he having a much greater flow of words, than true " learning. He afterwards behaved very ill, as ſhall " be ſhewn in its place (7)."

(6) I believe it is in the 373d of Calvin's Epiſt. pag. 726. edition Hanov. 1597.

(7) Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. des Egliſes Réformées, tom. 1. lib. 5. pag. 767. ad ann. 1561.

If this relation could be reconciled with that of Peter Martyr, we then muſt ſay, that Durel has expreſſed himſelf in the moſt obſcure and deceitful manner. I allow, that if Durel knew what the Author of the Hiſtory of the Proteſtant Churches had ſaid, he ought either to have refuted him, or have reconciled him to the beſt of his power with Peter Martyr: but there is ſome little probability that he knew nothing of it; and that he did not ſuſpect there were relations ſo different from thoſe of that Miniſter, and which were adopted and confirmed by Thuanus. Durel took advantage of the obſervation which this illuſtrious Hiſtorian employed to ſtrengthen his relation, viz. that the Biſhops of France feared the conſequences of the Biſhop of Troies's conduct, and for this reaſon they prevailed with the King to diveſt him of the Epiſcopal dignity. Now the apologiſt for the Preſbyterians eludes this Remark, by ſaying, that the Biſhops feared the conſequences of the conduct of the Biſhop of Troies, becauſe, that if the election of Biſhops could not be lawful without the voice or conſent of the people, all the hierarchy would be deſtroyed; and becauſe Caraccioli frequently condemned in his Sermons, either the idleneſs of the Prelates, or the cares they beſtowed on other matters (8). But this is far from the queſtion: it is evident Thuanus meant, that the fear of the Biſhops was founded on this reaſon, viz. upon Caraccioli's ſtill poſſeſſing his Biſhoprick after he had turned Proteſtant. It is by this means that his example might have been of very dangerous conſequence. Several Prelates would perhaps have forſaken the Romiſh Religion, had they been ſure of preſerving their Biſhopricks, by getting themſelves confirmed by the people among the Calviniſts. There was no room to fear, that any of them would have quitted their Sees, were they only to become Proteſtant Miniſters without any title or character in the Church. We may then aſſert that Durel's antagoniſt miſtook, and ſtruck into mere common places of controverſy, in order that he might have an opportunity chiefly to reproach the Engliſh Biſhops with their neglect of preaching (9).

(8) Apologia pro Miniſtris in Anglia, pag. 166.

(9) Ibid. and pag. ſeq.

[A] Servilius Treus . . . . adviſed . . . . the Rhetoric. . . . This reaſon among others, determined Carbo to dedicate to him his Introductio in Logicam.] The uſual common place, by which it is ſaid, that the perſon to whom an Author dedicates his work ſhall be the Protector of it (1), failed not of being firſt mentioned in this Epiſtle Dedicatory. After this followed the common place of gratitude, and therein the Panegyriſt, among other ſervices, expatiated on the applauſes which had been given to the treatiſe of Rhetoric, and the Exhortations that were made for people to purchaſe it. Deinde ſi iis potiſſime Opera dicanda . . . as it is expreſſed in folio 2d verſe, of the dedication of the work entitled Lud. Carbonis Introduct. in Logicam, Venetiis, 1597, in 8*vo.* to hortatum incluſive.

(1) See on this ſubject the note [C] of the Article ANTESIGNAN.

Obſerve that Servilius Treus, to whom thoſe Books, were dedicated, was a Lawyer who had exerciſed ſeveral conſiderable employments in the Republick of Venice. They are all enumerated in this Epiſtle Dedicatory. He was one of the ſeven Commiſſioners who preſided over the building of Palma nuova; and he made a ſpeech on that occaſion which was printed, and applauded by Carbo, who did not fail to obſerve, that his friend poſſeſſed a very rare and uncommon talent, viz. his being very fit for buſineſs, and at the ſame time very learned. It is certain that theſe two qualities meet very ſeldom in the ſame perſon (2); for a ſtrong application to ſtudy, generally makes a man not very capable of exerciſing public employments, I mean of ſuch employments as are not of a literary kind. Ut id omnes in te admirati ſunt quod in paucis reperitur doctrina, ... in the ſame Work, folio, a 4, to Itaque excluſive.

(2) See the Preface to the Oeuvres de Sarraſin.

This Epiſtle Dedicatory is dated from Venice, the 5th of June 1597.

CARDAN (JEROM), a Phyſician, and one of the greateſt genius's of his age, was born at Pavia the 24th of September 1501 (a) [A]. As his mother was not married

(a) Cardan, de vita propria, pag. 12. edit. Paris 1643, 8vo.

[A] He was born . . . the 24th of September 1501.] I would not depend on what I read in Chapter II of his Life, Ortus ſum an. M. D. VIII Calend. Octobris. I ſhall not criticize on the ill conſtruction of thoſe words, tho' they make the reader doubt, whether Cardan was born the 1ſt of October 1508, or the 24th of September 1500, but will examine other particulars. Cardan relates, that he was ſeized with a fit of ſickneſs which had like to have carried him off, in the beginning of his eighth year (1); and that he was recovered when the French made rejoicings for the victory obtained by them over the Venetians near the Adda (2). It is certain, that this victory was won the 14th of May 1509; and it is very probable, that Cardan fell ſick towards the cloſe of September 1508; at which time he was entering into his eighth year, and therefore

(1) Cardan, de Vitâ propriâ, cap. 4. pag. 14. Paris edition 1643.

(2) Convalui dum Galli, de victis in Alduæ confinii, Venetis celebrabant triumphum. Cardanus, ibid.

married [B], ſhe did whatever lay in her power, when with child, to deſtroy the fruit of her womb; but the potions ſhe took for that purpoſe, had not the wiſhed for effect (b). She was three days in labour; and they were forced at laſt to tear the child out of her. His head, at his birth, was covered with black, curled hair (c). At four years old he was ſent to Milan (d), where his father was a Lawyer (e); and at eight years of age, being ſeized with a dangerous illneſs, he was devoted to St. Jerom. It was his father made this vow; he choſe rather to have recourſe to this Saint than to his familiar Dæmon, he boaſting highly that he had one. His ſon never thought proper to aſk him the reaſon of ſuch a preference (f). Being twenty years old he went and ſtudied in the Univerſity of Pavia; and two years after explained Euclid there. He went to Padua anno 1524; took the ſame year his Maſter of Arts degree; and towards the cloſe of 1525, that of Doctor of Phyſick (g). He married about the end of the year 1531 (h). He had been incapable, during the ten preceding years, of having any commerce with women [C], which was a great grief to him. He was full thirty three years of age, when he ſet up for Profeſſor of Mathematics at Milan; and two years after, he was offered a Profeſſorſhip in Phyſick at Pavia, which he refuſed, not ſeeing any likelihood of having his ſalary paid him (i). In 1539 he was made a Fellow of the College of Phyſicians at Milan; and anno 1543, he taught Phyſic publickly in that city. He did the ſame at Pavia the year following, but left off teaching at the year's end, becauſe his ſalary was not paid him, and returned to Milan (k). In 1547 he refuſed an advantageous employment which the King of Denmark offered him; the air and Religion of that country prompting him not to accept of the offer [D]. In 1552 he went into Scotland,

(b) Cardanus, de vita propria, pag. 7.

(c) Ibid. pag. 8.

(d) Ibid. pag. 13.

(e) See the remark [S], ſome particulars concerning him.

(f) Cardanus, de vita propria, pag. 14.

(g) Ibid. pag. 16, 17.

(h) Ibid. pag. 19.

(i) Ibid.

(k) Ibid. pag. 20.

therefore was born about the end of September 1501. If any of my readers ſhould not be ſatisfied with this proof, upon pretence that Cardan's illneſs might have begun in September 1507, they may ſee in what manner Cardan fixes, in another place (3), his thirty fifth year to 1536. Baillet was in the right to obſerve, that Authors vary and are very obſcure, with regard to the exact time of Cardan's birth and death (4). See the Note [F].

(3) Ibid. pag. 19, 20.

(4) Baillet, vol. 1. of the Anti, pag. 46, & ſeq.

[B] His mother was not married.] She was called Clara Micheria (5). I have not found any paſſage, where her ſon declares expreſly that ſhe was not married; he indeed ſays in one place that ſhe endeavoured to deſtroy the fruit of her womb, and that his father did not live with her; but thoſe two circumſtances do not imply that a woman is not married. Many married women take potions to deſtroy the infant they are going with: the books of the Caſuiſts manifeſt this but too much; and the Confeſſors know enough of this matter. Beſides, married perſons often ſeparate from bed and board. Should then the reaſon be aſked me, why I pronounce Cardan a baſtard; it is this. The two abovementioned circumſtances, which I ſaid did not imply a woman's not being married, are yet commonly a mark of illegitimate birth. If they had not been ſo with regard to Cardan, he would have declared it expreſly; for he would not have been ignorant of the conſequence which would naturally be drawn from his confeſſion. Since therefore he does not ſpeak of his mother's being married, after having related the two particulars on which I inſiſt; there is no room to doubt, but that he was begot in a criminal way. After he was ſeven years of age he was brought up at his father's; and at that time his mother and her ſiſter lived in his father's houſe. This does not prove that ſhe was married; ſince the ſame may happen to a kept miſtreſs. I have read in a modern Writer (6) that Cardan owns *, that the College of Phyſicians of Milan would not admit him into their body, becauſe they ſuſpected that he was a baſtard. The word ſuſpected is remarkable. It proves evidently, that the public did not know whether Cardan's father and mother had been really married. Be this as it will, the modern Writer juſt now cited, employs a very improper expreſſion, when he ſays, that Cardan plainly declares himſelf a ſon of a whore; beginning the Hiſtory of his own Life by the action of his mother, who did whatever lay in her power to deſtroy him in her womb (7). The word Whore is altogether improper in this place; not only becauſe Cardan does in no way own that his mother was a concubine; but becauſe, that ſuppoſing he had owned it expreſly, we yet ought not to conclude from thence that he had treated her ſo ignominiouſly. A concubine and a whore are generally two very different perſons. Eſt enim meretrix quæ (ut loquitur Imp. in l. 22. C. ad L. Jul. de adult.) pudorem ſuum vulgi libidinibus proſternit, quæ paſſim venalem formam habet, & quæſtum inde facit (8). i. e. "A whore "(according to the Emperor Juſtinian) is a woman "who proſtitutes herſelf to any one; and who lets "out her body to all men without exception, for profit "and hire."

(5) Cardanus, de Vitâ propriâ, pag. 6.

(6) La Mothe le Vayer, vol. 10. Lettre 43. pag. 345.

* De Conſolatione, lib. 3. cap. 2.

(7) La Mothe le Vayer, tom. 2. Lett. 63. pag. 38.

(8) Marquardus Freherus, de Famâ, lib. 2. cap. 11. pag. m. 211.

[C] He married... in 1531. He had been incapable, during the ten preceding years, of having any commerce with women.] He aſcribes this to the malignant influences of the conſtellation which preſided over his birth. The two inauſpicious Planets, with Sol, Venus, and Mercury, were in the human ſigns; for this reaſon, ſays he, I was not to decline from the human form; and becauſe Jupiter had the aſcendant, and Venus was predominant over the whole figure, I was only injured in the privy parts, adds he; ſo that from the age of one and twenty till to thirty one, I have not been able to have the leaſt commerce with women, which obliged me to bewail my fate, and to envy the happineſs of all other men. Cum Sol & maleficæ ambæ & Venus & Mercurius eſſent in ſignis humanis, ideo non declinavi à forma humana; ſed cum Jupiter eſſet in aſcendente, & Venus totius figuræ domina, non fui oblæſus niſi in genitalibus, ut à xxi anno ad xxxi, non potuerim concumbere cum mulieribus, & ſæpius deſterem ſortem meam, cuique alteri propriam invidens (9). When he enumerates the greateſt calamities of his life, he finds four, the firſt of which according to him, is that of not having been capable of diverting himſelf with the Fair Sex; the ſecond was the tragical end of his eldeſt ſon; the third, his being thrown into priſon; the fourth, the diſſolute life his younger ſon led. Totidem maxima detrimenta & impedimenta, primum concubitus, ſecundum mortis ſævæ filii, tertium carceris, quartum improbitatis filii natu minoris (10). In another place, he makes a longer enumeration of his misfortunes, and does not omit his impotency. Infelicitates ſunt mors filiorum maximè ſæva, aut ſtultitia vel ſterilitas; impotentia ad congreſſum mulierum; paupertas perpetua, pugna, accuſationes, incommoda, morbi, pericula, carcer, injuria in præferendo immeritos tot & toties (11). i. e. "My misfortunes "are, the very cruel death, the folly, or barrenneſs "of my children; my own impotency; my perpe"tual poverty, the diſſenſions in which I was engag"ed; accuſations, loſſes, diſeaſes, dangers, impriſon"ment; the injury that was ſo often done me, in pre"ferring ſo many worthleſs perſons before me."

(9) Cardanus, de Vitâ propriâ, cap. 2. pag. 8.

(10) Ibib. cap. 30. pag. 116.

(11) Ibid. cap. 46. pag. 259.

[D] The air and Religion of that Country prompting him not to accept of the offer.] His friend Andrew Veſalius would have procured him this employment. Cardan was to have had eight hundred crowns a year, and a table at Court. But he refuſed theſe advantages, for the following reaſon, among others, viz. becauſe he would have been obliged to forſake the Romiſh Religion in order to live quietly at that country. Oblata eſt conditio D. CCC. Coronatorum in ſingulos annos à rege Daniæ, quam recipere nolui, cum etiam victus impenſam land [E], and came back to Milan about ten months after (l). He continued in this city till penſam ſuppeditaret, non ſolum ob regionis intemperiem, ſed quod alio ſacrorum modo conſuevisſent, ut vel ibi male acceptus futurus eſſem, vel patriam meam legem majorumque relinquere coactus (12). To judge of matters, from the idea, which one would at firſt entertain of Cardan's Religion, one would not have ſuppoſed him to be ſo very conſcientious. We ought to ſuſpect the overhaſty opinions which are formed of people on mere prejudices, and at firſt ſight, and go to the fountain head. With regard to my ſelf, after the peruſal of Cardan's work de Vita propria, I conſidered him as a ſuperſtitious perſon rather than a free-thinker. I own indeed that he himſelf confeſſes he had very little piety, parum pius (13); but he aſſures us in the preceding page, that tho' he was naturally very revengeful (14), he yet neglected to wreak his vengeance, whenever an opportunity offer'd for that purpoſe; he neglected it, I ſay, out of reverence to the Almighty. Dei ob venerationem, & quod omnia hæc vana quantum ſint dignoſco, occaſiones oblatas ultionum etiam conſulto negligo (15). No prayers nor conſtant attendance at Church, are equal to the worſhip which is paid to God in that manner; I mean in obeying his laws from the reverence we bear him, and in oppoſition to the ſtrongeſt propenſions of nature. A certain Writer therefore goes too far when he declares, that Cardan, by his own confeſſion, was an impious man (16). He boaſts his having refuſed a conſiderable ſum of money from the King of England, becauſe he would not allow him the titles which the Pope had deprived him of. Renui quingentos, certè aliqui dicunt mille (veritatem ſcire non potui) quod titulo ipſius regis, in pontificis præjudicium ſubſcribere noluerim (17). This is meant of King Edward, whoſe hand he had the honour to kiſs at London, in 1552. He relates, that having found among his father's manuſcripts, that prayers addreſſed to the holy Virgin, the firſt of April at eight in the morning, were very efficacious when joined to a Pater and an Ave Maria, he had offer'd up theſe prayers on very urgent occaſions, and received the greateſt benefit from them (18). He is angry with Polybius for denying the reality of apparitions, and ſuch other tenets of the religion of the Heathens (19). In fine, nothing can be wiſer and more ſolid, than the reflections made by him in the 22d chapter of his Life, where he lays down his religion and piety. Do the reaſons which he gives why he loved ſolitude, ſavour of impiety? When alone, ſays he, I am more than at any other time with thoſe I love, I mean with the Almighty and my good Angel. Diligo ſolitudinem, nunquam enim magis ſum cum his quos vehementer diligo quam cum ſolus ſum: diligo autem Deum, & ſpiritum bonum: hos dum ſolus ſum contemplor, immenſum bonum, ſapientiam æternam, lucis puræ principium & autorem, gaudium verum in nobis, ubi periculum non eſt ne nos deſerat, veritatis fundamentum, amorem voluntarium, autorem omnium, qui beatus eſt in ſeipſo, & beatorum omnium tutela & deſiderium; juſtitia profundiſſima ſeu altiſſima, mortuos curans, & viventium non oblitus, ſpiritus autem mandato illius me defendebo, miſericors, conſultor bonus, & in adverſis auxiliator & conſolator (20). i. e. "I love ſolitude; "for I am not at any time more with thoſe I love "from my ſoul, than when I am alone. I love God "and my good Angel; and theſe, when I am alone, "I contemplate; the boundleſs Good, eternal Wiſ"dom; the Fountain and Author of pure light and "knowledge; the Spring of true joy in the human "mind, which there is no danger of its ever loſing; "the Foundation of truth, diſintereſted love; the Crea"tor of all things, who is happy in himſelf, and "the Guardian and Protector of all who are happy; "the higheſt and moſt perfect Juſtice, extending its "care to the dead, and not forgetful of the living. "And the Angel who, by his command, is my De"fender; a kind and compaſſionate Counſellor; a "Helper and Comforter in diſtreſs."

(l) Cardan, de vita propria, pag. 22.

Nevertheleſs I would not either deny or affirm what I have read in Martin del Rio. This Author aſſures, that Cardan had written a work on the Mortality of the Soul, which he uſed to ſhew ſometimes to his intimate friends (21). This work was never printed. On the contrary, a book of Cardan's was publiſhed on the Immortality of the Soul; in which, ſome were diſpleaſed at his ſaying, that fate and the advice of friends, would not ſuffer him to declare all his thoughts on that ſubject. This, ſay they, is a ſign, that he publiſhed this book merely from a political view, and that his heart was corrupt as before. Cum eo ipſo opere (de Animarum Immortalitate) Cap. 13. pag. 280. apertè prodat fato ſe ac monitis prohiberi reliqua dicere quæ de Anima ſentiret, ſuſpicio eſt hunc Polypum ad eam ſcriptionem metu infamiæ adactum, verè anterius talè quid ſcripſiſſe contra Animæ Immortalitatem quale nonnulli referunt, idque doctrinæ venenum ejus in pectore etiam poſt editum eum quem retuli librum, delituiſſe (22). But I believe theſe people are miſtaken. Dr. Parker, who has exhibited very happily the extravagancies and wild whims of Cardan, thinks he is much more an Enthuſiaſt than an Atheiſt, and I believe he is in the right. See pag. 77 of his Treatiſe de Deo. However it cannot be denied, but that Cardan's works are interſperſed with very pernicious doctrines. Father Theophilus Raynaud points out ſome of them, in the paſſage juſt cited; and concludes with proſcribing this Phyſician's works, in the following manner; the Chief, ſays he, of Atheiſts of the ſecond claſs. Homo nullius religionis ac fidei, & inter clancularios Atheos ſecundi ordinis ævo ſuo facilè princeps. i. e. "A man without either faith or "religion, and Chief of the ſecond claſs of ſecret A"theiſts, in his time."

The elder Scaliger relates ſome words from Cardan's work on the Immortality of the Soul, which are directly of the ſame import with the impious tenets of Averroës. Cardan affirms that there is but one underſtanding in the ſublunary regions; and that this underſtanding which is human ſo far only as the matter or ſubſtance of man is capable of receiving it, enters men, and thereby they produce intelligent acts; that it alſo approaches beaſts and ſurrounds, but cannot enter them, becauſe of the diſproportion of their matter; it therefore illuminates men internally, and irradiates beaſts externally only (23). This is all the difference Cardan allows between the underſtanding of men and that of Brutes. Thence it follows evidently that the ſouls of men are not more perfect than thoſe of brutes, which are inferiour to the former in matter only; whence it follows, that our ſoul is as mortal as that of a dog. If the Reader ſhould meet with other principles of this kind in the above mentioned work of Cardan, he muſt not wonder at it; for it is no more than a rhapſody of ſeveral pieces, which he had collected here and there from the works of Pomponatius and Auguſtin Niphus &c. Ne vero tibi placeas in illis tuis Commentariis (de Immortalitate Animæ) quos confuſos diximus: nihil enim aliud ſunt quàm ſarrago præceptorum meorum, Pomponatii, Sueſſani, Dominici de Flandria, quæ tua feciſti ridiculis fabellis declamatoriis (24). To conceal his plagiariſm, he intermixed declamations with the doctrines he uſed to ſteal from thoſe Philoſophers. Thomaſius might have added theſe words of Scaliger, to thoſe he quotes from Naudæus (25), to ſhew that Cardan had been a Plagiary (26).

[E] In 1552 he went into Scotland.] He relates, that the Archbiſhop of St. Andrews (27), Primate of the Kingdom, ſent for him; after having applied in vain to the Phyſicians of the King of France, and afterwards to thoſe of the Emperor (28). This Prelate paid him largely for his voyage. Cardan, by this means travelled thro' ſeveral countries; he croſſed France in going; and returned thro' the Low-Countries and Germany along the banks of the Rhine (29). It was on this occaſion he went to London, and calculated the Nativity of King Edward, of which I ſhall perhaps take notice in ſome other article.

I ſhall here add, that this Archbiſhop, then forty two years old, had been ſick ten years (30). His diſeaſe was a great ſhortneſs of breath, with which he had been troubled, every week continually, during two years (31). Till that time the intervals had been longer. The Archbiſhop began to recover from the moment Cardan preſcribed to him (32). This Phyſician quitted the Prelate ſeventy five days after his arrival; and left him preſcriptions, by which a complete cure was wrought in two years (33). This is all he relates concerning the voyage in queſtion; he does not

(12) Ibid. cap. 4. pag. 21. See alſo cap. 32. pag. 139.

(13) Ibid. cap. 13. pag. 59.

(14) Ultionis deſiderium ultra vires nedum prona voluntas, ut illud placeat quod multi damnant verbo ſaltem. At vindicta bonum vita jucundius ipſa. Ibid. pag. 57.

(15) Ibid. pag. 58.

(16) Teiſſier, Elog. tom. 1. pag. 496. See below note [U].

(17) Cardanus, de Vitâ propriâ, cap. 29. pag. 107.

(18) Cardanus, de Vitâ propriâ, cap. 36. pag. 166.

(19) Ibid. cap. 43. pag. 232.

(20) Ibid. cap. 35. pag. 315.

(21) Del Rio, Diſquiſit. Magicar. tom. 1. lib. 2. Queſtion 26. Sect. 2. pag. m. 255.

(22) Th. Raynaudus, Erotem. IV de bonis ac malis Libris, num. 44.

(23) See Scaliger, Exercitat. 307. num. 30. pag. m. 987.

(24) Idem, Scaliger, ibid. num. 31. pag. 939.

(25) The reader will find them in note [Q], citation (68).

(26) Thomaſ. de Plagio Literario, n. 376. pag. m. 165.

(27) He calls him Amulthon; but ſhould have ſaid Hamilton.

(28) Cardanus, de Vitâ propriâ, cap. 40. pag. 192. See alſo cap. 29.

(29) Ibid. cap. 29.

(30) Idem, ibid. cap. 40. pag. 192.

(31) Idem, cap. 29. pag. 104.

(32) Ibid. cap. 40. pag. 193.

(33) Idem, ibid.

till the beginning of Oct. 1552, and then went to Pavia; from whence he was invited to Bologna anno 1562. He taught in this laſt city till the year 1570, at which time he was thrown into priſon; and ſome months after he was brought home. He did not enjoy his full liberty on this occaſion, he being confined in his houſe, but was not long ſo. He left Bologna in September 1571, and went to Rome, where he lived without any public employment. He was admitted a Member of the College of Phyſicians, and received a ſalary from the Pope (m). He died at Rome the 21ſt of September 1575 (n), if we may credit Thuanus, who perhaps has not been accurate enough [F]. This account would ſufficiently prove to the reader, that Cardan was of a very fickle temper; but he will have a much better idea of the ſingular and odd turn of his mind, by peruſing what he himſelf tells us concerning his good and bad qualities [G]. This frankneſs is itſelf an evident proof that his ſoul was of a very peculiar caſt [H]. He informs us (o), that not boaſt the prediction I ſhall here give. "This "Archbiſhop was ill of a dropſy which the Phyſi- "cians looked upon as incurable, but he was cured "by Cardan. . . . If we are to believe what is related "concerning this famous Aſtrologer, he gave a dread- "ful proof of his Art to the Archbiſhop whom he "had cured, when taking leave he ſpoke to him as "follows: That he had been able to cure the Archbiſhop "of his ſickneſs; but could not change his deſtiny, nor "prevent his being hanged. His prediction was veri- "fied by the event; and eighteen years after, this "Prelate was condemned (by the Commiſſioners ap- "pointed by Mary Queen Regent of Scotland) to be "hanged *. Which ſentence was executed. After this "we muſt not wonder, if ſome Hiſtorians, (eſpecially "the Scotch) call Cardan a Necromancer (34)." There are two reaſons which make me doubt, whether ſuch a prediction was made to this Archbiſhop. I, The firſt is, that Cardan was a man of too ſelfiſh a nature, and too well ſkilled in the quackery of Aſtrology, to make ſuch horrid menaces to a Prelate in ſo high a ſtation as this Archbiſhop. Aſtrologers very ſeldom tell a perſon of high diſtinction, that he is ſentenced by his ſtars to an ignominious death: they promiſe him all ſuch things, as they imagine he wiſhes for moſt earneſtly, and by that means dive the deeper into his purſe. Hence it is, that whenever a Nobleman endeavours not to be impoſed upon by them, he generally conſults this kind of people, without making himſelf known to them. II, My ſecond reaſon is, that had Cardan made this prediction, he would have boaſted of it in the work, wherein he relates his having cured this Archbiſhop; for at the time that he compoſed this work, this Prelate had ſome years before, met with the unhappy fate with which it is pretended Cardan threatened him: I therefore ſubmit it to my Reader whether he can ſuppoſe, that Cardan would have been ſilent, on an occaſion which ſo ſtrongly corroborated his Aſtrological Predictions.

(m) Ibid. pag. 21, 22.

(n) Thuan. lib. 42. pag. 155.

(o) Ibid. pag. 30.

* In 1570.

(34) Larrey's Hiſtory of England, vol. 1. pag. 711. anno 1551.

The Reader will find in Melvil's Memoirs, that John Hamilton Archbiſhop of St. Andrew, and brother to the Regent of the Kingdom, fell dangerouſly ſick, having for ſome time loſt his ſpeech, ſo that his life was deſpaired of; but that he recovered both his ſpeech and health, by the aſſiſtance of an Italian Necromancer, called Cardan (35).

(35) Melvil's Memoirs, pag. 45. of the Hague edition 1694.

[F] He died . . . the 21ſt of September 1575, if we may credit Thuanus, who perhaps has not been accurate enough.] If Cardan died the 21ſt of September 1575, he would have lived within three days of 74 years of age; and by that means, Thuanus would make him a year older than he really was (36). Moreover it appears from ſeveral paſſages of Cardan's life, that he was writing it during the year 1575. Naudæus found it to extend no farther than the 28th of April 1576. He therefore did not look into page 158, where Cardan's mentioned the firſt of October 1576 Teſtamenta plura condidi ad hanc uſque diem quæ eſt calendarum menſis Octobris anni M.D.LXXVI. If this date be juſt, Thuanus is miſtaken, both in the day and year *.

(36) Cum tribus diebus minus ſeptuageſimum quintum annum impleviſſet. Thuanus, lib. 62. pag. 155.

* [Father Niceron, tom. 14. pag. 248. ſays, that Bayle is miſtaken in this calculation, and that Thuanus is in the right, for which Father Niceron gave ſome reaſons, which the reader may conſult.] Addit. by the Tranſlator.

[G] They will have an idea of the ſingular and odd turn of his mind, by peruſing what he himſelf tells us concerning his good and bad qualities.] Beſides what is related in the text of this article, I ſhall here add; that he walked in ſo unequal and irregular a manner, that he doubtleſs was thought a madman. Sometimes he would walk very ſlow, and like a man who was deeply involved in thought; and then on a ſudden would ſcour along, and make very whimſical poſtures. Inceſſus inæqualis cauſa fuit cogitatio. . . . Abire in proverbium poſſet inceſſus meus, nam eſt inconſideratus, dum aliena ab his quæ præ oculis ſunt meditor. . . Ambulatio modo celeris, modo tarda, modo capite & humeris erectis, modo inclinatis (37). In Bologna, he took a pleaſure in riding publickly in a coach that had but three wheels (38). No man was ever more ſingular in his dreſs. Thuanus, who ſaw him at Rome obſerves, that his habit was quite different from that of all other men (39). His poverty was the cauſe of his whimſical dreſs; for when Cardan went to Scotland, he bought cloaths after the Scots faſhion. When he returned to Italy, having not wherewithal to buy others, and not being willing to ſell thoſe at too much loſs, he reſolved to wear them out. The whim and odd caſt of his behaviour cannot be better repreſented, than by the verſes of Horace which I ſhall cite preſently. He owns that they ſuit him exactly; and that had Horace been deſirous of drawing his character, he ought to have employed thoſe very verſes. Non aliter de me ego ſentio quàm Horatius de ſuo Tigellio: quinimo Horatium dixerim tum de me ſub illius perſonâ locuum.

(37) Cardanus, de Vitâ propriâ, cap. 21. pag. 84, 85.

(38) Naudæus, in Judicio de Cardano.

(39) Thuan. lib. 62. pag. m. 154. I cite his words below, citation (42).

Nil æquale homini fuit illi: ſæpè velut qui Currebat, fugiens hoſtem: perſæpe velut qui Junonis ſacra ferret; habebat ſæpe ducentos,
Sæpe decem ſervos: modo reges atque tetrarchas,
Omnia magna loquens; modo ſit mihi menſa tripes, &
Concha ſalis puri, & toga, quæ defendere frigus,
Quamvis craſſa queat *.

* Lib. 1. Sat. III. 9.

Quæras cauſam, imo cauſas; in promptu ſunt, varietas primo cogitationum & morum, deinde ut ſaluti prorſus conſulerem corporis; & quod cum mutaverim ſæpius Patriam, ſeu habitationis locum, coactus ſum etiam mutare veſtes; quas neque ob jacturam vendere, nec fruſtra ſervare conveniebat, ob id neceſſitas intulit legem (40). i. e. "I have juſt the ſame idea of myſelf as Ho- "race had of his Tigellius; and fancy this Poet was "ſpeaking of me when he drew that character.

(40) Cardanus, de Vitâ propriâ, cap. 20. pag. 82, 83.

"A moſt unſettled fellow, he would run
"As if he fled a robber or a dun;
"And ſtreight as in proceſſion gravely go,
"Now with two hundred ſervants, now but two:
"Sometimes he'd talk of Heroe's and of Kings,
"In mighty ſwelling numbers mighty things:
"And then again: Let gracious fortune give
"A little meat and drink enough to live:
"Let her a coat to keep out cold preſent,
"Altho' 'tis thick and coarſe, yet I'm content.

CREECH.

"If you aſk the cauſe or rather cauſes of this, it "is as follows: Firſt, the diverſity of my thoughts "and humours: Secondly, on account of my health; "again, by ſhifting my abode and going from "country to country, I am often obliged to change "my cloathes, which I could not conveniently ſell, "nor keep ſuperfluouſly; hence it was that neceſ- "ſity became a law." Cardan's mind was ſubject to the ſame irregularities. Read Thuanus's words in the following note.

[H] This frankneſs is alone an evident proof that his ſoul was of a very peculiar caſt.] Thuanus takes notice of it as a very ſingular and unuſual circumſtance. Varia ejus vita, ſays he (41), & mores; pluraque ipſa de ſe INAUDITA in viro literas profeſſo ſimplicitate ſeu libertate ſcripſit, quam curioſus quiſquam à me exigat. i. e. "His life and manners were different; and he "wrote ſeveral particulars relating to himſelf with a "ſimplicity that when nature did not make him feel any pain, he would excite that diſagreeable ſenſation in himſelf, by biting his lips, and ſqueezing his fingers till he cried out [I] ; and that he had been ſometimes prompted to lay violent hands on himſelf [K] ; that he took a pleaſure in rambling all night about the ſtreets (p) ; that he did not uſe to commit exceſs in the pleaſures of love [L], but that whenever he went greater lengths in it than was neceſſary, it prejudiced him very little ; that nothing was more delightful to him, than to ſpeak on ſuch ſubjects as might vex the company he was in (q) ; that he ſpoke on all ſubjects, but whether properly or improperly he minded not (r) ; that he had been ſo paſſionately fond of dice, as to ſpend whole days in playing at hazard, to the great prejudice of his family and reputation (s) ; for he even ſtak'd his furniture, and his wife's jewels (t) [M]. He himſelf relates theſe particulars and ſeveral others in the moſt unaffected manner. Nevertheleſs, had we his life accurately written by another hand, I do not doubt but we ſhould have found a great many more ignominious particulars in it than in this we are ſpeaking of, in which there are however ſeveral paſſages, that teſtify ſtill plainer than what has been related above, that Cardan was of a particular caſt of mind. He ſpeaks of a numberleſs multitude of prodigies, by which he foreſaw, either ſleeping or waking, what was to befall him. This made him believe that, like Socrates, and ſome other great men, he was under the care of a particular genius [N]. What ſhall

(41) Thuan. lib. 62. pag. 164.

(p) Thuan. lib. 62. pag. 32.

(q) Ibid. pag. 60.

(r) Ibid. pag. 61.

(s) Ibid. pag. 81.

(t) Ibid. pag. 94.

" ſimplicity and freedom, unheard of in a Man of Let" ters, of which I can give examples to any curious
" perſon." He adds, that he was ſurprized to find him, in Rome, where he ſaw him a few years before he died, ſo much beneath his great reputation. This made him wonder at the judgment which Julius Cæſar Scaliger had formed of Cardan ; viz. that in certain things, he appeared ſuperior to human underſtanding ; and in a great many others, inferior to that of little children. Romæ eum diverſo ab aliis cultu incedentem paucis ante obitum annis conſpicati & adlocuti, ac ſæpius admirati ſumus, cum celeberrimi tot ſcriptis hominis recordatio ſubiret ; neque tamen quidquam in eo quod tantæ famæ reſponderet animadverteremus : eoque magis Julii Cæſaris Scaligeri accerrimum judicium ſuſpeximus, qui divinum ingenium ſuum in opere de ſubtilitate exagitando, præcipuè exercuit inæqualitate illius ubique diligenter notata, qui in quibuſdam interdum plus homine ſapere, in pluribus minus pueris intelligere videtur (42). We ſhall ſee in the Note [T], that it has been thought that Cardan was ſubject to fits of madneſs.

(42) Idem, ibid.

[I] When nature did not make him feel any pain he would excite it . . . by biting his lips . . . till he cried out.] This will be leſs ſurprizing, when the reaſon of it is known. He employed this method, in order to prevent a greater evil ; for when he happened to be free from pain, he felt ſuch violent, ſuch grievous fits and ſtarts of the ſoul, that theſe were more afflicting to him than the pain it ſelf. It is this circumſtance we are to admire, and which appears indeed incredible. Fuit mihi mos (de quo plures admirabantur) ut cauſas doloris ſi non haberem, quærerem, ut dixi de podagra : unde plerumque cauſis morbificis obviam ibam (ut ſolum devitarem quantum poſſem vigilias) quòd arbitrarer voluptatem conſiſtere in dolore præcedenti ſedato : ſi ergo voluntarius ſit dolor, facilè ſedari potuerit : & quoniam experior me nunquam poſſe prorſus carere dolore, & ſi modo contingat, ſubit in animum impetus quidam adeò moleſtus, ut nihil poſſit eſſe gravius, ut multo minus malus ſit dolor, aut doloris cauſa, in qua nulla prorſus ineſt turpitudo, periculumve. Itaque ob hoc morſum labii, & digitorum diſtorſionem, & compreſſionem cutis, ac tenuis muſculi brachii ſiniſtri uſque ad lachrymas excogitavit (43). He ſays elſewhere, that in his greateſt tortures of mind, he uſed to laſh his legs ſeverely with a whip ; to bite his left arm ; to faſt ; and it was a great eaſe to him to weep, but very often he could not. In maximis animi doloribus crura verberabam virga, ſiniſtrum brachium mordebam acriter, jejunebam, levabar fletu multum, ubi contigiſſet flere, ſed perſæpe non poteram (44).

(43) Cardanus, de Vitâ propriâ, cap. 6. pag. 30.

(44) Ibid. cap. 14. pag. 65, 66.

[K] He had been prompted ſometimes to kill himſelf.] This he calls heroick Love ; and he imagines that ſeveral other perſons have been poſſeſſed with it, though they did not own it. Laboravi interdum etiam amore Heroïco, ut me ipſum trucidare cogitarem, verùm talia etiam aliis accidere ſuſpicor, licet hi in libros non referant (45).

(45) Ibid. cap. 6. pag. 31.

[L] He did not uſe to commit exceſs in the affair of love.] Here follow his words. Veneri neque immoderatè incubui, nec ex ſuperfluo uſu multum læſus ſum, nunc tamen manifeſtè ventriculum labefactat. i. e. " I never " was immoderate in my pleaſures with the other ſex,
" nor did I prejudice myſelf greatly, when I happened
" to abandon my ſelf too much to them ; but now
" they weaken my ſtomach." Obſerve, that in the title of the fourth chapter, he declares, that he writes his Hiſtory to the cloſe of October 1575 ; ſince therefore he ſays, at preſent the commerce with women weakens my ſtomach very much ; he conſequently muſt have diverted himſelf ſometimes at that ſport, at the age of threeſcore and fourteen. He therefore had ſome little compenſation for the ten years which he ſo much regretted ; for he perhaps would have employed them ſo ill, that he had not been able to live with regard to that point, till the age of ſixty.

[M] He even ſtaked his wife's jewels and his furniture (46)] He obſerves, that the miſery to which he was reduced, never obliged him to do any thing beneath his birth or virtue ; and that one of the methods he employed to ſubſiſt himſelf was, the making Almanacks. Ephemerides ſcribebam (47). He relates, that after having loſt all his money in Venice with his Landlord, who had cheated him, he ſtabb'd him with a dagger in the face ; recovered his money ; added that of his wounded Landlord, and forced his way out of the houſe. He alſo loſt his rings and cloaths, but had won them back again (48). We muſt not omit, that Cardan in conſideration of his having wounded the ſharper, threw down part of the money he had taken from him. All theſe particulars add no great honour to Cardan's memory, any more than what he relates, viz. of Profeſſor Curtius's indicting him for theft, becauſe he (Cardan) would not return what had been left with him in pawn : he declared, that he would keep the pledge in his hands, becauſe when Curtius had bound himſelf, there were no witneſſes preſent. Ab eodem Curtio de furto accuſati, quod pignus retinerem pro ſponſione pecuniarum quam ſine teſte feceram (49). How ſtrange is this conduct ! Did not theſe learned men treat one another like brutes ?

(46) Alea averſa oppignerata ornamentis uxoris & ſuppellectile. Cardanus, de Vitâ propriâ, cap. 25. pag. 94.

(47) Ibid. pag. 95.

(48) Ibid. cap. 30. pag. 111, 112.

(49) Ibid. cap. 14. pag. 67.

[N] He believed that . . . . he was under the care of ſome particular genius.] Were it poſſible for us to give credit to all Cardan relates, I ſhould believe his opinion was well grounded ; for methinks this cannot be explained ſolely by the general laws of the union of ſoul and body. Be this as it will, ſome perſons affirm, that he was very doubtful on this head. " He " varies ſo much in ſpeaking of his genius, that after " having expreſly declared in a Dialogue entitled Te-
" tim, that he had one which was Venereal com-
" pounded of Saturn and Mercury ; and in his work
" de Libris propriis, that this genius revealed himſelf
" to him in dreams ; he doubts in the ſame place,
" whether he really had one, or whether it was merely
" the excellence of his nature, which approached to " immortality. Sentiebam, ſays he, ſeu ex genio mihi
" præfecto, ſeu quod natura mea in extremitate humanæ
" ſubſtantiæ conditioniſque & in confinio immortalium po-
" ſita eſſet, &c. and concludes at laſt, in his Book de
" Rerum Varietate, that he was not poſſeſſed of any, de" claring ingenuouſly, Ego certe nullum Dæmonem aut
" Genium

ſhall we ſay concerning the four ſingular qualities with which Nature endowed him [O]? viz. Iſt, That he was raiſed to extaſy whenever he pleaſed. IIdly, That he ſaw whatever objects he pleaſed. IIIdly, That he beheld in dreams all that was to befall him; and IVthly, That he knew it alſo by certain marks or ſpecks which roſe upon his nails. It has been doubted whether he believed the immortality of the ſoul (u). He was unhappy in his family [P]. Cardan has been juſtly blamed for having been ſo preſumptuous as to calculate the nativity of Chriſt [Q]. It is pretended that his Aſtrological predictions

(u) See the remark [D] at the firſt and ſecond break.

(50) Naudé, Apologie des grans Hommes, chap. 14. pag. m. 348.

" Genium mihi adeſſe cognoſco (50)." See what Naudæus has ſaid on the ſubject, in his Judicium de Cardano, printed with this Phyſician's Life.

[O] What ſhall we ſay of the four ſingular qualities with which Nature endowed him.] He ſpeaks of them in ſo poſitive a manner, that it will be neceſſary to quote his own words. Quatuor mihi indita ſunt a natura, quæ nunquam aperire volui, & omnia (meo judicio) admiratione digna. Quorum primum hoc eſt, quod quoties volo, extra ſenſum quaſi in ecſtaſim tranſeo. . . . Sentio dum eam ineo, ac (ut verius dicam) facio, juxta cor quandam ſeparationem, quaſi anima abſcederet, totique corpori res hæc communicatur, quaſi oſtiolum quoddam aperiretur. Et initium hujus eſt à capite, maximè cerebello, diffunditurque per totam dorſi ſpinam, vi magnâ continetur: hocque ſolùm ſentio, quòd ſum extra meipſum; magnâque quâdam vi paululum me contineo. Secundum eſt, quòd cùm volo, video quæ volo, oculis, non vi mentis: velut imagines illas, de quibus dixi, cùm infans eſſem, me vidiſſe. Sed nunc credo ob occupationes, nec diu, nec perfectas, nec omnino ſemper cùm volo, nec tamen niſi velim. Moventur autem perpetuò quæ videntur imagines. Itaque video lucos, animalia, orbes, ac quæcunque cupio. Credo cauſam eſſe, vim virtutis imaginatricis, viſuſque ſubtilitatem. Tertium eſt, quod omnium quæ mihi ventura ſunt, imaginem video per ſomnum. Neque unquam auſim fermè dicere, verè autem dicere poſſum, meminiſſe, quod quicquam boni aut mali vel mediocris mihi evenerit, de quo prius & rarò ante multum, non fuerim per ſomnium præmonitus. Quartum eſt, quòd eorum, quæ mihi ventura ſunt, quanquam ſint perexigua, veſtigia in unguibus apparent. Nigra & livida malorum in medio digito, felicium alba; & ad honores in pollice, ad divitias in indice, ad ſtudia & res majoris momenti in annulari, ad exiguas inventiones in minimo: coacta, res firmas: ſi ſint veluti ſtellæ, res minus conſtantes & magis publicas verbiſque plenas (51). i. e. " Nature has indulged me four faculties or endowments which I never would diſcloſe; " and all of them, I think, are worthy of admiration. The firſt of theſe is, my having the power, " whenſoever I pleaſe, to tranſport my ſelf out of my " ſenſes, in a kind of extaſy. . . When thus enwrapt, " I feel a certain ſeparation near my heart, as if my " ſoul were diſlodging; and this is communicated to " my whole body, as though a ſort of wicket were " opened. This begins from my head, principally " from the cerebellum or hinder part of it; and ſpreading it ſelf along my back-bone, cannot be reſtrained " but by a great force; all I feel is, that I am beſide " my ſelf; but, by a certain ſtrong reſiſtance, I am " able to contain my ſelf a little. . . . The ſecond faculty is, that I ſee, whenever I pleaſe, whatſoever " I deſire to ſee; and that, with my eyes, and not " by force of imagination, as thoſe images I ſaid I ſaw " in my fancy. But I at this time believe that theſe, " (from the multiplicity of my employments) are " neither laſting nor perfect; nor whenever I deſire " them, nor without I do deſire them. I therefore " can ſee groves, animals, worlds, and whatever I " wiſh to ſee. I take the cauſe of this to ariſe from " the ſtrength of my conceptive faculty, and the " ſharpneſs of my ſight. The third endowment is, " that I perceive in ſleep the images of all theſe things " which are to befal me. And I dare almoſt affirm " (and am ſure I can very truly affirm it) that I don't " remember any thing ever happen'd to me, whether " good, bad, or indifferent, but I was firſt admoniſhed of it in a dream. The fourth faculty is, that " even the ſmalleſt circumſtances which are to happen " to me, are foretold me by marks and ſpecks on my " nails. Black and blue ſpots on my middle finger, " betoken misfortune, and white the very reverſe; " upon my thumb they foretel honours; on my fore-" finger, riches; on my ring-finger, ſtudies and mat-" ters of greater concern; and laſtly, on my little " finger, inventions of leſs conſequence. If theſe " ſpecks lie thick together, they denote things ſolid " and durable; but if they are ſcattered like ſtars, " they foretel things leſs conſtant, and ſuch as are of " a public nature, and made up merely of promiſes." It is to be obſerved, that whilſt theſe voluntary extaſies laſted, he did not feel the very violent pains of the gout; and that when perſons talk'd near him, he did but juſt hear the ſound of their words, but did not underſtand their ſignification. By the way, he would not for a long time boaſt theſe four ſingular qualities. At laſt this mighty ſecret burthened him too much, ſo that he reveal'd it to the public in a work of his.

(51) Cardanus, de Rerum Variet. lib. 8. cap. 43.

[P] He was unhappy in his family.] His eldeſt ſon, having fallen in love with a girl of no fortune married her, and repented his folly, but too late. Inſtead of bearing it patiently, ſince what was done could not be undone, he had recourſe to a very criminal remedy, which was the poiſoning of his wife. He ſuffer'd the puniſhment which ſuch a crime deſerved; the Judges ſentenced him to be beheaded, and he accordingly was executed at midnight (52), in the priſon (53). Cardan's other ſon was a cheat and a villain; his father was forced to throw him into priſon more than once (54), and to cut his ear off (55), and at laſt to turn him out of doors, and diſinherit him (56). Cardan's daughter gave him but two uneaſineſſes; firſt, when he was obliged to pay her portion (57), and ſecondly, her not bearing children. He was ſo deeply afflicted at his eldeſt ſon's tragical end, that he had like to have died with grief; and ſome of the Judges condemned the ſon upon no other motive, but from the hopes they entertained, that it would bereave the father either of his life or ſenſes. Confeſſi ſunt quidem è Senatu (ſed puto non de ſeipſis intelligi voluiſſe) eâ ſpe damnâſſe illum ut dolore interirem aut inſanirem, ab unoque quam parum abfuerim, ſuperi nôrunt, . . . ſed non ſucceſſit (58). i. e. " Some of the Senators confeſſed, " (tho' I believe they did not mean themſelves) that " they condemned my ſon merely in the hopes that it " would either diſtract me or make me lay violent " hands on my ſelf. Heaven only knows how near I " was to one of theſe . . . however, their hopes were " not fulfilled." A ſurprizing circumſtance is, that altho' Cardan did not deny but that his ſon had poiſoned his wife, and had confeſſed it at laſt to the Judges (59); he yet thought that God's wrath did purſue the latter for the unjuſt ſentence they had paſſed; and that ſeveral of them came to an untimely end (60). He pretended, that his ſon being deceived in his marriage, ſince his wife having neither money or honour, had made him a poor cuckold, he therefore was not guilty for killing her.

(52) Idem, de Vita propria, cap. 37. pag. 169.
(53) Idem, cap. 27. pag. 99, 100.
(54) Ibid.
(55) Naudæus in Judicio de Cardano.
(56) Cardanus, in Vitâ propriâ, pag. 100.
(57) A ſola filia præter dotis ſumptum nihil moleſti perpeſſus ſum. Ibid.
(58) Ibid. cap. 10. pag. 45.
(59) Ibid. pag. 170.
(60) Ibid. cap. 41. pag. 215, 216.

Nate, haud immiti qui principe, juſſa ſenatus,
Exemplo infando veterum tam dira tuliſti:
Crimina fallacis properas dum tollere mœchæ.
Conjugibus noſtris jam tûto inſultet adulter
Plectitur egregii juvenis ſi dextera vindex (61).

(61) Idem, pag. 299. See alſo pag. 46, 47.

[Q] He has been juſtly blamed for having been ſo preſumptuous, as to calculate the Nativity of Chriſt.] Gabriel Naudæus makes two obſervations on this ſubject. I. He cenſures Joſeph Scaliger, for believing that Cardan was the firſt who ever attempted it. II. He takes notice, that Cardan had the vanity to paſs for inventor of it, rather than juſtify himſelf from the example of thoſe who had preceded him in this profane enterprize.

With regard to the 1ſt point, he begins by citing the very words of Scaliger. Audi ſubtilitatem noſtri Sæculi: extitit ante 44 annos cymbalum genethliacorum, qui Domini noſtri Jeſu Chriſti thema edidit, & omnia quæ illi accederunt, ex poſitu ſtellarum neceſſario illi contigiſſe ratiocinatur; impiam dicam magis, an jocularem audaciam, quæ & Dominum ſtellarum ſtellis ſubjecerit, dictions were often enough ratified by the event [R]; but he himſelf owns, that the rules of Aſtrology proved falſe with regard to his own perſon (x). Some affirm, that Cardan having foretold that he ſhould die at a certain time; he abſtained from food, in order that his death might ratify his prediction [S], and that his continuing to live might not diſcredit the art he profeſſed. He was then afraid of ſurviving the falſity of his prophecies; he was ſo ſcrupulous with regard to the point of honour, that he could not bear the reproach of being a falſe Prophet, and of having diſhonoured his profeſſion. Few perſons in the ſame cauſe pretend to ſo much courage, or have ſo great a love for their art. They conſole themſelves, are not aſhamed, and continue in health (y). He wrote a very great number of books; for the Lyons edition of his works printed anno 1663, contains cerit, & natum eo tempore putarit, quod adhuc in lite poſitum eſt, ut vanitas cum impietate certaret (62). i. e. "Mark the ſubtlety of our age. About forty "four years ago, there aroſe a moſt noiſy calculator "of nativities, who publiſhed a ſcheme of that of our "Lord Jeſus Chriſt; and pretended to prove, that "whatever had happened to him, had come to paſs "neceſſarily from the poſition of the ſtars. I know "not whether to call this an impious or wanton at"tempt, in thus ſubjecting the Lord of the ſtars to "their power; and imagining him to be born at a "certain point of time, when that æra is ſtill con"teſted; ſo that the whole appears to be a conteſt "between vanity and impiety." After this, Naudæus mentions four Authors, who a long time before Cardan, had calculated the nativity of Chriſt. The lateſt of theſe is Tiberius Ruffilianus Sextus of Calabria, who lived under Pope Leo X. He undertook to maintain publickly 400 propoſitions at Bologna, at Florence, and at Padua: the Friars cenſured twelve of them as being ſomething heretical; and that which chiefly contributed to his condemnation was the following. Chriſtum quoad corporis compaginem elementariam aſtris ſuppoſitum, ejuſque genituram, & Prophetam magnum, & ea quæ circa corpus evenerunt, præſertim violentum ejus mortis genus, nuntiaſſe non inconvenit. i. e. "That "Chriſt was ſubjected to the ſtars, as to his elemen"tary contexture; and that it is not improper to cal"culate his nativity; and to ſhew that he was a "great Prophet, and all thoſe things which happened "to his body, eſpecially his cruel death." The Author of theſe propoſitions, being exaſperated againſt thoſe cenſors, publiſhed a Book entitled Apologeticus adverſus cucullatos, wherein he exhibited the Horoſcope of our Saviour's nativity under three different figures. Tria Chriſti geneſeos themata ſecundum tres rationabiles differentium doctorum opiniones luculenter enarravit (63). Before him, Cardinal Peter de Alliaco, Biſhop of Cambray, who died under Pope Martin V, not only maintained, that Chriſt's nativity might be judged by the obſervations of Aſtrology; but he alſo propoſed a ſcheme of his nativity. Præterquam contendit Chriſti nativitatem prænoſci potuiſſe ex genethliacis obſervationibus, ejuſdem inſuper nativitatis ſchema cæleſte propoſuit in elucidario Aſtronomicæ Concordiæ (64). Albertus Magnus, had maintained before Peter de Alliaco, that the rules of Aſtrology might take place with regard to our Saviour's Horoſcope. Albumazar, who lived before Albertus Magnus, has diſcovered ſeveral particulars relating to Chriſt, according to the principles of Aſtrology. Theſe are the four Authors produced by Naudæus; ſome of them were cited by Roger Bacon, by Picus of Mirandula, and by Robert Holkot; whence he concludes, that Thuanus (65) and Scaliger were in the wrong to believe, that Cardan deſerves to be charged with being the inventor of this profane calculation. Unde mirari ſatis non poſſum illos non viſos, nec auditos unquam fuiſſe duobus illis eruditorum Coryphæis Thuano & Scaligero qui ſaltem ex Bacchone, Pico Mirandulano, aut commentariis Roberti Holcot in ſapientiam Solomonis, diſcere potuiſſent, erratum à nonnullis ante Cardanum hunc errorem fuiſſe, ut Chriſtum falſis, & commentitiis aſtrorum imaginibus ſubmitterent: nec propterea æquum eſſe ut Cardanus, quaſi ſceleris iſtius primus opifex fuerit, tam acerbè ab illis vapulet (66). i. e. "Whence I cannot enough wonder, that theſe were "never heard of by thoſe profound ſcholars Thuanus "and Scaliger, who at leaſt might have ſeen in Ro"ger Bacon, Picus of Mirandula, or Robert Holcot's "Commentary on the wiſdom of Solomon, that ſome "had given into this error before Cardan, and ſub"jected Chriſt to the fictitious influence of the ſtars; "and therefore the two Authors abovementioned, "ought not to have inveighed ſo heavily againſt Car"dan, as tho' he had been the firſt who attempted "that impious calculation." Without going ſo far backwards, tho' Writers might have been deſired to look into Sixtus of Sienna, in order to ſee what was Cardinal de Alliaco's opinion on this matter (67).

(x) See the remark [R].

(y) See the remarks [I] and [K] of the article COMENIUS.

(62) Scaliger in Prolegomenis ad Manilium.

(63) Naudæus, in Judicio de Cardano.

(64) Idem, ibid.

(65) See what Thuanus ſays; Extremæ amentiæ fuit, imò impiæ audaciæ aſtrorum commentitiis legibus aſtrorum Dominum velle ſubjicere, quod ille tamen exarata ſervatoris noſtri genitura fecit. Thuanus, lib. 62. pag. 155. i. e. "It was "the greateſt "madneſs, or "rather the "moſt impious "boldneſs, to "pretend to ſub"ject the Lord "of the Stars, "to their ficti"tious laws; "and yet he "preſumed to do "this, by draw"ing our Savi"our's Horo"ſcope."

(66) Naudæus in Judicio de Cardano.

(67) See on this ſubject, citation (14), of the article AILLI.

With regard to the ſecond point, Naudæus affirms that Cardan having found his advantage in ſuppreſſing the names of the Authors, from whom he borrowed the calculation of Chriſt's nativity (for by this means he was looked upon as the firſt inventor of it;) would never tell the names of thoſe perſons when he was proſecuted for this horoſcope. Patet inde quam vafer Cardanus fuerit, nam cum certo certius exploratum valeret, themata Chriſti natalitia ab Alliacenſi & Tyberio Ruffiliano exarata fuiſſe, nec illum latere poſſent quæ Picus Albumaſar, & Bacchonus de illis dixerant, noluit tamen eorum unquam meminiſſe, ut vulgo literatorum, inventum iſtud ſuum fuiſſe, perſuaderet; quod ei poſtquam ex voto ceſſit non ſecus ac in igne contigerat, quem nullum eſſe ſub concavo Lunæ, poſt Laurentium Vallam, ſed illius tamen ſuppreſſo nomine, primus aſſeruit, noluit deinceps quantumvis ab æmulis urgeretur & in diſcrimen capitis veniret, vel minimum de illis auctoribus mentionem injicere, maluitque de ſua impietate tot rumores diſſeminari, quam ex opinione tam audacis facti, partam gloriam amittere (68).

(68) Naudæus, in Judicio de Cardano.

[R] It is pretended, that his Aſtrological predictions were often enough verified by the event.] Thuanus relates, that Cardan made Aſtrology to be in repute, by the ſucceſs he had in calculating nativities. Judiciariæ quam vocant fidem apud multos adſtruxit, dum certiora per eam quam ex arte poſſint plerumque promere (96). But Naudæus does not agree to this. He refers us to Scaliger, and to Alexander de Angelis, who relate, that the chief of Cardan's horoſcopes have been quite contrary to the event (70). Cardan himſelf owns, that by the knowledge he had in Aſtrology, he was perſuaded, that he ſhould not live above forty years, or at moſt would not reach forty five; and this was alſo the opinion of all his acquaintance. He adds, that this belief did him great prejudice. Aſtrologiæ cognitio quam tum habebam, & ut mihi videbatur, & omnes aiebant me non exceſſurum XL vitæ annum, certè non ad XLV perventurum, multum obfuit (71).

(69) Thuan. lib. 62. pag. 155.

(70) Naudæus, in Judicio de Cardano.

[S] He abſtained from food, in order that his death might ratify his prediction.] Thuanus relates, that this was believed. Cum tribus diebus mixus ſeptuageſſimum quintum annum impleviſſet, eodem quo prædixerat anno & die, videlicet XI Kalend. Octobris defecit, ob id, ne falleret, mortem ſuâ inediâ acceleraſſe creditus (72). i. e. "When he got within three days of threeſcore "and fifteen years of age, he died in the very ſame "year and on the very day (the XI of the Calends of "October) which he himſelf had foretold; it being "generally thought, that he haſtened his end by re"fuſing ſuſtenance, purpoſely that he might not con"tradict his prediction." Scaliger aſſerts it as an undoubted fact; I will cite his words after obſerving, that Cardan's father died in the ſame manner in 1524. He abſtained from all ſuſtenance, and lived thus for nine days (73). This man's eyes were white, he ſaw in the night time, and could ſee without ſpectacles (74). Here follow Scaliger's words. Idem Genethliacus quum multis ante annis diem & horam mortis ſuæ determinâſſet, & appetente tempore nihilominus benè valeret, quanquam jam octogenario major, ne artem contumeliæ exponeret, inediâ conſtituit mori. Quod neſcio ſerius, an citius ante conſtitutum ab eo tempus contigerit. Res nota eſt: neque noſtrum eſt mentiri. Omnino fecit, quod ille in Epigrammate, αἰσχυνθεὶς Πετόσιριν ἀπήγξατο. Lege totum

(71) Cardanus, de Vita propria, cap. 13. pag. 43, 44. See alſo pag. 184. wherein he ſays, Quod ad Aſtrologiam quæ prædicere docet operam dedi, & nimis quam debui fidi quoque in perniciem meam. See alſo his de Prudentiâ Civili, cap. 130.

(72) Thuan. lib. 62. pag. 155.

(73) Cardanus, de Vitâ propriâ, pag. 17.

(74) Ibid. pag. 10.

contains ten volumes in folio. His poverty was one reaſon why he wrote ſo great a number of books, the digreſſions and obſcurity whereof often puzzle the readers [T]. He did not write ſo great a number of books without being a plagiary (z). He apologizes for himſelf from the example of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius, for his having wrote his own life (aa). Naudæus aſcribes this juſtification to him (bb); but it is certain this example is improperly mentioned; ſince the work aſcribed to Marcus Aurelius is a collection of moral inſtructions which he preſcribes to himſelf, and not the hiſtory of his life. Some writers have aſſerted, that Naudæus has publiſhed Cardan's life, but they are miſtaken, for it is only a diſcourſe wherein Naudæus delivers his thoughts on Cardan's character. He could not but own that Cardan was a madman [U]. However Naudæus does him juſtice with regard to all other particulars, as his ſenſe, his learning, &c. The elder Scaliger wrote againſt Cardan, and thought, but without any grounds for it, that his criticiſm was the occaſion of his death [X].

(z) See the remark [D], citations (24) and (26); and the remark [Q], citation (68).

(aa) Cardanus, in Præf. Libri de Vita propria.

(bb) Naudæus in Judicio de Cardano.

The

(75) Scalig. Prolegomen. ad Manilium.

tum Epigramma. Nihil melius hujus Genethliaci exitum expreſſerit. Nam idem minus rei fuit (75). i. e. "The ſame fortune-teller, when he had foretold many "years before the day and hour of his death, and "when the time drew near, he yet found himſelf in "very good health, tho' he was upwards of fourſcore "years old; to prevent his bringing a ſcandal upon "his art, he reſolved to ſtarve himſelf. I cannot "ſay whether he died ſooner or later than the time "he had fixed upon. However, the fact is well "known, nor would I aſſert a falſity. His conduct "was exactly like that of the man in the Greek Epi"gram, which I deſire you to read quite through. "Nothing can expreſs more exactly the exit of this "fortune-teller, for he was alſo the ſame kind of coun"terfeit."

[T] His poverty was one reaſon why he wrote ſo great a number of Books; the digreſſions and obſcurity whereof often puzzle the readers.] Theſe meet with ſuch particulars as they never expected; and in his Arithmetic ſeveral diſcourſes concerning the Motion of the Planets, the Creation, and the Tower of Babel. They alſo find in his Logick, a judgment on Hiſtorians, and on thoſe who have wrote Epiſtles. He owns, that he uſed to make digreſſions, to fill up the ſheet ſooner, his bargain with the Bookſeller being at ſo much a ſheet; and that he wrote as much for a livelihood, as for reputation. Ut miſſos faciam (excurſus) quos de rebus ſuis frequentiſſimos habet: eo tantum fine, quemadmodum alicubi fatetur, ut plura folia typographis mitteret, quibuſcum antea de illorum prælio pepigerat; atque hoc modo fami, non ſecus ac famæ ſcriberet (76). With regard to his obſcurity, the Author I cite alledges ſome reaſons for it (77); and the following among others, viz. that Cardan was of opinion, that ſeveral things which were familiar to him, need not to be related; and beſides, his lively and extenſive genius hurried him from one place to another; and he did not give himſelf the trouble to explain what was to be the middle, and the band or tye of thoſe two extreams. He is not the only Writer who is guilty of this fault.

(76) Naudæus, in Judicio de Cardano.

(77) Idem, ibid.

[U] Naudæus could not but own, that Cardan was a madman.] The thought which Seneca aſcribes to Ariſtotle, viz. that all great Wits have a mixture of madneſs, nullum magnum ingenium ſine mixtura dementiæ (78), is not juſt with regard to Cardan, It cannot be ſaid with reſpect to him, that madneſs is mingled with great wit: we here muſt take things in another ſenſe, and ſay, that great wit is mixed with madneſs; great wit ought to be conſider'd only as an appendix or adjunct to folly or madneſs. Thoſe who think I exaggerate on this occaſion, may, if they pleaſe, adhere to Naudæus's opinion on this matter. He approves thoſe who declare, that Cardan's way of life was very like that of a madman. Ut mittam aliorum etiam graviſſimorum virorum judicia, qui Cardanum miras de ſeipſo fabulas concitâſſe, & inſanienti proximum vixiſſe non perperam aſſerunt (79). It is a very certain ſign, adds this Author, that Cardan was not always in his ſenſes, when we ſee the prodigious contradictions which are in his works. They cannot be imputed to a defect of memory, nor to artifice: the little relation there is betwen theſe ſeveral variations, is owing to the different fits of madneſs with which he was ſeized. Enimvero non ſemper eum ſui compotem fuiſſe, ſed æſtu quodam raptum indicio eſt omnium certiſſimo, varietas illa pugnantium inter ſe ſententiarum, quas non eſt quod aliquis oblivione eorum quæ jam dixerat, aut aſtu, vafricieque, prolatas ab eo fuiſſe, ſibi perſuadeat, cum ſe in rebus aliis memorem ad miraculum uſque præſteterit; & artis ac vafriciei ſuſpicionem omnem elevet, quod grandia quidem, ſed contraria ſemper, nunquam autem connexa, & ſibi mutuo cohærentia loqueretur (80). Another ſtrong proof of his madneſs or folly, is the ill he has publiſhed concerning himſelf. He could have ſued any Poet who ſhould have treated him as unhandſomely as he does himſelf. He owns, that his ſtar had inſpired him with an impious, revengeful, treacherous ſoul; and which was addicted to ſorcery, to ſlanders, and all ſorts of uncleanneſs, and filled with a great number of ſhameful vices which he enumerates. Ingenium ſi quis inimicus tale illi affinxiſſet quale ſuum eſſe in themate natalitio teſtatus eſt, potuiſſet in illum agere merito ea lege pœnaque lata, malo quæ nollet carmine quemquam deſcribi. Nam ex Venere loci Lunæ ac Mercurii domina, & Mercurio multum, Saturno mediocriter commiſta animum ſibi effictum ait, in diem viventem, nugacem, religionis contemptorem &c (81). Naudæus pretends, that Cardan was the very man he deſcribed himſelf; but I had rather aſſert, that Cardan pretended only to ſhew, what the malignant influences of his ſtar would have rendred him, had he not corrected them; for he confeſſed, that the ſciences relating to Divination were fruſtrated of their certainty with regard to his perſon. By the rules of Palmeſtry, it had been pronounced that he was a dunce; Ut Chiromantici rudem eſſe pronunciârint ac ſtupidum, inde ubi nôrunt puduerit (82); and by thoſe of Aſtrology, he was to die before the age of forty five (83). It is univerſally known, in what manner Socrates juſtified the Phyſiognomiſt, who had accuſed him of ſo many defects. I muſt not omit, I, that Naudæus aſſerts, that Cardan, who boaſted his having never told a lie, was a great liar; and proves him ſuch on certain occaſions. II, That Dr. Parker is of Naudæus's opinion, with regard to our Cardan's madneſs, and has calculated the chief ſymptoms of it (84).

(78) Seneca, de Tranquill. animi, ſub fin.

(79) Naudæus, in Judicio de Cardano.

(80) Idem, ibid.

(81) Idem, ibid.

(82) Cardanus, de Vita propria, cap. 5. pag. 24.

(83) See note [R].

(84) Parker, Diſputat. de Deo, Sect. 25.

[X] The elder Scaliger wrote againſt Cardan, and thought, but without reaſon, that his criticiſm was the occaſion of his death.] Without deviating ever ſo little from probability, it may be aſſerted that a ſtrong deſire of gaining fame, by eclipſing the glory of his opponent, prompted Julius Cæſar Scaliger to write againſt Cardan. Had the ſpirit of contradiction reigned leſs in him, he would have acquired more glory in this conteſt; but what the Greeks have called ἀμετρίαν τῆς ἀνθολχῆς an immoderate deſire of claſhing with others, has greatly injured Scaliger's reputation. It was in purſuance to this principle, he maintained that Parrots are ugly creatures. Had Cardan advanced this, Scaliger would have objected to him what is found in the ancient Poets, with regard to the beauty of thoſe birds. Voſſius has written a very judicious Criticiſm on this contradictory temper of Scaliger; and at the ſame time, points out the particulars in which thoſe two antagoniſts were ſuperior or inferior to each other. Scaliger, in Exercitat. 246. quia Cardanus Pſittacum commendarat à colorum varietate, ac præterea fulgore, quod & Apuleius facit in ſecundo Floridorum, contrà contendit eſſe deformem, non modo, ob fœditatem roſtri, ac crurum, & linguæ, ſed etiam quia ſit coloris fuſci ac cinericii, qui triſtis. Quid faciamus ſummo viro? Si Cardanus ea dixiſſet, provocaſſet ad judicia Poëtarum: atque adeo omnium hominum. Nunc quia pulchri dixit coloris, ille deformis contendit. Hoc contradictionis ſtudium, quod ubique in hiſce Exercitationibus ſe prodit, ſophiſtâ dignius eſt, quàm philoſopho.

The addition I ſhall here give relates to Cardan's book de Subtilitate, which was refuted by Julius Cæſar Scaliger (cc) [Y]. We ſhall give ſome additions to Mr. Bayle [Z]. (cc) See the remark [X].

CARION

Majorem etiam modeſtiam, dum ſalſe adeò tractat Cardanum, meritò paſſim requiras: præſertim ſi cogites, ſcribere adverſus virum ſummum, ſtudiis quidem humanitatis, & Metaphyſices, non paulò inferiorem: at non ſcientiâ naturæ, matheſeos autem omnibus diſciplinis, in quibus parum omnino Scaliger videbat, albis quod dicitur equis prævertentem (85). i. e. "Scaliger, in his "246th Exercitation, becauſe Cardan had praiſed "the Parrot, for the ſplendor and variety of its co- "lours, as Apuleius has done in his ſecond Florida, "he aſſerts, on the contrary, that it is ugly, not "only upon account of its diſagreeable beak, legs "and tongue; but alſo becauſe of its brown, aſh and "dull colour. What muſt be done with this very "great man? Had Cardan aſſerted theſe particulars, "Scaliger would have appealed to the judgment of "the Poets, and that of mankind in general; but "now becauſe Cardan declares, that the colours of "the Parrot's plumage are beautiful, he on the con- "trary aſſerts that they are ugly. This ſpirit of con- "tradiction which he betrays in every part of the "Exercitations in queſtion, becomes a Sophiſter rather "than a Philoſopher. We judge Scaliger not to have "behaved ſo modeſtly as he ought to have done, in "treating Cardan ſo very roughly, eſpecially when "we call to mind, that Scaliger was writing againſt "a very great man, who was little inferior to him in "the ſtudies of Humanity and Metaphyſicks; but "greatly his ſuperior in Phyſicks, and all the branches "of the Mathematicks, with which Scaliger was in- "deed but very little acquainted." Naudæus is in a greater paſſion againſt Scaliger, than Voſſius; he blames him for not reading the ſecond edition of Cardan's work. This cenſure is well grounded; for is it juſt, becauſe a critic will not loſe the pains he had taken in pointing out errors, that therefore a Writer ſhould be publickly condemned, for errors he had corrected. Scaliger publiſhed his criticiſm three years after the ſecond edition of his antagoniſt's work had appeared in print. He was afraid of finding in this ſecond edition, ſeveral paſſages corrected, which would have interrupted the joy which his having pointed out errors had filled him with; and have prevented him from publiſhing the cenſure of an error which Cardan had corrected. Theſe were the reaſons which made him not read the ſecond edition in queſtion. This is Naudæus's firſt obſervation. Nam primùm quis ferat Scaligerum Exercitationes ſuas triennio poſt ſecundam librorum de ſubtilitate editionem evulgaſſe, nec tamen illam videre voluiſſe, nec mendis illis peperciſſe quæ poſtrema hac diligentia ſublata à Cardano fuerant, ne videlicet laboris ſui quantumvis fruſtra impenſi fructum amitteret. His ſecond remark is, that Cardan juſtified himſelf ſo well, that ſuppoſing ſome objections were left which he could not anſwer, they ought to be conſidered as trifling. Præterea quis neſcit Cardanum, Actione prima in calumniatorem librorum de ſubtilitate, ſic omnes illius aculeos retudiſſe, objectiones diluiſſe, accuſationes infregiſſe, ut eorum ratio haberi non debeat, quæ ſupereſſe forſan ex tanto numero poſſent? nam homo fuit Cardanus, & humani à ſe nihil alienum putavit: nec adeo mirum eſt illum erraſſe, quin multo magis admiratione dignum ſit, tam raro, & in tam paucis, ac minimis ceſpitaſſe. i. e. "Who does not know "that Cardan, in his firſt anſwer to the rude cen- "ſurer of his treatiſe de Subtilitate, blunted ſo well "the edge of his ſatyr, removed all his objections, "and invalidated ſo happily all his accuſations, that "we muſt not wonder if ſome ſhould ſtill remain un- "anſwered, among ſo great a multitude? for Cardan "was a man, and thought himſelf obnoxious to error "as well as others. Nor ought we ſo much to won- "der that he erred, as that he ſhould err ſo ſeldom, "and that his miſtakes ſhould be ſo very inconſi- "derable." It is obſerved in the third place, that Scaliger himſelf committed more errors than he charged Cardan with, during the nine years in which he was giving this criticiſm. Imò verò auſim ego pignore depoſito contendere multo plures nævos eſſe, quos Scaliger Exercitationibus ſuis immiſtos reliquit, quam eos quibus adverſus Cardanum tam procaciter exagitandis totos novem annos inſudavit. In fine, he obſerved that the motive which prompted Scaliger to write againſt Cardan, was not ſo much from a love for truth, as from a deſire of oppoſing and combating all the moſt learned men of that age. Non tam eruendæ veritatis ſtudio, quam ut effræni deſiderio ſuo ſatisfaceret, cum illis omnibus congrediendi, quos ſuo tempore, literarum, eruditionumque Principes haberi cognoverat. To theſe four obſervations, I may add a fifth; viz, that Scaliger imagined, that his critique had killed poor Cardan; and upon this he writ a Preface filled with elaborate reflections (86): wherein he beſtowed the higheſt encomiums on Cardan; and declared his extreme ſorrow at his having gained a victory, which had thereby loſt the republic of letters ſo great a man as Cardan. The truth of the ſtory is, that Cardan ſurvived Scaliger fifteen or twenty years *; and by Naudæus's ſecond obſervation, we may diſcover, whether Scaliger's book could poſſibly give Cardan much uneaſineſs.

(85) Voſſius, de Origin. & Progr. Idol. lib. 3. cap. 80. pag. m. 1163.

(86) The reader will find it at the end of his Harangues contre Eraſme, printed in Toulouſe, anno 1620, pag. 63. It was not to ſerve as a Preface to the 16 books Exercitationum Exotericarum, as is ſaid in the Hiſtory of Cardan, pag. m. 334; but to the 16th book.

* [Scaliger died in 1558, and Cardan in 1576.] Addit. Rem.

[Y] The addition I ſhall give, relates to Cardan's book de Subtilitate, which was refuted by Julius Cæſar Scaliger.] Cardan employed but eight months in writing it, and gave his manuſcript to John Petreius a Bookſeller of Nuremberg, in order that he might get it printed. He dedicated it to Ferdinand de Gonzaga, Governor of the Milaneze. The firſt edition is in folio, and dated anno 1550 (87): nevertheleſs, the Author declares in an Epiſtle Dedicatory, dated from Paris the 21ſt of April 1552; that ſince the firſt edition, he had ſpent three years in correcting and enlarging the work. Quos octo menſium ſpatio abſolveram, perpetuo triennio emendati atque aucti in publicum ſub nomine tuo prodirent. This Epiſtle Dedicatory is that of the ſecond edition, and is inſcribed to the above mentioned Ferdinand de Gonzaga. By the ſecond edition, I mean that which was publiſhed after the firſt reviſal of this work, and which was made public in the beginning of 1554 (88). That of Nuremberg had been already pirated at Lions. Scaliger's critique on the latter appeared in 1557; and nevertheleſs Cardan objects to this antagoniſt, that he had employed almoſt nine years in criticiſing him (89). Cardan reviſed his work a ſecond time, and ſent the manuſcript (corrected and enlarged by him) to a Bookſeller of Baſil (90) in order that he might get it printed; and annexed to it his anſwer to Scaliger, entitled, Hieronymi Cardani in Calumniatorem Librorum de Subtilitate Actio prima. It does not deſcend to particulars, being only a general anſwer. As Ferdinand de Gonzaga was dead, the Author ſought for a new patron. He dedicated this third edition to Don Gonſales Ferrand of Cordova, Duke of Sueſſe. He put no date to his Epiſtle Dedicatory, but I believe it was writ in 1560. I have nevertheleſs ſeen the Dedication to the ſecond Edition, in a copy printed at Baſil in folio, ex Officina Petrina, anno 1560. The Actio prima in Calumniatorem is annexed to this copy. I do not think that Cardan reviſed his work after that time. I do not find any marks of a third reviſal, in Henricpetri's Edition of 1582, in 8vo (91). I have by me a Lyons Edition, apud Bartholomæum Honoratum, 1580 in 8vo, which is agreeable to the firſt reviſal. The Actio in Calumniatorem is not inſerted in it, which ſhews the utmoſt negligence in the Bookſeller of Lyons of whom we are ſpeaking. He did not know, that twenty years before, an Edition had been publiſhed greatly ſuperior to that which he pirated. We have a French tranſlation of this work of Cardan, by Richard le Blanc; and printed at Paris, anno 1556 in 4to. (92).

(87) Epitome Bibliot. Geſneri, pag. 346.

(88) Cardani Act. in Calumniat. pag. m. 1019.

(89) Idem, ibid. pag. 1028.

(90) Called Henric. Petri.

(91) Geſner's Epitome does not mention this edition in 8vo; but the folio only.

(92) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Françoiſe, pag. 1222.

[Z] We ſhall give ſome additions to Mr. Bayle,] Cardan's father (Facio Cardan) was Doctor of Phyſic, and of the Civil and Canon Law. He was a good Mathematician, and publiſhed a work of the Mathematical kind, whoſe title may be ſeen in a modern Author *, who alſo gives (with his epitaph) a few other particulars concerning him. He likewiſe relates ſome curious circumſtances concerning Cardan's mother, and her bringing him into the world †. He was exceedingly vain, of which ſome inſtances are given ‡; eſpecially of his boaſting that he had acquired the Greek, Latin, French and Spaniſh tongues, without

* Father Niceron's Memoirs pour ſervir à l'Hiſt. des Hommes Illuſt. tom. 14. pag. 235. Paris 1731. 12mo.

† Idem, pag. 236, 237.

‡ Pag. 256, 257.

CARION (JOHN), Profeſſor of Mathematicks in the Academy of Frankfort on the Oder, was born at Buetickheim in Germany (a). He publiſhed an Ephemerides, or Aſtronomical Tables, which extend from the year 1536 to 1550. He made public another book intitled Practicæ Aſtrologicæ (b). He did not gain much reputation by the two pieces above-mentioned; but he gained great fame by a Chronicle that was not written by him [A], and without learning them. The Author of an Engliſh Piece entitled, the Mechaniſm of the Mind, printed at London in 1703, 12mo, ſeems to be miſtaken, in aſcribing what follows to Cardan, viz, that being in his old age, he wept for grief at his not being able to underſtand his own works *. It is obſerved, that the dates in ſeveral of Cardan's works, often contradict one another; which is owing, either to the Printers, or to Cardan himſelf, who depending on his memory for them, was thereby ſometimes apt to miſtake †. The Reader will find the titles of all his Works, the ſubjects they treat of, and ſometimes the judgment of them, in the Book whence I have extracted theſe particulars.

(a) Geſner, in Biblioth. folio 399.

(b) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Philoſoph. pag. 104.

* Idem, pag. 238.

† Idem, pag. 281.

[A] He gained great fame by a Chronicle that was not written by him.] It has borne a multitude of impreſſions, and been tranſlated into many languages. Here follows the hiſtory of this affair. Carion having written a Chronicle, intended to have it printed at Wittemberg, but wanted to have Melancthon correct it. Melancthon, inſtead of correcting it, drew up another, and publiſh'd it in Wittemberg under Carion's name. He compoſed it in the German Tongue. This work was tranſlated into Latin in 1538, by Herman Bonnus, a Clergyman of Lubec, and Principal of the College (1). Melancthon finding the vaſt encouragement this book met with, made a new Latin verſion of it, which, after reviſing and making ſome additions to it, he publiſhed in 1558 (2). He publiſhed it two years after, enlarged with a ſecond part. The work conſiſted then of three books. The two firſt include the firſt part, and extend, from the beginning of the world, to our Saviour's time. The third book forms the whole ſecond part; and reaches from Auguſtus to Charlemain excluſive. Peucer, after the diſeaſe of Melancthon his father-in-law, continued this work, and publiſhed, in 1562, the fourth book, which extends from Charlemain to Frederic II. Three years after he publiſhed the fifth book, which ends with the death of the Emperor Maximilian, in 1519. In 1572 (3) he made an edition of the whole work, i. e. of what he himſelf and Melancthon had written; and promiſed to continue the Hiſtory to his own times (4), but did not keep his word. The edition now before me of Carion's works is of Geneva 1625, in 8vo (5); and contains, in an appendix, an epitome of Hiſtory, from the coronation of the Emperor Charles V, to the death of Rodolphus, in 1612. Euſebius Menius tranſlated this Chronicle into German (6). Simon Goulart publiſhed a French Tranſlation of it, anno 1579. He printed a ſecond edition of it in 1595; and each time he added a Supplement of his own writing, to the time in which he lived. I ſhall take notice hereafter of the French Verſion which John de Blond publiſhed.

(1) Melancthon, in Epiſt. Dedicat. Chronic. Carionis, edit. 1558.
(2) Idem, ibid.

(3) At Wittemberg in folio, apud Joannem Cratonem.
(4) See the Epiſtle Dedicat. to the edit. of 1572.
(5) Apud Samuelem Criſpinum. There is one of anno 1617, apud eundem; and one of Frankfort, 1594, in 2 vol. 8vo. See Michael Hertzius's Bibliotheca Germanica, num. 502, 508.
(6) Melch. Adam, in Vitis Phil. pag. 125. This German tranſlation was printed at Frankfort in 1566, folio.
(7) It is the 117th of book 4. and is dated die ſolſtitiali, 1531.

It is to be obſerved, that Carion's manuſcript was ſent to Melancthon in 1531, which appears from a Letter of the latter (7). I'll give a long extract of it, becauſe it will let my readers into Carion's character. Accepi tuam diſputationem de Prædictionibus Carionis. Quanquam autem iſte vehementer affirmat, ſe nihil præter ſiderum poſitum in conſilium adhibere, tamen multis non ſatis perſuadet hoc. Et ars meo quoque judicio non poteſt tam diſertè de ſingularibus eventibus pronunciare, ſed vir eſt, quantum ego quidem cognovi, candidus & Suevicæ ſimplicitatis plurimum referens. Miſit huc Χρονικὰ excudenda, ſed eâ lege, ut ego emendarem. Sunt multa ſcripta negligentiùs. Itaque ego totum opus retexo, & quidem Germanicè, & conſtitui complecti præcipuas mutationes maximorum Imperiorum. i. e. "Your "Diſputation concerning the Predictions of Carion is "come to hand. Altho' he ſtrongly inſiſts, that he "formed them altogether from the poſition of the "ſtars, yet many are not ſufficiently perſuaded that he "ſays true. And indeed it is my opinion, that the "art it ſelf cannot pronounce ſo very exactly on par-"ticular events. But the Author of this work, ſo "far as I am able to judge, is a candid perſon, and "ſeems to poſſeſs a great deal of the Schwabian ſim-"plicity. He ſent his Chronicle to be printed in this "city, but upon condition that I ſhould reviſe it. He "has written many things careleſly; for which reaſon "I am new-modelling the whole in the German "Tongue: and ſhall interſperſe the work with the "principal Revolutions of the greateſt Empires." We find, by this paſſage, that Melancthon gave the work, which he had been deſired to correct, an entire new form. We ſhall preſently ſee, that he quite blotted out Carion's manuſcript from one end to the other; and yet would have the Chronicle he himſelf drew up in its ſtead, printed under Carion's name. This he would have done, not only in the firſt edition, which is in the German language, and printed at Wittemberg in 1531; but alſo in the ſucceeding ones which are in Latin, and were corrected and enlarged by him. The ſame was obſerved, after his death, in Peucer's Continuations. Read what follows: Nomen Chronici Carionis retinui, quod mutare illud Autor primus ſanctæ beatæque memoriæ Philippus Melancthon ſocer meus noluit. Occaſio nominis hujus inde extitit, quod cum Johannes Carion mathematicus ante annos quadraginta cæpiſſet contexere Chronicum, & recognoſcendum illud atque emendandum, priuſquam prælo ſubjiceretur, miſiſſet ad Philippum Melancthonem, hic, quod parum probaretur, totum abolevit una litura, alio conſcripto, cui tamen Carionis nomen præfixit: ſed & hoc cum retexiſſet, amici nomen & memoriam, a cujus primordiis ἀΦορμὴν prima Chronici contexendi nata atque profecta eſſet, titulo poſteritati commendare voluit (8). i. e. "I have retained "Carion's name, and for this reaſon, becauſe the firſt "author of it, Philip Melancthon, my father-in-law, "of bleſſed memory, would not change it. The oc-"caſion of its being printed under his (Carion's) name "is as follows: John Carion the Mathematician, "having been compoſing a Chronicle forty years, ſent "it to Philip Melancthon, to reviſe and correct be-"fore it went to preſs. Melancthon after peruſing "it, did not approve it in any manner, ſo that he "effaced the whole, and drew up another, which he "nevertheleſs publiſhed under Carion's name. And "when he afterwards retouched the work, he would "tranſmit to poſterity the name and memory of his "friend, who had firſt drawn up the plan of that "Chronicle, and been the occaſion of his writing it." But I am alſo to obſerve, that there is ſome reaſon to believe, that Carion publiſh'd the work he himſelf had compoſed. This Mr. Sagittarius does not doubt of, and is only ſurprized at this conduct of Carion (9). He had, among his Books, two German Editions of this Author's Chronicle, the one in 4to, the date of which he does not know; the other in 8vo, which extends to the 16th of April 1521, the Epiſtle Dedicatory whereof is dated 1531 (10). This does not correſpond with Melancthon's work; for, even where it was moſt augmented by the Author, it extends but to the beginning of Charlemain's reign. Here follows another difficulty. The Swiſs declared, that moſt of the particulars which are related in that Chronicle concerning their Nation, are ſo many falſities. Qui inter Helvetios noſtros hiſtoriarum patriæ non imperiti ſunt, pleraque falſa eum de rebus noſtris ſcripſiſſe affirmant (11). i. e. "Such of my countrymen (the Swiſs) as are not "unſkilled in the hiſtory of their country, affirm, that "moſt of the particulars he has wrote concerning it "are falſe." Bullinger refuted publickly the falſities he met with in it, concerning a battle which the Swiſs loſt near Zurich, anno 1531 (12). This alſo, for the reaſon I have given above, cannot ſuit in any manner with the work written by Melancthon. On the other ſide Geſner, who relates theſe obſervations of the Swiſs, had juſt before pointed out the work of Carion, by ſuch characteriſticks as agree admirably well with that of Melancthon. He had juſt before ſaid, that Carion's Chronicle, printed in the German Tongue, at Wittemberg anno 1538, had been printed at Hall in

(8) Peucer, Epiſt. Dedicat. Chronici Carionis edit. 1572, ſub finem.

(9) Miror ipſum Carionem illud edidiſſe. i. e. "I am ſurprized "that Carion "ſhould publiſh "it." Gaſpar Sagittarius, Introductio ad Hiſtoriam Eccleſiaſt. pag. 98.
(10) Idem, ibid.

(11) Geſner, in Biblioth. folio 399, verſo.

(12) Bullingerus, in reſponſione ad Joan. Cochlei Libellum de Scripturæ & Eccleſiæ Autoritate circa finem capitis xxix. apud Geſner. ibid.

and which was highly esteemed by the Protestants [B]. He died at Berlin, anno 1538 (c). Moreri in Suabia anno 1539; and at Lyons anno 1543, translated into Latin by Hermannus Bonnus, entitled, Chronicorum libellus, maximas quoque res gestas ab initio mundi apto ordine complectens, ita ut annorum ratio ac præcipuæ vicissitudines, quæ in regna, in religionem, & in alias res magnas incidunt, quam rectissime cognosci queant. i. e. "A book of Chronicles, containing, in their "proper order, the most memorable transactions that "have happened from the beginning of the world; in "such a manner that the chronology, and particularly "the revolutions which have happened in Kingdoms, "in Religion, and other great matters, may be ex-"actly known." This title represents very well the plan and character of Melancthon's Chronicle; and it is well known that this Author acknowledged publickly as his work, that which Herman Bonnus had translated into Latin (13). The abovementioned Gesner observes that Carion dedicated his Book, in 1531, to Joachim Marquis of Brandenburg; which suits perfectly with Melancthon's work, as is manifest from the following words of an Epistle Dedicatory (14): Cum autem prima editio illustrissimo Principi Electori patri tuo dedicata sit, ne transferre munus in aliam familiam viderer, filio dedicare hanc editionem volui, quia patrem ipsum cui jam Historia Ecclesiæ & Imperiorum notissima est, scio vellet talia jam à filiis legi, & se vivo vos in possessionem doctrinæ venire. i. e. "Having "dedicated the first edition to the illustrious Electoral "Prince your father; I did not think proper to trans-"fer my offering to another family; and therefore "have dedicated this to the son, because I know that "your father, who is perfectly well acquainted with "history both ecclesiastical and civil, would have his "sons acquire this kind of learning in his Life." Let it not be objected, that at the same time that these words were written, the Elector of Brandenburg, to whom the first edition was dedicated, was living; which cannot agree with the Elector of anno 1531 (15). This, I say, is nothing to the purpose; for the person to whom this first edition was dedicated, was not created Elector, at the time when the Chronicle in question first appeared in print. I will make another remark: Du Verdier informs us, that the Chronicle of John Carion the Philosopher, containing the most memorable Transactions from the creation of the world to the reign of Henry II; translated into Latin by John le Blond, was printed several times at Paris and at Lions (16). Does this denote the work of Melancthon, a Chronicle which he extended only to Charlemain? It rather denotes the Chronicle of Carion, which he carried as far as 1530, if Keckerman may be credited (17). We have nothing more to suppose, but that the French Translator continued it to his own time.

(c) Melch. Adam, Vit. Philosoph. pag. 105.

The result of this is, that it is uncertain whether two works did not appear under Carion's name, the one written by Carion himself, and the other by Melancthon. It is probable that Carion did not acquiesce with the judgment of that learned man, when he found that instead of retouching some passages in his Chronicle, it had been entirely laid aside, and a new one composed in its stead. Perhaps therefore he published his work, whilst, on the other side, a work written by another was published under his name. If this be the case, we have two Chronicles, one of which was continued to the year it was printed in. Perhaps too, Melancthon consented to have all such additions made to his Chronicle, as the reviser might think proper; and having left this to Carion's discretion, the latter printed his work in the same form he had received it back from Melancthon, and added a continuation of it down to his own times. If this be the case, we have only one German edition under Carion's name. We may suppose naturally enough, that Melancthon, having revised his work a long time after and translated it into Latin, retrenched all such particulars as himself had not writ. Thus his Latin Chronicle appears to have been continued, in the first Edition, no farther than Cæsar, and in the second, no farther than Charlemain. They who understand German, and have an opportunity of consulting the Libraries in Germany, are desired to clear up this point, and to give the proper proofs relating to it.

Since what the reader has just now was printed, my doubts have been cleared up. I have seen a Latin Chronicle of Carion, dedicated by him to Joachim Marquis of Brandenburg, and divided into three books, which extend from Adam, to the expedition of Soliman into Hungary, anno 1532. The Author concludes with four or five prophesies, which he applies to Charles V, and all which were proved false. The dedication is dated at Berlin anno 1531. The Edition I my self make use of is of Paris, anno 1563, in 16mo, for Jaques Dupuis; and contains a supplement to the 29th of September 1560.

I have also seen Jean le Blond's French translation, printed at Paris, by Stephen Grouleau, anno 1556, in 16mo. There is no appendix with regard to the universal History, but only with respect to that of Francis I, and of Henry II. That of Francis I begins at the first year of his reign.

[B] Which was highly esteemed by the Protestants.] Andrew Franckenberg speaks of it as follows: Chronicon Carionis magna sui parte retextum, tanto judicio tantaque dexteritate perfecit (Melancthon) ut nihil in eo genere & compendiaria ratione præstantius extare sciamus (18). i. e. "Carion's Chronicle, the greatest part "of which has been cast into a new form, was per-"fected by Melancthon with so much judgment and "accuracy, that we do not know of any finer "piece in the compendiary way." He had so high an esteem for it, that he took it for his model, in the work I quote from (19); and made an Oration, de Magnitudine rerum divinarum & politicarum quæ in Chronico Philippi continentur (20). i. e. "Of the Great-"ness of the Things both ecclesiastical and civil, con-"tained in the Chronicle of Philip (Melancthon)." We may believe that Victorinus Strigelius was almost of the same opinion, since he made several historical lectures on this Chronicle (21). Stephen Prætorius looks upon all those as tasteless who are not pleased with this most learned and elegant Epitome, as he calls it. Eruditissima & elegantissima epitome omnium fere historiarum totius mundi est Chronicon Philippi Melancthonis, quod qui non degustavit, is vere bardus est (22). Let us add to this the testimony of Boeclerus: In hoc (Chronico) ea sunt ad summam rerum & Historiæ universalis contextum spectantia, judicia, monita, præcepta, ut de alio hujus generis & instituti volumine similia polliceri nemo facile queat (23). i. e. "This Chro-"nicle contains such judgments, remarks and pre-"cepts, with regard to the drawing up an Epitome "and universal History; that no one could easily pro-"mise so much concerning another work, of the same "kind and on a like plan." The Writer who quotes these judgments, shews that he himself approves of them. Meretur, says he (24), hoc ipsum, quod vulgò Carionis, rectius tamen Philippo-Peucerianum appellaretur Chronicon, inter selectissimaque utriusque Historiæ (Ecclesiasticæ ac Civiles) monumenta computari, atque a studiosa juventute diligenter legi, lectumque aliquoties repeti. i. e. "This "Chronicle, that commonly goes by the name of "Carion, but which is more justly that of Melancthon "and Peucer, deserves to be ranked among the most "excellent monuments of History both ecclesiastical "as well as civil; and to be studied very diligently "by youth, not only once, but very often." He is displeased, that the Authors whence the several passages are borrowed are not cited. His censure is very just; this being a capital fault in a work of that kind, and indeed is a fault in most books. La Popeliniere, who has bestowed great encomiums on this Chronicle, has observed another fault in it, and that is, a spirit of prejudice. It may not be improper to cite the whole passage in question. "John Carion the Mathemati-"cian is reputed to be the Author of the Chronicles, "first printed in Germany, and afterwards in other "places under his name. Tho' having presented the "first draughts of them, as I have been informed "(25) to Philip Melancthon his master, in order for "him to revise, add and correct it at pleasure; he "drew his pen over the whole piece, and composed "it anew; and, at the same time, from his natural "sweetness of temper, suffered him to print them un-"der his name. They show great learning and care. "But what is still remarkable is, his endeavours to "make them of advantage to the reader, by his ex-"patiating

(13) See the Epistle Dedicatory of Melancthon, to the edition of 1558.

(14) That of the edition of 1351. Melancthon dedicated this edition to Sigismund of Brandenburg, Archbishop of Magdeburg, son to the Elector Joachim II.

(15) Joachim I, who died in 1535, having succeeded his father anno 1499. Heiss. Histoire de l'Empire, tom. 2. pag. m. 331.

(16) Du Verdier Vau Privas, Bibliotheque Francoise, pag. 665.

(17) Keckerm. de Natura & propriet. Hist. cap. 5. apud Magirum, Eponymol. pag. 182.

(18) Andr. Franckenbergius, lib. 3. Institutionum Antiquitatis & Historiar. pag. 237. apud Gasparum Sagittarium, Introduct. ad Historiam Ecclesiast. pag. 97, 98.

(19) Suas Institutiones Antiquitatis & Historiarum ad Chronicon Carionis Melancthonianum potissimum accommodavit. Sagittarius, ibid. pag. 101. i. e. "He "formed his "Institutions of "Antiquity and "History, chiefly according "to Melancthon's Chroni-"cle of Carion.

(20) It was printed at Wittemberg in 1589. Idem, ibid.

(21) Scholas Historicas in idem Chronicon scripsit. Keckerm. de Natura & Propriet. Histor. in Auctar. cap. 6.

(22) Steph. Prætorius, in Ordine Studiorum, apud Sagittar. Introduct. ad Hist. Eccles. pag. 98.

(23) Boeclerus, Dissert. de Utilit. ex Historiæ Univers. Compositione capiendâ, pag. 16, apud Sagittar. ibid.

(24) Sagittar. ibid. pag. 97.

(25) He might have quoted a book printed within these 27 years, viz. Peucer's Dedication to the edition of 1572. See the quotation (8) above.

Moreri has committed a puerile error [C]. I ſhall make ſome obſervations in oppoſition to other writers [D].

" patiating generally on the moſt ſhining examples, " in order to habituate him to virtue; and ſometimes " raiſing him to the ſkies, there to admire the divine " Providence, in the ſo greatly famous methods of " governing the world. He nevertheleſs ſometimes " exceeds the duties of a Chronologer by his prolixity; " and that of an Hiſtorian by the diverſity of his paſ- " ſions (26)." Simon Goulart has beſtowed theſe applauſes on Carion's work (27), without blending them with this cenſure. I am to obſerve, that the Writers of the other party condemn very much this Chronicle. Poſſevinus ſuo more, theſe are Keckerman's words (28), inſectatur Chronicon Melanctbonis ſine ulla ratione & fronte. i. e. " Poſſevinus, according to his uſual cu- " ſtom, inveighs againſt Melancthon's Chronicle, " without the leaſt reaſon." Surius lets fly whole vollies of injurious reflections on Peucer, for his continuing that Chronicle (29). He had been injuriouſly treated in the Epiſtle Dedicatory to the 5th Book.

(26) La Popeliniere, Hiſtoire des Hiſtoires, lib. 9. pag. 481. This work was printed in 1599.
(27) See the Epiſt. Dedicat. to his Tranſlation.
(28) Keckerm. de Natura & Prop. Hiſt. in Auct. cap. 6.
(29) Surius, Comment. Rerum in Orbe geſtar. ad ann. 1565.

[C] Moreri has committed a puerile error.] I give it that name, becauſe it is very like thoſe which ſchool-boys make in tranſlating their exerciſe. Here follow his words. Cario underſtood the languages, Polite Literature and Mathematicks. He taught them with applauſe in Wittemberg and other places. The import of this is, that he taught all theſe things in ſeveral univerſities; whereas in fact he only taught the Mathematicks at Francfort upon the Oder. Here follow the words which Moreri attempted to tranſlate. they are very eaſy, and yet he did not underſtand them, A teneris optimarum literarum & artium ſtudioſus fuit, inque pluribus Germaniæ Academiis, præſertim in Witebergenſi . . . cum laude verſatus (30). This evidently ſignifies, that Cario gained applauſe whilſt he ſtudied at Wittemberg, and in ſeveral other univerſities of Germany. But this is not, teaching in them with applauſe.

(30) Melch. Adam. in Vit. Philoſoph. pag. 104.

[D] I ſhall make ſome obſervations, in oppoſition to other Writers.] The epitomizers of Geſner, take notice of an addition of 1528, which is an error. The firſt edition could not precede the year 1531. Keckerman relates that Melancthon publiſhed in 1540, a Chronicle, from the creation to Charlemagne (31). He ought to have ſaid, in 1560. Zeiller has committed the ſame error (32), he having copied Keckerman verbatim. He is guilty of another miſtake, where he aſſerts, that Peucer continued this Chronicle to his time (33); but he ought to have ſaid, till 1519. He obſerves, that Peucer died in 1602. Mr. Sagittarius makes uſe of an odd kind of proof, to ſhew that Melancthon and Carion were good friends (34). He cites a paſſage extracted from the Dedication to Carion's Chronicle, prefixed to the edition of 1558. This paſſage declares, that Melancthon had heard Capnion ſay, that the Elector Palatine cauſed an epitome of the ancient Monarchy to be drawn up by Dalburg Biſhop of Worms, by Rodolphus Agricola, and by Capnion. He doubtleſs imagined that, inſtead of Capnion, we ſhould read Carion in the following words, Sæpe audivi narrare Capnionem &c. i. e. " I have often heard " Capnion ſay &c;" but he then committed another error; for he thought that a man born in 1499 (35), had joined in a work with Rodolphus Agricola, who died in 1485.

(31) Keckerm. de Naturâ & Prop. Hiſt. in Auct. cap. 6.
(32) Martinus Zeillerus, in Hiſtoricis, Part 2. pag. 34. He cites Keckerman. de Hiſt. pag. 207.
(33) Idem, ibid. pag. 114.
(34) Interceſſiſſe tamen Melancthoni cum Capnione ſingularem amicitiam ſequentia produnt. Sagittar. Introd. ad Hiſtor. Eccleſiaſt. p. 99. He writes in the margin, Amicitia Philippi cum Carione.
(35) He obſerves this of Carion, pag. 69.

CARMILIANUS (PETER), a Latin Poet, and an Engliſhman, lived in the beginning of the ſixteenth Century. Eraſmus and Andrew Ammonius ſpeak contemptibly enough of him. He publiſhed, among other Poems, an Epitaph on the King of Scotland, who had been killed in a battle won by the Engliſh in 1513. The judgment which was paſſed upon that Epitaph will be ſeen in the remark [A], and which at the ſame time will make the reader not wonder, that no one ſhould have taken notice of this Poet. The profound obſcurity in which he is buried, is one of the chief reaſons which excited me to devote this little article to his memory. I ſhall obſerve the ſame with regard to ſome others.

[A] The judgment which was paſs'd on it will be ſeen in the Remark.] Ammonius wrote the following words on this ſubject to Eraſmus. Hoc prætereundum non eſt P. Carmelianum Regis Scotorum Epitaphium nuper edidiſſe muliebribus maledictis refertum, quod Pinſonicis characteribus excuſum propediem leges. Eo Carmilianus magis ſibi placet, ſeque magis miratur quam Catullianus ille Suffenus, & tamen niſi ego admonuiſſem pullulare prima correpta poſuiſſet. Utcunque multa reſtant quæ rideas, & inprimis aliquos invenire qui ejuſmodi ineptias ſeriò laudent (1). i. e. " I muſt not omit, that Peter Carmilianus has " lately publiſhed an Epitaph on the King of Scotland, " filled with womaniſh railings, and which you will ſoon " read, printed by Pinſon. Carmilianus is highly " delighted with himſelf upon that account, and ad- " mires himſelf more than Suffenus does in Catullus; " and nevertheleſs, if I had not corrected him, he " would have made the firſt ſyllable in pullulare ſhort. " There are many more things you'll laugh at, and " particularly that there are ſome perſons who ſeriouſly " applaud ſuch ſtuff" This Letter of Ammonius is dated in Nov. 1515; and is the XLth of Eraſmus's eighth Book. Here follows Eraſmus's anſwer on that occaſion: Carmiliani Epitaphium vidi, cumque legerem pullulare, hic, inquam, ſcabies eſt; deinde cum ſciſcitanti reſpondiſſent eſſe Carmiliani, reſpondi, ſanè ipſo dignum eſt. Id quidem ſic acceperunt quaſi dixiſſem Scotorum Rege dignum: quibus pluſculum erat naſi, ſubriſere. Sed næ tu homo nimium es candidus qui belluæ iſtius famæ conſulas: ità me Deus amet magno emerim ſi ſiluiſſes. i. e. " I have ſeen the Epitaph written by Carmilia- " nus; and the moment I read the word pullulare; " this, ſays I, is a ſcab. Afterwards, upon my en- " quiring who had wrote it, I was anſwered Carmilia- " nus; to which I replied it is really worthy of him. " This anſwer was by ſome underſtood, as tho' I had " declared it to be worthy of the King of Scotland. " However, ſome who were ſharper, ſmiled at the " joke. But you certainly were too good-natur'd, to " concern your ſelf for the reputation of ſuch a looby. " I wiſh to God you had taken no notice of him." This anſwer of Eraſmus, dated in November 1511, is the XXth Epiſtle of Book the eighth. Hence the reader may judge of the accuracy of thoſe who drew up the Order of Eraſmus's Epiſtles, and dated thoſe which had no date to them (2).

(1) Epiſt. Eraſm. 40. lib. 8. pag. 435.
(2) See the end of the Remark [B] of the Article (ANDREW) AMMONIUS.

CARNEADES, a famous Grecian Philoſopher, was of Cyrene (a). He founded the third Academy [A], which, properly ſpeaking, differed not from the ſecond (b); for, excepting Carneades, I ſay, the ſucceſſor of Hegeſinus. Let us cite Cicero. Cujus (Arceſilæ) primò non admodum probata ratio, . . . proximè a Lacyde ſolo retenta eſt: poſt autem conficta a Carneade, qui eſt quartus ab Arceſila: audivit enim Hegeſinum, qui Evandrum audierat Lacydis diſcipulum, quum Arceſilæ Lacydes fuiſſet (3). He had ſaid in another place, that the Academy of Arceſilaus maintained it ſelf without any variation

(b) Founded by ARCESILAUS. See his Article.
(a) Diogen. Laertius, lib. 4. num. 62. Plutarch. Sympoſ. lib. 8. cap. 1. pag. 717.

[A] He founded the third Academy.] I obſerve elſewhere (1), that Diogenes Laertius is not to be regarded, when he attributes this foundation to Lacydes. Lacydes punctually followed the Hypotheſis of Arceſilaus his Predeceſſor; and we do not find that Evander, who ſucceeded him or Hegeſinus (2) who ſucceeded Evander, made any innovation therein. It was Carneades who made himſelf head of a new party;

(1) In the Article LACYDES, Remark [A].
(2) Clemens Alexandrinus, Stromat. lib. 1. pag. 301. calls him Hegeſilaüs.
(3) Cicero, Academ. Quæſt. lib. 2. folio 203, B.

excepting a few mitigations, which were of no uſe but to throw duſt in people's eyes, he was as vehement a defender of uncertainty as Arceſilaüs [B]. He found it in the moſt evident ation till the time of Carneades. Quæ (Academia) uſque ad Carneadem perducta, qui quartus ab Arceſila fuit, in eadem Arceſilæ ratione permanſit (4). Clemens Alexandrinus obſerves that the middle Academy flouriſhed till Hegeſilaüs the predeceſſor of Carneades (5). I ſhall below cite St. Auguſtin, who attributes to Carneades the having made an innovation in the Academy of Arceſilaüs.

(4) Idem, ibid. lib. 1. in fine.

(5) Clemens Alexand. Strom. lib. 2. pag. 301.

[B] He was as vehement a defender of uncertainty as Arceſilaüs.] The words of Cicero follow, which teſtify that Carneades confirmed the hypotheſes of Arceſilaüs: Hæc in philoſophia ratio contra omnia diſſerendi, nullamque rem apertè judicandi, profecta a Socrate, repetita ab Arceſila, CONFIRMATA à Carneade, uſque ad noſtram viguit ætatem. i. e. "This method of diſ-"puting againſt all things, and determining nothing "openly, which proceeded firſt from Socrates, and "was afterwards taken up by Arceſilaüs, and CONFIR-"MED by Carneades, flouriſhed till our own time (6)." Here are others which acquaint us that with reſpect to incomprehenſibility, he carried matters as far as the other. Ex hoc illud eſt natum, quod poſtulabat Hortenſius, ut id ipſum ſaltem perceptum a ſapiente diceretis, nihil poſſe percipi. Sed Antipatro hoc idem poſtulanti, quum diceret, ei qui affirmaret nihil poſſe percipi conſentaneum eſſe, unum tamen illud dicere percipi poſſe, ut alia non poſſent, Carneades acutius reſiſtebat. Nam tantum abeſſe dicebat ut ei conſentaneum eſſet, ut maximè etiam repugnaret. Qui enim negaret quidquam eſſe quod percideretur, eum nihil excipere; ita neceſſe eſſe ne id ipſum quidem quod exceptum non eſſet, comprehendi & percipi ullo modo poſſe (7). i. e. "Hence proceeded the demand "of Hortenſius, that you ſhould allow your wiſe man "to comprehend this at leaſt, that nothing can be "comprehended. But when Antipater demanded the "ſame thing, and ſaid it was fitting that he who "affirmed nothing could be comprehended, ſhould ad-"mit that this one thing might be comprehended, "viz. that all other things were incomprehenſible, "Carneades with great vigour denied it; and ſaid it was "ſo far from being fitting for him, that he ſhould oppoſe "it with all his might. For whoever denies that there "is any thing which may be comprehended, excepts "nothing: and therefore it neceſſarily follows that "even that which is not excepted, cannot any way "be comprehended or underſtood at all." You ſee he taught that thoſe who ſay nothing can be comprehended, and there is nothing certain, ought by a neceſſary conſequence to ſay, that even this propoſition itſelf, there is nothing certain, we can comprehend nothing, is alſo uncertain, and incomprehenſible. But he was one of thoſe who affirmed that nothing can be comprehended: therefore he went as far as Arceſilaus. Duo placet eſſe Carneadi genera viſorum. In uno hanc diviſionem: alia viſa eſſe quæ percipi poſſint, alia quæ non poſſint. In altero autem, alia viſa eſſe probabilia, alia non probabilia. Itaque quæ contra ſenſus, contraque perſpicuitatem dicantur, ea pertinere ad ſuperiorem diviſionem, contra poſteriorem nihil dici oportere. Quare ita placere, tale viſum nullum eſſe ut perceptio conſequeretur; ut autem probatio, multa: etenim contra naturam eſſet, ſi probabile nihil eſſet, & ſequitur omnis vitæ ea quam tu, Luculle, commemorabas everſio. Itaque & ſenſibus probanda multa ſunt, teneatur modo illud, non ineſſe in his quicquam tale, quale non etiam falſum nihil ab eo differens eſſe poſſit. Sic quicquid accideret ſpecie probabile, ſi nihil ſe offeret quod ſit probabilitati illi contrarium, utetur eo ſapiens, ac ſic omnis ratio vitæ gubernabitur. i. e. "The opinion of Carneades was, that there were two "kinds of appearances. In the one he made this di-"viſion: that there were ſome appearances which "might be comprehended, and others which could not. "In the other, that ſome appearances were probable, "and others not probable. Therefore that whatever "was ſpoken againſt the ſenſes, and againſt evidence, "belonged to the former diviſion; but that againſt "the latter nothing needed to be ſaid. Wherefore this was "his opinion; that no appearance was ſuch as that com-"prehenſion neceſſarily followed, but there were many "which induced approbation: for it would be againſt "nature if nothing were probable, and the overturn-"ing of all methods of life, which you, Lucullus, "was mentioning, would follow. Therefore many "things are to be approved by the ſenſes; only let "this be held to, that there is not in theſe any ſuch "thing, but that there may be a falſity which may "in no reſpect differ from it. So whatever happens "apparently probable, if nothing offers to contradict "that probability, let the wiſe man make uſe of "it, and thus every inſtitute of life will be regu-"lated (8)." You ſee he admitted only probabilities for the uſe of life, and that as to other matters, he did not think there was any certainty or evidence. He had laboured with all his might to overthrow the cuſtom of aſſenting to that which is not evident (9): did they undertake to do more in the middle Academy? They had reaſon to ſay, that the pains he had taken on that account was a Herculean labour, and they might have added that the Hero might more eaſily have got the better of two thouſand monſters, every one more terrible than the hydra of Lerna, or the Lion of Nemea, than Arceſilaus or Carneades could have obliged mankind not to judge, that is to ſay, not to aſſent to any thing which had not been made evident by due examination.

(6) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. 1. pag. m. 14.

(7) Idem, Academ. Quæſt. lib. 4. pag. 1067, ed. Gronoviane, 1692, in 4to, (m. folio 204. B.]

(8) Idem, ibid. pag. 1077. ejuſd. editionis, (m. folio 209. D.)

(9) Ego enim etſi maximam actionem puto repugnare viſis, obſiſtere opinionibus, aſſenſus lubricos ſuſtinere, credoque Clitomacho ita ſcribenti: Herculis quendam laborem exanclatum à Carneade, quod ut feram & immanem belluam ſic ex animis noſtris aſſenſionem, id eſt, opinationem & temeritatem extraxiſſet, tamen &c. Cicero, Academ. Quæſt. lib. 4. folio 210, D.

Let us obſerve that the innovation of Carneades conſiſted only in this: he did not deny, as Arceſilaus did, that there were no truths; but he maintained that we could not certainly diſcern them. Sint iſta vera, ſays an Academic in Cicero, vides enim jam me fateri aliquid eſſe veri, comprehendi ea tamen & percipi nego (10). Add hereto this other paſſage: Non enim ſumus ii, quibus nihil verum eſſe videatur, ſed ii, qui omnibus veris falſa quædam adjuncta eſſe dicamus, tanta ſimilitudine, ut in iis nulla inſit certa judicandi & aſſentiendi nota. Ex quo exiſtit & illud, multa eſſe probabilia, quæ quanquam non perciperentur, tamen quia viſum hæberent quendam inſignem & illuſtrem, his ſapientis vita regeretur (11). i. e. "For we are not the men "who think there is nothing true, but who ſay that "ſome falſe circumſtances ſtick to all truths, and with "ſo great likeneſs, that there is no certain mark in "them by which we may give our judgment and aſ-"ſent. From whence it alſo follows, that many "things are probable, which, though they be not per-"fectly underſtood, yet becauſe they have a certain "remarkable and illuſtrious appearance, by them is "the life of a wiſe man regulated." It is alſo aſſerted that Arceſilaus denied there were any probable things (12): Carneades did not deny it, and was even of opinion that probability ought to determine us to act, provided nothing was abſolutely decided (13). He had yet ſome farther indulgence, he permitted the wiſe man to judge in ſome caſes. Si ulli rei ſapiens aſſentietur unquam, aliquando etiam opinabitur: nunquàm autem opinabitur, nulli igitur rei aſſentietur. Hanc concluſionem Arceſilas probat. Confirmabat enim primum & ſecundum. Carneades nonnunquam ſecundum illud dabat aſſentiri aliquando: ita ſequebatur etiam opinari (14). i. e. "If the wiſe man ever aſſents to any thing, he will "ſometimes alſo judge. But he never will judge; "for which reaſon he will aſſent to nothing. Arce-"ſilaus approves of this concluſion. For he con-"firmed both the firſt and the ſecond. Carneades "ſometimes allowed that a man might give his aſſent: "whence it followed that he might alſo judge." This condeſcenſion of Carneades made a breach in his ſyſtem, and they ſay Arceſilaüs was more conſiſtent than he. Ex his illa neceſſario nata eſt ἐποχὴ, id eſt aſſenſionis retentio, in qua melius ſibi conſiſtit Arceſilas, ſi vera ſunt quæ de Carneade nonnulli exiſtimant. Si enim percipi nihil poteſt, quod utrique viſum eſt, tollendus aſſenſus eſt. Quid enim eſt tam futile, quàm quicquam approbare non cognitum? Carneadem autem etiam heri audiebamus ſolitum eſſe delabi interdum, ut diceret opinaturum, id eſt, peccaturum eſſe ſapientem (15). i. e. "From hence neceſſarily aroſe that Epoche, or "ſuſpenſion of aſſent, wherein Arceſilaus was more "conſiſtent with himſelf, if thoſe things be true of "Carneades which ſome ſuppoſe. For if nothing can "be

(10) Idem, ibid. folio 211, B.

(11) Idem, de Natura Deorum, pag. m. 15.

(12) See Voſſius, de Philoſoph. ſectis, pag. 76.

(13) See Cicero, Academ. lib. 2. folio 210, B.

(14) Idem, ibid. folio 207. B. See alſo folio 210, D.

(15) Idem, ibid. folio 206, C.

dent notions [C]. It is not agreed whether he wrote any books or not: ſome Authors aſſure us he compoſed none; while others ſeem to ſay the contrary (c). What is related of

(c) See the Remark [I] at the end.

" be comprehended, which was the opinion of both, " aſſent muſt be wholly taken away. For what is ſo trifling as to approve of any thing which is not known? " But we alſo heard Carneades yeſterday ſometimes " uſe to condeſcend ſo far, as to ſay a wiſe man might " give his judgment, that is, might commit a fault." But it is certain Carneades always returned to the Epoche, which was, as we may ſay, the analyſis of his creed. This appears from the expoſition of his opinion to be found at the end of the Academic Queſtions of Cicero. I ſhall ſet it down here: Quid Catulus ſentit? Quid Hortenſius? Tum Catulus. Ego ne inquit? ad patris revolvor ſententiam, quam quidem ille Carneadeam eſſe dicebat, ut percipi nihil putem poſſe, aſſenſurum autem non percepto, id eſt, opinaturum ſapientem exiſtimem, ſed ita ut ſi intelligat ſe opinari, ſciatque nihil eſſe quod comprehendi & percipi poſſit, per inoxiam illam omnium rerum comprobans, illi alteri ſententiæ, nihil eſſe quod percipi poſſit, vehementer aſſentior. Habeo inquam ſententiam tuam, neque eam admodum aſperno. Sed quid tibi tandem videtur Hortenſi? Tum ille ridens, tollendum. Teneo te inquam. Nam iſta Academiæ eſt propria ſententia (16). i. e. " What thinks Catulus? " What thinks Hortenſius? Then ſaid Catulus, Do " you aſk me? I fall back into my father's opinion, " which he ſaid was that of Carneades, ſo that I think " nothing can be perfectly underſtood; yet I ſuppoſe " a wiſe man may aſſent to what is not fully underſtood, that is, may give his judgment, but yet ſo " as that he may at the ſame time know that he " judges only, and that there is nothing which can be " comprehended and perfectly underſtood. Approving " therefore of the Epoche we have been ſpeaking of " in all things, I fully aſſent to that other opinion, " that there is nothing which can be comprehended. " I underſtand your opinion, ſaid I, nor do I much " diſlike it. But what think you Hortenſius? I, ſaid " he laughing, am for denying the whole, [that is, " both comprehenſion and aſſent.] I have you faſt, ſaid " I; for that is the proper opinion of the Academy." But there is more ſtill to be ſaid; for ſome people who might very well know it have maintained that he did not approve of Philoſophers paſſing their judgment. Licebat percipere nihil, & tamen opinari: quod à Carneade dicitur probatum. Equidem Clitomacho pluſquam Philoni aut Metrodoro credens, hoc magis ab eo diſputatum, quàm probatum puto (17). i. e. " A man " might comprehend nothing, and yet give his judgment; which is ſaid to have been approved by Car- " neades. Truly I give more credit to Clitomachus " than to Philo or Metrodorus, and am of opinion that " was a point rather diſputed than approved of by " him." It ſeems to me, therefore, that we may ſuppoſe he retained the ground of Arceſilaüs's doctrine, but that out of policy, and to take from his adverſaries the moſt ſpecious pretexts of declaiming and turning him into ridicule, he granted them ſome degrees of probability which ought to determine the wiſe man to chuſe ſuch or ſuch a ſide in the practice of civil life. He plainly ſaw that without this he could never anſwer the moſt odious objections, he could never prove that his principle did not reduce a man to inaction, and the moſt ſhameful quietiſm. All things well conſidered, it is the ſame thing to ſay, there are no truths, and to ſay, there are ſome, but we have no rule to diſcern them from falſhood. If Arceſilaüs had maintained the firſt of theſe two propoſitions, he ought to be compared to thoſe fiery horſes, which follow their impetuoſity to the bottom of precipices. But I have ſome difficulty to believe that he abſolutely denied the exiſtence of truths. He was ſatisfied, as I think, to maintain that they were impenetrable by the mind of man. The heat of diſpute hindred him perhaps from expreſſing himſelf ſo prudently as they did afterwards in the Academy of Carneades. This latter took better precautions, that he might not become altogether ſo odious as the other. Carneades primo illam velut calumniandi impudentiam, qua videbat Arceſilam non mediocriter infamatum, depoſuit, ne contra omnia velle dicere quaſi oſtentationis cauſa videretur (18). i. e. " Carneades firſt laid aſide that impudence, as it " were of impeaching all things, by which he ſaw Arce- " ſilaüs had gotten no ſmall infamy, leſt he ſhould " ſeem to diſpute againſt every thing out of oſtenta- " tion." Theſe words of St. Auguſtin are leſs diſadvantageous to Carneades than to Arceſilaüs: yet Numenius judged otherwiſe of theſe two Academics; he is leſs angry with Arceſilaüs than with the other. He ſuppoſes that Arceſilaüs was ſincere, deceiving others, and deceiving himſelf alſo; whereas Carneades, believing nothing of what he ſaid, and uſing among his friends a language of confidence quite different from his lectures, ſought only to amaze his ſcholars, and to play with the arguments on either ſide (19). He built, he pulled down, he had no ſooner eſtabliſhed a probability, than he overturned it himſelf. Ἦγε δ' ἂν κἀθεὶς, κἀ ἀπίθανεν, ἀντιλογίας τε κἀ γραφὰς λεπτολόγους συνέφερε τῇ μάχῃ ποικίλλων, ἐξαπατητικός τε κἀ καταφαντικός τις ἦν, καὶ μεθοτέρωθεν ἀντιλογικός. Idem afferebat, idem auferebat, pugnamque ſuam contrariis ſententiis, & verſutis quibuſdam ac ſubtilibus argutiis cum multiplici varietate miſcebat, affirmando ſimul ac negando, & oppoſitis utrinque rationibus diſputando (20). By acknowledging that there were truths and falſhoods in nature, but ſo concealed that they could not be certainly diſcerned from one another (21), he was a more dangerous knave than Arceſilaüs. Ἦν γὰρ λῃστὴς κἀ γόης σοφώτερος. Fur ergo præſtigiatorque fuit ſolertior (22). Cicero ſays a thing which may be oppoſed to Numenius. The latter pretends that the public doctrine of Carneades, and his domeſtic doctrine, did not agree at all; that in public he perplexed every thing, to combate the Stoics; but that among his intimate friends he had no other opinions than thoſe of the common people. Ὅμως δὲ, καίτοι καὐτὸς ὑπὸ Στοϊκῆς φιλονικίας εἰς τὸ φανερὸν κυκῶν, πρός γε τοὺς ἑαυτοῦ ἑταίρους ἀπορρήτων ὁμολόγου τε κἀ ἀλήθευε, κἀ ἀπεφαίνετο, ἃ καὶ ἄλλος τῶν ἐπιτυχόντων. Et tamen ille ipſe, qui Stoïcos vellicandi ſtudio palam cuncta miſcebat, clam ſodales inter ſuos eadem omnia fatebatur, vereque ac certo pronunciabat, quæ alius quivis e populo (23). This does not agree with the paſſage where Cicero aſſures us that Clitomachus was never able to diſcover what appeared the moſt probable to Carneades, whoſe favourite ſcholar he had been for many years (24). Cujus (Calliphontis) quidem ſententiam Carneades ita ſtudioſe defenſitabat, ut eam probare etiam videretur, quanquam Clitomachus affirmabat nunquam ſe intelligere potuiſſe quid Carneadi probaretur (25).

Several people will blame the heap of quotations we have juſt now ſeen: I foreſaw their diſdain, their diſguſt, and their magiſterial cenſures, and was reſolved not to regard them. I had rather ſubmit to be a tranſcriber for the eaſe of thoſe who are deſirous of informing themſelves hiſtorically of the opinions of the ancients, without ſtirring from their ſeat, and to ſee the original proofs, I mean the witneſſes own expreſſions. This has been my motive on a hundred other occaſions.

[C] He found uncertainty in the moſt evident notions.] All Logicians know that the foundation of the ſyllogiſm, and conſequently the faculty of reaſoning, is built on this Maxim, Thoſe things which are the ſame with a third, are the ſame with each other. Quæ ſunt idem uno tertio ſunt idem inter ſe. It is certain that Carneades oppoſed it ſtrongly; ſince he diſplayed all his ſubtleties againſt the following, Thoſe things which are equal to a third are equal to each other. Galen informs us of this in a Diſcourſe which has been printed with one of the Books of Sextus Empiricus, and he even ſays that the ſcholars of that Philoſopher had left in writing all the ſophiſms which their maſter had made uſe of to combate this common and moſt evident notion, and that neither they, nor any of the Academies who had lived after him, had taken the pains to ſolve thoſe ſophiſms: he adds, that there is no leſs malignity in preſerving thoſe objections in a book, without taking notice of their deficiency, than in inventing them. I ſet down his words, according to the verſion of Eraſmus. Carneades ne illud quidem quod eſt omnium evidentiſſimum concedit eſſe credendum, quod magnitudines uni cuipiam æquales, ſint etiam inter ſeſe æquales. Rationes igitur quibus conatur deſtruere & hæc & alia permulta, quæ tibi evidenter apparent creduntque eſſe vera, adhuc in (16) Idem, ibid. in fine, folio 213. D.

(17) Idem, ibid. folio 208, A.

(18) Auguſtin. lib. 3. contra Academicos, apud Aldobrandin. Not. in Diogen. Laertium, lib. 4. num. 28.

(19) Τοῦ γὰρ ἓν ἀπαγαν τοὺς ἄλλους, αὐτὸς ἔμενεν ἀνίξαπάτητος, ὃ μὴ πρόσων τοῦ Ἀρκεσιλάου. ἐκεῖνος γὰρ περιεχόμενος τῇ φαρμακίᾳ τοὺς συγκορυβαντιῶντας, ἔλαθεν ἑαυτὸν πρῶτον ἐξαπατικὸς μὴ γεγονὼς, πεπεῖσθαι δ' ἀληθῆ εἶναι, ἃ λέγει διὰ τοὺς ἀπαξαπάντων ἀναιρέσεως χρημάτων. Quippe, cum in fraudem alios & errorem impelleret, tum fallebatur ipſe nunquam; id quod locum in Arceſila non habebat. Is enim dum cæteros ſuis ſecum maleficiis, ac præſtigiis, Corybantum more inſanientes circumferret, non ſentiebat quam ſeſe primum ipſe deciperet, dum ſibi quoque vera eſſe quæ diceret, omnia ſimul ac ſemel abolendo, perſuadebat. Numenius apud Euſeb. Præp. Evang. lib. 14. cap. 8. pag. 737, C.

(20) Idem, ibid. B.

(21) Idem, ibid. pag. 738. A.

(22) Idem, ibid.

(23) Idem, ibid. D. See alſo pag. 739, A.

(24) A Clitomacho ſumam, qui uſque ad ſenectutem cum Carneade fuit. Cicero, Academ. Quæſt. folio 209, D.

(25) Idem, ibid. folio 213, A.

of his application to ſtudy is very ſingular [D]. He was the Antagoniſt of the Stoics, and applied himſelf with great earneſtneſs to refute the Works of Chryſippus [E], which had hunc uſque diem ſervatas habemus, proditas ſcriptis, ab illius diſcipulis collectas. Solutiones autem nec ab illis, nec ab alio quopiam Academicorum qui poſt Carneadem fuerunt, datæ ſunt. Ea res ſola declarat, iſtius rationes omnes eſſe ſophiſmata: nobiſque quærendæ ſunt, ô diſcipuli, iſtarum ſolutiones. Improbum eſt enim hoc: attamen nihilo minus improbum fecerunt illi qui ſcripſerunt quidem has, cæterùm vobis non indicârunt quales eſſent (26).

(26) Galenus, in Libro de optimo docendi genere, at the end of the Pyrrhonianæ Hypotypoſes, printed by Henry Stephens, in 1562, pag. 220, 221.

[D] What is related of his application to ſtudy is very ſingular.] He was as laborious as any man could be, and ſo intent on his ſtudy that he neglected to cut his nails, and let his hair grow (27). He was ſo far from chuſing to ſpend his time otherwiſe than in his ſtudies, that he not only avoided entertainments (28), but forgot even to eat at his own table (29), and his maid-ſervant Meliſſa, who was alſo his concubine, was obliged to put the victuals into his hand, or perhaps into his very mouth. I expreſs my ſelf thus, becauſe the Latin Author, whom I am going to cite, has kept to general phraſes. Let us obſerve, that the concubine's care was divided, between the fear of interrupting Carneades, and that of letting him ſtarve to death. This obſervation is not uſeleſs; we may infer thence that our Philoſopher was not well pleaſed to be interrupted in his meditations, not even when the occaſion of it was to give the body neceſſary nouriſhment. Carneades laborioſus & diuturnus ſapientiæ miles: ſiquidem nonaginta explctis annis, idem illi vivendi ac philoſophandi finis fuit. Ita ſe mirificum doctrinæ operibus addixerat, ut cum cibi capiendi cauſâ recubuiſſet, cogitationibus inhærens, manum ad menſam porrigere oblivîſceretur. Sed enim Meliſſa, quam uxoris loco habebat, temperato inter ſtudia non interpellandi, ſed inediæ ſuccurrendi officio, dexteram ſuam neceſſariis uſibus aptabat. Ergo animo tantummodo vitâ fruebatur, corpore verò quaſi alieno & ſupervacuo circumdatus erat (30). Add to this what I ſhall ſay preſently concerning the remedy he made uſe of to augment the ſtrength of his mind.

(27) Φιλόπονος δὴ ἀνθρωπος γέγονεν ἐκ παιδὸς τὴν ἀρχὴν καὶ τῆς ἄλλης... ἕθην καὶ ἰκμὰς καὶ ἐνθρυπτὸν ἔσχατα ἀσχολία τῶν περὶ τὸς λόγους. Fuit autem vehementer ſtudioſus... quocirca & cæſariem & ungues nutriebat, tanta erat in literas intentione. Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 62.

(28) Idem, ibid. num. 62.

(29) Val. Maximus, lib. 8. cap. 7. num. 5. in Extr. pag. m. 687, 688.

(30) Idem, ibid.

Muretus, by a ſlip of memory, has taken Chryſippus for Carneades. Prodeat in medium Chryſippus, ſays he (31), qui ſæpe ſtudio intentus tanta voluptate perfruebatur, ut eum tanquam extra ſe poſitum cibi potioniſque caperet oblivio. i. e. "Let Chryſippus ſtep forth, who often enjoyed ſuch pleaſure when intent on ſtudy, that, like one in an exſtaſy, he forgot to eat and drink." On Muretus's word, another learned man has ſince attributed to Chryſippus what belongs only to Carneades (32); but he obſerves, it is true, that Valerius Maximus ſpeaks of the latter, and not of the former (33). Let us ſet down his words; we ſhall ſee he ſays that the food was put into Chryſippus's mouth: Aut Chryſippum denique repetam, quem inter etiam epulas tam intemperantem ſtudii fuiſſe ajunt, ut evolante ad alia ingenio, manus ceſſaret, & hianti ori ancilla Meliſſa cibum ingerere deberet (34) He is no Plagiary, though he makes uſe of the words of Fromondus (35); for he refers us to him. Here, therefore, are three Authors who have committed the ſame fault: I doubt not but they have a good many companions.

(31) Muret. Orat. 2. vol. 1. pag. m. 17.

(32) Jacobus Thomaſius, Oration. pag. 148, 156. edit. Lipſ. 1683.

(33) Idem, ibid. in margine, pag. 156.

(34) Idem, ibid. pag. 156.

(35) Libertus Fromondus, Philoſoph. Chriſtian. de Anima, pag. 211.

[E] He was the antagoniſt of the Stoics; and he applied himſelf . . to refute the works of Chryſippus.] The former part of this remark is teſtified by the following paſſage of Cicero. Sed is (Carneades) ut contra Stoicos, quos ſtudioſiſſimè ſemper refellebat, & contra quorum diſciplinam ingenium ejus exarſerat (36). He read with attention the writings of the Stoics, and above all thoſe of Chryſippus, and refuted them (37). He ſucceeded ſo well therein, that he ſaid that had it not been for Chryſippus, he ſhould not have become what he was. Εἰ μὴ γὰρ ἦν Χρύσιππος οὐκ ἂν ἦν ἐγώ. Niſi Chryſippus fuiſſet, non eſſem ego (38). A great many others might ſay the ſame thing: they have been obliged to the antagoniſts they have had for all their glory: they would have been ſunk in idleneſs, or at leaſt they would have made ſtudy a domeſtic amuſement, if the deſire of ſurpaſſing them had not inſpired them with the reſolution of acquiring great knowledge, and of imparting it to the public. The neceſſity of defending one's ſelf againſt an ambitious and turbulent aggreſſor, has given birth to books which have procured a great deal of glory to people who thought of nothing leſs than of ſetting up for Authors. Our Carneades is not in this laſt predicament. It was he who began the quarrel: he choſe for his antagoniſt one of the moſt celebrated Philoſophers of the Sect of the Stoics, and wiſhed ſo ardently to overcome him, that when he prepared to encounter him he armed himſelf with a doſe of hellebore, in order to have his mind more free, and to excite the fire of his imagination againſt him with greater violence. Idem (Carneades) cum Chryſippo diſputaturus, helleboro ſe antè purgabat, ad exprimendum ingenium ſuum attentius, & illius refellendum acrius (39). I wiſh he who ſaid this had not uſed the word cum: which would make one believe that a verbal diſpute was there intended; but this is a falſe imagination, ſince Chryſippus was not alive when Carneades undertook to refute him. Pliny (40), and Aulus Gellius (41), aſſert that he made uſe of that remedy to anſwer the books of Zeno. Some Moderns ſuppoſe this Zeno to be not the Head of the Stoics, but Zeno of Tarſus, the ſcholar and ſucceſſor of Chryſippus (42). This may be; but as Mr. Menage has judiciouſly obſerved (43), it may alſo be underſtood of the Founder of the Stoics. I cannot wholly applaud his critique on Jonſius. He cenſures him with reaſon for having ſaid that Valerius Maximus aſſerts that Carneades took hellebore deſigning to write againſt Zeno (54). He ſhould have ſaid, deſigning to diſpute with Chryſippus. He very falſly charges him with having accuſed Petronius, Tertullian, St. Jerome, and St. Auguſtin, of a miſtake in ſaying that Carneades purged his brain with white hellebore when he wrote againſt Chryſippus (45). This fault of Mr. Menage is the more aſtoniſhing, becauſe he had but juſt quoted the words of Jonſius; here they are: Quod tamen Chryſippo tribuit perperam Petronius in Satyrico. Tertullianus Libro de Anima cap. 6. Hieronymus Commentario in Epiſtolam ad Galatas (46). They clearly ſignify that thoſe three Authors are in the wrong to attribute that to Chryſippus which Pliny, Valerius Maximus, and Aulus Gellius have related of the hellebore of Carneades. Jonſius ſpeaks not of St. Auguſtin at all. This fault of Monſieur Menage is not his only one; for he ſays expreſly that Petronius, Tertullian, and St. Jerome, affirm that Carneades purged his brain with white hellebore, when he wrote againſt Chryſippus (47). But it is certain that theſe three Authors ſpeak only of the hellebore taken by the latter. Mr. Menage ſays it himſelf in another book (48). I ſhall make one more remark againſt him. He is miſtaken in ſaying that Fulgentius names Zeno when he ſpeaks of the hellebore of Carneades (49): this is not true; he names only Carneades (50). If the originals had been conſulted, new matter might have been found to criticiſe Jonſius, who has placed Fulgentius among the Authors who have ſaid that Carneades prepared himſelf by a doſe of hellebore to write againſt Zeno. I take notice of theſe ſmall ſlips with a view only of accuſtoming Authors to the moſt ſevere exactneſs; for if they be guilty of the leaſt remiſſneſs, they occaſion many others to commit miſtakes and to hand them from one to another.

(36) Cicero, Tuſcul. Quæſt. lib. 5. folio 276, D. He ſays in the 2d Book de Natura Deorum, folio 297, B. that Carneades libenter in Stoicos invehebatur.

(37) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 62.

(38) Idem, ibid.

(39) Val. Maximus, lib. 8. cap. 7. num. 5.

(40) Candidum (elleborum) . . . quondam terribile, poſtea tam promiſcuum, ut plerique ſtudiorum gratia ad pervidenda acrius quæ commentabantur, ſæpius ſumpſiterint. Carneadem reſponſurum Zenonis libris. Plin. lib. 25. cap. 5. pag. 390, 391.

(41) Aulus Gellius, lib. 17. cap. 15.

(42) Jonſius, de Script. Hiſt. Philoſoph. pag. 117. Ouzelius, in Aulum Gellium, cited by Mr. Baillet, Jugemens, tom. 1. pag. 420.

(43) Menage, Anti-Baillet, tom. 1. pag. 154.

(44) Ibid. pag. 153.

(45) Ibid.

(46) Jonſius, de Script. Hiſtor. Philoſ. pag. 117.

(47) Menage, Anti-Baillet, tom. 1. pag. 153.

(48) Idem, Not. in Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 62. pag. m. 184.

(49) Menage, Anti-Baillet, tom. 1. pag. 154.

(50) Sed in quibus & Carneades reſudat elleborum. Fulgent. Mytholog. lib. 1. ſub fin. præfat. pag. m. 27.

Obſerve that Fulgentius makes mention alſo of Chryſippus's hellebore. Ego vero Chryſippi ellebori rancidulo acrore poſtpoſito cum Muſis aliquid blandius fabulabor (51). i. e. "But I, rejecting the offenſive acrimony of Chryſippus's hellebore, will diſcourſe gaily a little with the Muſes." So here are almoſt as many Authors for Chryſippus, as for Carneades. You have for the latter Valerius Maximus, Pliny, Gellius, St. Auguſtin (52), and Fulgentius; and for the former, Petronius, Tertullian, St. Jerome, and the ſame Fulgentius. Mr. Menage to theſe laſt adds Lucian (53); but he brings him in by head and ſhoulders, for the paſſage which he cites contains no more than that Chryſippus could not enter into the Iſland of the Happy, till after four purgations by hellebore (54). There is another paſſage in Lucian which is more tractable: it is that where he makes Chryſippus ſay that a man cannot become wiſe without drinking hellebore three times one after another (55). See alſo Lucian's Hermotimus towards the (51) Idem, de Virgiliana Continentia, pag. m. 140.

(52) Auguſt. lib. 1. contra Creſconium, cap. 19. cited by Mr. Baillet, Jugem. des Poet. tom. 1. pag. 199.

(53) Menag. Not. in Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 62.

(54) Lucianus, Veræ Hiſt. lib. 2. pag. m. 757. tom. 1.

(55) Idem, in Vitar. Auctione, pag. 377. tom. 1.

had been of late the chief pillar of their Portico. He was master of a surprizing eloquence, which appeared formidable to the Roman Senate [F], when he was at Rome with the end. You will find there some ground to conclude that if Mr. Menage had quoted that place, he might have proved what he asserted. In this diversity of opinions, I should chuse to follow those who ascribe all this to Carneades (56); but perhaps Chrysippus also swallowed hellebore to clear his understanding.

(56) See Schoock. Fabul. Hamel. pag. 125, 126.

Let us observe by the way, that Charles Stephens, Lloyd, and Hofman, are mistaken when they say that Carneades was the good friend, and the faithful follower, of the Philosopher Chrysippus, Chrysippi maximè studiosus. I shall take notice below (57), that there were some doctrines which he maintained for no other reason than to oppose the Stoics.

(57) In the Remark [K].

[F] He was master of a surprizing Eloquence, which appeared formidable to the Roman Senate.] It was so powerful, that he never maintained any thing without proving it, nor did he ever attack any thing without utterly overthrowing it. Carneadis vero vis incredibilis illa dicendi & varietas perquam esset optanda nobis, qui nullam in illis suis disputationibus rem defendit, quam non probârit, nullam oppugnavit quam non everterit (58). After this commendation, is there any need to alledge these other words of Cicero? Hinc hæc recentior Academia emanavit, in qua extitit divina quadam celeritate ingenii, dicendique copia Carneades (59). That is, "Hence proceeded this new Academy, in which Carneades appeared, indued with a divine quickness of understanding, and eloquence of speech (59)." Numenius has compared the Eloquence of Carneades to a rapid river which drives before it whatever it meets. This elogy will be better perceived in the original Greek which I am going to cite. Εἴτί που ἰδιόν τι καὶ θαῦμα ἰχνεύων λόγων, ἐξηγείρετο λάβρος, οἷον ποταμὸς ῥοώδης, σφοδρῶς ῥέων, πάντα καταπιμπλὰς τὰ τῇδε κ τὰ ἐκεῖθι, κ εἰσέπιπτε, κ συνέσυρε τὰς ἀκούσας διὰ θερύων. Quod si alto quodam & exaggerato dicendi genere opus esset, tum enimvero vehementi ac rapido cursu ferebatur, ut amnis quidam incitatus & rapax, qui omnia passim inundet & obruat: sic in auditorem incumbebat, eumque secum magno cum fragore strepituque rapiebat (60). He adds that this Philosopher charmed his auditors to that degree, that he led them captive to a submission to his sentiments, and that either by force or by dexterity he subdued even those persons who had taken the most exact precautions against him. This deserves to be told in Greek. Καὶ μέντοι λέγων ὁ Καρνεάδης ἐψυχαγώγει κ ἠνδραποδίζετο. ἦν δὲ κλέπτων μὲν ἀφανὴς, φαινόμενος δ' ληστὴς, αἰρῶν κ δόλῳ κ βίᾳ τὺς κ πάνυ σφόδρα παρεσκευασμένους. At enim vero Carneades interea dicendi facultate auditorem permulcebat, idemque captivum trahebat: & fur occulte, manifeste prædo, vel fraude vel aperta vi paratissimum etiam quemque capiebat (61). None of his adversaries, continues he, could withstand him; they were inferior to him in eloquence; he alone triumphed, all his opinions got footing; the opinions of others were all rejected. Πᾶσα γὰρ Καρνεάδᾳ διάνοια ἐνίκα, κ ἰδέμία ἠτιᾶτο ἄλλως· ἐπὶ κ οἷς προσιπολέμει, ἦσαν ἐκεῖ ἀδυνατώτεροι. Omnis quippe Carneadis vincebat opinio, alia cujuslibet nulla prorsus, cum adversarios omnes longè dicendo inferiores haberet (62). Antipater would needs oppose him (63), but how? He never durst appear before him, neither at the public Lectures, nor walking abroad, nor in conversation. He held his tongue: not a word escaped out of his poor mouth; he attacked him at a distance only and secretly, by some Books which he composed. Posterity saw them: they were not even able to support themselves against Carneades when dead, so far were they from being able to withstand him in his flourishing condition, surrounded by so bright a glory. Βιβλία κατέλιπε γράψας τοῖς ὕστερον, οὐτε νῦν δυνάμενα, κ τότε ἀδυνατώτερα πρὸς οὕτως ἄνδρα ὑπέμειναν φανέντα, κ καταδόξαντα εἶναι τοῖς τότε ἀνθρώποις τὸν Καρνεάδην. Libros tantum posteris relinquebat, verum ejusmodi, qui ne nunc quidem, tum vero multo minus Carneadem illum, qui tantus ac tam admirabilis ejus ævi hominibus videbatur, sustinere possent (64). Let us conclude with a fine passage of Lactantius. Carneades Academicæ sectæ Philosophus, cujus in differendo quæ vis fuerit, quæ eloquentia, quod acumen, qui nescit, is ex prædicatione Ciceronis intelliget aut Lucilii, apud quem differens Neptunus de re difficillima, ostendit non posse id explicari, nec si Carneadem ipsum Orcus remittat (65). What an idea! What an elogy! Neptune is introduced, who discoursing on a matter of very great difficulty, shews that it could not be explained, even tho' Carneades should rise from the dead. Let us go on to his Roman Embassy. It furnishes testimonies of his eloquence which suffer us not to doubt of this fact. Rhetoricians left their Schools, to go to his Auditory (66).

(58) Cicero, de Orat. lib. 2. folio 78, D. See ibid. folio 88, A. the elogy given to his local memory; but there are some Critics who think that instead of Carneades, we should read there Charmidas. See Jonsius, pag. 191. Yet Quintilian, lib. 11. cap. 2. pag. m. 518, writes Carneades.

(59) Cicer. de Orat. lib. 3. cap. 18. fin.

(60) Numenius, apud Eusebium, Præpar. Evangel. lib. 4. cap. 8. pag. 737. C.

(61) Idem, ibid. pag. 738. B.

(62) Idem, ibid. C.

(63) Idem, ibid.

(64) Idem, ibid. D.

(65) Lactant. lib. 5. cap. 14. pag. m. 336.

The Athenians, being condemned to pay a fine of five hundred talents, for having plundered the city of Oropus, sent Embassadors to Rome, who got the fine mitigated to one hundred talents (67). Carneades the Academic, Diogenes the Stoic, and Critolaüs the Peripatetic, three celebrated Philosophers, were charged with this Embassy (68). Before they had audience of the Senate, each of them made Orations in the presence of a great number of persons, and a peculiar character was admired in each of them (69). Strength and rapidity were the character of Carneades (70). Here follows something more remarkable. Cato the Censor was of opinion that those Embassadors should be immediately sent back, because it was very difficult to discern the truth thro' the arguments of Carneades. Cato Censorius, in illa nobili trium sapientiæ procerum ab Athenis legatione, audito Carneade, quamprimum legatos eos censuit dimittendos, quoniam illo viro argumentante, quid veri esset haud facile discerni posset (71). The Athenian Embassadors, said they in the Senate, were not sent so much with design to obtain something of us by way of persuasion, as to force us to comply with whatever they pleased. Εἰς τοσοῦτον ἐνέτρεψαν τὴν σύγκλητον βουλὴν, ὡς εἰπεῖν αὐτοὺς, ἔπεμψαν Ἀθηναῖοι πρεσβεύοντας, οὐ τοὺς πείσοντας, ἀλλὰ γὰρ τοῦς βιασομένους ἡμᾶς ἅπασι ὅσα θέλουσιν. Qui tanta gravitate dicendi Senatum perpulerunt, ut diceret, Miserunt Athenienses legatos, non ut nos persuaderent, sed qui cogerent nos facere, quod ipsis collibitum esset (72). It is not necessary to say that this constraint signified no more than that there was no withstanding the Discourses of Carneades. Consult Plutarch, who will acquaint you that the Roman youth were so charmed by the fine discourses of Carneades, that they renounced pleasures, and all other exercises, to follow the passion of philosophizing, with which he had inspired them, and with which they were seized as it were by enthusiasm. Λόγῳ κατεῖχεν, ὡς ἀνὴρ Ἕλλην εἰς ἔκπληξιν ὑπερφυὴς πάντα κηλῶν κ χειρούμενος, ἔρωτα δεινὸν ἐμβέβληκε τοῖς νέοις, ὑφ' οὗ τῶν ἄλλων ἡδονῶν κ διατριβῶν ἐκπεσόντες ἐνθουσιῶσι περὶ φιλοσοφίαν. Vulgatumque fuit, virum Græcum ad miraculum usque eximium, omnia delenientem & allicientem, mirum infudisse juventuti ardorem, per quem reliquarum voluptatum & oblectamentorum obliti, quasi fanatici raperentur ad philosophiam (73). This did not please Cato: he was afraid lest for the time to come young people would chuse rather to study than to go to war; and he censured in the Senate the conduct which was observed with respect to those Philosophical Embassadors. Let us give them their answer as soon as possible, represented he, and let us send them home: they are men who persuade folks whatever they please (74). He spoke in this manner, nor for any particular hatred to Carneades, as some have believed, but because he despised all Philosophy in general, and the whole Grecian learning (75). Those last words of Plutarch ought not to hinder us from believing that Cato above all things apprehended the subtilty of wit and strength of argument with which our Carneades maintained either side of the question: such people are dangerous: they may prejudice the best causes, as Cicero said of him (76): they sometimes prove white to be black: they resemble that son of Mercury of whom it is said,

Nascitur Autolycus, furtum ingeniosus ad omne,
Qui facere assuêrat, patriæ non degener artis,
Candida de nigris, & de candentibus atra (77).

That is,

"To Mercury Autolycus she brought,
"Who turn'd to thefts and tricks his subtle thought;
"Possess'd he was of all his father's sleight,
"At will made white look black, and black look
"white."

(66) Diog. Laertius, lib. 4. num. 62.

(67) See Pausanias, lib. 7. pag. 216, 217.

(68) Aulus Gellius, lib. 7. cap. 14. Macrobius, Saturnal. lib. 1. cap. 5.

(69) Idem, ibid.

(70) Violenta & rapida Carneades dicebat. Aulus Gellius, lib. 7. cap. 14. Facundia Carneadis violenta & rapida. Macrob. Saturn. lib. 1. cap. 5.

(71) Plinius, lib. 7. cap. 30. pag. m. 52.

(72) Ælian. Hist. Var. lib. 3. cap. 17. pag. m. 189.

(73) Plutarch. in Catone majore, pag. 349. E.

(74) Περὶ παντὸς οὖ βουλοιντο ῥαδίως πεῖθειν δύνανται. Persuadere facile quidvis valent. Idem, ibid. pag. 350, A.

(75) Idem, ibid.

(76) Ut Carneadi respondeatis, qui sæpe optimas causas ingenii calumnia ludificari solet. Cicero, lib. 2. de Repub. apud Nonium, Voce Calumnia, pag. m. 263.

(77) Ovid. Metam. lib. 11. ver. 314.

with two other Embaſſadors. They ſay he ſpoke admirably one day in the behalf of juſtice, and the next day againſt it [G]. The ſubtilties with which he combated that virtue appeared terrible to Cicero [H], and enough to prevent the laying of ſolid foundations

[G] He ſpoke one day in behalf of Juſtice, and the next day againſt it.] This was his element: he delighted in demoliſhing his own work, becauſe all this in the end did ſervice to his grand principle, that there are only probabilities or reſemblances of truth in the mind of man; from whence it follows that between two things directly contradictory, either this or that may be choſen indifferently, for the ſubject of a diſcourſe ſometimes negative, and ſometimes affirmative; but let us come to the proofs of our text. Lactantius will furniſh us with them. Is (Carneades) cum Legatus ab Athenienſibus Romam miſſus eſſet, diſputavit de juſtitia copioſè, audiente Galba, & Catone Cenſorio maximis tunc Oratoribus. Sed idem diſputationem ſuam poſtridie contraria diſputatione ſubvertit, & juſtitiam, quam pridie laudaverat, ſuſtulit, non quidem Philoſophi gravitate, cujus firma & ſtabilis debet eſſe ſententia, ſed quaſi oratorio exercitii genere in utramque partem differendi. Quod ille facere ſolebat ut alios quodlibet aſſerentes poſſet refutare (78). i. e. "He (Carneades) being ſent Embaſſador to Rome by "the Athenians, diſputed eloquently concerning Juſtice, "in the preſence of Galba and Cato the Cenſor the "greateſt Orators of that time. But the next day "he overthrew his former arguments by a contrary "diſputation, and deſtroyed Juſtice, which he had "praiſed the day before, not indeed with the gravity "of a Philoſopher, whoſe opinion ought to be firm "and ſtable, but for a kind of oratorial exerciſe of "diſputing on either ſide. Which he uſed to do, that "he might refute others who aſſerted any thing as "certain." Lactantius adds that it was not difficult for that Philoſopher to refute all that was ſaid in behalf of juſtice; for the Pagans could not know it, becauſe they were ignorant of true Religion, which is the ſource and foundation of it. Erat facillimum juſtitiam radices non habentem labefactare, quia tum nulla in terra fuit; ut, quid eſſet aut qualis à Philoſophis cerneretur .... cujus origo in religione, ratio in æquitate eſt. Sed ii, qui primam illam partem neſcierunt, ne ſecundam quidem tenere potuerunt (79). If they knew it not, they could not maintain it; it muſt therefore neceſſarily ſuccumb when attacked by a Sophiſt. Expoſui cauſam, cur Philoſophi nec invenire juſtitiam, nec defendere potuerunt. Nunc redeo ad id, quod intenderam. Carneades ergo, quoniam erant infirma, quæ à Philoſophis diſſerebantur, ſumpſit audaciam refellendi, quia refelli poſſe intellexit (80). i. e. "I have ſhewn the reaſon "why the Philoſophers could neither find out juſtice, "nor defend it. I return now to what I firſt intended. "Carneades, therefore, ſeeing thoſe arguments which "the Philoſophers advanced were weak, had the boldneſs to refute them, becauſe he knew they might be "refuted (80)." Lactantius proceeds to give us the ſubſtance of Carneades's diſputation againſt Juſtice, and acquaints us that that Philoſopher argued in this manner. If there were any ſuch thing as Juſtice, it would be founded either on poſitive Law, or on the Law of nature. But it is founded neither on poſitive Law, which varies according to different time and place, and is by every nation accommodated to their own intereſt and advantage; nor on the Law of nature, becauſe this Law is no more than a propenſion which nature has given all ſorts of animals towards that which is uſeful for them, and it cannot be regulated according to this propenſion without committing a thouſand frauds: the reſult of which is that it cannot be the foundation of juſtice, therefore &c. He ſhewed by a great many examples that the condition of mankind is ſuch, that if they will be juſt, they act imprudently and fooliſhly; and that if they will act prudently, they become unjuſt: from whence he concluded that there was no juſtice; for a virtue inſeparable from folly cannot paſs for juſt. Lactantius acknowledges that the Pagans were not capable of refuting this argument, and that Cicero durſt not undertake it. Ita ergo juſtitiam cum in duas partes diviſiſſet, alteram civilem eſſe dicens, alteram naturalem, utramque ſubvertit; quod illa civilis ſapientia ſit quidem, ſed juſtitia non ſit, naturalis autem illa juſtitia ſit quidem, ſed non ſit ſapientia. Arguta hæc planè, & venenata ſunt, & quæ M. Tullius non potuerit refellere. Nam cum faciat Lælium Furio reſpondentem, proque juſtitia dicentem, irrefutata hæc tanquam foveam prætergreſſus eſt, ut videatur idem Lælius non naturalem, quæ in ſtultitiæ crimen venerat, ſed illam civilem defendiſſe juſtitiam, quam Furius ſapientiam quidem eſſe conceſſerat, ſed injuſtam (81). After this he gives the ſolution of it from the light of faith (82), and obſerves that Carneades, knowing on the one hand that juſt men are not fools, was ignorant on the other of the true reaſon why they appeared to be ſo; which engaged him to make the beſt uſe of this opportunity of declaiming in favour of incomprehenſibility, his darling principle. Senſit igitur Carneades, quæ ſit natura juſtitiæ, niſi quòd parum altè proſpexit, ſtultitiam non eſſe, quanquam intelligere mihi videor, qua mente id fecerit. Non enim verè exiſtimavit eum ſtultum eſſe qui juſtus eſt; ſed cum ſciret non eſſe, & rationem tamen, cur ita videretur, non comprehenderet, voluit oſtendere, latere in abdito veritatem, ut decretum diſciplinæ ſuæ tueretur, cujus ſumma ſententia eſt, nihil percipi poſſe (83). Let us not forget a very good obſervation of Quintilian. He ſays that though Carneades argued for injuſtice, yet for all that he behaved himſelf according to juſtice. It was the uſual way of the Academics: their ſpeculation was ſuſpended between two contraries; but their practice was fixed to one of them. Neque enim Academici cùm in utramque diſſerunt partem, non ſecundum alteram vivunt. Neque Carneades ille, qui Romæ audiente Cenſorio Catone non minoribus viribus contra juſtitiam dicitur diſſeruiſſe, quàm pridie pro juſtitia dixerat, injuſtus ipſe vir fuit (84). It is the caſe of all the world: men live not according to their principles (85).

[H] The ſubtilties with which he attacked juſtice ſeemed terrible to Cicero.] One of the beſt works of that illuſtrious Roman is the Treatiſe de Legibus. He there lays down this foundation, that there is a natural law, that is to ſay, actions which are by their nature juſt, and which we are obliged to do, not becauſe we live in a ſociety which by a poſitive law ſubjects thoſe who do them not to a penalty, but becauſe of the juſtice and rectitude which accompanies them independently of human inſtitution. He aſſerts that he ought to ſuppoſe this, if he would build on well choſen and well concerted principles, and yet he does not expect every body will approve them; he promiſes himſelf only the approbation of the old Platonics, and that of the Peripatetics and Stoics. He does not trouble himſelf about the School of Epicurus; which made profeſſion to keep at a diſtance from Politics: he leaves it therefore to philoſophize in that retreat after its own manner; but he begs quarter of Arceſilaus and Carneades. He fears that if they came to attack him, they would make too wide breaches in the edifice which he imagined he had raiſed. He does not find that he has courage enough to repel them, wherefore he wiſhes not to be expoſed to their anger, he deſires to appeaſe them, and will enter into no war with them. Let us ſee his Latin. Vereor committere, ut non bene proviſa & diligenter explorata principia ponantur: nec tamen ut omnibus probentur, nam id fieri non poteſt, ſed ut eis qui omnia recta atque honeſta per ſe expetenda duxerunt, & aut nihil omnino in bonis numerandum, niſi quod per ſeipſum laudabile eſſet, aut certe nullum habendum magnum bonum, niſi quod vere laudari ſua ſponte poſſet. His omnibus ſive in Academia vetere cum Speuſippo, Xenocrate, Polemone manſerunt: ſive Ariſtotelem & Theophraſtum cum illis re congruentes, genere docendi paululum differentes, ſequuti ſunt: ſive, ut Zenoni viſum eſt, rebus non commutatis immutaverint vocabula: ſive etiam Ariſtonis difficilem atque arduam, ſed jam tamen fractam & convictam ſectam ſequuti ſunt, ut virtutibus exceptis atque vitiis, cætera in ſumma æqualitate ponerent; his omnibus hæc quæ dixi probantur: ſibi autem indulgentes, & corpori deſervientes, atque omnia quæ ſequantur in vita, quæque fugiant, voluptatibus & doloribus ponderantes, etiam ſi vera dicunt (nihil enim opus eſt hoc loco litibus) in hortulis ſuis jubeamus dicere, atque etiam ab omni ſocietate reipublicæ, cujus partem nec norunt ullam, nec unquam noſſe voluerunt, pauliſper ſaceſſant

(78) Lactant. lib. 5. cap. 14. pag. 336, 337.

(79) Idem, ibid. pag. 337.

(80) Idem, ibid. cap. 16. pag. 340, 341.

(81) Idem, ibid. pag. 342.

(82) Nobis facilior eſt iſta defenſio, quibus cæleſti beneficio familiaris eſt ac penitus nota juſtitia, quique illam non nomine ſed re novimus. i. e. "This defence "is more eaſy "to us, to "whom, by the "favour of heaven, juſtice is "familiar, and "perfectly well "known, and "who are acquainted with "it not by name, "but in reality." Lactant. cap. 17. pag. 343.

(83) Idem, ibid.

(84) Quintil. Inſtit. Orat. lib. 12. cap. 1. pag. m. 557.

(85) Compare the Elogy which Cleanthes gave to Arceſilaus above in the Article of ARCESILAUS, Citation (91).

tions in Works designed to treat of right and of laws. He demonstrated the discourses of the Stoics in behalf of Religion to be absurd [I], and I wonder he was suffered to attack them so vigorously on that head; for the reasons which he alledged against them were very fit utterly to subvert all the Pagan Deities. There is nothing more christian-like than one of his doctrines of Morality [K]. His argument against the Oracles of Apollo cessant rogemus: perturbatricem autem harum omnium rerum Academiam hanc ab Arcesila & Carneade recentem exoremus, ut sileat. Nam si invaserit in has, quæ satis scite nobis instructæ & compositæ videntur rationes, nimias edet ruinas, quam quidem ego placare cupio, submovere non audeo (86). According to this idea, Carneades might have passed for a destroying Angel (87).

(86) Cicero, lib. 1. de Legib. folio 330 verso.

(87) We have seen in the preceding page, Citation (81), that Cicero, introducing Lælius speaking in behalf of Justice, against Furius, who had spoken for Injustice, left several Arguments of Carneades unanswered. It was in his Books de Republica. See St. Augustin, de Civitate Dei, lib. 2. cap. 21.

[I] He demonstrated the discourses of the Stoics in behalf of Religion to be absurd.] This is what may be gathered from the following words of Cicero addressed to the Stoics. Si vos sequar, dic quid ei respondeam, qui me sic roget: Si Dii sunt, sunt ne etiam Nymphæ Deæ? si Nymphæ, Panisci etiam & Satyri? Hi autem non sunt, ne Nymphæ quidem Deæ igitur. At earum templa sunt publice vota & dedicata. Quid igitur? ne cæteri quidem ergo Dii, quorum templa sunt dedicata? Age porrò Jovem & Neptunum Deum numeras? ergo etiam Orcus frater eorum Deus, & illi qui fluere apud inferos dicuntur, Acheron, Cocytus, Styx, Phlegethon, tum Charon, tum Cerberus Dii putandi. At id quidem repudiandum: ne Orcus quidem igitur. Quid dicitis ergo de fratribus? Hæc Carneades agebat non ut Deos tolleret: quid enim Philosopho minus conveniens? sed ut Stoicos nihil de Diis explicare convinceret. Itaque insequebatur. Quid enim, aiebat, si ii fratres sunt in numero Deorum, num de patre eorum Saturno negari potest, quem vulgo maxime colunt ad occidentem? Qui si Deus est, patrem quoque ejus Cælum esse Deum confitendum est. Quod si ita est, Cæli quoque parentes Dii habendi sunt Æther & Dies, eorumque fratres & sorores, qui à genealogiis antiquis sic nominantur, Amor, Dolus, Metus, Labor, Invidentia, Fatum, Senectus, Mors, Tenebræ, Miseria, Querela, Gratia, Fraus, Pertinacia, Parcæ, Hesperides, Somnia, quos omnes Erebo & Nocte natos ferunt. Aut igitur hæc monstra probanda sunt, aut prima illa tollenda (88). i. e. "If I follow you, tell me what I "shall answer to him who should ask me this question: If there be gods, are there nymphs also who "are goddesses? if there be nymphs, are there also "sylvan gods and satyrs? But there are no such beings as these, and therefore no nymphs? Yet temples are publickly vowed and dedicated to them. "What then, are not the rest Gods to whom temples are dedicated? To come nearer, do you reckon "Jupiter and Neptune to be Gods? consequently their brother Pluto will be a God, and the rivers which "are said to flow in hell, Acheron, Cocytus, Styx, "and Phlegethon; Charon and Cerberus also must be "deemed Gods. But this is not to be admitted: neither "therefore is Pluto a God. What say ye then of his "brothers? Thus Carneades argued, not to prove there "were no Gods; for what could be more unbecoming "a Philosopher? but to convince the Stoics that they "said nothing satisfactory concerning the Gods. Therefore he proceeded. What then, said he, if those brothers are in the number of the Gods, can it be denied of their father Saturn, who is principally worshipped by the common people in the west? And if "he be a God, we must also allow his father the "Heaven to be a God. Which if it be so, the parents of Heaven, Æther and Day, are also to be held "Gods, and also their brothers and sisters, who are "thus named in the ancient genealogies; Love, Deceit, Fear, Labour, Envy, Necessity, Old Age, "Death, Darkness, Misery, Complaint, Favour, Fraud, "Obstinacy, the Fates, the Hesperides, Dreams, all which "are said to be the issue of Erebus and Night. Either these monsters therefore must be admitted, or the "former must be denied." You may read in Cicero himself the whole sequel of this argument, which is very long. We see in another place that Carneades had produced so many reasons against those who say that the Gods have done a thousand things on earth for the advantage of mankind, that he had raised a desire in a great many people to inform themselves what was to be believed concerning them. Contra quas Carneades ita multa disseruit, ut excitaret homines non socordes ad veri investigandi cupiditatem (89). It has been said elsewhere (90) that if Carneades had undertaken to plead the cause of the Pagan Religion, he would have seen that Eloquence run aground which was so irresistible. Let us add here, that when he pleaded against this same cause, it was easy for him to triumph. The contrary side melted before his Eloquence like wax before the fire. Observe that Mr. Foucher, who excuses it as much as he can (91), makes use of too indulgent an evasion, and of conjectures which are not at all compatible with the facts.

(88) Cicero, De Natura Deorum, lib. 3. pag. m. 625.

(89) Idem, ibid. lib. 1. pag. 7.

(90) Pensées diverses sur les Cometes, num. 124. pag. 361.

(91) Foucher, Dissert. sur la Philos. des Academiciens, livr. 3. pag. 159.

WHETHER Carneades wrote any books.

Two passages of Cicero which I have cited seem to prove that Carneades wrote some books; for there is no likelihood that the arguments of a Philosopher should be cited, which were known only by tradition: but I may answer that they might be cited according as they were found in the works of some of his scholars. It is thus that Cicero sets down some other dogms of Carneades, by citing the books of Clitomachus (92). This is no demonstrative proof, therefore, against those who affirm that Carneades composed nothing. Plutarch expressly asserts it (93): others say that some letters were handed about which he had written to Ariarathes King of Cappadocia; but that all the rest had been composed by his scholars, and that he left no writings behind him (94). The existence of these letters does not refute Plutarch; for the letters which a man writes, without designing to publish them, do not make him an Author, I mean do not hinder his being reckoned among those who have composed no work. Pliny and Aulus Gellius are against Plutarch: they assure us Carneades took hellebore to write against Zeno (95). I do not produce Fulgentius; for probably the Carneades whom he cites (96) is the Poet (97), and not the Philosopher. It would be more to the purpose to cite Cicero, who has spoken of a writing of Carneades on this thesis, It seems that a wise man would be afflicted at the loss of his country. This writing was inserted by Clitomachus in the work of consolation which he addressed to his countrymen the Carthaginians. Legimus librum Clitomachi, quem ille eversa Carthagine misit consolandi causa ad captivos cives suos. In eo est disputatio scripta Carneadis, quam se ait in commentarium retulisse: quum ita positum esset, videri fore in ægritudine sapientem patria capta. Quæ Carneades contra dixerit, scripta sunt (98). Cicero knew the strong and subtile reasons which Carneades urged against divination. Nobismet ipsis quærentibus quid sit de divinatione judicandum, quod à Carneade multa acute & copiose contra Stoicos disputata sint (99). But yet, once more, this does not prove that they subsisted in any book of that Philosopher. I have said above (100) that his objections against the maxim, Quæ sunt æquali unitertio sunt æqualia inter se, were also known.

(92) Cicero, Acad. Quæst. lib. 2. folio 209, D.

(93) Plutarch. de Fort. vel Virtute Alexandri, pag. 328, A.

(94) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 62. pag. 265.

(95) See the Remark [D].

(96) Nam & Carneades in libro Telesiaco ita ait, πᾶσα τύχη ἀϊσθησιν φρονοῦντος κατοικεῖ, id est, omnis fortuna in sensu habitat sapientis. Fulgent. de Virgil. Contin. pag. m. 145.

(97) Diogenes Laertius, lib. 4. num. 66. makes mention of the Poet Carneades.

(98) Cicero, Tuscul. Quæst. lib. 3. folio 263, B.

(99) Cicero, de Divinat. lib. 1. circa init. folio m. 304, C.

(100) In the Remark [C], Citation (26).

[K] Nothing more christian like than one of his moral doctrines.] I shall here transcribe from a Canon of Dijon, to the end it may not be said that if I were a Divine, I would not speak thus of the opinions of a Philosopher who invincibly refuted the Religion of the Pagans, the only one which he was acquainted with. "Here is one of his maxims: If a man privately "knew that an enemy or any other person, whose "death might be of advantage to him, would come "to sit down on the grass, under which there lurked "an asp, he ought to give him notice of it, even "tho' he could not be reproach'd for having kept silence "on this occasion. Si scieris, inquit Carneades, aspidem occultè latere uspiam, & velle imprudentem alium super eam assidere, cujus mors tibi emolumento futura sit, improbe feceris nisi monueris ne assideat, sed impune tamen id te constaret feciisse: quis enim coarguere possit (101)? This doctrine is admirable, "and is doubtless most worthy of Christianity; for "what is there more worthy of Christianity than to do "good to ones enemy, and to do it without any hope "of being recompensed for it in this world (102)?" These are the words of Mr. Foucher; he almost repeats them in the IVth chapter of the IId book.

(101) This passage is Cicero's, lib. 2. de Finibus, folio m. 223, A. and not lib. 1. as it is quoted by Mr. Foucher, Dissertat. sur la Philosophie des Academiciens, liv. 1. chap. 8. pag. 158.

(102) Foucher, ibid. pag. 46, 47.

But since we are upon a point of morality of Carneades,

Apollo had ſome ſtrength [L]. It is thought he would have left the ſucceſſion to his Chair of Philoſophy to his diſciple Mentor, if he had not broke with him for having catched him in bed with his miſtreſs [M]. Some ſay he lived fourſcore and five years (d): others neades, let us ſay ſomething likewiſe of his opinion concerning the nature of the ſupreme good. The ultimate end of man, ſaid he, is to enjoy the principles of nature (103). Mr. Foucher thinks that this means, To exerciſe in perfection all the functions of the underſtanding and will, without being hindred, either by ignorance or prejudices, or by any other exterior obſtacle (104). Cicero obſerves that Carneades maintained this opinion only to contradict the Stoics, and that if virtue had been joined to the felicity he mentions, the meaſure of true happineſs would have been filled up. Quæ poſſunt eadem contra Carneadeum illud ſummum bonum dici, quod is non tam ut probaret (105), protulit, quàm ut Stoicis, quibuſcum bellum gerebat, opponeret. Id autem ejuſmodi eſt, ut additum ad virtutem autoritatem videatur habiturum, & expleturum cumulate vitam beatam (106). He has ſaid in another Book: Honeſte vivere fruentem rebus his, quas primas homini natura conciliet, & vetus Academia cenſuit, ut indicant ſcripta Polemonis, quæ Antiochus probat maxime, & Ariſtoteles ejuſque amici nunc proxime videntur accedere. Introducebat etiam Carneades, non quo probaret, ſed ut opponeret Stoicis, ſummum bonum eſſe frui his rebus, quas primas natura conciliaviſſet (107). i. e. "That we ſhould "live virtuouſly, and enjoy thoſe things which nature "principally provides for man, was the opinion of the "old Academy, as appears from the writings of Po"lemo, which Antiochus chiefly approves, and to the "ſame opinion do Ariſtotle and his friends at preſent "ſeem nearly to accede. Carneades alſo introduced "this propoſition, that the ſupreme good conſiſted in "enjoying thoſe things which nature had provided in "the firſt place, not with deſign to prove it, but only "to oppoſe the Stoics." Some other paſſages of Cicero (108) clearly teſtify that Carneades confined happineſs to the enjoyment of natural good, without including moral good. It is proper to obſerve that on this head he put the Stoics and the Peripatetics to a nonplus; for he demonſtrated to them that their controverſies concerning the ſupreme good were nothing but a diſpute about words. Carneades tuus egregia quadam exercitatione in dialecticis, ſummaque eloquentia rem in ſummum diſcrimen adduxit, propterea quod pugnare non deſtitit in omni hac quæſtione quæ de bonis & malis appelletur, non eſſe rerum Stoicis cum Peripateticis, controverſiam, ſed nominum (109). He judged of the thruſts exchanged between the two ſects, as Umpire of the field, and ſhewed the one that thoſe things which they called goods, and which the other called only conveniencies, were not worth deſiring, ſince the one aſcribed no greater advantages to them than the other. Quorum controverſiam ſolebat tanquam honorarius arbiter judicare Carneades. Nam quum quæcunque bona Peripateticis, eadem Stoicis commoda viderentur, neque tamen Peripatetici plus tribuerent divitiis, bonæ valetudini, cæteriſque rebus generis ejuſdem, quàm Stoïci, quum ea re, non verbis ponderarentur, cauſam eſſe deſiderandi negabat (110). One of his victories over the Stoics was to drive them from a poſt, in which they had maintained themſelves a conſiderable time. They had ſaid that good repute without ſome advantage was not worth ſtirring a ſtep for. But they could not withſtand Carneades, and ſaw themſelves obliged to aſſert that it was worthy of our choice for its own ſake (111). Every one knows they made a diſtinction between good, and the things which deſerved preference.

(d) Diogenes Laert. lib. 6. num. 65. Lucian. in Macrob. pag. 640. tom. 2.

(103) Carneadi frui principiis naturalibus eſſet extremum. Cicero, de Finib. lib. 2. folio 221, C.

(104) Foucher, Diſſertat. ſur la Philoſ. des Academ. pag. 158.

(105) Add hereto theſe words of the 5th Book de Finibus, folio 239. Voluptatis Ariſtippus, non dolendi Hieronymus, fruendi rebus his quas primas ſecundum naturam eſſe diximus, Carneades non ille quidem autor ſed defenſor diſſerendi cauſa.

(106) Cicero, de Finib. lib. 2. folio 222, A.

(107) Idem, Acad. Quæſt. lib. 2. fol. 212. B, C.

(108) In his 2d Book de Finibus, folio 221, D; and in the 5th Book, folio 239 verſo.

(109) Idem, ibid. lib. 3. fol. 230, A.

(110) Idem, Tuſcul. lib. 5. ſub fin. folio 278, D.

(111) Idem, de Finib. lib. 3. 231.

[L] His argument againſt the oracle of Apollo had ſome ſtrength.] He aſſerted that that Deity could not foretel things to come, unleſs they depended on a neceſſary cauſe: he deprived him of the knowledge of all contingent events, as of Oedipus's parricide for inſtance; for there being no cauſe which neceſſarily forced that man to kill his father, it could not be foreſeen that he would kill him: what is to come cannot be known but when all the efficient cauſes of an action are known. He alſo aſſerted that the Gods who preſided over the oracles could not know what was paſt, when there remained no ſigns which might ſerve for tracks to direct them back to the time of the event. He meant, without doubt, that there was no other track which could ſerve for this purpoſe, beſides the concatenation of natural cauſes which act without any uſe of liberty; and that therefore the acts of man's free-will breaking the chain, hindred the Gods from extending their view to ages paſt, when there remained no ſenſible monument of the events. Dicebat Carneades, ne Apollinem quidem futura poſſe dicere, niſi ea, quorum cauſas natura ita contineret, ut ea fieri neceſſe eſſet. Quid enim ſpectans Deus ipſe diceret Marcellum eum qui ter conſul fuit, in mari eſſe periturum? Erat quidem hoc verum ex æternitate, ſed cauſas id efficientes non habebat, ita ne præterita quidem ea quorum nulla ſigna tanquam veſtigia extarent Apollini nota eſſe cenſebat, quo minus futura. Cauſis enim efficientibus quamque rem cognitis, poſſe denique ſciri quid futurum eſſet. Ergo nec de Oedipode potuiſſe Apollinem prædicere, nullis in rerum natura cauſis propoſitis, quur ab eo patrem interfici neceſſe eſſet, nec quicquam ejuſmodi (112). Chryſippus had eluded the inſtance taken from a man who is predeſtined to die, dying of courſe, whether he makes uſe of medicines, or whether he does not: he had eluded this, I ſay, by ſuppoſing the complication of predeſtined events, as that ſuch a man ſhall make uſe of a Phyſician and recover. For which reaſon the medicines are then an annex to the fatality of the recovery. Omnes igitur hujus generis captiones eodem modo refelluntur. Sive tu adhibueris medicum, ſive non adhibueris, convaleſces, captioſum. Tam enim eſt fatale Medicum adhibere, quàm convaleſcere. Hæc ut dixi confatalia ille apellat (113). Carneades was not ſatisfied with this anſwer; but to refute it thoroughly, he ſhewed the great inconvenience of it, I mean the extinction of liberty. If you join in this manner, ſaid he, in the decrees of deſtiny the cauſes with the effects, every thing will be done by neceſſity, and nothing will be in our power; every thing will depend on an anterior cauſe, and all are linked together by a natural and indiſſoluble band. His meaning will be better comprehended from the Latin words of Cicero. Carneades genus hoc totum non probabat, & nimis inconſiderate concludi hanc rationem putabat: itaque premebat alio modo, nec ullam adhibebat calumniam, cujus erat hæc concluſio: Si omnia antecedentibus cauſis fiunt; omnia naturali colligatione conſerta contextaque fiunt, quod ſi ita eſt, omnia neceſſitas efficit. Id ſi verum eſt, nihil eſt in noſtra poteſtate. Eſt autem aliquid in noſtra poteſtate. At ſi omnia fato fiunt, omnia cauſis antecedentibus fiunt: non igitur fato fiunt quæcunque fiunt (114).

(112) Idem, de Fato, folio 325, C. D.

(113) Idem, ibid. C.

You ſee that the diſputes of the Auguſtinians with the Jeſuits and with the Remonſtrants, on the conſequences of Predeſtination, were on foot among the ancient Philoſophers. You ſee that Carneades has furniſhed a difficulty for the Predeſtinarian Divines to object to their adverſaries, that God could not foreſee future things, if they depended on an indifferent cauſe. There are none but the Socinians, who have had the ſincerity to acknowledge the evident force of this objection: but into what an abyſs have they thrown themſelves by this act of ingenuity! It obliges them to give up the preſcience of God, and what can be more monſtrous than to admit a God who knows not the actions of men otherwiſe than gradually as they are done?

(114)‖ Idem, ibid.

[M] He broke with Mentor, for having catched him in bed with his miſtreſs.] To leave no ambiguity, I am obliged to ſay that Mentor was caught in bed with the miſtreſs of Carneades his Profeſſor. Carneades did not then diſpute on probability, nor on incomprehenſibility: he was altogether like other men; he took what his eyes had diſcovered to him, of the infidelity of his concubine and his ſcholar, to be a thing certain, and what he very well comprehended, and he thereupon broke with Mentor. This latter became his Antagoniſt; oppoſed ſubtilties to ſubtilties, and refuted the Acatalepſy. Καρνεάδη ϑ' γένηται γνάφιμος Μέντωρ μὲν ὁ πρῶτος, ὃ μὲν διάδοχος. ἀλλ' ἔτι ζῶν Καρνεάδης ἐπὶ παλλακῇ μοιχὸν εὑρὼν, οὐχ ὑπὸ παιδικῆς φαντασίας, οὐδ' ὡς μὴ καταληφὼς, ὡς δὲ μάλιστα πιστεύων τῇ ὄψει, ἀφ' καταλαβὼν, παρητήσατο τῆς διατριβῆς. Mentorem Carneades primum habuit diſcipulum, non tamen ſucceſſorem. Quod enim illum adhuc vivens cum pellice ſua repererat, non jam viſo tantum probabili, aut quaſi minus hominem comprehenderet, at ſuis maximè credens oculis, eumque verè comprehendens, others ſtretch his life to ninety (e). His death is placed in the fourth year of the 162d Olympiad (f). I do not believe there is any good ground to ſubſtitute a different chronology, as Petavius has done (g), or that it can be made out that he lived at the ſame time with Epicurus. A Diſpute has ariſen on this laſt point, between two Moderns [N] who

(e) Cicero, Academ. Quæſt. lib. 2. folio m. 203, B. Valer. Maxim. lib. 8. cap. 7. pag. m. 687.

(f) Diogen. Laert. lib. 4. num. 65.

(g) See the Remark [P], num. 6.

comprehendens, ejus deinceps operam & conſuetudinem repudiavit (115). This is what Numenius informs us. Diogenes Laertius ſpeaks of it with more brevity (116). This was a baſe action of Mentor: he was the chief ſcholar of Carneades; he had free admittance into his houſe, as if he had been his ſon; and he abuſed that privilege to debauch the Philoſopher's concubine. The diſorders occaſioned by love cannot be ſufficiently lamented. It is a brutiſh paſſion, which ſtifles all ſentiments of gratitude and generoſity. You meet with people who would not for all the world rob their friend of the value of a penny: they would ſuffer inſupportable remorſe of conſcience, if they could reproach themſelves with having betrayed him in the ſmalleſt affair: the moſt ſhining generoſity dwells in their ſoul in all other reſpects; but they make no ſcruple to debauch his wife or his daughter. No friendſhip is proof againſt the dæmon of impurity: every thing ſeems to him to be fair prize. Non hoſpes ab hoſpite tutus. The rights of hoſpitality, which are ſo ſacred, ſo inviolable, ſtop him not. On the contrary, he therein finds his preparatives, and the forwarding of his affairs.

(115) Numenius, apud Euſebium, Præpar. Evang. pag. 738, D.

(116) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 63.

[N] I do not believe . . . that he lived at the ſame time with Epicurus. A diſpute has ariſen on this point between two Moderns.] I mean Mr. Foucher Canon of Dijon, and Mr. Lantin Counſellor in the Parliament of the ſame City. The Pieces publiſhed by them on this controverſy are to be found in the Journal des Savans (117). The queſtion in debate is, Whether Carneades was contemporary with Epicurus. Mr. Foucher has aſſerted it in his Hiſtory of the Academics, and has maintained it by four arguments in a Memorial communicated to Mr. Couſin (118). They were refuted by Mr. Lantin (119), and in a manner that will not admit of a good reply, in my opinion. He has found in Cicero (120) a deciſive fact; which is that Carneades came to Rome with the two other Embaſſadors of the Athenians under the Conſulſhip of Publius Scipio and Marcus Marcellus. Now that Conſulſhip coincides with the year of Rome 598, which is the ſecond of the 155th Olympiad, and about a hundred and twelve years later than the death of Epicurus. It is not true therefore that Epicurus and Carneades lived at the ſame time: wherefore Mr. Foucher cannot be ſupported by that paſſage of Cicero (121), where it is ſaid that Carneades the intimate friend of Epicurus, Epicuro perfamiliaris, made a viſit to Arceſilaüs. Either Cicero's memory muſt have failed him, or he ſpeaks of a different Carneades from ours (122), or elſe the tranſcribers muſt have put Carneades there inſtead of ſome other Philoſopher, as has happened to them in other places (113). Mr. Foucher without doubt perceived the force of this argument; but having found new difficulties, he would not yield till Mr. Lantin had ſolved them (124). He believes that poſſibly the Conſulſhip under which the three Philoſophers came as Embaſſadors to Rome, might be that of a Scipio the Bald, and a Marcellus in the year 531 or 532 of the foundation of Rome. . . . And if ſo, Carneades would have lived twenty years with Epicurus, and would have been deputed at the age of ſixty . . and might have lived yet thirty years after his Embaſſy, ſince he did not die till ninety. But it is eaſy to ſhew that that Embaſſy was a great deal later than the year 532.

In the firſt place, we are informed by Pauſanias (125), that the plundering of Oropus was poſterior to the reduction of Macedonia into a Roman Province, and it is certain that Perſeus, the laſt King of Macedon, was not brought to Rome till the year 587. It is not poſſible, therefore, that an Embaſſy, deſigned to moderate the fine which the Athenians had been condemned to pay for plundering of Oropus (126), ſhould belong to the year of Rome 532. In the ſecond place, Cato was an old man at the time of this Embaſſy: Plutarch takes notice of it. Ἦδη ὁ ἀνὴρ γέρων ὑπὸ γήρως γεγονὼς πρέσβεις Ἀθήνηθεν ἦλθον εἰς Ῥώμην οἱ περὶ Καρνεάδην, &c. Eo jam ſene legati Athenienſium Romam adventârunt Carneades, &c (127). Now Cato was born in the year of Rome 519; for Cicero (128) makes him ſay that at the age of ſixty five he adviſed the paſſing of the law Voconia, under the Conſulſhip of Philippus and Cœpio, which coincides with the year 584. It is not poſſible therefore that theſe three Athenian Embaſſadors could come to Rome in the year 532. My third Reaſon follows: I have taken it from the very paſſages which Mr. Foucher has produced in favour of his own cauſe. Scipio and Lælius were very young at the time of that Embaſſy (129), and they looked on old age as yet at a diſtance in the year of Rome 601. Read Cicero's Treatiſe de Senectute, where Cato ſpeaks to them as an old man to young people, and where he takes notice that Scipio Africanus had then been dead thirty three years (130), his death happening a year before himſelf (Cato) was Cenſor. He died therefore in the year 568. It is conſequently impoſſible that Carneades could come to Rome with the character of Embaſſador from Athens in the year 532. For, if Lælius and Scipio were then fifteen, they would have been above fourſcore before the third Punic War, which is abſolutely falſe; and nothing would be more ridiculous than Cato's talk in the Dialogue de Senectute. He would have been younger than they. Wherefore I cannot conceive the reaſon which induces Mr. Foucher to ſupport his opinion by a proof drawn from Scipio and Lælius being young men when thoſe Philoſophers were deputed to the Roman People. Cicero has placed the Embaſſy of the three Philoſophers under the Conſulſhip of Publius Scipio and Marcus Marcellus. M. Lantin judges this Conſulſhip to be that of P. Scipio Naſica, and M. Marcellus, in the year of Rome 598. Here is what has been objected to him. "The Marcellus, under whoſe Conſulſhip Carneades "was ſent to Rome, was dead before the Marcellus, "who was the Collegue of Scipio Naſica, was Con"ſul. For we find in the Dialogue de Senectute, "that the firſt had already loſt his life before the 592d "year of Rome; whereas the Collegue of Scipio "Naſica was not Conſul with him till the year 599, "at which time it is certain that the Embaſſy of Car"neades had been already performed. Therefore it "was not under the Conſulſhip of Scipio Naſica and "Marcellus that Carneades went to Rome, ſince the "Embaſſy was over before that Conſulſhip, and Mar"cellus, who had been Conſul at that time, was al"ready dead; which is teſtified by Cicero in the ſame "Dialogue, in theſe words: Cujus interitum ne cru"deliſſimus quidem hoſtis honore ſepulturæ carere paſſus "eſt. i. e. "Whoſe death even the moſt cruel ene"my ſuffered not to be deprived of the honour of bu"rial (131)." To refute this paſſage it is ſufficient to obſerve that the Latin Words, which conclude it, relate to the brave Marcellus who performed ſo many glorious exploits during the ſecond Punic War, and for whom Hannibal made an honourable funeral in the year of Rome 545. Cato was then but ſix and twenty. It was therefore under none of the Conſulſhips of this Marcellus that Carneades was deputed to the Romans. Neither have I been able to gueſs for what reaſon the year of Rome 592 is pitched on here.

(117) Under the 6th of Auguſt 1691, pag. m. 500; under the 24th of March 1692, pag. 197; and under the 8th of December 1692, pag. 704.

(118) It is in the Journal des Savans of the 6th of Auguſt 1691.

(119) Journal des Savans, 1692, pag. 206, &c.

(120) Quæſt. Acad. lib. 4. in my edition it is in the 2d Book, folio 212, D.

(121) It is at the end of the 5th Book de Finibus.

(122) This is viſible; for he had ſeveral times named our Philoſopher in the preceding pages without any addition of diſtinction. Would he have bethought himſelf at the end of the Book to characterize him by Epicuro perfamiliaris?

(123) See Jonſius, de Script. Hiſt. Philoſ. pag. 191. where he ſhews that we ought to read Charmidas, and not Carneades, in ſome Paſſages of Cicero.

(124) See the Journal des Savans, 1692, pag. 704, & ſeq.

(125) Pauſanias, lib. 7. pag. 216.

(126) This was the end of the Embaſſy of the three Philoſophers. See Plutarch. in Catone majore, pag. 349; A. Gellius, lib. 7. cap. 14.

(127) Plutarch. in Catone majore, pag. 349, D.

(128) Cicero, de Senectute, cap. 5. pag. m. 398.

(129) Quibus adoleſcentibus Stoïcum Diogenem, & Academicum Carneadem video ad Senatum ab Athenienſibus miſſos eſſe legatos, Cicero, Tuſcul. lib. 4. cited by Monſ. Foucher in the Journal des Savans, pag. 706.

(130) The Manuſcripts vary here; ſome have 35 years, and others 33.

(131) Journal des Savans 1692, pag. 705.

who have publiſhed the Pieces written by them on the Controverſy in the Journal des Savans. I ſhall examine it a little. Plutarch has preſerved us this judicious ſaying of Carneades (b), Riding is the only thing which young Princes learn perfectly: their other maſters flatter them, and thoſe who wreſtle with them ſuffer themſelves to fall; but a horſe throws to the ground without diſtinction of poor or rich, of ſubject or ſovereign, all the unſkilful who get on his back. I ſhall take notice of a miſtake of Saldenus [O], and of the faults of Moreri [P]. I have ſpoken elſewhere (i) of a CARNEADES, who was one of the friends of Epicurus, and, as it ſeems to me, was not a different perſon from

(b) Carneades, apud Plutarch. de Diſcrim. Adulat. & Amici, pag. 58, F.

(i) Above, Citation (96) of the Article ARCESILAUS.

Scipio here intended is manifeſtly the ſame who deſtroyed Carthage in the third Punic war, and afterwards Numantia, it muſt neceſſarily be that the journey of thoſe Philoſophers was taken towards the end of the VIth Century of Rome, and not in 532. This Scipio was not yet born in the year 532; for when he was created Conſul in 606, he had not attained the age which was required by the laws to obtain that dignity (132). He ſtood for the office of Ædile only; but, to ſatisfy the Tribunes of the people, a diſpenſation of age was granted him (133). His youth when the Athenian Deputies philoſophized at Rome, is one of the beſt arguments which Mr. Lantin could oppoſe to Mr. Foucher. I wonder he has paſſed ſo ſlightly over the teſtimony of Aulus Gellius which was objected to him: he contents himſelf with obſerving that it is not an authority which can be put in compariſon with that of Cicero (134). Methinks he might have given a better anſwer: he might have denied that Aulus Gellius ſays what Mr. Foucher imputes to him, that Carneades was ſent Embaſſador about the year 534 (135). Here are the words of A. Gellius: Ac deinde annis ferè poſt quindecim bellum adverſus Pœnos ſumptum eſt: atque non nimium longè M. Cato Orator in civitate & Plautus Poëta in ſcena floruerunt: iiſdemque temporibus Diogenes Stoïcus & Carneades Academicus, & Critolaus Peripateticus ab Athenienſibus ad Senatum populi Romani negotii publici gratia legati ſunt: neque magno intervallo poſtea Q. Ennius, &c. (136). i. e. "And then, about fifteen years after, the war againſt "the Carthaginians was undertaken: and no very "long time after, M. Cato the Orator and Plautus the "Poet flouriſhed, the one in the city, the other on "the theatre: about the ſame time Diogenes the Stoic, "Carneades the Academic, and Critolaus the Peripa"tetic, were ſent Embaſſadors by the Athenians to the "Roman Senate on public buſineſs: and not a great "while after Q. Ennius &c." One would ſooner find here the year 560, than the year 534, ſince the Conſulſhip of Cato coincides with the year of Rome 558, and Plautus died but in 596 (137). Let it not be imagined that I approve of the Chronology of Aulus Gellius: his uncertain manner of expreſſion by non nimium longe: iiſdem temporibus: neque magno intervallo poſtea, is enough to render it contemptible. Theſe are terms without any exactneſs: they are ſtretched or contracted, ſometimes more, and ſometimes leſs, as Caſaubon judiciouſly obſerves (138).

(132) According to Livy, lib. 44. pag. m. 867. he was in his 17th year when Perſeus was taken, that is in the year 585.

(133) See Sigonius in Faſtis, ad ann. 606.

(134) Journal des Savans 1692, pag. 209.

(135) Journal des Savans 1691, pag. 513.

(136) Aulus Gellius, lib. 17. cap. 21. in fine.

(137) Cicero, in Bruto, pag. m. 104.

(138) Caſaubon. in Athen. lib. 5. cap. 18. pag. 385.

I know a great many Readers will cry out, that I ſtand on trifles more than I ought, and that they care not to be informed whether Carneades came to Rome in the year 532, or in the year 598; but I little regard the falſe taſte of ſuch Cenſors: and it would ill become me to be ſo ſqueamiſh with regard to inquiries which an illuſtrious Counſellor of the Parliament of Burgundy, and an illuſtrious Canon of the Capital of the ſame Province, have judged not unworthy of their attention, and which they have communicated to the public under the direction of a famous Preſident in the Court of the Mint at Paris (139). If any one ſhould have a mind to anſwer the cenſure of thoſe nice Gentlemen, who deſpiſe diſcuſſions of this kind, for me, I would deſire him to apply to me the following verſes of Terence:

(139) Mr. Couſin, Author of the Journal des Savans.

Faciunt næ intellegendo ut nihil intellegant,
Qui cum hunc accuſant, Nævium, Plautum, Ennium
Accuſant, quos hic noſter auctores habet:
Quorum æmulari exoptat neglegentiam
Potius, quam iſtorum obſcuram diligentiam (140).

(140) Terentius, in prologo Andriæ.

That is,

"But in reality by pretending to too much under"ſtanding, they ſhew they underſtand nothing; who "when they find fault with our Author, find fault with "Nævius, Plautus, and Ennius, whom he followed "in this reſpect; and whoſe happy negligence he "chuſes to imitate rather than the obſcure exactneſs "of the former.

[O] I ſhall take notice of a miſtake of Saldenus.] Having mentioned the obſcurity of the Philoſopher Heraclitus, he obſerves that Epicurus and Carneades had the ſame defect. Germani huic fuerunt Epicurus & Carneades Cyrenæus, novæ Academiæ principes, quorum hic adeo à Clytomacho obſcurus dictus fuit, ut nunquam percipere ſe potuiſſe aſſeverarit, quænam ſcriptorum ejus mens ſenſuſque fuerit (141). i. e. "Nearly of kin to "him were Epicurus and Carneades the Cyrenæan, "Heads of the New Academy, the latter of whom "was by Clytomachus ſaid to be ſo obſcure, that he "declared he could never underſtand the meaning or "ſenſe of his writings." To make no animadverſion on his Epicurus, who was as much Head of the new Academy, as I am Patriarch of Conſtantinople; I ſhall only ſay, that it is utterly falſe that Clitomachus complained of the obſcurity of the writings of Carneades. He ſaid no more than that he could never diſcover what were the opinions which Carneades approved (142). This did not proceed from the obſcurity of his expreſſions, but from the Scepticiſm of that Philoſopher. He found no certainty in any thing; he maintained and refuted ſucceſſively the ſame doctrines: this was the reaſon why it could not be diſcerned whether he approved any one of them. I do not accuſe honeſt Saldenus of having miſunderſtood the words of Cicero, which acquaint us with what concerns Clitomachus: I make no doubt but he would have underſtood them, if he had taken them from the ſource; but he found them in a place of baniſhment, where they had loſt their natural ſhape. He is excuſable therefore for having miſtaken them. He ſaw them in ſome modern book, whither they arrived not till after they had rambled thro' countries of all ſorts. They had been ſo abuſed by robbers, that they had nothing of their patrimony left, and had paſſed thro' ſo many hands, that if they had received but a little knock at every conveyance, it would have been more than ſufficient to have killed them outright. Let us reaſon in the ſame manner with regard to an infinite number of paſſages which are copied from the firſt modern Writer one meets with. Theſe are poor fugitives who have been rifled, lamed, ſtigmatized, &c; ſhould a man wonder that their condition is miſtaken, and that the quality of their birth cannot be diſcovered?

(141) Guilielmus Saldenus, de Libris, pag. 124.

(142) See above, Citation (25). the words of Cicero, which inform us of this fact.

[P] . . and the faults of Moreri.] I. Nothing is more falſe than to aſſert that Carneades ſucceeded Chriſippus, This fault has been corrected in the ſecond Dutch Edition. II. It is true that he applied himſelf more to Moral Philoſophy than to Natural (143); but it is falſe that excepting Moral Philoſophy he neglected every thing elſe. Could he have maintained the epoche with the ſtrength and eloquence that he did, if he had neglected Natural Philoſophy, Logic, Rhetoric, &c? III. Can the ſtrong meditation which makes a man forget to eat at table be called a deep lethargy? Can he be more broad awake than in ſuch a condition? IV. Valerius Maximus does not ſay, that he purged his brain with hellebore (144) . . . . to diſpute againſt Zeno: it ſhould have been againſt Chryſippus. V. He did not poiſon himſelf when he was informed that Antipater had taken poiſon. We read the direct contrary in Diogenes Laertius. That Hiſtorian relates (145) that Carneades had a great averſion to death, and that he often repeated theſe words, Nature which has put together will alſo diſſipate. His meaning was that he would leave her to act alone, and

(143) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. in Carneade, init. num. 62.

(144) The words are miſerably placed in the Original: they may ſignify he purged his brain of hellebore.

(145) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 64.

from that voluptuous Epicurean who is named Corniades in the editions of Plutarch (k). There is no manner of foundation to ſuppoſe, that when Cicero ſpeaks of this friend of Epicurus, he means Carneades who founded the third Academy. See the Remark [N], and the marginal Note (122). I ſhall examine in another place (l) the paſſage of Diogenes Laertius, which imports that one of the Scholars of Epicurus changed ſides, and joined himſelf to Carneades; and I ſhall acquaint the Reader with what Mr. de la Monnoie thinks of that matter.

(k) See the Remark [S] of the Article EPICURUS, at the end.

(l) In the Remark [D] of the Article EPICURUS, at the end.

and not prevent her by killing himſelf. When he was told that his adverſary Antipater (146), a Philoſopher of the ſect of the Stoics, had poiſoned himſelf, a ſudden fit of courage againſt death ſeized him, then give me ſome too, cried he. What would you have, aſked his attendants? Some mellow wine, replied he. From whence it appears that if the fancy took him to imitate his antagoniſt, it did not laſt long. Diogenes Laertius banters him for this puſillanimity, and reproaches him for having choſen rather to linger and pine away with the Phthiſic, than to put an end to his life at once (147). Father Labbe ought to have known thoſe particulars, and not have ſaid that he killed himſelf by poiſon (148). VI. If it be hard to fix the year of his death, it is not for the reaſon given by Moreri; it is not, ſay I, becauſe Diogenes Laertius makes him to have lived eighty five years, and Cicero allows him ninety. This difference contributes nothing at all to the difficulties in fixing the year wherein Carneades died; for the year of his birth is not known, and if it were known, we need only remove the year of his death five degrees either backward, or forward, according as we prefer or poſtpone the authority of Cicero to that of Diogenes Laertius: ſo the difficulty would not be great. However it is great; but for other reaſons, which you may ſee diſcuſſed in the two Authors whom Father Labbe is going to name to you: "There is a great deal of diffi-" culty in determining the year of this Philoſopher's " death, as the ſame Father Petau has obſerved in his " Miſcellaneous Exercitations on the works of Julian the " Apoſtate. Jonſius, in his Treatiſe of Philoſophical " Hiſtory (149), judiciouſly anſwers the objections " which that Father had made with great erudition " againſt the common opinion founded on the teſtimony " of Apollodorus, produced by Diogenes Laertius (150)." Moreri, intending to make ſome uſe of the firſt lines of this paſſage, has done it with ſo little attention that he has been guilty of a blunder. VII. It is not true that Apollodorus quoted by the ſame Diogenes . . . aſſerts . . . that there was an eclipſe of the moon at the time of Carneades's death. Diogenes tells it from a hearſay, but without quoting Apollodorus. Take notice he ſubjoins, that it ſeemed as if the faireſt of all the heavenly bodies next the ſun would bear a part in the misfortune of Carneades (151). Take notice beſides that others ſay the ſun was darkened at the ſame time (152). VIII. The Athenians having pillaged the city of Oropus, it cannot be ſaid that they were the occaſion of its being pillaged. This expreſſion is by no means proper in this place. IX. It is falſe that Carneades would not follow probability; for he confeſſed that a man ought to regulate himſelf by it in practice (153). X. Moreri ſhould not have cited Plutarch's piece againſt Colotes, ſince there is no mention of Carneades to be found therein; XI. But he ſhould have cited Father Rapin (154), from whom he has tranſcribed almoſt a whole page word for word.

(146) See the Remark [F], Citation (63).

(147) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 65.

(148) Labbe, Chronolog. Franc. tom. 2. pag. 395. ad ann. Romæ 625.

(149) Pag. 189, & ſeq.

(150) Labbe, Chronol. Franc. tom. 2. pag. 396.

(151) Συμπαθῆσαι, ὡς ἂν εἴποι τις, αἰσθομένην τοῦ μετ' ἥλιον παλλίστου τῶν ἄστρων. Ut compati ſibi videri poſſit pulcherrimum poſt ſolem ſidus. Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 64.

(152) Suidas, in Καρνεάδης.

(153) See above Remark [B], Citation (8).

(154) Rapin, Compariſon de Platon & d'Ariſtote, Part 4. chap. 1. pag. m. 369.

☞ CARPENTER (GEORGE Lord), Baron of Killaghy in the Kingdom of Ireland, deſcended from an antient and good family in Herefordſhire [A], was born at Ocul in that county, February the 10th 1657 (a). His father was Mr. Warncomb Carpenter, ſixth ſon of Thomas Carpenter Eſq; [B] of the Homme in the pariſh of Dilwyn in Herefordſhire. His mother was daughter to Mr. Taylor of the ſame county, and widow to Mr. John Hill, by whom ſhe had one ſon [C]. George Lord Carpenter was the youngeſt of ſeven children, whom his father left at his death, and was educated at a private ſchool in the country. In the year 1672 he went into the third Troop of Guards as a private Gentleman, and was afterwards appointed Quarter Maſter to the Regiment of Horſe commanded by the Earl of Peterborough, and went through the ſeveral poſts of Cornet, Lieutenant, Captain, &c. till he was advanced to that of Lieutenant Colonel of the Regiment, in which commiſſion he continued thirteen years, though the Regiment was almoſt conſtantly in ſervice. In 1693 he married Alice, daughter of William Lord Viſcount Charlemount, who having a conſiderable joynture from her firſt huſband James Margetſon Eſq;, by the ſale of part of it for her life he was enabled to purchaſe the Regiment of Dragoons, which he commanded till his death. He ſerved in all the firſt wars in Ireland and Flanders, and the laſt in Spain, with unblemiſh'd honour and reputation, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf to great advantage by his courage, conduct, and humanity. At the unfortunate battle of Almanza in Spain he commanded the rear, and brought up the laſt ſquadron in the retreat, which ſaved the baggage of the army. At the battle of Almenara he was wounded, but receiv'd the compliments of Charles then King of Spain, now Emperor of Germany, for his conduct in the engagement. He was again deſperately wounded [D] in defending the Breach at Britmega againſt

(a) From Manuſcript Memoirs communicated to us, from whence we have extracted moſt of the particulars of this Article.

[A] Was deſcended from an ancient and good Family in Herefordſhire.] The Family had been poſſeſſed of a conſiderable eſtate in that County for above four hundred years. A great part of this eſtate together with the manour of the Homme in the Pariſh of Dilwyn, was left in the year 1733 to the preſent Lord Carpenter by his couſin Thomas Carpenter Eſq; who dying without iſſue was the laſt of the eldeſt branch of the family.

[B] His father was Mr. Warncomb Carpenter, ſixth ſon of Thomas Carpenter Eſq;] He had a conſiderable joynture with his wife, beſides fifteen hundred pounds given him by his father, which was a very handſome fortune at that time for a younger ſon. But being a man of ſpirit, and zealouſly attached to the royal cauſe, he was an Officer in the King's Army during the civil wars, and at the battle of Naſeby had both his legs ſhot through by a muſket-ball. The wound breaking out again ſome years afterwards occaſioned his death, when his fortune was greatly reduced; and he left but a very ſmall ſupport for a large family of ſeven children.

[C] His mother was . . . widow to Mr. John Hill, by whom ſhe had one ſon.] This ſon, whoſe name was William, being a ſervant and favourite of the Duke of York, afterwards King James II, was by him made Governor and Captain General of the Leeward Iſlands, which being afterwards taken by the French, he bravely retook them, and continued Governor of them with great reputation till his death.

[D] He was again deſperately wounded.] It was by a muſket-ball, which having broken part of his againſt the whole French and Spaniſh army, where they were at laſt taken priſoners. In 1705 he was made a Brigadier General; in 1708 Major General; and in 1710 Lieutenant General. In 1714 he was choſen Member of Parliament for Whitchurch in Hampſhire; and the year following was appointed Envoy Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the Emperor, whoſe perſonal regard and eſteem he had gained, while he ſerved under that Prince in Spain. But the rebellion breaking out that year, he was ſent into the North, where he not only prevented the rebels from ſeizing Newcaſtle, and marching into Yorkſhire, but having overtaken them at Preſton, where they were inveſted by Major General Wills, he, by altering the diſpoſition which that General had made, cut off entirely both their eſcape and their receiving any ſupplies, which immediately reduced them to a capitulation (b). In the beginning of February 171⅝ he ſent a challenge to General Wills, but they were prevented from fighting [E]. In 1716 he was appointed Governor of Minorca, and Commander in chief of his Majeſty's forces in Scotland; and in 1719 was created Baron Carpenter of Killaghy in the Kingdom of Ireland [F]. In 1722 he was choſen Member of Parliament for the City of Weſtminſter, and upon all occaſions voted for what he thought to be the real good of his country, without any regard to party. In October 1731 being near ſeventy four years of age, he began to labour under a failure of appetite, and having had a fall, by which his teeth were looſened on that ſide, which had not been wounded, he was capable of taking but little nouriſhment, which together with old age and a decay of nature put an end to his life February the 10th 173½. He was interred near his beloved wife in the chancel of the pariſh church of Owſelbury in Hampſhire, where a monument of marble was erected to his memory [G] by jaw-bone, and beat out all his teeth on one ſide, lodged itſelf in the root of his tongue, where it remained a whole year before it was extracted. For the greateſt part of this time his life was not expected, he labouring under the moſt ſevere pain, and being incapable of ſwallowing any thing but liquids.

(b) See an Account of his conduct in this affair in A True Relation of the Purſuit of the Rebels in the North, and of their Surrender at Preſton to Lieutenant General Carpenter, commanding in chief his Majeſty's Forces there, join'd to a Plan publiſhed under this Title, An exact Plan of the Town of Preſton, with the Barricades of the Rebels, and the Diſpoſition of the King's Forces, under the Command of Lieutenant General Carpenter and Major General Wills. See likewiſe The Political State of Great Britain for Feb. 1615-16, vol. 11. pag. 179, & ſeqq.

[E] In the beginning of Feb. 171⅝ he ſent a challenge to General Wills, but they were prevented from fighting.] We ſhall repreſent this affair in the words of Mr. A. Boyer, the author of the Political State of Great Britain(1). On Monday February 6th the Town was ſurprized, and all the well-affected concerned to hear, that Lieutenant-General Carpenter and Lieutenant-General Wills, two Officers, who on all occaſions had diſtinguiſhed themſelves for their bravery and conduct, and who had lately ſo well deſerved of their King and Country, were like to fight a duel. The truth is, a challenge was ſent for that purpoſe from General Carpenter to General Wills, and Colonel Churchill, who carried it, was to be ſecond to the firſt, and Brigadier Honeywood to the other. But this affair having taken vent, and reached the ears of the Duke of Montague, his Grace prevented the combat by ſending a guard into the field; after which the Duke of Marlborough interpoſed in, and allayed this unhappy quarrel, at which all the enemies of the Government did heartily rejoice. The ſubject matter of it is not yet fully known, but was then, and is ſtill reported to be an old grudge upon a diſpute, that happened between theſe two great men in Spain, and which having bled afreſh at Preſton, upon the competition of the command, they wiſely thought fit to defer the deciſion of it till they met in London, and in the mean time to act with all the chearfulneſs and unanimity againſt the rebels.

(1) For February 1715-16, vol. 11. pag. 177, 178.

[F] In 1719 was created Baron Carpenter of Killaghy in the Kingdom of Ireland.] The preamble to his Patent is as follows in Engliſh. "Since we and our "predeceſſors have liberally beſtowed titles of honour "on perſons eminent for arts and qualifications proper "to a peaceable reign; we judge it reaſonable, that "military virtue, which ſeems for many years paſt "to have been a principal ſupport of the Government, "ſhould be diſtinguiſhed by due rewards. For this "reaſon eſpecially we have thought fit to advance our "faithful and beloved GEORGE CARPENTER Eſq; "Lieutenant-General of our Armies, to the Peerage of "this Kingdom, a perſon who having applied him-"ſelf early to the profeſſion of Arms has paſſed thro' "all military employs, to the rank he now bears by "ſlow and gradual promotions, his ſervices always "preceding his advancement. When Britain was de-"livered from arbitrary power, he readily embraced "the intereſts of the Revolution, and ſerved under "King William of glorious memory, firſt in the re-"duction of this Kingdom, and afterwards in Flan-"ders, behaving himſelf as a brave and induſtrious "Officer. After the ſhort interval of an unſafe peace, "the war breaking out again with greater violence, "and ſpreading itſelf almoſt through all Europe, "Spain was the ſcene of his ſervices. Earl Stanhope, "Chief Commander of the Britiſh Forces in that "Kingdom, freely imparted to him his deſigns, and "in the execution of them ſucceſsfully experienced "his courage and conduct. When the General's pre-"ſence was required in England, he intruſted him "with the command of his troops, as being fully aſ-"ſured, that the public cauſe would ſuffer no diſad-"vantage by his management; for his diligence and "circumſpection in performing the duties of his em-"ployment were not leſs remarkable than his con-"ſtancy and preſence of mind in the time of action, "and moſt imminent danger. By his integrity, pru-"dence, and evenneſs of temper, he not only gained "the affections of his countrymen, but the eſteem "and regard of the Generals of the Allies, and even "of his Imperial Majeſty. We have had a proof "of his loyalty and abilities in an inſtance very be-"neficial to the public; for when ſedition, which "was ſeaſonably repreſſed in other places, had taken "root in the County of Northumberland, and there "broke out into an open rebellion, he, by our com-"mand, haſtened thither to extinguiſh this flame of "civil war though with unequal numbers. He pre-"vented the rebels ſeizing Newcaſtle, intended by "them for their place of arms; hindered their march-"ing into Yorkſhire; and at laſt having overtaken "them at Preſton, where they were inveſted by other "of our troops, block'd them up more cloſely, and ob-"liged them to ſurrender. By which ſucceſs peace "was reſtored to England, which much conduced to "the ſubduing the rebels in Scotland. For theſe rea-"ſons, that a perſon ſo well deſerving of Britain and "Ireland, allied by marriage to a noble Family of "that Kingdom, may from himſelf tranſmit an ho-"nour to his poſterity; we create him a Peer &c."

[G] A monument of marble was erected to his memory.] It has the following Epitaph inſcribed upon it: Here lies the Right Honourable George Lord Carpenter, Colonel of his Majeſty's own Regiment of Dragoons, Governour of the Iſland Minorca, Lieutenant-General and Commander in Chief of his Majeſty's Forces in North-Britain, deſcended from an ancient Family in Herefordſhire, and bred in arms, having been fifty nine years in the Army, and paſſed thro' all military employs from a private Gentleman in the Horſe-Guards to the Rank, in which he died; by ſlow and gradual promotions, his ſervices always preceding his advancement. He ſerved thro' the whole courſe of the laſt wars of England with France in Ireland, Flanders, and Spain, with honour and reputation; was never abſent from his poſt, when there was any action, or that action was expected; and was as remarkable for his great humanity, as for his courage and preſence of mind in time of ſervice and moſt imminent danger. By his prudence, integrity and evenneſs of temper during the Spaniſh war, he not only gained by his ſon, the preſent Lord Carpenter, who was the only child that ſurvived him.

ed the affections of his countrymen, but the eſteem and regard of the General of the Allies and of the Emperor himſelf; to whom he was appointed Envoy Extraordinary, and Plenipotentiary in 1715. He married Alice, daughter to the Lord Charlemount, by whom he left iſſue only one ſon, who erected this monument to the memory of the beſt of Fathers. Obiit 10° die Februarii 1731. Ætat. 74. T.

CARRANZA (BARTHOLOMEW) a native of Miranda (a) in Navarre, was one of the moſt illuſtrious Dominicans of the ſixteenth Century. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the Council of Trent, anno 1546 [A], and eſpecially in the debate about reſidence (b). He not only aſſerted, that reſidence is of divine right, but alſo that the contrary opinion is a diabolical doctrine (c). Philip of Auſtria, who had been his diſciple (d), took him with him (e) when he went into England to marry Queen Mary. He thought Carranza had great abilities for combating and extirpating the Proteſtant Religion, which had taken deep root in that country. This Dominican employed his utmoſt endeavours in this miſſion. He cauſed books to be burnt, men to be baniſhed, and the Univerſity of Oxford to be reinſtated. He was the Queen's Confeſſor, and pleaſed Philip ſo well, that he raiſed him to the principal Biſhoprick of Spain, (the Archbiſhoprick of Toledo) anno 1557 (f). He aſſiſted the Emperor Charles V in his expiring moments (g) [B]; a circumſtance which chiefly contributed to the report that was ſpread of this Emperor's dying in the Lutheran principles [C]; for, as early as the year 1559, Carranza was ſeized by the Inquiſition, as a Heretic (h). After having defended himſelf in Spain

(a) Hence it is that he is alſo called Bartholomew de Miranda.

(b) Fra. Paolo, lib. 2. pag. m. 201.

(c) Ibid. pag. 240.

(d) Vinc. Baron. Apolog. tom. 2. lib. 5. pag. 237.

(e) Nichol. Antonio, Biblioth. Hiſpan. tom. 1. pag. 147.

(f) Idem, ibid.

(g) Who died the 21ſt of September 1558.

(h) Spondan. ad ann. 1559, num. 29.

[A] He ſignalized himſelf in the Council of Trent, anno 1546.] Moreri is miſtaken in ten years, when he aſſerts, that Carranza ſpoke before the Council, the 1ſt Sunday in Lent of the year 1556 the Oraiſon of his which is ſtill extant. Oraiſon is here an improper term; it ſhould have been Sermon. Nicholas Antonio who fixes it expreſly to anno 1546, made uſe of the word Concio (1). No Council was held in 1556.

(1) Nicol. Anton. Bibl. Hiſp. tom. 1. pag. 148.

[B] He aſſiſted Charles Vth in his expiring moments.] No one can deny this: Famianus Strada owns, that Bartholomew de Miranda Archbiſhop of Toledo, adminiſtred the Sacraments of the Church to that Emperor when dying. Toletano Antiſtite procurante quæ Chriſtiano ritu luctanti Animæ ſuppeditantur adjumenta (2). i. e. "The Archbiſhop of Toledo adminiſtering thoſe helps, which are given to the departing ſoul, after the manner uſed by Chriſtians." Father Paul did not know this circumſtance; or he would have mentioned it in the paſſage where he ſpeaks of Conſtantius Pontius, and of our Bartholomew Carranza (3). Pallavicino the Jeſuit, who gives him no quarter, accuſes him of having aſcribed to Pontius what related to Carranza: for Father Paul ſays, that Conſtantine Pontius aſſiſted that Emperor, till he reſigned his breath. Illius (Carranzæ) loco Pontium accepit Suavis hallucinatus: nam revera Carolo moribundo adfuit Caranza, & pro dignitate quam obtinebat extrema Eccleſiæ officia illi præſtitit in vitæ exitu (4). i. e. "Father Paolo miſtook Pontius for Carranza; for 'tis certain "that Carranza attended on the Emperor Charles "in his dying moments; and, by virtue of his dignity, performed to him the laſt offices of the Church, "as he was leaving the world." Thus we find Father Palavicina declaring, that Bartholomew Carranza adminiſtred the laſt offices of Religion to the Emperor Charles V. Nicholas Antonio aſſerts the ſame thing (5). I'll cite Campana as a fourth teſtimony in the following Note.

(2) Strada, de Bello Belg. lib. 1. Dec. 1. pag. m. 15.

(3) Fra-Paolo, vol. 5. pag. m. 399.

(4) Palavic. Hiſt. Conc. Trident. lib. 14. cap. 11. ſub fin.

(5) N. Anton. Bilioth. Hiſp. vol. 1. pag. 148.

[C] ... Which ... has given occaſion to ſay, that this Emperor died in the Lutheran principles.] It is univerſally known, that Carranza loſt his Archbiſhoprick and his liberty, as being a heretick; and that after fifteen or ſixteen years impriſonment, he was declared ſuſpected of hereſy; and condemned as ſuch to make his abjuration, and other penalties (6). We therefore muſt not think it ſtrange, that from different motives, ſeveral Roman Catholicks as well as Proteſtants, ſhould ſuſpect, that Charles V died almoſt in the Lutheran principles; ſince he was deſirous of reſigning his breath in the arms of ſuch an Archbiſhop. The Spaniſh Hiſtorians were perfectly well acquainted with the grounds of theſe preſumptions or conjectures; for which reaſon, not being able to deny but that Carranza aſſiſted this Emperor in his laſt moments; they aſſert that Charles V ſent for him with no other deſign but to cenſure and reprimand him. Count de la Roca gives the following turn to this circumſtance. Don Bartholomew de Carranza, Archbiſhop of Toledo, was preſent at the interment of the Immortal Charles V, which was attended by all his family. This Prelate was come a little before to St. Juſtus, where the Emperor waited for him with great impatience, upon his being told that, during the ſtay he had made in England, he had imbibed ſome heterodox opinions, which afterwards brought him into great trouble; and this prompted this gracious and Catholic Prince to reprimand him (7). This Author was far from aſſerting, that the Emperor was prepared for death by Carranza; but his ſilence is nothing to the purpoſe, ſince Cardinal Palavicino, who adopts the reaſon why Carranza was preſent at this ceremony (8), according to John Anthony de Vera (9), declares expreſly, that this Archbiſhop adminiſtred to the dying Prince, all the comforts which the Church indulges on ſuch occaſions; Extrema Eccleſiæ officia illi præſtitit in vitæ exitu (10). Spondanus, having perceived the artifice of the Spaniſh Hiſtorians, thought himſelf obliged to oppoſe the teſtimony of Campana to that of Sandoval, Hiſtorian and Panegyriſt of the Emperor Charles V. Sandoval owns, that his Imperial Majeſty ſaw Carranza; but declares that he did not ſpeak to him; tho' he was deſirous of queſtioning him on ſome erroneous opinions which, as it was reported, Carranza maintained. Spondanus, notwithſtanding this relation of Sandoval, gives entire credit to Campana, who tells us in the Life of Philip II, that Charles V thanked Carranza, for coming to aſſiſt him in ſo great an exigency; that he confeſſed his ſins to him, received the Sacrament from his hand; and diſcourſed with him on religious ſubjects till he expired. Carolum gratias ei egiſſe de adventu ad ipſum in tali neceſſitate, & confeſſum ei eſſe peccata ſacramentaliter, atque Euchariſtiam de ejus manu ſumpſiſſe, ac multa ſpiritualia colloquia cum eo habuiſſe uſque ad tranſitum: quod & nos verum putamus, cum plures id aſſerant (11). Spondanus is perſuaded that all this is true, notwithſtanding the ſeveral aſſertions of Sandoval; who denied it upon no other account, but from the apprehenſions he was under, leſt ſuch a particular ſhould make Charles V be conſidered as an heretick. Sed Sandovalium, qui nonniſi laudes Caroli proſequitur, timuiſſe, ne ſi diceretur Carolus Sacramenta in fine à Miranda, qui poſtea ... infamatus eſt de prava doctrina, ſuſcepiſſe, & extrema verba cum eo habuiſſe, id in Caroli dedecus ac quoddam animæ periculum verteret (12).

(6) Spondan. ad ann. 1559, num. 29.

(7) Hiſtoire de Charles Quint. pag. m. 347.

(8) Cauſa cur illic adeſſet, ea fuit, quod delato ad Carolum rumore ſiniſtræ opinionis, quæ de corrupta Archiepiſcopi mente ſpargebatur, ad ſe hominem accerſiri juſſerat, ut ipſum commoneret. Palavic. Hiſt. Concil. Trident. lib. 4. cap. 11.

(9) He is the ſame with Count de la Roca.

(10) Palav. Hiſt. Concil. Trident. lib. 4. cap. 11.

(11) Spondan. ad ann. 1558, num. 6.

(12) Idem, ibid.

We have already ſeen that Father Paul makes no mention of this circumſtance; but he made amends for it another way, and did not let ſlip the opportunity of repreſenting Charles V, as a Prince who was ſuſpected to entertain heterodox opinions; for in relating the ſevere executions which were made in Spain, he obſerves, that the Spaniards burnt the effigy of Conſtantine Pontius (he had died ſome days before in the priſons of the Inquiſition,) who had been Confeſſor to Charles V in his retirement; and who had ſeen him breath his laſt (13). He had been impriſoned immediately

FACTS concerning the Confeſſor of Charles V.

(13) Fra-Paolo, Book 5. pag. 399.

Spain till the year 1567, he was carried to Rome, where he ſuffered a long impriſonment; at laſt his ſentence was pronounced, anno 1576. The purport of it was, that although there were no certain proof of his having imbibed heretical notions; nevertheleſs, as the preſumptions againſt him were very ſtrong, he therefore muſt make a ſolemn abjuration. Having ſubmitted to this order, he was ſent to the Monaſtery della Minerva (i), and there died a little after (k), viz. the 2d of May 1576, aged threeſcore and twelve years. Very wonderful things are related concerning his patience [D]. His chief works are, Summa Conciliorum, and a Spaniſh Catechiſm in folio, which was put into the Index Expurgatorius [E].

(i) This is a Monaſtery of Dominicans in Rome.

(k) Spondan. ad ann. 1596. num. 29. Nicol. Antonio, Biblioth. Hiſp. tom. 1. pag. 147.

The reader will meet with an ample relation, concerning the merit and the incidents of Carranza's life, in Varillas's preface to his 5th Tome of his Hiſtory of Hereſy. Read alſo the 13th book of the ſame Hiſtory. He did not forget to obſerve, that the General of diately after the death of that Prince (14). This laſt execution, adds he, tho' only upon an effigy, ſtruck greater terror than all the reſt; every one concluding from thence, that no toleration or mercy could be expected from a Prince, who did not ſpare even a perſon, all whoſe ignominy would reflect on the memory of his own father (15). Mezerai carries this reflection farther, ſince that after having related, that Philip cauſed ſeveral Lutherans to be burnt, even the effigy of Conſtantine Pontius, Confeſſor to Charles V, who had attended him till he expired; he adds, We are not to wonder, that he did not fear to caſt an odium on his father's memory, ſince, if we may credit ſome authors, he would have proſecuted him; and have burnt his bones, as tho' he had been an heretic: and that nothing but the following conſideration prevented his putting it in execution, viz. that had his father been a heretick, he would have forfeited his dominions; and conſequently had no right to reſign them to his ſon (16). We are here informed of a great many particulars. I. That Conſtantine Pontius was Confeſſor to Charles V. II. That he acted as ſuch when that Emperor was near his end, and when he breathed his laſt. III. That his effigy was burnt. IV. That this was a blot in the memory of Charles V. V. That Philip would have had his Royal Father condemned for hereſy, had not ſome important political reaſons prevented him. Mezerai relates this laſt particular, from the teſtimony of ſome Authors; and others aſſert it without the leaſt reſtriction (17). We ſhall ſee below (18), the authority on which Brantome grounds it. I believe we may venture to aſſert, that this is a very doubtful incident. The 1ſt and the 2d particulars are not allowed by the Spaniſh writers (19). They own indeed, that Conſtantine Pontius (20) was Chaplain to Charles V; but deny that he ever was his Confeſſor; and affirm that Pontius was impriſoned by the Inquiſition, before that Emperor died. Count de la Roca delivers himſelf as follows. "When the "Inquiſitors ſeized Conſtantine Pontius at Sevil, Charles "Vth ſpoke theſe words; If Conſtantine be a here- "tick, he is a great one (21)." That Prince's laſt Confeſſor was called Francis Villalva (22). The third incident is true; and with regard to the 4th, we may aſſert that the conviction of Conſtantine Pontius, has given occaſion to entertain certain ſuſpicions with reſpect to the Emperor Charles V. I muſt not forget to obſerve that Carranza does not ſeem to have been in any manner the Spiritual Director of that Monarch; and that in caſe he adminiſtred the Sacraments to him, in his expiring moments; the reaſon of this we are told, was becauſe the Monaſtery of St. Juſtus was in his dioceſs. Carranza had ſet out for that Convent, as ſoon as he heard of the Emperor's ſickneſs; and arrived there the night before his Imperial Majeſty died. Placidiſſime expiravit (Carolus) præſente Bartholomæo Carranza à Miranda Archiepiſcopo Toletano Ordinis Dominicani, loci ordinario, qui audita ejus infirmitate accurrerat, & pridie obitus advenerat, ſumma ejus, ut quidam ſcribunt, conſolatione (23). i. e. "Charles the "Vth breathed his laſt with great calmneſs, in pre- "ſence of Bartholomew Carranza of Miranda, Arch- "biſhop of Toledo, a Dominican, and Ordinary of "the place; who, upon the news of his illneſs, haſted "thither; and arrived the day before he expired, to "the great conſolation of that Monarch, as ſome "write." I ſhall be more particular on this part of Charles the Vth's Hiſtory, in Note [D] of his Article; and will point out ſome errors committed by the Abbot of St. Real.

(14) Nella quale (pregione) per imputatione d'Hereſia fu poſto immediate dopo la morte dell' Imperatore. Amelot de la Houſſaye has not mentioned this.

(15) Amelot de la Houſſaye has here placed the marginal note following. Nothing prevented his condemning his memory as an Heretick, but the apprehenſions he was under, that in caſe his father had been ſuch, the reſignation he had made of his dominions in his favour, would be reputed void, becauſe of his entertaining heretical notions.

(16) Mezerai, Abr. Chronol. anno 1559, vol. 5. pag. 9.

(17) Amelot de la Houſſaye. I cited his words in citation (15) above.

(18) In the note [S] of the Article CHARLES V.

(19) See Cardinal Palavicino, Hiſt. of the Counc. of Trent, lib. 14. cap. 11. num. 3.

(20) I give him his name, in compliance with the vulgar error. I have hinted ſufficiently in the Article PONTIUS CONSTANTIUS, that this is not his real name.

(21) Count de la Rocca, Hiſt. of Charles V. pag. m. 335.

(22) Palavic. Hiſt. Concil. Trident. lib. 14. cap. 11. Ex Joanne Antonio Vera, & Sandovallio.

(23) Spondan. ad ann. 1558, num. 9.

[D] Wonders are related of his patience.] One of the nobleſt proofs, that can be given of this, is, that altho' he knew himſelf to be innocent, he yet did not blame his Judges. Juſt before his death (on the feſtival of St. Athanaſius who was the greateſt Prelate, and had ſuffered more perſecutions than any of his time) in preſence of the Holy Sacrament which he was to receive, and of all the Monks belonging to the Convent della Minerva at Rome, where he died (24); he proteſted with tears in his eyes, by the glorious Saviour whom he was going to receive, and before whom he was to give an account of all his actions in a few hours that he had never offended him mortally in matters of faith; that nevertheleſs, he conſidered the ſentence as juſt which had been pronounced, in conſequence of what had been ſworn and proved againſt him. This action perſuaded the people ſo fully of his innocence, that when he was buried (which was on a working day) all the ſhops were ſhut, as tho' it had been Eaſter Sunday. The people paid as much veneration to his corps, as tho' he had been a Saint (25).

(24) Conſequently the following words of Thuanus, lib. 84. pag. 76. are not true: Tædio carceris miſer Caranca, cum nihil contra ipſum probaretur, tandem extinctus eſt. i. e. "Carranza, againſt "whom nothing "could be proved, being worne "out by his "long impriſon- "ment, at laſt "died.

(25) The Count de la Roca, Hiſt. de Charles Quint, pag. 348.

The juſtice which the common people on this occaſion did Carranza, by acknowledging his innocence and bewailing the oppreſſion it met with, is extremely laudable. The common people are not always blind (26); however they only did part of their duty at this time; for they ought likewiſe to have ſhewn their reſentment againſt that unjuſt tribunal, for having ſo long perſecuted this excellent man; or at leaſt ſhould have ſhewed, that they wiſhed thoſe wicked Judges might be branded with infamy; for can any thing be more ſhocking, than to ſee a learned Prelate, againſt whom no proof can be exhibited, abſolutely unable to get from the paws of thoſe informers, till after having ſuffered a long and cruel impriſonment; and that he could not obtain his releaſe, without branding his own reputation, merely to ſave the credit of thoſe villainous informers? To conceal the unjuſtice which had been done Carranza, the Inquiſitors were forced to declare, that there were ſome ſuſpicions of his being an heretick; otherwiſe they had been too much expoſed to the complaints and hatred of the people. It was by this means they impoſed on the public; and for this very reaſon the public ought to have been offended. However, this would be requiring too many things, at one and the ſame time, from the common people. None but wiſe men are capable of perceiving this double iniquity; and of paying humble ſubmiſſion to the decrees of Providence, which not only ſuffers the tribunal of the inquiſition, (that true abomination introduced into the holy places) to triumph and reign during ſo many years in ſeveral parts of the Chriſtian World; but alſo, to extend, by inſenſible degrees, its phylacteries; and to ſpread its fibres and roots in all parts.

REFLECTIONS on the juſtice done to Carranza, by the common people.

(26) Interdum vulgus rectum videt, eſt ubi peccat. Hor. Epiſt. 1. lib. 2. ver. 63.

[E] He writ . . . a Spaniſh Catechiſm . . . which has been placed in the Index Expurgatorius.] According to Nicholas Antonio, this Book was the cauſe of the perſecution which was raiſed againſt Carranza. Qui liber Autori ſua infortunii tota cauſa fuiſſe dicitur: quare prohibitus eſt in Romano Indice (27). See in Father Paul, in what manner the Biſhop of Lerida exclaims againſt the congregation of the Index, which had approved this Book. The Biſhop of Lerida inveighed againſt the approbation given by that body, and quoted ſome paſſages of the Jeſuits favoured Carranza. An advocate for the Dominicans (l) took advantage of this circumſtance, in order to anſwer a Jeſuit, who endeavoured to make the Orthodoxy of this great Prelate ſuſpected. The General of the Jeſuits was bound in gratitude to ſerve Carranza, it being he who gave the Jeſuits leave to ſettle in Toledo, which his Predeceſſor had rigorouſly oppoſed (m).

(27) Anton. Biblioth. Hiſp. tom. 1. pag. 148.

(l) Vincent. Baron. Apolog. tom. 1. pag. 64.

(m) Idem, ibid.

paſſages of the Book which, when taken in the ſenſe he gave them, ſeemed to merit cenſure; and what was ſtill worſe, he attacked the conſcience of the Prelates, who formed this congregation. The chief of them complained to the Pope's Legates about it; but the diſpute was ended, on the Biſhop of Lerida's making ſome excuſes: and on condition; that no copies ſhould be given of the atteſtation which had been put into the hands of Bartholomew Carranza's agent. The Count de Luna Embaſſador of Spain, got this atteſtation from the agent (28).

(28) Fra-Paolo, Book 8. anno 1563, pag. m. 724.

CARTEROMACHUS (SCIPIO) a native of Piſtoia in Tuſcany, was one of the ableſt men of the ſixteenth Century. He was very well ſkilled in the Latin and Greek tongues [A], and very happy in explaining the difficult paſſages of antient Authors. He was greatly reſpected at Venice, and would not have left it, had he not found that the tumults and confuſion of the war, would not ſuffer him to purſue his ſtudies in peace. He withdrew to Rome, and was there patronized by Cardinal Francis Alidoſi. He followed him to Ravenna, and after that Cardinal had loſt his life in that city, he returned to Rome. Pope Leo the Xth placed him near the perſon of Julius de Medicis, as a man of letters, and he very probably would have been raiſed to ſome honourable and lucrative employment, had he not died before he had an opportunity of reaping advantage of his maſter's friendſhip (a). I ſhall cite an Author who aſſures us, that he lived with Cardinal de Medicis in 1512 (b). This Cardinal was afterwards Pope Leo the Xth. I ſhall quote another Author, who informs us that Carteromachus was averſe to oſtentation, and that he died at about forty three years of age [B].

(a) Extracted from Pierius Valerianus, de Litterator. Infelicitate, lib. 2. pag. m. 72, 73.

(b) See the Remark [A], Citation (3).

[A] He was very well ſkilled in the Latin and Greek Tongues.] This appears from his writings. Quâ literaturâ fuerit ſive carmen Græcè ſive Latinè pangeret, ſive orationem elucubraret, ex multis ejus ſcriptis unicuique erudito viro licet inſpicere (1). i. e. "Every "learned man may ſee, by the many writings of "Carteromachus, how ſkilful he was, both in Greek "and Latin, in compoſing either verſes or proſe." Alcyonius declares that he had very great ſkill in the Greek tongue. Cui ſays he (2), tametſi Latinus eſt, attamen vel Græci ipſi in ſuæ linguæ cognitione & ſubtilitate primas deferunt. i. e. "Who, tho' he be an "Italian, yet the Greeks themſelves would allow him "the preheminence, in the knowledge of their tongue, "and the delicacies of it." Some pages after, he makes Julius of Medicis, ſpeak as follows to Cardinal John de Medicis his couſin, who afterwards was Pope Leo X. Multos Græca literatura inſignes viros domi habes, ad quorum æmulationem non deſiſtis cum omni genere exercitationis, tum maxime ſtilo augere partam eloquentiam; atque inter hos maximè eminet Scipio Carteromachus, quem honorificentiſſime pro tua natura liberaliſſimeque tractas, cum præſertim videas illum quanquam Latinum Græce ſic loqui & ſcribere, ut ſolus poſt veterum Græcorum Platonis, Socratis, Demoſthenis, & Strabonis interitum, orbæ eloquentiæ tutor relictus videatur (3). i. e. "You have with you many men, fa-"mous for their knowledge in the Greek tongue, in "emulation of whom you never ceaſe to im-"prove the eloquence you poſſeſs, in exerciſes of every "kind, and eſpecially in diction. Among theſe Sci-"pio Carteromachus is particularly conſpicuous, to "whom you, from your uſual good nature, indulge "the moſt honourable and beneficent treatment; par-"ticularly as you find, that he, tho' an Italian, both "writes and ſpeaks Greek in ſo great perfection, that "he, ſince the time of thoſe ancient Greeks, Plato, "Socrates, Demoſthenes and Strabo, ſeems to be the "only ſurviving protector of eloquence."

(1) Pier. Valerian. de Literat. Infelic. lib. 2. pag. 72.

(2) Petrus Alcyonius, in Medice Legato poſteriore, folio g. ii verſo.

(3) Alcyonius, in Medice Leg. poſteriore, ſub fin. Note that this Dialogue of Alcyonius relates to the time of John de Medicis's embaſſy, about anno 1512.

[B] He was averſe to oſtentation and died at about forty three years of age.] People were forced to provoke and ſpur as it were Carteromachus; for otherwiſe, it would have been impoſſible to gueſs from his converſation, that he was a man of letters. What a noble elogium is this, and how few learned men deſerve it! The writer who beſtows it on him is very worthy of credit, he ſpeaking of a perſon deceaſed, with whom he had been perſonally acquainted. Bononiæ primùm videre contigit Scipionem Carteromachum, reconditæ & abſolutæ eruditionis hominem, ſed uſque adeo alienum ab oſtentatione, ut ni provocâſſes, juràſſes eſſe literarum ignarum. Cum eo poſt Romæ fuit mihi propior familiaritas. Et deceſſit haud multò major annis quadraginta duobus (4). i. e. "I happened to be firſt "acquainted with Scipio Carteromachus, at Bononia. "He was a man of prodigious erudition, and this he "concealed ſo induſtriouſly, and was ſo averſe to "oſtentation, that unleſs he was ſtrongly excited, you "would ſwear he was wholly ignorant of Literature. "I afterwards became more familiarly acquainted with "him in Rome. Carteromachus died at a little above "forty two years of age." The epiſtle of Eraſmus, whence I extracted theſe words, is dated the 1ſt of March, 1524.

(4) Eraſm. Epiſt. 5. lib. 23. pag. 1209. He ſays in his Ciceronianus, Scipionem Carteromachum agnoſco, virum citra oſtentationem in utraque literatura doctum.

☞CARTES (a) (RENE' DES), one of the moſt eminent Philoſophers and Mathematicians of the ſeventeenth Century, was deſcended of an antient and noble family in Touraine in France, and younger ſon of Joachim Des Cartes, Counſellor in the Parliament of Rennes, by Jane Brochard, daughter of the Lieutenant General of Poictiers. He was born at La Haye in Touraine March 31ſt 1596 (b), and had the ſurname of Du Perron, a Lordſhip belonging to the family, given him, in order to diſtinguiſh him from his elder brother. His mother died ſoon after his birth; and his father ſome years after married Anne Morin, daughter to the chief Preſident of the Chamber of Accounts at Nants, by whom he had a ſon and a daughter (c). The cares of this new family did not divert him from the care due to his ſon René, whom he uſed to call the Philoſopher, on account of the inſatiable curioſity of the child in aſking the reaſons of every thing which he met with (d). He was ſent therefore to the Jeſuits College at La Fleche in 1604, and put under the tuition of Father Charlet, who was related to him. Here he made a great

(a) Dr. Thomas Teniſon, afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in his Account of the Lord Bacon's Works, pag. 5, 13. prefixed to the Baconiana, or Certain genuine Remains of Sir Francis Bacon, edit. London 1679. erroneouſly calls our Anthor de Chart.

(b) La Vie de M. Des Cartes reduite en abregé par Monſ Baillet, liv. 1. edit. Paris 1693, in 12mo, and Les Hommes Illuſtres, qui ont paru en France pendant le xvii Siecle. Par Mr. Perrault, tom. 1. pag. 124. edit. Paris 1701.

(c) Baillet, ubi ſupra.

(d) Idem, ibid. and Perrault, ubi ſupra.

great progreſs in the learned Languages and polite Literature [A], and contracted an intimacy with ſeveral young Gentlemen, who proved eminent in the Republic of Letters, and particularly Marine Merſenne, afterwards known by the name of Father Merſenne (e). Having paſſed thro' his courſe of Philoſophy without any great ſatisfaction to himſelf, he left the College in Auguſt 1612, and reſolved to abandon his Books and the purſuit of ſcience, and ſpent the winter of the year 1612 and the beginning of 1613 in the city of Rennes in paying viſits to his family, in learning to ride the great horſe, and to fence, and other exerciſes ſuitable to his quality. His Father deſigned him for the Army; but his tender years and the weakneſs of his conſtitution not permitting him to expoſe himſelf ſo early to the fatigues of war, he was ſent to Paris in the ſpring following, without any perſon to inſpect his conduct, except a Valet de Chambre and a Lacquey or two, ſo that tho' he did not launch out into any groſs extravagance or debauchery, yet he was ſometimes engaged in gaming (f), in which he had prodigious ſucceſs (g). Here he renewed his acquaintance with ſeveral perſons, who ſerved to reclaim him from his averſion to ſtudy, and particularly Monſ. Mydorge, and Father Merſenne, whoſe converſation revived in him a deſire after truth; and though that Father removed to Nevers in 1614, yet his departure was ſo far from occaſioning in our Author any thoughts of returning to his former diverſions, that it inſpired him with a reſolution of retiring from the world, and engaging in a ſevere courſe of ſtudy; which he purſued till he was found out and interrupted by his friends. He departed for Holland in May 1616, and inliſted himſelf in the Prince of Orange's troops as a volunteer [B], and while he lay in garriſon at Breda during the truce between the Spaniards and Dutch, ſolved a problem in Mathematics to the ſatisfaction of Iſaac Beekman, Principal of the College of Dort [C]. During his ſtay at Breda he likewiſe wrote a treatiſe of Muſic [D], and laid the foundation of ſeveral of his works.

(e) Baillet. ubi ſupra, and Perrault, ubi ſupra.

(f) Perrault, pag. 125. and Baillet, ubi ſupra.
(g) Baillet, ubi ſupra.

[A] Here he made a great progreſs in the learned Languages and polite Literature.] He had brought with him to the College an uncommon paſſion for learning, with a ſolid judgment, and a great quickneſs and vivacity of genius; and in all the courſe of his ſtudies in polite Learning, which was five years and an half, he never diſcovered the leaſt affectation of ſingularity, except that which emulation produced in endeavouring to gain an advantage over thoſe of his companions, who had ſurpaſſed the reſt. He ſhewed likewiſe the greateſt eaſineſs and compliance of temper imaginable, and paid the utmoſt ſubmiſſion to his Tutor's will. With theſe excellent diſpoſitions he made himſelf Maſter of the Latin and Greek Tongues, which he early apprehended to be of the utmoſt importance for the underſtanding of the ancient Authors. He had a greater affection for Poetry, than thoſe, who conſidered him only as a Philoſopher, could imagine; and he had even a talent that way, which ſhewed that he had a true reliſh for the beauties of that Art. He found likewiſe a prodigious pleaſure in the Fables of the Ancients, not ſo much on account of the myſteries of Natural and Moral Philoſophy veiled under them, as becauſe they awakened his genius by the moſt agreeable turns of fancy in the texture of them. In reward for his exact diſcharge of his duty, he was diſpenſed with attending ſo cloſely to the Lectures as his companions; and this liberty he made uſe of to ſatisfy the paſſion, which he felt in him, to acquire a clear and certain knowledge of every thing, that conduces to the advantage of life; which they put him in hopes of attaining by means of his humanity ſtudies. Upon this account he did not confine himſelf to what was taught in the College, but read over all the moſt rare and valuable books of ſcience, which he could procure (1). And tho' ſome perſons have ſuſpected, that in the whole courſe of his life he had but a very ſmall regard for books; yet, as Mr. Baillet obſerves, he paſſed this judgment upon them even at that time, that the reading of good books, is converſing, as it were, with the greateſt genius's and moſt valuable men of former Ages, who were the Authors of them; and that it is a ſtudied converſation, in which they diſcover only their beſt thoughts (2).

(1) Baillet, Vie de Des Cartes reduite en abregè, liv. 1. and Carteſii, Diſſertat. de Methodo, pag. 2, 3. edit. 4to, Amſtelodami 1664, in 4to.
(2) Carteſ. de Methodo, pag. 3, 4. and Baillet, ubi ſupra, lib. 1. See likewiſe Monſ. Baſnage de Bauval's Hiſt. des Ouvrages des Savans, Mois de Juin 1693, Art. 1. pag. 535. 3d edit. Rotterdam 1701.

[B] Inliſted himſelf in the Prince of Orange's Troops as a Volunteer.] As his mind was already poſſeſſed of a ſtrong paſſion for the diſcovery of truth, to which he was reſolved ſome time or other to apply himſelf, his deſign was not to become a great ſoldier under the diſcipline of that Prince; ſo that in determining to bear arms, he reſolved never to appear in any reſpect forward as an Actor, but every where to be but as a ſpectator of the tranſactions of the ſeveral States and Kingdoms. He turned ſoldier for no other end, but to obſerve the different turns of human nature, and to endeavour to fortify himſelf againſt all the accidents of life. That he might not be uneaſy under the power of any ſuperior, he refuſed upon his firſt entrance all command and all engagements, and always ſupported himſelf at his own charges. But merely in form and to keep up the cuſtom, he received once his pay, and had the curioſity to preſerve that piece of Money all his life, as a teſtimony of his having ſerved in the Army. He really took a delight in war at that age; but this inclination of his was abated by time. He was always averſe to indolence and debauchery in the Army. He ſhewed himſelf as active as the moſt forward of the ſoldiers, and employed his leiſure hours in ſtudy, while others were engaged in riot and extravagance (3).

(3) Baillet, ubi ſupra, liv. 1.

[C] Solved a problem in Mathematics to the ſatisfaction of Iſaac Beekman, Principal of the College of Dort.] A perſon unknown having cauſed the Problem to be fixed up in the ſtreets of Breda, Des Cartes ſeeing the concourſe of paſſengers, who ſtop'd to read the Note, which was written in Dutch, deſired one who ſtood near him to explain to him in Latin or French what was contained in that paper. The man promis'd to ſatisfy him upon condition, that he would engage to ſolve the Problem. Monſieur Des Cartes accepted of the condition with ſuch a reſolute air, that the man little expecting ſuch a thing from a young Cadet in the Army, gave him his name in writing, with the place where he lived, in order that he might bring him the ſolution of the Problem. Monſr. Des Cartes found by the Note that his name was Iſaac Beekman, and that he was Principal of the College of Dort; upon which returning to his lodging, he applied himſelf to the examination of the Problem, and found the ſolution of it very readily. The next day he viſited Mr. Beekman, who ſeemed ſurprized at his having ſolved the Problem ſo ſpeedily; but his wonder was much more increaſed when he began to diſcourſe with the young Gentleman, whoſe knowledge he found much ſuperior to his own in thoſe ſciences, in which he had employed his whole time for ſeveral years. He therefore deſired his friendſhip and correſpondence, which our Author immediately agreed to, and returned his civilities with the moſt unreſerved friendſhip and confidence, though he was younger than Mr. Beekman by near thirty years (4).

(4) Idem, ibid.

[D] During his ſtay at Breda likewiſe, he wrote a Treatiſe of Muſic.] He compoſed it in Latin. He was willing to intruſt the perſon, to whom it was addreſſed, with the original, on condition, that he ſhould let no body ſee it, becauſe as he judged it to be very imperfect, he was apprehenſive leſt it ſhould become public, either by being printed, or by a great number of copies being taken of it. Beekman, who was eſteemed one of the chief Mathematicians of the works [E]. He left Breda in July 1619 (b), and went to Maeſtricht, Aix la Chapelle, Mentz, and Francfort, where he was preſent at the Coronation of the Emperor Ferdinand II; and entered himſelf as a volunteer in the army of the Duke of Bavaria, in Oct. 1619. Here in his winter-quarters in the Dutchy of Newburgh, upon the banks of the Danube, he found himſelf in a place ſo little frequented by people, whoſe converſation might afford him any diverſion, that he entered upon a ſtrict courſe of Meditation upon the moſt important ſubjects, and endeavoured to diveſt himſelf intirely of his former prejudices. During this retirement he was informed of the ſociety of Roſacrucians, and endeavoured to find out ſome of them, but in vain. In the ſpring following he attended the Duke of Bavaria's army into Suabia, and arrived at Ulm in June 1620, where he ſpent the winter following, and became acquainted with John Faulhaber, who encouraged him in the ſtudy of the Mathematicks. He was preſent at the ſiege of Prague, and after the taking of it, paſſed in 1621 into Hungary under Count de Bucquoy, and was preſent at the ſiege of Preſbourg, Tinaw, and other places; but the raiſing of the ſiege of Newhauſell, with the loſs of his General, who was killed there, determined him to abandon the profeſſion of arms, ſo that he quitted the Imperial ſervice July 28th. the next day after the raiſing the ſiege of New-Hauſell, and returned to Preſbourg. Upon this he began his travels into the North, and viſited Sileſia, the utmoſt parts of Poland, Pomerania, the coaſts of the Baltic, the Marquiſate of Brandenburg, Holſtein, Eaſt-Friſeland, and Weſt-Friſeland, in his paſſage to which he was in danger of being murdered by the ſailors [F]. From Weſt-Friſeland he went into Holland, and afterwards to Rennes in France towards the middle of March. In the beginning of Lent the year following he went to Paris, where he cleared himſelf from the imputation of being a Roſacrucian, and declared againſt the Mathematics [G], and applied himſelf again to that of Ethics and Natural Philoſophy [H]. He afterwards went to Bretagne and Poictou where he ſold his eſtate, took a journey

(b) Idem, ibid.

Age, did not think it too imperfect for him, and imagining that Des Cartes had diſowned it, claimed it as his own compoſition; upon which our Author thought proper to acknowledge it. His friends could never obtain his conſent to the publication of this treatiſe during his life; and his enemies having procured an imperfect copy ſought an occaſion to be revenged upon him after his death. But they were ſo far from caſting any blemiſh upon his memory, that they drew upon him the admiration of all, who knew that it was the compoſition of a youth of twenty two years of age. The multitude of editions and the tranſlations of it into Engliſh and French, are a ſtrong proof how much it is valued (5). It was printed under the title of Compendium Muſicæ at Utrecht 1650 in 4to, and Amſterdam 1656 in 4to. An Engliſh Tranſlation of it was publiſhed at London in 1653. Father Poiſſon of the Oratory tranſlated it into French, and his Tranſlation of it was printed with the neceſſary Explications at the end of Des Cartes's Mechanics at Paris 1668 in 4to.

(5) Baillet, ubi ſupra.

[E] Laid the foundation of ſeveral of his works.] Mr. Baillet informs us, that among his juvenile meditations we find his opinion concerning the Souls of Brutes, which he ſuppoſes to be mere mechaniſm, andwhich he wrote an account of twenty years before he publiſhed his doctrine concerning the Diſtinction between a thinking and an extended ſubſtance; and that he had not ſo much as peruſed at that time St. Auguſtin, or Gomez Pereira, or any other Author, who was capable of affording any hint of this notion; and that it appears, that he never ſaw Pereira in his whole life; but that it was from ſome of his friends, and ſome who envied him, that he was informed, that there was ſome affinity between his opinion and that of the Spaniſh Phyſician. Mr. Bayle in his Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (6) tells us, that Monſr. Des Cartes had finiſhed his Meditations, without ever reflecting upon the nature of the ſouls of Brutes, or abandoning the common opinion, which he had imbibed in his infancy; and that afterwards when he came to conſider the conſequences of his doctrine concerning the Diſtinction between a thinking and extended ſubſtance, he perceived that the ſenſe of animals overturned the whole œconomy of his Syſtem. And Mr. Bayle obſerves, that perhaps this difficulty was ſtarted to him by others, and not the reſult of his own reflection; but that as he read very few Books, it is probable that he never ſaw or heard of Pereira's Antoniana Margarita, printed at Medina del Campo in the year 1554. However Mr. Bayle's ſuppoſition, that Des Cartes never thought of this point till he had finiſh'd his Syſtem, is directly contrary to Mr. Baillet's account abovementioned; wherein he aſſures us, that our Author formed that hypotheſis, when he was very young.

(6) Mois de Mars 1684, Art. 11.

[F] In his paſſage to which he was in danger of being murdered by the ſailors.] They imagining him to be a Merchant, and that he had a large ſum of money about him, and perceiving him to be a foreigner, who had little acquaintance in the country, and a man of a mild diſpoſition, reſolved to murder him and throw his body into the ſea, and diſcourſed of their deſigns before his face, not knowing that he underſtood any language except French, in which he ſpoke to his Valet de Chambre. Monſr. des Cartes diſcovering their intent, ſtarted up of a ſudden, and drawing his ſword, ſpoke to them in their own language, in ſuch a tone as ſtruck a terror upon them, and threatned to run them through, if they preſumed to ſtir. Upon this they behaved very civilly to him afterwards, and landed him ſafe at the place, whither he was bound (7).

(7) Baillet, ubi ſupra.

[G] Declared againſt the Mathematics.] He had long been convinced by experience of the little advantage of the Mathematics, eſpecially when men ſtudy them only for themſelves, without applying them to other things. And ſince the year 1620 he had wholly laid aſide Arithmetic; tho' the great affection, which he had for Geometry, continued longer with him, becauſe the Mathematicians of Holland and Germany, whom he met with during his travels, continued to exerciſe him in that ſcience by the Queſtions and Problems, which they propounded to him. But it appears that his eſteem for it was abated from the year 1623, if it be true that in 1638 it was above fifteen years that he had declared he had quite laid aſide Geometry, and would never more meddle with the ſolution of any Problem, except at the requeſt of ſome friend (8).

(8) Idem, ibid.

[H] He applies himſelf again to the ſtudy of Ethics and Natural Philoſophy.] He had once indeed been tempted to diſcard the ſtudy of the latter, finding himſelf diſcourag'd in it by the little certainty, which he diſcovered in his Obſervations. He determined therefore to confine himſelf wholly to the ſtudy of Morality; but it was not long before he was convinced that the ſtudy of Natural Philoſophy was not altogether uſeleſs with regard to that of Ethics, and that the progreſs he made in diſcerning truth from falſhood would be of great advantage to him in the regulation of his actions. This conſideration occaſioned him to return to the obſervation of nature, ſince the moſt certain means to know how we ought to live, is to know what kind of world it is we live in, and who is the Creator of this Univerſe, which we inhabit. And he often declared ſince that time, that the inſight, which he gained into Phyſic, had been very ſerviceable to him in eſtabliſhing journey through Swiſſerland to Italy. Upon his return he ſettled at Paris, where his reputation procuring him a great number of friends, his retirement was interrupted by frequent viſits. This induced him to endeavour to conceal himſelf; but being diſcovered, he went to the ſiege of Rochelle in 1628, and returned to Paris in the beginning of November. A few days after his return, at an aſſembly of men of learning at the houſe of Monſignor Bagni, the Pope's Nuncio, he was prevailed upon to explain his ſentiments with regard to Philoſophy; upon which the Nuncio urged him to publiſh his ſyſtem *; for which purpoſe our Author retired to Amſterdam about the latter end of March 1629, and from thence to Friſeland, to a place near Franeker, where he began his Metaphyſical Meditations [I], and ſpent ſome time in Dioptrics, to which he had applied himſelf in France. About ſix months after he returned to Amſterdam, where he ſpent three months more upon his Mathematical Meditations; but the Treatiſe which he had begun upon that ſubject, was interrupted by his other ſtudies at the beginning of the next Year, and he did not reſume it till about ten Years after. It was during his reſidence in Friſeland that he drew up his Diſcourſe of Meteors [K]. After he was ſettled in Amſterdam he ſeriouſly undertook the ſtudy of Phyſic, Anatomy and Chemiſtry [L], and rejected an opportunity offered him of going into the Levant with Count de Marcheville, Embaſſador from the King of France to the Grand Seignior, but ſoon after took a ſhort tour to England, and not far from London made ſome obſervations concerning the declinations of the Magnet. Upon his return he determined to propound no more queſtions to any perſons, and only to reſolve thoſe propounded to himſelf. He admitted Monſieur Ville-Breſſieux, who had a prodigious genius for the Mathematics and Chemiſtry, into his family; and in the ſpring of the year 1633 removed to Deventer, where Henry Renneri, one of his firſt diſciples, was appointed Profeſſor of Philoſophy. Here he applied himſelf to compleat ſeveral works, which he had left unfiniſhed the year before, and reſumed his ſtudies in Aſtronomy, and in the ſummer following finiſhed his Treatiſe of the World [M]. The next year he removed to Amſterdam, and ſoon after took ſtabliſhing certain foundations in Morality or Ethics; and that it was abundantly more eaſy for him to find the ſatisfaction which he look'd for in this point, than in ſeveral others, which related to Phyſic, tho' he had employed more of his time therein. So that, as Mr. Baillet obſerves, after all theſe enquires he might boaſt, not ſo much that he had found out the means of preſerving life, as that of not being afraid of death, and that he prepared himſelf for it, exempt from the diſquietude common to thoſe, whoſe wiſdom is derived from other men's inſtructions, and grounded upon foundations, which depend only upon the prudence and authority of other men (9).

(9) Idem, ibid.

* Idem, ibid. lib. 2.

(9) Idem, ibid.

[I] Where he began his Metaphyſical Meditations.] It was there that he renewed his old proteſtations before the altar to labour only for the glory of God and the benefit of mankind; and therefore reſolv'd to begin his meditations concerning the Exiſtence of God and the Immortality of the Soul. But that he might undertake nothing, which had any affinity with Divinity, he conſider'd God only as the Author of Nature; and it was not natural Religion, but only revealed, that he excluded from his deſigns (10).

(10) Idem, lib. 3.

[K] It was during his reſidence in Friſeland that he drew up his Diſcourſe of Meteors.] He was at firſt ſollicited to give his thoughts concerning the Parhelia obſerved at Rome in March 1629. The Obſervations were ſent to him by Father Merſenne, and before that by Henry Reneri, a new acquaintance, whom he had got upon his arrival in Holland, and who was afterwards one of the firſt, who publicly taught his Philoſophy. Reneri received them from Gaſſendus, then in Holland, who wrote a Diſſertation upon that Phænomenon in his Travels, before Monſr. Des Cartes. It is to theſe Obſervations upon the Parhelia that the world is obliged for that excellent Treatiſe of Meteors, which our Author publiſh'd ſome years after (11).

(11) Idem, ibid.

[L] He ſeriouſly undertook the ſtudy of Phyſic, Anatomy, and Chemiſtry.] He imagined, that nothing was more capable of promoting the temporal felicity of mankind than an happy union of Phyſic with Mathematics. But before he was in a capacity of contributing any comfort or relief to men's labours, or could multiply the conveniencies of life by Mechanics, he thought it neceſſary to find out ſome way or other to ſecure the human body from thoſe evils, which might diſturb its health, or deprive it of power and force to labour. Upon this perſuaſion he began to put his deſign in execution by the ſtudy of Anatomy, in which he employed all the winter, which he ſpent in Amſterdam. He declares, that he had ſo much zeal for the knowledge of it, that he went almoſt every day to a Butcher's ſhop to ſee him kill beaſts, and cauſed the parts of ſuch animals to be brought home to his lodgings, as he deſigned to anatomiſe at his own leiſure. And this was his frequent practice in other places, where he reſided afterwards. He joined the ſtudy of Chemiſtry to that of Anatomy in the latter end of the year 1629; and he aſſures us, that he learned daily in this ſcience, as he did in the other, ſome things, which did not occur to him in Books. But before he would apply his mind to the Diſcovery of Diſeaſes and their Remedies, he had a deſire to know whether there was any method of finding out a medicine grounded upon infallible Demonſtration (12).

(12) Idem, ibid.

[M] In the ſummer following he finiſhed his treatiſe of the world.] He called it his world, becauſe it was the idea of a world, which he had imagined anſwerable to the world, in which we live; and it contained an Abridgment of all his Natural Philoſophy; that is, of all that he could come to the knowledge of with regard to material things, except what relates to light, which he intended to explain in its full extent. That he might not be engaged to follow or refute opinions commonly received amongſt the learned, he was willing to reſign this ſame world to the exerciſe of their brains in diſputing about it, and to treat only of that, which might happen in a new world, ſuppoſing that God ſhould create ſufficient matter in the imaginary ſpaces to form ſuch an one. He ſuppoſed that God would agitate the parts of this matter in a various and confuſed manner, ſo as to make a Chaos, or an indigeſted confuſed maſs; and that in proceſs of time he would only afford nature his ordinary concurrence, and ſuffer her to act agreeably to the laws, which he hath eſtabliſhed. Upon this ſuppoſition he deſcribes this matter, as it was at firſt; ſhews what thoſe laws of nature were; and demonſtrates, that the greateſt part of the matter of this Chaos would in compliance with theſe laws range themſelves in ſuch a manner, as to reſemble our heavens &c. He proceeds then to the explication of the nature of the ſoul, and endeavours to ſhew, that it cannot be derived from the powers of matter as the other things were, which he treats of; but that it is created. He reviſed this treatiſe in order to ſend it to Father Merſenne, to be printed at Paris with the King's privilege, at the time when he heard that Galileo was caſt into the Inquiſition for aſſerting the Earth's Motion. This alarmed Des Cartes, as he was perſuaded, that Galileo's opinion was the moſt took a journey into Denmark and the Lower Parts of Germany, in company with Monſieur Ville-Breſſieux. The winter following afforded our Author an opportunity for thoſe obſervations, which he made upon Snow of ſix Points or Angles, and upon that occaſion to make others upon Hail and Rain. He afterwards wrote a fixth Diſcourſe of them, publiſhed in his Treatiſe of Meteors. In the latter end of Autumn 1635 he went to Lewarden in Friſeland, where he remained to the year 1637, and wrote his Treatiſe of Mechanics [N]: he returned to Amſterdam about the beginning of March, and made a great many curious obſervations concerning the Circles about Candles (g). In 1637 he publiſhed his four Treatiſes concerning Method, Dioptrics, Meteors, and Geometry [O], and ſoon after took a journey to Breda, and into Flanders, to viſit Monſieur de la Baſſe Governor of Doway. At his return he ſettled at Egmond, a pleaſant village in North-Holland, where the publick exerciſe of the Roman Catholick Religion was undiſturbed and publick, and ſoon perceived the fruits, which the reading of his book produced; and was obliged to anſwer the objections of Fromond, Regius Profeſſor of the Holy Scriptures in Louvain, of Plempius, a Dutch Phyſician in the ſame Univerſity, and Ciermans, Profeſſor of the Mathematicks in the Jeſuits College there. In France his book was received according to the different prejudices of the readers; and Monſieur Fermat in particular made ſome objections againſt it; but was afterwards reconciled to our Author, who had likewiſe a diſpute with Monſieur Petit, Monſieur Morin, Regius Profeſſor of Mathematicks at Paris, and Monſieur Beaugrand, Secretary to the King of France. He reſolved now to diſcontinue his application to abſtract Geometry, though he determined to continue that part of it, which is converſant about the Phænomena of Nature, and wrote an Explanation of the obſcure paſſages in his Book, for the uſe of his friend Monſ. des Argues; and conſented, that a Dutch Gentleman, one of his friends, ſhould draw up a regular Introduction to his Geometry, to facilitate the underſtanding of it to all kinds of readers. About the end of the year 1638 he deſired to be excuſed from anſwering any more Problems, and drew up a ſeries of the beſt objections which had been put to him, and of the moſt curious Problems, which had been propounded, in order to be printed with his anſwers (h). Whilſt they fatigued him in France with Objections and Problems, there was ſcarce any thing thought of in Holland

(g) Idem, ibid. lib. 3.

(h) Idem, ibid. lib. 4.

moſt probable, and proper for the explication of all Phænomena; and upon this hypotheſis he built the greateſt part of his Syſtem of the World; ſo that not being able to retrench it without rendering all the reſt defective, he thought it more adviſeable to ſuppreſs the Treatiſe abovementioned, than to publiſh it imperfect, or expoſe himſelf to the cenſure of the Inquiſitors at Rome, by maintaining an hypotheſis, which they had condemned without underſtanding it. However he reſolved to review this work, and to new-model his Explication of the Earth's Motion, in order to ſhew how it may be denied in oppoſition to Galileo, tho' in reality it be carried about, and the hypotheſis of Copernicus remain in full force. This he did not attempt ſo much out of regard to the Inquiſition, as to explain thoſe paſſages of Scripture, which are commonly alledged againſt this opinion (13). An Abridgment of this Treatiſe was publiſhed at Paris 1664 in 8vo under the following title: Le Monde de Des Cartes, ou le Traité de la Lumiere & des autres principaux Objets des Sens. Avec un Diſcours de Mouvement local & un autre des Fievres, compoſés ſelon les Principes de cet Auteur. This firſt edition is very imperfect: but Mr. Clerſelier afterwards corrected the errors by the original, and publiſh'd it very exactly at Paris 1677 in 4to at the end of Des Cartes's Traité de l'Homme. It is printed in Latin in his Opera Poſthuma (14).

(13) Baillet, ubi ſupra, lib. 3.

(14) Niceron, pag. 306, 307.

[N] His Treatiſe of Mechanics.] It was written for the uſe of Monſr. de Zuilechem, his friend and correſpondent, Counſellor and Secretary to the Prince of Orange (15). In 1668 there was printed at Paris in 4to, Traité de la Mecanique compoſé par M. Des Cartes. De plus l'Abrigé de la Muſique du même Auteur, mis en François avec éclairciſſemens neceſſaires, par N. P. P. D. L.. i. e. "Nicolas Poiſſon, Prêtre de l'Oratoire." This, as Father Niceron obſerves (16), is but a ſmall part of a large work, which our Author had a deſign of compoſing, but never wrote. It was publiſhed in Latin in his Opera Poſthuma.

(15) Baillet, ubi ſupra, lib. 3.

(16) Pag. 297.

[O] His four Treatiſes concerning Method, Dioptrics, Meteors, and Geometry.] They were printed at Leyden in 4to under the following title, Diſcours de la Methode pour bien conduire ſa raiſon, & chercher la Verité dans les Sciences. Plus la Dioptrique, les Meteores, & la Géometrie. Theſe four Treatiſes, which are Eſſays towards his Philoſophy, were publiſhed at firſt without his name, he deſiring to be unknown, in order that he might hear the more freely the judgment, which was paſſed upon them. In the firſt of theſe Treatiſes he begins with divers conſiderations upon the Sciences; and then propoſes the principal Rules of Method, which he obſerved for his own uſe in the conduct of his reaſon. He afterwards points out ſome rules of Morality, which he had deduced from his Method; and propounds ſome arguments, by which he evinces the Exiſtence of a God, and explains the Nature of the human Soul. In the laſt place he makes a deduction of things, which he ſuppoſed requiſite for the proceeding further in the ſtudy of Nature. His Treatiſe of Dioptrics is divided into ten parts, which form ſo many ſhort Diſcourſes or Diſſertations concerning Light, Refraction, the Eye and Senſes, the Images formed at the bottom of the eye, Viſion, Spectacles, and cutting of Glaſſes. His Treatiſe of Meteors is divided into ten chapters, and in it he treats of Terreſtrial Bodies, of Vapours and Exhalations, of Salt, of Winds, of Clouds, Rain, Snow, and Hail; of Tempeſts, Lightning, and other Fires kindled in the air; of the Rain-bow; of the Colour of Clouds; of Circles or Crowns appearing ſometimes about the Stars; and of Parhelia's. His Treatiſe of Geometry is divided into three Books. Stephen Curcellæus, a famous Divine among the Arminians, tranſlated ſome years after the three firſt Treatiſes into Latin, without meddling with that upon Geometry, either becauſe he ſuppoſed it to be above his reach, or becauſe he had heard that ſome other perſon was engaged in that deſign. Des Cartes reviſed his Tranſlation, and took that opportunity to make ſome alterations in his firſt Treatiſe; upon which they were publiſhed under this title: Renati Des Cartes Specimina Philoſophiæ, ſeu Diſſertatio de Methodo rectè regendæ rationis, Dioptrice & Meteora ex Gallico Latinè verſa, & ab Autore emendata. Amſterdam 1644 in 4to, and 1656 in 4to. After this Francis van Schooten, Profeſſor of Mathematics at Leyden, tranſlated his Geometry into Latin, and added his own Commentaries to it, with the excellent Notes of Monſr. de Beaune, Counſellor in the Preſidial of Blois, which had been a long time handed about in manuſcript among the Mathematicians. This Tranſlation was printed under this title: Renati Des Cartes Geometria cum Florimondi de Beaune Notis, ex Gallico Latinè, Interprete & Commentatore Franciſco a Schooten. Leyden 1649 in 4to. Accedit Compendium Muſicæ. Francfort upon the Meine 1695 in 4to (17).

(17) Niceron, pag. 296, 297.

Holland but diſcarding the old Philoſophy, and following his. The Univerſity of Utrecht was Carteſian from its foundation by means of Renneri; and Henry Regius, a young Phyſician, declared openly in his favour, though he was afterwards vehemently attacked by Gilbert Voetius, Profeſſor of Divinity there. Des Cartes removed now to Harderwick near Utrecht, and thence to Leyden, and not long after was invited to ſettle in England by Sir Charles Cavendiſh, brother to the Earl of Newcaſtle [P]. About this time he was attacked by the Jeſuits, and particularly Father Bourdin. At the latter end of the year 1641 Lewis XIII King of France invited him to his Court upon very honourable conditions; but there were no ſollicitations powerful enough to wean him from his retirement (i). In 1641 he publiſhed his Meditations concerning the Exiſtence of God, and the Immortality of the Soul [Q]. Voetius abovementioned being choſen Rector of the Univerſity of Utrecht the ſame year, procured Des Cartes's Philoſophy to be prohibited, and wrote againſt him, who immediately publiſhed a Vindication of himſelf [R]. The (i) Idem, ibid. lib. 5.

[P] Not long after was invited to ſettle in England by Sir Charles Cavendiſh, brother of the Earl of Newcaſtle.] He was invited thither with his friend Monſr. Mydorge, and they were both to be ſettled there under King Charles I. Our Author did not appear backward to the acceptance of this offer, eſpecially conſidering what he was aſſured of, as Monſr. Baillet tells us, that the King was a Catholic in his heart. Sir Charles Cavendiſh, the promoter of this deſign, and his brother, the Earl of Newcaſtle, were both acquainted with our Philoſopher; and the former was an excellent Mathematician, and a great Admirer of Des Cartes's Philoſophy. But the civil wars breaking out in England prevented the ſucceſs of this affair.

[Q] In 1641 he publiſh'd his Meditations &c.] They were printed at Paris in 8vo under the following title: Meditationes de primâ Philoſophiâ, ubi de Dei Exiſtentiâ & Animæ Immortalitate. In the firſt of theſe Meditations he propounds the reaſons why we may doubt of all things in general, and eſpecially of material things, till we have eſtabliſhed a better foundation in ſcience than has hitherto been laid. He ſhews that the advantage of this general doubting conſiſts in delivering us from all kinds of prejudices, and diſengaging our minds from ſenſe, in order that we may not any longer doubt of the things, which we ſhall afterwards diſcover to be true. In the ſecond he ſhews, that the ſoul making uſe of its own liberty in ſuppoſing that the things, of whoſe exiſtence there may ariſe the leaſt doubt, do not exiſt at all, in effect acknowledges, that it is impoſſible, but that at the ſame time it muſt exiſt itſelf; which ſerves to make it diſtinguiſh the things, which belong to it from what relates to the body. In the third he produces and diſplays the beſt argument he hath for the Exiſtence of God, without uſing any compariſon drawn from corporal things. In the fourth he endeavours to prove, that all things, of which we have a clear and diſtinct idea, are true; and explains the nature of error in judgment, and the diſcernment of truth from falſhood. In the fifth he explains the Nature of a Body in general; and demonſtrates the Exiſtence of God in a new manner; and ſhews that the Certainty of Demonſtrations themſelves depend upon the Knowledge of God. In the ſixth he ſhews the Difference between the Action of the Underſtanding and that of the Imagination; and proves that the Soul of Man is really diſtinct from the Body, tho' it is ſo cloſely united, that it forms as it were the ſame thing with it. He explains likewiſe the ſeveral Errors, which proceed from the ſenſes, with the means to avoid them; and exhibits thoſe reaſons, from which we may conclude the Exiſtence of things material (18). Several objections were ſent him againſt this work. The firſt ſett was drawn up by a Divine of Louvain, and Native of Antwerp, whoſe name was Caterus, who would not ſuffer his name to be prefixed to them. The ſecond objections were made by divers Divines and Philoſophers at Paris, and collected by Father Merſenne. The Anſwer of Des Cartes to theſe Objections is accompanied with a piece written by him, containing the reaſons for the proof of the Exiſtence of God, and the Diſtinction between the human Soul and Body, ranged in a geometrical manner. The third ſett of Objections were made by Mr. Thomas Hobbes. The fourth came from Anthony Arnaud. The fifth from Gaſſendus. The ſixth from divers Divines, Philoſophers, and Geometricians, as appears from the title given them by Father Merſenne, who publiſh'd the Book. The ſecond edition of the Meditations in Latin was printed at Amſterdam by Elzevir in 1642 in 12mo; and the Author corrected it in the title of the Paris Edition, and ſubſtituted the term Diſtinction between the Soul and Body inſtead of the Immortality of the Soul, which was not ſo ſuitable to it. He added the ſeventh ſett of Objections propoſed to him by Father Peter Bourdin a Jeſuit, with his Anſwers, a Letter to Father Dinet of the ſame Society with relation to his Diſpute with that Father, and an Addition at the end of the fourth Objection concerning Tranſubſtantiation, which Father Merſenne had thought proper to retrench in the Paris Edition. A late edition was publiſhed with this title: Meditationes de primâ Philoſophiâ, in quibus adjectæ ſunt in hâc ultimâ editione utiliſſimæ quædam animadverſiones ex variis doctiſſimiſque Autoribus collectæ, cum Autoris Vitâ breviter ac concinnè conſcripta. Amſtelodami (that is, Neapolt) 1719 in 8vo. This edition was publiſh'd by Giovacchino Poeta. The Meditations were tranſlated into French, and printed at Paris 1647 in 4to under the following title: Les Meditations Metaphyſiques de René des Cartes touchant la premiere Philoſophie, dans leſquelles l'exiſtence de Dieu & la Diſtinction réelle entre l'Ame & le Corps de l'Homme, ſont démonſtrées. Traduites du Latin de l'Auteur par M. le D. D. L. N. S. (i. e. Monſr. le Duc de Luines). Et les Objections faites contre ces Meditations par diverſes perſonnes tres-doctes, avec les Réponſes de l'Auteur, traduites par Mr. C. L. R. (i. e. Clerſelier). Des Cartes, who reviſed theſe Tranſlations, took the opportunity of correcting his own work, and explaining ſome paſſages, the ſenſe of which was not ſufficiently clear in the Latin, without meddling however with the ſtyle; which renders theſe Tranſlations preferable to the Latin Original. A ſecond edition was publiſhed at Paris 1661 in 4to; but the beſt is the third edition, which is divided into Articles, with Summaries by R. F. (i. e. René Fedé, Doctor of Phyſic of the Faculty of Angers), and printed at Paris 1673 in 4to (19).

(18) Baillet, ubi ſupra, lib. 5.

(19) Niceron, pag. 295-300.

[R] Who immediately publiſh'd a Vindication of himſelf.] It was entitled, Epiſtola Renati Des Cartes ad celeberrimum Virum D. Giſbertum Voëtium in quâ examinantur duo libri nuper pro Voëtio Ultrajecti ſimul editi; unus de Confraternitate Marianâ, alter de Philoſophiâ Carteſianâ. Amſterdam 1643 in 12mo, and in the Collection of his Letters Tom. II. p. 541. In this piece he anſwers a Book written againſt him by Martin Schoockius, with a long Preface by Voetius, under the title of Philoſophia Carteſiana, ſive admiranda Methodus novæ Philoſophiæ Renati Des Cartes. Utrecht 1643 in 12mo. And he added a Confutation of a Book written by Voetius againſt the Confraternity of Bois-le-Duc. Nor was our Author ſatisfied with having cenſured Schoockius, but proſecuted him for the ſlanders publiſh'd againſt him in his book. At laſt the Univerſity of Groningen, to whom that affair was referred, gave ſentence April 10th 1645, decreed that Des Cartes ſhould content himſelf with the Declarations, which Schoockius had made: 1. That he had written merely at the inſtigation of Voetius, who furniſhed him with the Memoirs relating to every thing perſonal in his Book, and particularly with regard to his pretended Atheiſm, and the long and invidious Parallel between him and Vanini. 2. That thoſe, who had the care of publiſhing his Book, had added without his conſent moſt of the things, of which Des Cartes complained. 3. That he acknowledged Des Cartes to be a man of probity and honour, who was by no means an Atheiſt, as he had been made very wrongly to aſſert (20).

(20) Niceron, pag. 301, 302.

The ſame year he took a voyage into France, where he found the edition of his Principles [S], and the Latin Tranſlation of his Eſſays finiſhed, and the Copies ſent from Holland. He dedicated his Principles to his illuſtrious diſciple, Elizabeth, Princeſs Palatine, daughter of Prince Frederic V Elector Palatine, and King of Bohemia. Having viſited his friends at Paris, he departed for Holland about the end of October, and retired to Egmond, with a reſolution to apply himſelf wholly to the knowledge of Animals, Plants, and Minerals. In June 1645 he publickly renounced his diſciple Regius, who had preſumed to advance ſeveral notions of his own, and had ſtollen his Treatiſe of Animals. He had now directed his application with freſh vigour to Anatomy; and being viſited at this time by a Gentleman who deſired to ſee his Library, he ſhewed him nothing but a calf which he was going to diſſect. He was a little diverted from this ſtudy by the queſtion concerning the Quadrature of the Circle, agitated in 1645 between Longomontanus and Mr. John Pell; which queſtion he declared impoſſible to be ſolved. He paſſed the ſevere winter of that year at Egmond, and compoſed two ſmall works, the former againſt Gaſſendus's Inſtances, and the latter of the Nature of the Paſſions. About the ſame time he had a diſpute with Monſieur Roberval concerning Vibrations, and carried on a correſpondence upon moral Philoſophy with the Princeſs Elizabeth. In the beginning of the year 1647 he anſwered ſome queſtions propoſed by Chriſtina Queen of Sweden, and Monſieur Chanut, the Reſident of France in that Kingdom [T]. But the pleaſure of this correſpondence was diſturbed by the clamours, which Ravius, Principal of the College at Leyden, and Triglandius, Profeſſor of Divinity there, raiſed againſt his Philoſophy in that Univerſity; but they were both ſoon after enjoined ſilence with regard to him, though they afterwards wrote againſt him. In June he took a journey to France, where the King ſettled on him a penſion of three thouſand Livres, and returned to Holland about the end of September. In November he received a letter from Monſieur Chanut, deſiring in Queen Chriſtina's name his opinion of the Sovereign Good; which he ſent her with ſome letters, which he had formerly written to the Princeſs Elizabeth upon the ſame ſubject, and his treatiſe of the Paſſions [U]. The Queen was ſo highly pleaſed with them, that ſhe wrote him a letter of thanks with her own hand. In May following he took a third journey into France, where Gaſſendus and he were reconciled, and in September returned to Egmond. In March following Schooten's Tranſlation of his Geometry was publiſhed. The Queen of Sweden having invited him into that Kingdom, he arrived at Stockholm in the beginning of October, where he was received with the higheſt civility by her Majeſty, who engaged him to attend her every morning at five a clock (k) to inſtruct her in his Philoſophy, and deſired him to reviſe and digeſt all his writings, which were unpubliſhed [X], and to form a compleat Body of Philoſophy from them. She propoſed likewiſe to ſettle him

(k) Perrault, pag. 117. and Baillet, ubi ſupra.

[S] The Edition of his Principles.] It was printed at Amſterdam by Elzevir 1644 in 4to under the title of Principia Philoſophiæ; and tranſlated into French, and publiſh'd at Paris 1647, 1651, 1658 in 4to under the following title: Les Principes de la Philoſophie, écrits en Latin par Réne Des Cartes, & traduits en François par un de ſes Amis. The Abbé Picot made this Tranſlation, which was reviſed by Des Cartes. There was an Engliſh Tranſlation printed with ſome Remarks upon the Work itſelf at London 1653 in 4to. This Work is divided into four parts; the firſt of which contains the Principles of human Knowledge. The ſecond treats of the Laws of Nature, and the Principles of natural Things, the Proprieties of Bodies, Space, Motion, &c. The third contains a particular Explication of the Syſtem of the World, and more eſpecially of the Heavens and celeſtial Bodies, The fourth treats of the Earth.

[T] He anſwered ſome queſtions propoſed by Chriſtina Queen of Sweden, and Monſr. Chanut, the Reſident of France in that Kingdom.] The Queen had diſputed with Monſ. Chanut, concerning this queſtion; When a man carries love or hatred to exceſs, which of theſe two irregularities is the worſt? The Reſident ſent this queſtion to our Author without acquainting him which ſide of it was taken by the Queen. Upon this Des Cartes drew up a fine diſſertation upon love publiſhed in the firſt volume of his letters. In this piece he diſcuſſed three points; firſt, What love is? Secondly, Whether mere natural light teaches us the love of God? Thirdly, Which of the two exceſſes of love or hatred is the worſt? This proved highly ſatisfactory to the Queen, except with regard to one paſſage, from which it appeared that Des Cartes was not of their opinion, who maintain the world to be finite. And ſhe ſignified her doubt, whether it is poſſible to admit the hypotheſis of an infinite world, without claſhing with the Chriſtian Religion. Monſr. Chanut, was deſired to acquaint him with this objection, upon which he anſwered, that he did not ſuppoſe the world to be infinite, but indefinite (21).

(21) Baillet, ubi ſupra, lib. 7.

[V] His treatiſe of the paſſions.] It is entitled, Traité des Paſſions de l'Ame, and was printed at Amſterdam 1650 in 12mo, at Roan 1651 in 12mo, and at Paris 1664 and 1679 in 12mo. A Latin Tranſlation of it was publiſhed at Amſterdam 1656 and 1664 in 4to. with ſeveral other works of our Author. He had written this treatiſe in 1646 for the uſe of Princeſs Elizabeth, and ſent it in manuſcript to the Queen of Sweden about the end of the year following. He afterwards reviſed it at the requeſt of his friends, and enlarged it by one half, and in this ſtate it was publiſhed (22).

(22) Niceron, pag. 303, 304.

[X] Deſired him to reviſe and digeſt all his writings which were unpubliſhed.] The moſt conſiderable of them were printed after his death, and are as follow. L'Homme de René Des Cartes, avec les Remarques de Loüis de la Forge, & un Traité de la Formation du Fœtus par le même Des Cartes. Paris 1664 in 4to. Theſe two pieces were likewiſe printed at Paris 1677 in 4to. with le Monde de Des Cartes, ou le Traité de la Lumiere &c. Monſr. Clerſelier publiſhed the two pieces above mentioned. Two years before the French Edition of the Traité de l'Homme, a Latin tranſlation of it was printed under the following title: Renatus Des Cartes de Homine, figuris & Latinitate donatus à Florentio Schuyl, inclytæ urbis Sylvæ Ducis Senatore, & ibidem Philoſophiæ Profeſſore. Leyden 1662 and 1664 in 4to. Tho' the figures which accompanied this tranſlation, are beautiful enough, yet they are not ſo proper to explain the text of Des Cartes as thoſe of Meſſrs. de la Forge and Gutſchowen in the French edition of 1664. Beſides Mr. Schuyl not having the advantage of a good copy of the Original, his verſion is defective. But he has given a preface to it, which may be conſidered as a maſter-piece in the kind, and was thought ſo excellent by Monſr. Clerſelier, that he ſubjoined it to his French edition of Des Cartes's Treatiſe, in order him in Sweden upon very honourable terms, and to allow him a revenue of three thouſand crowns per annum, with an eſtate, which ſhould deſcend to his heirs and executors for ever, and to form an Academy, of which he was to be Director. But theſe deſigns were broke off by his death [Y], which happened February the 11th 1650 (l), he being then fifty three years, ten months, and eleven days old. His body was interred at Stockholm, and ſeventeen years afterwards removed to Paris, where a magnificent monument was erected to him in the church of Saint-Genevieve du Mont (m). Several works have been written on occaſion of our Author and his Philoſophy [Z]. Monſieur Baillet (n) has given us a particular account of the qualifications of his mind and body, and highly recommends him for his contempt of wealth and fame, his love of truth, his modeſty, (l) Perrault, pag. 127. and Baillet, ubi ſupra.

(m) Baillet, lib. 7.

(n) Ibid. lib. 8.

der to render it more compleat (23). John Daniel Major having found a fragment in manuſcript of Des Cartes, intitled, Explication des Engins, tranſlated it into Latin, and publiſhed it at Kiel in 1672. He took all the liberty with it, which he thought proper; but at the bottom it appears that this piece is not at all different from Des Cartes's Mechanics mentioned above (24). But the moſt conſiderable of our Author's poſthumous writings are his Letters, printed in three volumes by Monſr. Clerſelier, under the following title: Lettres de René Des Cartes, où ſont traités les plus belles Queſtions touchant la Morale, la Phyſique, la Medicine, & les Mathematiques, données au Public par le Sieur Clerſelier. Paris 1667 in 4to. They were tranſlated into Latin, and printed by Elzevir at Leyden 1668 in 4to. Theſe Letters contain a great many curious things relating to the Diſputes, which Des Cartes had with the learned men of his time. Monſr. Clerſelier publiſh'd them from the Minutes of our Author, which it is probable are not exactly conformable to the Originals, which he ſent, ſince in tranſcribing them he made frequent alterations (25). Renati Des Cartes Opuſcula Poſthuma, Phyſica & Mathematica. Amſterdam 1701 in 4to. This volume contains ſeveral ſmall Tracts or Fragments of our Author, which had never been publiſh'd before except in Low-Dutch, to which are added three others, which had been already printed in Latin or French. The pieces contained in this Collection are, 1. Mundus, ſeu Diſſertatio de Lumine, ut & aliis ſenſuum objectis primariis. This is a Tranſlation of the French piece abovementioned, intitled, Le Monde de Des Cartes &c. made from the firſt edition, which is full of faults. 2. Tractatus de Mechanicâ, unà cum Elucidationibus N. Poiſſonii è Gallico Sermone in Latinum tranſlatus. 3. N. Poiſſonii Elucidationes Phyſicæ in Carteſii Muſicam. This had already been publiſhed in French. 4. Regulæ ad directionem ingenii, ut & inquiſitionem Veritatis. This treatiſe, which is imperfect, contains excellent rules for the direction of the mind in the ſearch of truth. 5. Inquiſitio Veritatis per Lumen Naturæ. This piece, which is a ſequel of the other, is ſtill more imperfect; for there is only the beginning remaining. 6. Primæ Cogitationes circa generationem Animalium. 7. De Saporibus. It is a Fragment, which contains but two pages. 8. Excerpta ex MSS. Renati Des Cartes, quæ Algebram ſpectant. Theſe are only ſome Problems. A new edition has been publiſh'd at Paris of his works in French in fifteen volumes in 12mo, and contains as follows: Lettres de M. Des Cartes, ou l'on a joint le Latin de pluſieurs Lettres, qui n'avoient été imprimées qu'en François, avec une Traduction Françoiſe de celles, qui n'avoient juſqu'à preſent paru qu'en Latin, 1724, ſix volumes. Les Meditations Metaphyſiques touchant la premiere Philoſophie, 1724, two volumes. Diſcours de la Methode, pour bien conduire ſa Raiſon, & chercher la Verité dans les Sciences. Plus la Dioptrique, les Meteores, la Mechanique, & la Muſique, 1724, two volumes. Les Principes de la Philoſophie, 1724, one volume. Les Paſſions de l'Ame. Le Monde, ou Traité de la Lumiere. Edition augmentée d'un Diſcours ſur le Mouvement local & ſur la Fievre, ſur les Principes du même Auteur, 1728, one volume. L'Homme de René Des Cartes, & la Formation du Fœtus; avec les remarques de Louïs de la Forge, 1722, one volume.

(23) Niceron, pag. 304, 305, 306.

(24) Idem, pag. 307.

(25) Idem, pag. 307, 308.

[Y] His Death.] Upon his return from the Queen on the firſt of February, he found himſelf ſeized with the illneſs, which put an end to his life. The next day he was attacked by a continued fever with an inflammation in the lungs. Monſr. Chanut, the French Embaſſador, who had juſt recovered of the ſame kind of diſtemper, would have him treated in the ſame way with himſelf; but his brain being ſeized, he could not be prevailed upon to hear the advice of his friends, and obſtinately refuſed to be let blood, crying out, when it was mentioned to him, Gentlemen, ſpare French blood. However he agreed at laſt to it, but then it was too late (26). He deſired then that his Confeſſor Father Viögué, who was employed in the exerciſe of his miſſion ſome leagues from Stockholm, might be ſent for; and requeſted thoſe, who were preſent, not to diſcourſe with him any longer except about the mercy of God, and the reſignation, with which he ought to ſuffer the ſeparation of his ſoul. He remained very quiet the two laſt days, and departed peaceably in the arms of the Embaſſador and Father Viögué (27).

(26) Niceron, pag. 291, 292.

(27) Baillet, lib. 7.

[Z] Several works have been written on occaſion of our Author and his Philoſophy.] We ſhall mention ſome of the moſt conſiderable. Petri Danielis Huetii Cenſura Philoſophiæ Carteſianæ. Paris 1689, in 12mo. Reponſe au Livre, qui a pour titre, P. Danielis Huetii Cenſura Philoſophiæ Carteſianæ. Par Pierre Silvain Regis. Paris 1691 in 12mo. Gerardi de Vries Prof. Philoſ. Ultraj. de Renati Carteſii Meditationibus à Petro Gaſſendo impugnatis Diſſertatiuncula Hiſtorico-Philoſophica. Utrecht 1691 in 8vo. Mr. Baſnage de Bauval in his Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Savans (28) tells us, that this Author thro' his whole Diſſertation ſhews in a very ingenious manner his averſion to Des Cartes. Hiſtoire de la Conjuration faite à Stockholm contre M. Des Cartes. Paris 1695 in 12mo. This pretended Hiſtory is a mere piece of raillery. The qualities, accidents, and ſubſtantial forms, which Des Cartes had rejected in his Philoſophy, are the formidable enemies, which conſpired againſt him. When they had come to a reſolution among themſelves, and he was ſolemnly declared an Innovator, and as ſuch ſentenced to be cut off from the Society of the Learned, Heat was commiſſioned to execute the ſentence, and acted with ſuch violence in the body of this Philoſopher, as to raiſe a fever in it attended with a delirium, which deſtroyed his health in a few days, in ſpite of all the knowledge, which he had obtained. Danielis Lipſtorpii Specimina Philoſophiæ Carteſianæ. Leyden 1653 in 4to. We find in this work a Life of Des Cartes compiled from theſe particulars, which the Author had learn'd from Mr. Schooten, and Dr. Raey, a Phyſician. There are a great many errors in it, but it contains ſeveral things very curious (29). Renati Carteſii Vita a Petro Borello conſcripta, publiſhed at the end of a Book of Borellus's intitled, Hiſtoriarum & Obſervationum Medico-Phyſicarum Centuriæ IV. Caſtris 1653 in 12mo. Paris 1656 in 8vo. Francfort 1670 and 1676 in 8vo and in p. 580 of the firſt volume of the Memoriæ Philoſophorum Henningi Witten. It appears that Borellus wrote this piece merely from what he learned of Monſr. de Ville-Breſſieux, who had lived ſome time with Des Cartes; ſo that he is only to be depended upon for ſome general facts. He has not very much troubled himſelf about particular circumſtances, which might ſerve to verify his facts; nor obſerved any order with regard either to time or the things themſelves; nor given this piece any elegance of ſtyle or regularity of method. In ſhort the manner, in which he has confounded every thing, is ſuch, that there is nothing more remarkable in this piece, than the Author's addreſs in throwing together ſo many faults in ſo ſhort a compaſs. It was tranſlated into Engliſh, and publiſh'd at London 1670 in 24mo, under the title of a Summary or Compendium of the Life of the moſt famous Philoſopher Renatus Des Cartes. Written originally in Latin by Peter Borellus Phyſician to the French King. To which is alſo added an Epitome of his Life

(28) Sept. 1691. Art. 3. pag. 27.

(29) Niceron, pag. 311, 312.

modeſty, diſintereſtedneſs, moderation, piety, and ſubmiſſion to the authority of the Church. We ſhall give his character from ſome other writers in the note [AA]. He imagined

Life by Marcus Zurius Boxhornius, Hiſtoriographer at Leyden. But to proceed to the other writings relating to our Author: Joannis Tepellii Hiſtoriæ Philoſophiæ Carteſianæ. Nuremberg 1674 in 12mo. This piece is divided into ſix chapters; the firſt of which relates to the Life of our Author. It is full of errors, and very ſuperficial. Voyage du Monde de Des Cartes. Paris 1691 in 12mo. This was written by Father Daniel the Jeſuit, and was tranſlated into Latin and Engliſh. Nouvelles difficultes propoſées par un Peripateticien à l'Auteur du Voyage du Monde de Des Cartes, touchant la Connoiſſance des Bêtes. Avec la Refutation de deux Défenſes du Syſteme general de Des Cartes. Paris 1693 in 12mo. This was likewiſe written by Father Daniel. Recueil de quelques Pieces curieuſes concernant la Philoſophie de M. Des Cartes. Amſterdam 1684 in 12mo. Nouveaux Mémoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſtoire du Carteſianiſme, par M. G. de l'A. Utrecht 1693 in 12mo. This was written by Monſr. Huet, Biſhop of Avranches. La Vie de M. Des Cartes. Paris 1691 in 4to in two volumes. This was written by Monſr. Baillet (30), who publiſh'd an Abridgment of it at Paris 1693 in 12mo under the following title, La Vie de M. Des Cartes reduite en abregé.

(30) See the Article of BAILLET, pag. 587. vol. 2.

[AA] We ſhall give his character from ſome other Writers in the Note.] Dr. Barrow in his Opuſcula (31) tells us, that he was undoubtedly a very good and ingenious man, and a real Philoſopher, and one who ſeems to have brought thoſe aſſiſtances to that part of Philoſophy, which relates to Matter and Motion, which perhaps no other had done, that is, a great ſkill in Mathematics, a mind habituated both by nature and cuſtom to profound meditation, a judgment exempt from all prejudices and popular errors, and furniſhed with a conſiderable number of certain and ſelect experiments, a great deal of leiſure, entirely diſengaged by his own choice from the reading of uſeleſs Books, and the Avocations of Life, with an incomparable acuteneſs of wit, and an excellent talent of thinking clearly and diſtinctly, and expreſſing his thoughts with the utmoſt perſpicuity. Samuel Mareſius likewiſe in his Theolog. Elenchtic. Nov. Synops. (32), Alexander Morus in his Preface to Euſebius's Chronicon, Morhof in his Polyhiſtor (33), Bullart in his Academie des Sciences, and other Writers ſpeak of him with great commendation. The great Dr. Edmund Halley in a Paper concerning Optics communicated to Mr. Wotton, and publiſhed by the latter in his Reflections upon antient and modern learning (34), writes as follows: As to Dioptrics, tho' ſome of the ancients mention Refraction, as a natural effect of tranſparent Media; yet Des Cartes was the firſt, who in this Age has diſcovered the laws of Refraction, and brought Dioptrics to a Science. M. Wotton, in the Book juſt mentioned, tells us (35), that "our Author, "who came ſoon after the Lord Bacon, did not perfectly tread in his ſteps, ſince he was for doing too "great a part of his work in his cloſet; concluding "too ſoon before he had made experiments enough; "but to a vaſt genius he joined an exquiſite ſkill in "Geometry, ſo that he wrought upon intelligible prin"ciples in an intelligible manner, tho' he very often "failed of one part of his end, namely a right expli"cation of the Phænomena of Nature; yet by mar"rying Geometry and Phyſics together, he put the "world in hopes of a maſculine off-ſpring in proceſs "of time, tho' the firſt productions ſhould prove abor"tive." This paſſage was animadverted upon by Mr. John Keil in the Introduction to his Examination of Dr. Burnet's Theory of the Earth, and vindicated by Mr. Wotton in his Defence of the Reflections upon antient and modern learning (36). The learned and ingenious Mr. Thomas Baker in his Reflections upon Learning; wherein is ſhewn the Inſufficiency thereof in its ſeveral particulars, in order to evince the Uſefulneſs and Neceſſity of Revelation remarks (37), that the Carteſians have been obſerved to be no friends to Logic, and that their maſter has left nothing extant upon that ſubject, except ſome ſcattered expreſſions; unleſs a Treatiſe of Method muſt be interpreted a Logic, which notwithſtanding is more properly metaphyſical. "One "of his firſt principles of reaſoning, after he had "doubted of every thing, ſeems to be too circular to "be ſafely built upon; for he is for proving the Being "of a God from the Truth of our Faculties, and the "Truth of our Faculties from the Being of a God. "He had better have ſuppoſed our Faculties to be "true; for they being the inſtruments, that we make "uſe of in all our proofs and deductions, unleſs we "ſuppoſe them to be true, we are at a ſtand, and can "go no farther in our proofs. So that the way of "ſuppoſing ſeems to be more rational than that of "doubting." The ſame Author likewiſe in his ſeventh Chapter (38) conſiders the Natural Philoſophy of Des Cartes, and obſerves, that among all the antient opinions none have been revived with more general approbation, than thoſe of Democritus and Epicurus, the Founders of the Atomical or Corpuſcular Philoſophy; an ill omen to Religion, when they who have explicated the Production of the World by the laws of Mechaniſm without a God, have been ſo generally followed. In this, ſays Mr. Baker, Mr. Des Cartes has been too ſucceſsful, whom tho' it would be very unjuſt to charge with a denial of a God, whom he ſuppoſeth to have created matter, and to have impreſſed the firſt motion upon it; yet in this he is blameable, that after the firſt motion is impreſſed, and the wheels ſet a going, he leaves his vaſt machine to the laws of Mechaniſm, and ſuppoſeth that all things may be thereby produced without any further extraordinary aſſiſtance from the firſt Impreſſor. The ſuppoſition is impious, and as he ſtates it, deſtructive of itſelf, for not to deny him his laws of motion, moſt of which have been evidently ſhewn to be falſe, and conſequently ſo muſt all be, that is built upon them, his Notion of Matter is inconſiſtent with any motion at all; for as ſpace and matter are with him the ſame, upon this ſuppoſition there can be no motion in a Plenum. This Mr. Baker ſhews by obſerving, that motion is only the ſucceſſion of bodies from one place to another: but how ſhould they ſucceed from one place, if there be no room to ſucceed them in the next, which there cannot be, if all be full? And the difficulty is ſtill greater upon the firſt framing of things, before the ſubtile matter is produced, that was to ſuit itſelf to all the ſolid interſtices, betwixt the larger ſolid bodies, which muſt needs clog and interfere with one another, unleſs we allow ſome fluid matter, that will yield and give way to the other's motions. Mr. Des Cartes imagines he anſwers all this by a ſucceſſion of bodies in a circular motion: "but I think, ſays "Mr. Baker, this motion carries its own confutation "with it, and that nothing can be ſuppoſed more ab"ſurd than to imagine, that upon the motion of every "little atom, the whole frame of things muſt be diſ"turbed and ſet a going. Motion is one of Mr. Des "Cartes's darling principles, and by this and matter, "he pretends to ſolve the greateſt difficulties that are "in nature. And it is very remarkable, that he has "not failed more in any of his notions, than in theſe "two great fundamentals of his Philoſophy; for al"lowing him theſe, his other explications hang toge"ther ſomewhat better." But this it is to frame Hypotheſes out of one's own imagination without conſulting nature, which Mr. Des Cartes has not done, for it was equal to him what Hypotheſis he went upon, and Father Merſennus (f) told him that a Vacuum was as much in faſhion, and as agreeable to the taſte of the Age, as a Plenum then ſeemed to be, we ſhould have had an Hypotheſis grounded upon a Vacuum, and no doubt as ſpecious and plauſible, as that we now have, perhaps more plauſible, being more conſonant to his own ſenſe, as having been his firſt deſign, and the other only hammer'd out by the direction of his confident Merſennus. And it is a wonderful thing, that men ſhould run mad after ſuch an Hypotheſis, which, as it has not the leaſt ground in nature, ſo the Author himſelf never believed it. It has been anſwered and effectually confuted in all its branches, by ſeveral hands, but by none better than the Author of A Voyage to the World of Des Cartes, which tho' not always concluſive, is every where ingenious, and confutes him in his own way, for one romance is beſt anſwered by another. Mr. Leibnitz tells us (40) that he had an infinite regard for our Author, who was a very learned man, and had read more than his followers imagine; and that he was one of thoſe, who had added moſt to the

(31) Pag. 156.

(32) Tom. 2. Controverſ. 21.

(33) Pag. 297.

(34) Cap. 24. pag. 601, & ſeqq. 3d edit. London 1705, in 8vo.

(35) Cap. 27. pag. 348.

(36) Pag. 3, 4, 5, 6. edit. London 1705, in 8vo.

(37) Cap. 5. pag. 73. 4th edit. London 1708.

(38) Pag. 97, & ſeqq.

(f) Vide Rapin, Reflex. pag. 423.

(40) Miſcellanea Leibnitiana, pag. 350. edit. Lipſiæ 1718, in 12mo.

imagined it to be poſſible to prolong life very conſiderably beyond the common period, and thought he had diſcovered the method [BB]. He was never married, but had one the diſcoveries of their predeceſſors; but that thoſe, who reſt entirely in him, are much miſtaken in their conduct. This he obſerves, is true even with regard to Geometry itſelf; in which Des Cartes, as great a Geometrician as he was, did not proceed ſo far as ſome perſons ſuppoſe; ſince his Geometry is confined. Mr. Leibnitz has given ſome inſtances of this in the Acta Eruditorum of Leipſic. The ſame writer likewiſe remarks (41), that Des Cartes endeavoured to correct ſome errors with regard to Natural Philoſophy, but that his preſumption and contemptuous manner of writing, together with the obſcurity of his ſtyle, and his confuſion, and ſevere treatment of others, are very diſagreeable. Carteſius voluit emendare quædam in Phyſicis; diſplicet tamen audacia & faſtus nimius, conjunctus cum ſtyli obſcuritate, confuſione, maledicentiâ. He informs us (42), that Des Cartes's demonſtration of the exiſtence of God was made uſe of by St. Anſelm Archbiſhop of Canterbury in his Book contra Inſipientem, and by St. Thomas Aquinas, and other Scholaſtic Writers. And obſerves (43), that our Author wanted to have it thought, that he had never made uſe of Books, but that all his knowledge was owing to himſelf; whereas it is certain, that he had read a great number of books, and ſtudied Logic under the Jeſuits at Flêche; and that he was well verſed in the Scholaſtic Philoſophy, which has much excellent matter in it, tho' intermixed with much droſs. Mr. John Keil, in the Introduction (44) to his Examination of Dr. Burnet's Theory of the Earth, tells us, that our Author has encouraged ſo very much the preſumptuous pride in the modern Philoſophers, that they think they underſtand all the works of nature, and are able to give a good account of them, "whereas neither he, nor any of his followers have "given us a right explication of any one thing. So "ridiculous are the things he has delivered in his "principles of Philoſophy, that it is a wonder how "they ſhould be believed by any; but it is ſtill a "greater wonder how they came to be ſo much ap"plauded and received among the learned, as they "were." Mr. Keil then ſets down ſome of the ſtrange ſchemes and unaccountable fancies of our Philoſopher; and obſerves (45), that notwithſtanding thoſe and many other of his abſurd notions he had a ſtrong party of the Philoſophers on his ſide, and great was the outcry againſt Ariſtotle for his tyrannical uſurpation of the liberty and property of the Philoſophers to think and ſay what they had a mind, tho' what they ſaid was much more abſurd than Ariſtotle's Ἐντελέχια, or the ſchoolmen's ſubſtantial Forms, which muſt give way to Monſr. Des Cartes's ingenious hypotheſis, who, as his followers pretended, could ſolve all the Phænomena in nature by his principles of matter and motion, without the help of attraction or occult qualities. He was the firſt world-maker this Century produced; for he ſuppoſes God at the beginning created only a certain quantity of matter and motion; and from thence he endeavours to ſhew how by the neceſſary laws of Mechaniſm, without any extraordinary concurrence of the Divine Power the world and all that therein is might have been produced. Nay he was ſo bold, that he pretended he could ſolve that inſuperable problem, viz. having a quantity of matter and motion to produce any animal. But with what confidence could he pretend to ſolve ſo intricate a problem, who blundered ſo much in the eaſieſt and moſt abſtracted things in nature (for ſuch are the laws of motion) that of the ſeven rules he has given us about motion, there is but one of them true? He afterwards (46) tells us, in anſwer to a paſſage in Mr. Wotton's Reflections and ancient and modern learning, that Des Cartes was ſo far from applying Geometry and obſervations to Natural Philoſophy, that his whole ſyſtem is but one continued blunder upon the account of his negligence in that point; which he could eaſily prove by ſhewing, that his theory of the Vortices, upon which Des Cartes's ſyſtem is grounded, is abſolutely falſe; and that Sir Iſaac Newton has ſhewn, that the periodical times of all bodies, which ſwim in Vortex, muſt be directly as the ſquares of their diſtances from the center of the Vortex. But it is evident from obſervations, that the planets in turning round the ſun, obſerve quite another ſort of law than this; for the ſquares of their periodical times are always as the cubes of their diſtances; and therefore ſince they do not obſerve that law, which of neceſſity they muſt, if they ſwim in a Vortex, it is a demonſtration, that there are no Vortices, in which the planets are carried round the ſun. Beſides if the earth were carried in a Vortex, it muſt neceſſarily move faſter, when it is in the beginning of Virgo, where the fluid is in a narrow ſpace, (and by conſequence moves ſo much the ſwifter) than it would do when it is in the beginning of Piſces, and that in the proportion as three to two, which is directly againſt experience and obſervation. It is impoſſible therefore, upon this and a great many other accounts, which Sir Iſaac Newton has ſhewn in his Principia, that the earth and the other planets can move in a Vortex. So that the notion of a Vortex being ruined, as Dr. Keil obſerves (47), "the whole Carteſian ſyſtem muſt of neceſſity fall to the "ground; and that world whoſe origination he pretend"ed to have deduc'd from mechanical principles, muſt be "a wild chimera of his own imagination." Mr. de Voltaire in his Letter on Des Cartes and Sir Iſaac Newton (48) obſerves, that nature had favoured the former with a ſhining and ſtrong imagination, whence he became a very ſingular perſon both in private life, and in his manner of reaſoning. This imagination could not conceal itſelf even in his Philoſophical works, which are every where adorned with very ſhining, ingenious metaphors. Nature had almoſt made him a Poet; and indeed he wrote a piece of Poetry for the entertainment of Chriſtina Queen of Sweden, which however was ſuppreſſed in honour to his memory. He remarks likewiſe, that he extended the limits of Geometry as far beyond the place where he found them, as Sir Iſaac did after him; and taught firſt the method of expreſſing curves by equations; that he applied this geometrical and inventive genius to Dioptrics, which, when treated by him, became a new art; and that if he was miſtaken in ſome things, the reaſon is, that a man who diſcovers a new tract of land, cannot at once know all the properties of the ſoil. Thoſe who come after him, and make theſe lands fruitful, are at leaſt obliged to him for the diſcovery. Mr. de Voltaire acknowledges, that there are innumerable errors in the reſt of Des Cartes's works; and tells us, that Geometry was a guide which he himſelf had in ſome meaſure formed, and which would have ſafely conducted him thro' the ſeveral paths of Natural Philoſophy; yet at laſt he abandoned this guide, and gave entirely into the humour of framing Hypotheſes; and then Philoſophy was no more than an ingenious romance fit only to amuſe the ignorant. "He was miſtaken in the na"ture of the ſoul, in the proofs of the exiſtence of a "God, in matter, in the laws of motion, and in "the nature of light. He admitted innate ideas; he "invented new elements; he created a world; he made "man according to his own fancy; and it is juſtly ſaid, "that the man of Des Cartes is in fact that of Des "Cartes only, very different from the real one. He "puſhed his metaphyſical errors ſo far, as to declare "that two and two make four, for no other reaſon "but becauſe God would have it ſo. However it will "not be making him too great a compliment if we "affirm that he was valuable even in his miſtakes. "He deceived himſelf, but then it was at leaſt in a "methodical way. He deſtroyed all the abſurd chi"mæra's, with which youth had been infatuated for "two thouſand years. He taught his contemporaries "how to reaſon, and enabled them to employ his "own weapons againſt himſelf. If Des Cartes did "not pay in good money, he however did great ſer"vice in crying down that of a baſe alloy."

[BB] He imagined it to be poſſible to prolong life very conſiderably beyond the common period, and thought that he had diſcovered the method.] Mr. Des Maizeaux in his Life of Monſr. de St. Evremond, prefixed to the firſt volume of that Author's works, printed in Engliſh at London 1728 in 3 Volumes, tells us (49), that Sir Kenelm Digby informed Monſr. de St. Evremond, that having read the writings of Des Cartes, he reſolved to go to Holland to ſee him; and found him in his retirement at Egmond. After having diſcourſed with him a long time without making himſelf known, Monſr.

(41) Idem, pag. 181.

(42) Ibid. pag. 63, and 75.

(43) Ibid. pag. 234.

(44) Pag. 10. 2d edit. London 1734, in 8vo.

(45) Pag. 11, 12.

(46) Pag. 13.

(47) Pag. 14, 15.

(48) Letters concerning the Engliſh Nation, Letter 14.

(49) Pag. 42.

one natural daughter, whoſe name was Francina [CC], and who died when ſhe was but five years of age. Father Rapin (n) having obſerved, that Des Cartes's principles of Motion, Figure, and Extenſion, are almoſt the very ſame with thoſe of Democritus and Epicurus, tells us, that Father Merſenne, who was his Reſident at Paris, having mentioned one day in an aſſembly of learned men, that Des Cartes, who gained a great reputation by his Geometry, was drawing a Syſtem of Natural Philoſophy, in which he admitted a Vacuum, that notion was ridiculed by Roberval and ſome others; upon which Merſenne wrote to him, that a Vacuum was not then in faſhion at Paris (o), which obliged Des Cartes to change his ſcheme, in complaiſance to the Natural Philoſophers, whom he ſtudied to pleaſe, and admit the Plenum of Leucippus; "ſo that, ſays Father Rapin, the excluſion of a Vacuum became one of his principles, merely out of "political conſiderations (p)." Rapin mentions no authority for this ſtory; and the reader will obſerve, that he was a very zealous Ariſtotelian, extremely prejudiced againſt any new Syſtems of Philoſophy. Des Cartes is ſaid to have been extremely obliged to Mr. Thomas Harriot's Artis Analyticæ Praxis for many of his improvements in Algebra and Geometry [DD].

(n) Reflexions de Phyſique, Reflex. x. Oeuvres, tom. 2. pag. 423, 424. edit. Amſterdam 1709.

(o) A la mode a Paris.

(p) Par politique.

CARTHAGENA

Monſr. Des Cartes, who had ſeen ſome of his works, told him, that he did not doubt but he was the famous Sir Kenelm Digby. And if you, Sir, replied the Knight, were not the illuſtrious M. Des Cartes, I ſhould not have come over from England on purpoſe to ſee you. Then Sir Kenelm ſaid to the Philoſopher, "That our ſpeculative diſcoveries were indeed pretty and agreeable, "but that after all they were too uncertain and unprofitable to take up a man's whole thoughts; that life "was almoſt too ſhort to attain to the right knowledge of neceſſary things; and that it would be much "more worthy of him, who ſo well underſtood the "frame of the human body, to ſtudy ways and means "to prolong it, than to apply himſelf to the bare "ſpeculations of Philoſophy." Des Cartes aſſured him, that he had already conſidered that matter, and that to render a man immortal, was what he would not venture to promiſe; but that he was very ſure it was poſſible to lengthen out his life to the period of the Patriarchs. When Monſr. de St. Evremond told Mr. Des Maizeaux this particular, he added, that they were not ignorant in Holland, that Des Cartes flattered himſelf he had made this diſcovery, and that he had heard ſeveral perſons talk of it, who had known that Philoſopher; that Des Cartes's friends in France alſo knew it; and that Abbot Picot, his diſciple and martyr, being perſuaded that he had found out this great ſecret, would not believe the news of his death, and that when he was aſhamed to doubt of it any longer, he cried out, 'Tis done and over; the world will ſoon be at an end! It is certain, as Mr. Des Maizeaux obſerves (50), that Des Cartes thought he had found out a way to prolong the life of man. I never took ſo much care, ſaid he to Mr. de Zuylichem, who aſked him what he was employed about; I never took ſo much care to preſerve my life as now; and whereas I thought death could abridge me of but THIRTY or FORTY years at moſt, it cannot ſurprize me now, without depriving me of the hope of ABOVE AN HUNDRED YEARS (51). For it ſeems evident to me, that if we only guarded againſt certain errors, that we are uſed to commit in our courſe of diet, we might without any other invention attain to an old age much longer and more happy than now we do. But becauſe I have need of a great deal of time and experience to examine every thing proper to this ſubject, I am now compoſing a ſhort ſyſtem of Medicines, which I hope while I am engaged in this work to obtain ſome reſpite from nature, and conſequently to be able to proſecute my deſign better hereafter (52). Monſr. Baillet tells us in his life of Des Cartes (53), that the Abbot Picot having accompanied him to Holland in 1647, conformed to his courſe of diet during the three months, which he ſtayed with him at Egmond, and that he was ſo pleaſed with it, that at his return to France he ſeriouſly renounced that good eating and drinking, which before he liked well enough, and was reſolved to reduce himſelf to the rules of M. Des Cartes, thinking it would be the only way to promote the ſucceſs of the ſecret, which he pretended was found out by our Philoſopher, in order to make men live four or five hundred years. And the ſame writer tells us in another place (34), that this Abbot was ſo fully perſuaded, that Des Cartes could not be miſtaken in his notions on this point, that he would have ſworn it would have been impoſſible for him to die as he did at the age of fifty four; and that had it not been for ſome unaccountable violent cauſe (like that which put his machine in Sweden out of order) he would have lived five hundred years, after having found the art to live out ſeveral ages.

(50) Pag. 42.

(51) Des Cartes wrote this from Egmond in 1638, at the age of forty two years. He died twelve years after.

(52) Lettres de M. Des Cartes, tom. 2. pag. 374.

(53) Tom. 2. pag. 448.

(54) Ubi ſupra, pag. 452, 453.

[CC] Had one natural daughter, whoſe name was Francina.] She was born at Deventer July the 19th 1635, and died at Amersford September the 7th 1640 (55). He publickly owned her for his daughter, tho' it is not known who her mother was, he not being married to her. He lamented his daughter's death in ſuch a manner as ſhewed that true Philoſophy cannot ſtifle natural affection. The ſorrow, which overwhelmed him for this loſs, would incline us to believe, that ſhe was his only child. But his enemies have not ſcrupled to father more upon him. This charge, tho' ſupported by the authority and writings of a grave Miniſter at Utrecht, he only treated with contempt, and anſwered, that not having made a vow of chaſtity, and not being exempt from human frailties, he ſhould make no ſcruple at all to own them before the world, if he had any; but tho' he had none, yet he conſented not to paſs for a great Saint with a Miniſter, who had no good opinion of the gift of continence in the Prieſts of the Romiſh Church, who live in celibacy. He ſoon repaired the breach, which was made in the regularity of his life, with which he honoured his ſolitude and the profeſſion of his Philoſophy, and reſtored his celibacy to its former perfection, even before he had gained the name of father. And in ſhort the public had never come to the knowledge of this humbling circumſtance of his life, if he had not made an open confeſſion of it himſelf by writing the hiſtory of his dear Francina in the firſt leaf of a book, which was ſeen by many perſons (56).

(55) Niceron, pag. 288.

(56) Baillet, ubi ſupra, lib. 5. See likewiſe Monſ. de Voltaire's Letters concerning the Engliſh Nation, Letter 14.

[DD] Des Cartes is ſaid to have been greatly obliged to Mr. Thomas Harriot's Artis Analyticæ Praxis, for many of his improvements in Algebra and Geometry.] This Treatiſe of Mr. Harriot was publiſhed after his death, which happened July 2d 1621 (57), by Mr. Walter Warner in 1631 at London in a thin folio, under the following title, Artis Analyticæ Praxis ad æquationes Algebraicas novâ, expeditâ, & generali methodo, reſolvendas, tractatus poſthumus &c. Dr. John Wallis in his Treatiſe of Algebra both Hiſtorical and Practical (58) has given a very particular account of this work, and tells us in his Preface, that Mr. Harriot in that Book hath taught (in a manner) all that, which hath ſince paſſed for the Carteſian Method of Algebra, there being ſcarce any thing of (pure) Algebra in Des Cartes, which was not before in Harriot, from whom Des Cartes ſeems to have taken what he hath (that is purely Algebra,) but without naming him. But the application thereof to Geometry or other particular ſubjects, (which Des Cartes purſues) is not the buſineſs of that Treatiſe of Harriot. In another place (59) likewiſe he obſerves, that "Harriot hath made very many advantageous "improvements in this art, and hath laid the foundations, on which Des Cartes (though without naming "him) hath built the greateſt part (if not the whole) "of his Algebra or Geometry, without which that "whole ſuperſtructure of Des Cartes (I doubt) had "never been." In ſeveral of the following Chapters he remarks what Des Cartes appears to have borrowed from Harriot, and in his LIIId Chapter (60) he expreſſes

(57) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 461. 2d edit. London 1721.

(58) Printed at London 1685, in fol.

(59) Cap. 30. pag. 126.

(60) Pag. 198.

CARTHAGENA (JOHN) was firſt a Jeſuit, and afterwards a Franciſcan. He was born in Spain, and was a Profeſſor in Salamanca; but he afterwards went to Rome, and there taught Divinity with applauſe, under the Pontificate of Paul V. He died at Naples in 1617 (a). No man was ever more devoted to the intereſt of the Court of Rome than Carthagena, or ever exaggerated more the rights of the Popes. This appears by the works he publiſhed, on the Diſputes between Paul V and the Republick of Venice [A]. Theſe furniſhed the French with materials to defend themſelves againſt the malicious complaints of the Spaniards [B]. Carthagena alſo advanced certain extravagant ſuppoſitions, with regard to the grace of God indulged to ſome Saints [C]. I ſhall preſſes himſelf thus: But pure Algebra, as it ſimply conſiders the computation and management of proportion (abſtract from the conſideration of any particular ſubject,) none before him (61) had ſo accurately deliver'd by a genuine deduction from its true principles. And what Des Cartes (who hath borrowed his Algebra from him, and others ſince him) have added to it, are built upon thoſe foundations, which he had laid. Dr. Wallis then relates the following ſtory, which Dr. John Pell, who had not long before told it to him, had from Sir Charles Cavendiſh, only brother to William then Earl, and afterwards Duke of Newcaſtle, a perſon of honour, well ſkilled in the Mathematics, who about that time lived at Paris. He diſcourſing there with Monſr. Roberval concerning that piece of Des Cartes, then lately publiſh'd, I admire, ſaith Roberval, that notion in Des Cartes of putting over the whole equation to one ſide, making it equal to nothing; and how he lighted upon it. "The reaſon why you admire it, ſaith "Sir Charles, is becauſe you are a Frenchman; for if "you were an Engliſhman, you would not admire it." Why ſo? ſaith Monſr. Roberval. "Becauſe, ſaith "Sir Charles, we in England know where he had it, "namely from Harriot's Algebra." What Book is that? ſaith Monſr. Roberval, I never ſaw it. "Next "time you come to my chambers, ſaith Sir Charles, "I will ſhew it you." Which a while after he did, and upon peruſal of it Monſr. Roberval exclaimed with admiration, Il l'a veu! Il l'a veu! i. e. "He "had ſeen it! he had ſeen it!" finding all that in Harriot, which he had before admired in Des Cartes, and not doubting but that Des Cartes had it from thence. In confirmation of what Dr. Wallis has aſſerted upon this point, we may obſerve, that Des Cartes came over to England about the very year 1631 (62), in which Harriot's Book was publiſhed; and therefore it is improbable, that it could eſcape the knowledge of a perſon ſo deeply engag'd in mathematical enquiries as our Author. To this we ſhall add a paſſage out of a Letter of Monſr. Carcavi to our Author, dated at Paris September 24th 1649 (63). "Monſ. Roberval "aſſures me, what I would not mention to you, but that "it concerns your intereſt to know it, that he could "reproach you with what an anonymous Author, "who wrote a ſmall Tract in Algebra (ſome believe "him to be a Jeſuit) objects to you, that in the formation of equations you only copy what was publiſh'd in the year 1631 by an Engliſhman, whoſe "name was Hariot, and who is very little known to "us here, at leaſt to me." T.

(a) See Nicholas Antonio, Bibliotb. Hiſpan. tom. 1. pag. 511, 512.

(61) Mr. Harriot.

(62) See Baillet, ubi ſupra, lib. 3. and Niceron, pag. 285.

(63) Lettres de Monſieur Des Cartes, Lett. lxxviii. tom. 3. pag. 457. edit. Paris 1667, 4to.

[A] He publiſhed Works on the Diſputes between Paul V and the Republic of Venice.] Here follow the titles of them, Pro eccleſiaſtica libertate & poteſtate tuenda adverſus injuſtas Venetorum leges, printed at Rome 1607 in 4to. Propugnaculum Catholicum de jure Belli Romani Pontificis adverſus Eccleſiæ jura violantes. Printed at Rome 1609 in 8vo.

[B] Theſe furniſhed the French with materials, to defend themſelves againſt the malicious complaints of the Spaniards.] They were eternally complaining of the alliances which the French concluded with Proteſtant Powers. They amplified very much, and employed hyperboles to diſcredit expreſly the league, which had been concluded in favour of the Elector Palatine, of which (ſaid theſe people) the King of England is the Head; and thereupon, they threw out ſuch floods of injurious expreſſions againſt this Monarch, that they were juſt upon the point of diſplaying all that infamous Satyr, which they formerly printed againſt him, under the title of Corona Regia (1). To this, among other things, Father Carthegena was objected (2), tho, in Rome, a Spaniſh Monk, writing to the Pope, in favour of the Pope, and by his command, employs a whole chapter to prove *, "that the Pope may, with a ſafe con- "ſcience, and whenever he thinks proper, call infidel "ſoldiers to his aſſiſtance, to oppoſe all ſuch as ſhall "violate the liberties of the Church." The ſame Monk was produced (3) writing a Book purpoſely (4) to prove, that it is lawful to make war againſt Catholicks, if it ſhould be neceſſary; and concluding with theſe words, "It does not belong to the ſubjects of a "King, to examine whether the cauſes of a war are "juſt." This other maxim of the ſame Monk was cited on this occaſion (5). The Eccleſiaſticks are obliged, by a divine as well as human right, to maim and put to death the enemies of the Church, for the defence of the State, without being guilty thereby of any irregularity: and they may take and poſſeſs the eſtates of the enemies, with as much reaſon as ſecular ſoldiers. But the writers on both ſides, the Spaniards with their complaints againſt the French Leagues, and the French with their apologies, had little thought of futurity; and did not know that, before the end of the Century, the proofs would be changed into objections on both ſides. Now both parties may ſay,

(1) Ferrier, Catholique d'Etat. p. 151. in the Collection of Hiſtorical Pieces, publiſhed anno 1643.
(2) Idem, ibid. pag. 138.

* Propugnac. Catholic. de Jure Belli Romani Pontificis, lib. 3. cap. 1.
(3) Ferrier, Catholique d'Etat, pag. 95.
(4) It is the Propugnaculum Catholicum.
(5) Ferrier, Catholique d'Etat, pag. 87.

Mutemus clypeos, Danaûmque inſignia nobis
Aptemus (6).
That is,
"Then change we ſhields, and their devices bear."
Dryden.

(6) Virgil. Æn. lib. 2. ver. 389.

Whilſt a ſpectator, who is not attached by either party, will make the following reflection:

Neſcia mens hominum fati ſortiſque futuræ (7).
That is,
"O mortals! blind in fate."

(7) Idem, ibid. lib. 10. ver. 501.

[C] Carthagena . . advanced ſome extravagant ſuppoſitions, with regard to the Grace of God indulged to ſome Saints.] He pretended that St. Joſeph, and many more, were juſtified before they were born. Claudius Dauſqueius or Dauſquius, Canon of Tournay, wrote againſt this wild notion; and declared, among other particulars, that Carthagena wreſted, in a very raſh manner, the ſenſe of the Scriptures. Palam in oculis Eccleſiæ Romanæ præcipiti temeritate in ſacras literas involavit, eaſque obtorto collo in affectatæ novitatis patrocinium interpretando contra Concilii Tridentini edicta depravavit (8). i. e. "He publickly, in preſence of "the Church of Rome, ſeized with raſh hands the "ſacred writings; and interpreting them contrary to "the Decrees of the Council of Trent, corrupted and "wreſted them to patronize the novel tenets he affected to advance." A Flemiſh Franciſcan took pet at this, and publiſhed a book againſt this Canon; who made a reply in as furious terms as his adverſary. This doctrine of Carthagena is ſeen in his Homiliæ ſacræ, cum Catholicæ tum Morales de Religionis Chriſtianæ arcanis. If the judgment of Dauſquius on this work may be relied on, it conſiſts of a mere rhapſody of words, diſplayed in high flown words (9). Iſta incurioſa curioſitate victus Carthagena volumina iſta, quibus orbis cymbalum audire meruit (an etiam voluit) inſcribit De Religionis Chriſtianæ Arcanis. Quia ſcilicet arcano quodcunque Moſes volumine clauſit, & de Arcanis Catholicæ Veritatis quæcunque Galatinus compilavit veritate, diligentia, immanitate ſuperavit Carthagena (10). i. e. "Carthagena vanquiſhed by that incurious curio- "ſity, entitled thoſe Books, by which he merited (nay "deſired) to be called the Drum of the World, de Reli- "gionis Chriſtianæ Arcanis, (of the Myſteries of the Chriſtian

(8) See the Treatiſe of Dauſquius, S. Joſephi Sanctificatio extra uterum, pag. 82.

(9) In illa voluminum Carthagenæ immanitate verboſiſſima (cui loquacitate cedit unicus ſcriptor ab omni ævo) Cenſores &c. Dauſquius, in S. Joſephi Sanct. extra uterum, pag. 109.
(10) Ibid. pag. 116.

I ſhall give ſome ſpecimens of his manner of thinking in the laſt remark.

" Chriſtian Religion). For Carthagena exceeded in a " monſtrous extravagancy, whatever Moſes included " in his volume of Myſteries; or what Galatinus had " compiled with fidelity and care, in his work on the " Secrets and Myſteries of the Catholic Truth." There is a treatiſe in the volumes in queſtion, entitled, Arcana Deiparæ, ac Joſephi Myſteria, i. e. " The Se- " crets of the Virgin Mary, and the Myſteries of Jo- " ſeph." The Author gives us therein a relation that is equally rude and impertinent (11); viz. that St. Joſeph may be rank'd among the Martyrs, becauſe the jealouſy, which tortur'd his ſoul, when he took notice, from time to time, of his wife's increaſing pregnancy, was an inſupportable torment. Cum ergo B. Joſeph immani zelotypiæ dolore angeretur, neque levamen hoc quod ei adſumere licebat, quæritaret, Evangeliſta dicente, cum eſſet juſtus, noluit eam traducere, conſequens eſt cor ejus graviſſimo doloris vulnere fuiſſe exulceratum. . . Profecto hujuſmodi perplexitas & pluſquam civile bellum inter ſenſum & rationem, non poterat non immaniter viſcera Joſephi diſrumpere & excarnificare . . cogitatio illa non potuit non eſſe illi grave martyrii genus (12). He corroborates his thought by the authority of Solomon. Cum zelotypicus amor ſit, ut ait Solomon, dura ſicut infernus æmulatio, non poteras non vehementer & abſque ulla interruptione Joſephi cor tranſverſari, ſicut & infernus ſummopere torquet, & nec per momentum excruciare ceſſat (13). i. e. " Since the paſſion " of jealouſy, as Solomon obſerves, is grievous as hell, " it was impoſſible but Joſeph's heart muſt be vio- " lently and inceſſantly transfixed; as hell tortures to " an exceſſive degree, and is every moment torturing." How are our myſteries expoſed by ſuch aſſertions, and what a door is opened to profane raillery, when writers preſume to make ſuch martyrdoms as theſe! The Canon of Tournay had great reaſon to inveigh againſt ſuch wild fancies, and give them the name of Blaſphemies. Senſus virgineum uterum intumeſcentem videns adulteram judicabat. Theſe are Carthagena's words, and here follow thoſe of the Canon (14). Joſephus Chryſoſtomi teſtificatione cavebat vel minimam Virgini afferre moleſtiam, & tu dicis Joſephum eam adulteram judicaſſe. Impiè. Ac ſi dicat, Manifeſtaque crimina pleno Fert utero. i. e. " Joſeph, accord- " ing to the teſtimony of St. Chryſoſtom, was care- " ful not to give the Virgin the leaſt uneaſineſs; and " you ſay, that Joſeph imagined her to be an adul- " tereſs. How impious is this! as tho' he ſhould ſay, " Her ſwelling womb ſhews her guilt evidently."

(11) Dauſquius, ibid. pag. 119. calls it Blaſphemia propudioſa, i. e. " A filthy " Blaſphemy."

(12) Tom. 2. lib. 4. Homil. 3. pag. 123. num. cæterum, apud Dauſquium, ibid.

(14) Ibid. pag. 122.

(15) Apud Dauſquium, pag. 121.

A Profeſſor of Louvain reap'd very little benefit from theſe judicious reflections made by the Canon of Tournay. " He one day roſe to the higheſt ex- " ceſſes of impiety and impudence united; for, ex- " plaining St. Joſeph's uneaſineſs; and attempting to " give a reaſon, why he had thoughts of abandoning " the bleſſed Virgin, he ſaid, that it was becauſe this " great Saint was afraid to paſs for a C . . . timebat " vocari C . . .; modeſty will not allow me to write, " what this man was not aſhamed of ſpeaking before " a numerous auditory." Theſe are the very words I have extracted from a book printed at Colen, in 1685, entitled the Hiſtory of the Intruſion of the Sieur du Bois, into the Scripture-Profeſſor's Chair, in the Univerſity of Louvain; and the manner of his exerciſing that employment, with reflections on the cauſes of the credit and reputation he enjoys.

☞CASAUBON (ISAAC), a learned writer in the beginning of the ſeventeenth Century, was born at Geneva February the 18th 1559 [A]. His father's name was Arnold Caſaubon, and his mother's Jane Roſſeau, who both retired to Geneva on account of the perſecution for Religion. Our Author was educated at Creſt, a ſmall town in Dauphiné, whither his father was invited to be Miniſter, after the perſecution ceaſed (a). He ſtudied under the direction of his father till he was nineteen years of age [B]; when he was ſent to Geneva to continue his ſtudies (b). He made a great progreſs in the Greek tongue under Francis Portus of the Iſle of Candy, who was Profeſſor of that language, and whom he ſucceeded in the year 1582, when he was but twenty three years old. In 1583 he publiſhed his notes on Diogenes Laertius [C], which he dedicated to his father, and the year following his Lectures upon Theocritus [D], which he dedicated to Henry Stephens the Printer at Geneva, whoſe daughter he married April the 28th 1586. This probably is what gave occaſion to his enemies to aſſert, that he had ſpent his youth in correcting the proofs of this Printer, which is falſe, though no blemiſh to

(a) Bernard, Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, Mois du Juillet 1710, Art. 1. pag. 5, 6. and Niceron, Memoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſtoire des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 18. pag. 118. edit. de Paris 1732.

(b) Bernard, pag. 6. and Niceron, pag. 119.

[A] Born at Geneva February 18*th* 1559.] This appears from his 879th Letter in Mr. Theodore Janſon ab Almeloveen's edition of his Letters printed at Rotterdam 1709 in folio; which Letter is addreſſed to John Prideaux. And therefore Moreri is extremely miſtaken in aſſerting that he was born at Bourdeaux, a village in Dauphiné. His father indeed was a native of that place, and this might occaſion the confounding him with his ſon.

[B] He ſtudied under the direction of his father till he was nineteen years of age.] The vivacity of his genius, and the happy diſpoſition, which he ſhewed to learning, even from his infancy, occaſioned him to apply himſelf to it very early; and he made ſo quick a progreſs in it with his father's aſſiſtance, who was his only Preceptor, that at nine years of age he was able to ſpeak and write Latin with great eaſe and correctneſs. But his father's engagements obliging him to be almoſt always abſent from home for three years, he forgot entirely all that he had learn'd of him, and was obliged at twelve years of age to begin his ſtudies again, which he did with an incredible ardour, and almoſt by himſelf, his father's frequent abſence not permitting him to inſtruct him but at intervals. But as this method could not carry him any great length, he was ſent in 1578 to Geneva, to proſecute his ſtudies under the Profeſſors, who taught there. And his indefatigable application ſoon made him recover the time, which he had loſt before (1).

(1) Niceron, Memoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſtoire des Hommes illuſtres, tom. 18. pag. 118, 119. edit de Paris 1732.

[C] In 1583 he publiſhed his Notes on Diogenes Laertius.] They were printed Morgiis 1583 in 8vo under the following title: In Diogenem Laertium Notæ Iſaaci Hortiboni. He wrote theſe Notes at twenty five years of age, and had a deſign to enlarge them very much afterwards; but other employments prevented him. He dedicated them to his father, who commended him indeed for his pains, but told him, that he ſhould value one remark upon the ſacred books more than all the works, which he promiſed with regard to profane writers. After that he applied himſelf in good earneſt to thoſe ſtudies, which had ſome relation to Religion, and wrote ſome Notes on the New Teſtament. When Henry Stephens, his father-in-law, publiſhed an edition of Diogenes Laertius in 1594 in 8vo, he added the Notes of our Author, which have been ſince inſerted in all the editions of Laertius. Caſaubon took the name of Hortibonus, which ſignifies the ſame thing as Caſaubonus, becauſe Caſau in Dauphiné means a Garden; ſo that Ravius has made a pleaſant miſtake in his manuſcript Notes upon Geſner's Bibliotheca, where he treats Caſaubon as a plagiary from Hortibonus, as Placcius obſerves in his Book de Pſeudonymis (2).

(2) Idem, pag. 133, 134.

[D] His Lectures upon Theocritus.] They were publiſh'd at Geneva 1584 in 12mo under the following title; Iſaaci Hortiboni Lectiones Theocriticæ; in the edition of this Author by John Criſpinus. Theſe Notes, which have been reprinted ſeveral times ſince, were publiſhed likewiſe under the name of Hortibonus, which Caſaubon preferred to his own, as more ſuitable to a Latin Book. He dedicated theſe Lectures to Henry Stephens, whoſe daughter he married two years after (3).

(3) Idem, pag. 134, 135.

to his reputation, if it had been true. In 1587 he publiſhed his Strabo at Geneva [E], and the ſame year his edition of the New Teſtament with Notes [F]. He ſtudied Philoſophy and Civil Law under Julius Pacius, and applied him likewiſe to the Oriental Languages and Rabbins (c). Soon after this he publiſhed his Notes upon Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus [G], and an edition of Polyænus's Stratagems [H], and had a ſhare in that of Dicæarchus [I]. In 1590 he publiſhed an edition of Ariſtotle in Greek and Latin [K], and in 1591 an edition of Pliny's Letters with Notes, and the antient Latin Panegyrics [L]. Some time after this he fell into great trouble, of which he complains extremely in his Letters, by being ſurety in a great ſum for Mr. Wotton an Engliſhman, which he was obliged to pay. This ſtraitened him, till he was reimburſed by the care of his friends, and particularly of Joſeph Scaliger, about a year after (d). He publiſhed his edition on Theophraſtus's Characters in 1592 [M], and Apuleius's Apology in 1594 [N], and his Commentary upon Suetonius in 1595 [O]. In the mean time he was not eaſy at Geneva, either becauſe he could not pleaſe Henry Stephens his father-in-law, a moroſe and peeviſh man, or had not a ſufficient ſubſiſtence, or becauſe he was himſelf of an unſettled temper (e). He therefore accepted the place of Profeſſor of the Greek Tongue and Polite Learning, which was offered him at Montpellier [P], and was highly eſteemed and followed there, and ſeemed well contented with his ſituation. But this did not laſt long, for what had been promiſed him was not performed, and his ſalary was not duly paid; and in ſhort he was ſo uneaſy, that he ſays in one of his Letters, that he was juſt about returning to Geneva (f). In 1598 he went to Lyons on account of his edition of Athenæus [Q]. He lodged there at the houſe of Mery de Vicque, a man of conſiderable

(c) Bernard, pag. 7. and Niceron, pag. 121.

(d) Bernard, pag. 8.

(e) Idem, pag. 9. and Niceron, pag. 121.

(f) Bernard, pag. 10. and Niceron, pag. 122.

[E] In 1587 he publiſhed his Strabo at Geneva.] It was printed in folio under the following title: Strabonis Geographiæ Libri XVII. Græce & Latine, ex Guil. Xylandri Interpretatione, edente cum Commentariis Iſaaco Caſaubono. Our Author's Commentaries were publiſhed with Additions in the edition of Strabo at Paris 1620 in fol. and have been inſerted in all the editions ſince (4).

(4) Idem, pag. 135.

[F] His edition of the New Teſtament with Notes.] It was printed at Geneva 1587 in 16mo with this title: Novum Teſtamentum Græcum cum Notis Iſaaci Caſauboni in quatuor Evangelia & Actus Apoſtolorum. Theſe Notes of our Author are inſerted in the Critici Sacri.

[G] His Notes upon Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus.] Animadverſiones in Dionyſium Halicarnaſſenſem, and were printed in the edition of that Author, which he publiſhed at Geneva 1588 in fol. with the Tranſlation of Æmilius Portus. This edition is not taken notice of by Fabricius in his Bibliotheca Græca. Theſe are not very conſiderable, becauſe Caſaubon did not put his laſt hand to them, and was too precipitate in the publication of them (5).

(5) Idem, pag. 135, 136.

[H] An edition of Polyænus's Stratagems.] It was printed at Lyons 1589 in 16mo under the following title: Polyæni Stratagematum Libri VIII. Græcè & Latinè, edente cum Notis Iſaaco Caſaubono. Caſaubon was the firſt who publiſhed the Greek Text of this Author. But the Tranſlation is not his own, as is erroneouſly aſſerted in the Bibliotheca Curioſa of Hallervoord; but was done by Juſtus Vultejus, who publiſh'd it in 1550 in 8vo.

[I] Had a ſhare in that of Dicæarchus.] It was printed at Geneva 1589 in 8vo and entitled, Dicæarchi Geographica quædam, ſive de Vitâ Græciæ; ejuſdem Deſcriptio Græciæ verſibus Græcis iambicis ad Theophraſtum; cum Iſaaci Caſauboni & Henrici Stephani Notis.

[K] In 1590 he publiſh'd an edition of Ariſtotle in Greek and Latin.] It was printed at Lyons in fol. under the following title: Ariſtotelis Opera, Græcè, cum variorum Interpretatione Latinâ, & variis Lectionibus & Caſtigationibus Iſaaci Caſauboni. It was reprinted at Geneva 1605 in fol. Theſe Notes are only marginal ones, and Caſaubon tells us, that he wrote them in the intervals of his other engagements.

[L] An edition of Pliny's Letters with Notes, and the antient Latin Panegyrics.] It was printed at Geneva 1591 in 12mo under the following title: Plinii Epiſtolarum Libri IX. & ejuſdem, Pacati, Mamertini, Nazarii, Eumenii, Auſonii, ac Claudiani Panegyrici, cum Iſaaci Caſauboni Notis in Epiſtolas. This edition was reprinted at Geneva in 1599, 1605, and 1611 in 12mo.

[M] His edition of Theophraſtus's Characters.] It was publiſhed at Lyons 1592 in 12mo, under this title; Theophraſti Characteres Ethici Græcè & Latinè ex verſione & cum Commentario Iſaaci Caſauboni. The third edition was printed at Lyons in 1612 in 12mo. This third edition is more correct than the former, Caſaubon having reviſed his Tranſlation, being excited to it by a Greek, whoſe name was Furlanus, who had laboured upon the ſame Author, and whoſe work was very contemptible. Caſaubon's edition of Theophraſtus is highly eſteemed ſtill, and it is one of the works, which have procured him the moſt reputation. Joſeph Scaliger in his Letter to him dated at Leyden May 1594 (6) tells him, that when he read this edition of Theophraſtus, he was ſo highly pleaſed with it, that he was even tranſported with joy, and could not refrain from ſpeaking of him all that Caſaubon's merits and his own regard for him required; tho' whatever he could ſay, would be below his deſert. Quum primum mihi ſalivam moviſſent Theophraſtei Characteres tui, dicam ſerio, de poteſtate mei exivi, neque me continere potui, quin ea de te prædicarem, quæ & meritum tuum & amor meus poſtulabant; quanquam quicquid de te dixero, omne infrà virtutes ingenii tui fuerit. And the ſame Writer in the Scaligerana, ſive excerpta ex ore Joſephi Scaligeri per F. F. P. P. tells us (7), that our Author's edition of Theophraſtus and Athenæus are excellent ones.

(6) See Scaliger's Epiſtol. 35. lib. 1. pag. 131. edit. Francofurti 1628 in 8vo.

(7) Pag. 64. edit. Genevæ 1666.

[N] And Apuleius's Apology in 1594.] It was printed by Commeline in 4to under this title: L. Apuleii Apologia, cum Iſaaci Caſauboni Caſtigationibus. Father Niceron tells us (8), that he ſhews by this edition, that he was no leſs an able Critic in Latin, than he had before ſhewn himſelf in Greek. He dedicated it to Joſeph Scaliger, who had then contracted a ſtrict friendſhip with him, and highly approved his works, tho' he was uſed to commend but a very few perſons.

(8) Pag. 137.

[O] And his Commentary on Suetonius in 1596.] It was printed at Geneva 1596 in 4to, under the following title: C. Suetonii Tranquilli Opera, cum Iſaaci Caſauboni Animadverſionibus. This work was ſo well received, that it was reprinted the year following with ſome additions by him. Another edition enlarged and corrected was printed at Paris 1610 in fol.

[P] He therefore accepted the place of Profeſſor of the Greek Tongue and polite Learning, which was offered him at Montpellier.] A greater ſalary was promiſed him than he enjoyed at Geneva. He was a long while in ſuſpenſe whether he ſhould accept this offer, but at laſt was prevailed upon by the ſollicitations of Philip de Canaye, Lord of Freſne, and of William Ranchin, a famous Profeſſor of Civil Law at Montpellier (9). He removed thither in the latter end of the year 1596, and entered upon the exerciſe of his Profeſſorſhip in Feb. the year following (10). About the ſame time the city of Niſmes gave him an invitation to reſtore their Univerſity, but he refuſed it. It is ſaid likewiſe, that the Univerſity of Franeker had then alſo ſome thoughts of ſending for him; but this is not certain (11).

(9) Bernard, Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, July 1710, Art. 1. pag. 9.

(10) Niceron, ubi ſupra, pag. 122.

(11) Bernard, ubi ſupra, and Niceron, ubi ſupra.

[Q] His edition of Athenæus.] It was printed at Lyons 1600 in two volumes in fol. under the following conſiderable fortune, who being a great favourer of men of learning, carried him with him to Paris, where he was introduced into the acquaintance of the firſt Preſident du Harlay, the Preſident de Thou, Monſieur Gillot, and Nicholas le Fevre. Henry IV of France being informed of his merit would have him leave Montpellier for a Profeſſorſhip at Paris. He was for ſome time in ſuſpence what courſe to take, and returned to Montpellier, where he received a letter from the King dated January the 3d 1599, by which he was ſent for to Paris, and ſet out for that city February the 26th the ſame year. Being come to Lyons, his friend Monſieur de Vicque obliged him to ſtay there, at leaſt till the King ſhould come thither, eſpecially becauſe his edition of Athenæus, which went on but very ſlowly, ſtood in need of his preſence. Some domeſtic affairs obliged him to go to Geneva, where he complains that juſtice was not done him with regard to the eſtate of his father-in-law. Upon his return to Lyons, having tarried a long time in vain for the King's arrival there, after a ſecond journey to Geneva, he went at laſt to Paris, though he foreſaw, as de Vicque and Joſeph Scaliger foretold him, that he would not have all the ſatisfaction there, which at firſt he expected; not that Henry IV did not receive him with great civility, but the jealouſy of ſome other Profeſſors, and eſpecially his being a Proteſtant, occaſioned him great trouble (g). Some time after he was appointed one of the Judges in the Conference between James-Davy du Perron, Biſhop of Evreux, afterwards Cardinal, and the famous Philip du Pleſſis-Mornay [R]. Upon his return to Paris he met with ſome chicanry, with reſpect to his ſalary and the expences which he was at in removing with his family to Paris, becauſe the Marquis de Roſny, the King's Treaſurer, was not his friend; ſo that he was obliged to procure an expreſs order from Henry IV for the payment of three hundred crowns (h). He returned May the 30th 1600 to Lyons to haſten the impreſſion of his Athenæus (i), and had there a quarrel with his friend de Vicque, becauſe he would not go with him to Swiſſerland [S], whither the latter was ſent by the King. He returned to Paris with his wife and children in September following, and was very well received by the King and by a great many perſons of diſtinction (k). He read no public Lectures, but only private ones, and at the ſame time publiſhed ſeveral works of the Antients [T]. He ſtudied Arabic, and made ſuch a progreſs in it, that he undertook the compiling a Dictionary, and tranſlated ſome books of that Language into Latin. He tells us himſelf, that in 1601 he was obliged againſt his will to write to James VI King of Scotland, afterwards King of England, but he does not mention the reaſons of it. That Prince anſwered him with great civility, which obliged our Author to write to him a ſecond time (l). Henry IV augmented his ſalary, and appointed (g) Bernard, pag. 10, 11. and Niceron, pag. 122, 123, 124.

(h) Bernard, pag. 13. and Niceron, pag. 125.

(i) Mr. Bernard pag. 13. erroneouſly ſays his Polybius.

(k) Bernard, pag. 13. and Niceron, pag. 126.

(l) Bernard, pag. 14.

lowing title; Athenæi Deipnoſophiſtarum Libri XV. Græcè & Latinè, Interprete Jacobo Dalechampio; cum Iſaaci Caſauboni Animadverſionum Libris XV. It was reprinted likewiſe in the ſame city in 1612 in two volumes in fol. Caſaubon's Notes are contained in the ſecond volume.

[R] Appointed one of the Judges in the conference between James Davy du Perron, Biſhop of Evreux, afterwards Cardinal, and the famous Philip du Pleſſis-Mornay.] The conference was held at Fontainebleau May the 4th 1600. It was deſigned, that there ſhould have been ſeveral ſittings; but the indiſpoſition of du Pleſſis-Mornay put an end to it at one (12). As our Author was not favourable to the latter, who, if we may believe the Hiſtorians of that time, did not acquit himſelf to great advantage in that conference, it was reported, that Caſaubon would ſoon change his Religion. Mr. Bernard tells us (13), that there were two things, which increaſed this ſuſpicion; one was, that Philip de Canaye, his great friend, went over to the Roman Catholics; the other was, that his own ſon John did the like. But we may obſerve with regard to the latter inſtance, that his ſon did not change his religion till about ten years afterwards, as appears from Mr. Bernard's own account (14); and conſequently this could not poſſibly encreaſe the ſuſpicion of our Author's diſpoſition to turn Roman Catholic then. Mr. Bernard remarks (15), that he cleared himſelf of theſe accuſations in ſeveral of his Letters; and the conſequences ſhewed, that either theſe ſuſpicions were falſe, or that if he was under any temptation to change his Religion, he had ſtrength enough to reſiſt it. However it is certain, that he was not in all points of the opinion of the Reformed Church; and he declared, that with reſpect to the Sacraments the Fathers of the Church believed ſomething more than the Reformers, as appears by his 670th letter addreſſed to Utenbogard, and by his 1043d to Tilenus (16). But however that matter was, Mr. Almeloveen in his life of him gives a large account of what paſſed at the conference of Fontainbleau, in order to ſhew, that thoſe were in the wrong, who accuſed Caſaubon of favouring du Perron on that occaſion.

(12) Niceron, pag. 124, 125.

(13) Ubi ſupra, pag. 12.

(14) Pag. 17. See likewiſe Niceron, pag. 129.

(15) Pag. 12.

(16) Idem, ibid.

[S] Had there a quarrel with his friend de Vicque, becauſe he would not go with him to Swiſſerland.] The reaſon of this refuſal was, that he was under ſome apprehenſions leſt he might loſe the place of Library-keeper to the King, which had been promiſed him, and which it was probable would be ſoon vacant, the perſon, who enjoyed it, being greatly indiſpoſed. Nor was he diſappointed in his expectations of it (17).

(17) Niceron, pag. 126.

[T] At the ſame time he publiſhed ſeveral works of the Antients.] We ſhall give ſome account of them. Hiſtoriæ Auguſtæ Scriptores cum Commentario Iſaaci Caſauboni. Paris 1603 in 4to; and likewiſe with the Commentaries of Salmaſius upon the ſame Authors at Paris 1620 in fol. and Leyden 1670 in two volumes in 8vo. Diatriba ad Dionis Chryſoſtomi Orationes, publiſhed in the Edition of that Author by Frederic Morel at Paris 1604 in fol. Perſii Satyræ ex recenſione & cum Commentariis Iſaaci Caſauboni. Paris 1605 in 8vo. and London 1647 in 8vo. The notes, which accompany the text of Perſius, were the lectures, which he had formerly read at Geneva. They were enlarged in the edition of 1647. Joſeph Scaliger ſays, that in this edition of Perſius the ſauce is worth more than the fiſh. Au Perſe de Caſaubon la ſaulce vaut mieux que le poiſſon (18). De Satyricâ Græcorum Poeſi, & Romanorum Satyrâ Libri duo. Paris 1605 in 8vo. Our Author aſſerts in this work, that the Satyrical Poetry of the Latins was very different from that of the Greeks. This opinion was attacked by Daniel Heinſius in his two books De Satyrâ Horatianâ, printed at Leyden 1629 in 12mo. Ezechiel Spanheim in the Preface to his tranſlation of the Emperor Julian's Cæſars, having examined the arguments of theſe two learned men, declares for Caſaubon's opinion. Crenius has inſerted our Author's treatiſe in his Muſæum Philologicum & Hiſtoricum, printed at Leyden 1699 in 8vo, together with the following piece, Cyclops Euripidis Latinitate donata a Q. Septimio Florente. Caſaubon, who publiſhed this tranſlation, ſubjoined it to his treatiſe de Satyricâ Poeſi, &c. Gregorii Nyſſeni Epiſtola ad Euſtathiam, Ambroſiam, & Baſiliſſam, Græcè & Latinè cum Notis Is. Caſauboni. Paris 1606 in 8vo. and Hanaw 1611 in 8vo. He was the firſt, who publiſhed this letter.

(18) Scaligeriana, pag. 64. edit. Genevæ 1666.

pointed him his Library-Keeper in the latter end of the year 1603 [U]. The ſame year he took a journey to Dauphiné to ſee his mother, and to Geneva about his private affairs. He was frequently and ſtrongly ſollicited by his friends of the Roman Catholic Religion to abandon the Proteſtant Faith; but in vain [W]. The Magiſtrates of Niſmes gave him a ſecond invitation to their City, offering him an houſe and a ſalary of 600 crowns of gold per ann. but he durſt not accept it for fear of diſpleaſing the King (m). The famous diſputes between Pope Paul V and the Republic of Venice occaſioned him to write a Treatiſe on Eccleſiaſtical Liberty [X]. In 1609 he publiſhed at Paris his edition of Polybius in fol. [Y]. The year following there happened two things, which proved a great affliction to him; the death of Henry IV, which deſtroyed all his hopes of keeping his place, and his ſon John's changing his Religion; and this latter circumſtance gave him the greater uneaſineſs, becauſe a report was ſpread that he himſelf had charged George Stranchan, an Engliſhman, who taught his ſon the Mathematics, to inſtruct him at the ſame time in the Popiſh Religion (n). Mr. Almeloveen in his Life of our Author, clears him of all theſe imputations, and ſhews that Caſaubon lamented a long while his ſon's change. The ſame year having obtained leave of the Queen of France, he went over to England with Sir Henry Wotton, Embaſſador Extraordinary from James I (o), where he was extremely well received [Z], and engaged in writing a confutation of Baronius's

(m) Bernard, pag. 15. and Niceron, pag. 128.

(n) Bernard, pag. 17, 18. and Niceron, pag. 129.

(o) Bernard, pag. 18. and Niceron, pag. 129.

[V] Augmented his ſalary, and appointed him his Library-Keeper in the latter end of the year 1603.] The King added two hundred crowns to his ſalary, and nominated him to ſucceed John Goſſelin his Library-Keeper, a great Mathematician, but a man of a very odd temper, who would not let Caſaubon have the uſe of the Books in the King's Library as often as he deſired. Our Author entered upon this new office in the latter end of the year 1603, when Goſſelin, who was very old, having been left near a fire by his ſervant, fell into it, and was burnt (19).

(19) Bernard, pag. 14. and Niceron, pag. 127.

[W] He was frequently and ſtrongly ſollicited by his friends of the Roman Catholic Religion to abandon the Proteſtant Faith; but in vain.] About the year 1604 he was obliged to ſuſtain ſome attacks from the Jeſuits and Cardinal du Perron, concerning Religion. It happened that he had a diſpute with the latter at a feaſt, to which he had been invited. This occaſioned a report, that he promiſed there to turn Papiſt; which obliged him to write a letter to the Cardinal, which the Miniſters of Charenton thought fit to publiſh, in order to confute thoſe falſe rumours (20). It appears from his 348th letter of Mr. Almeloveen's edition, that Monſr. du Freſne, after he had embraced the Roman Catholic Religion, ſollicited Caſaubon to do the like; to which he anſwered, that he would always remember their antient friendſhip and the obligations, which he had to him, but could not do what he deſired of him, and far leſs follow his example. He deſired him earneſtly not to impute his refuſal to obſtinacy, but rather to ſincerity, and to the reſolution, which he had of maintaining thoſe opinions, which he knew to be true, and of which he was fully perſuaded. And in his 319th letter directed to Mr. du Pleſſis he clears himſelf of the ſuſpicions, which were ſpread abroad concerning him, that he was about to change his Religion. In 1609 he had a conference with Cardinal du Perron concerning Religion by the King's Order, in order to prevail upon him to embrace the Popiſh Religion. And it was then given out that he wavered on that head (21).

(20) Bernard, pag. 15. and Niceron, pag. 128.

(21) Bernard, pag. 16. and Niceron, pag. 128, 129.

[X] Occaſioned him to write a Treatiſe on Eccleſiaſtical Liberty.] It was entitled, De Libertate Eccleſiaſticâ Liber. 1607 in 8vo. pagg. 264. In this treatiſe he defended the rights of God and Sovereigns againſt the pretenſions of Rome. But when the differences between the Pope and the Venetians were determined, the King ordered it to be ſuppreſſed before it was printed, or perhaps before it was finiſhed†. But becauſe the Author had ſent ſome ſheets of it to ſeveral of his friends, as they were printed, the work could not be entirely ſuppreſſed. It is ſaid likewiſe, that there are two or three editions of that fragment. It is certain that Melchior Goldaſt inſerted it in his Collectanea de Monarchia S. Imperii, tom. 1. pag. 674. and Almeloveen reprinted this fragment in his edition of Caſaubon's Letters (22).

† Bernard, pag. 16. and Guil. Camdeni & illuſt. Viror. ad G. Camden. Epiſtol. pag. 99.

(22) Bernard, pag. 15, 16. and Niceron, pag. 140, 141.

[Y] In 1609 he publiſhed at Paris his edition of Polybius in fol.] It was publiſhed under the following title: Polybii Opera Græcè & Latinè ex Verſione Iſaaci Caſauboni. Accedit Æneas Tacticus de tolerandâ Obſidione. Græcè & Latinè. It was reprinted at Hanaw from the Paris Edition in 1609 in fol. It is dedicated to King Henry IV, and the dedication is eſteemed a maſter-piece of the kind. Our Author had a talent for pieces of that nature as well as for Prefaces. In the former he praiſes without any low ſervility, and in a manner, which appears very remote from flattery; and in the latter he ſhews the deſign and merit of his works without oſtentation, and with an air of modeſty. He may ſerve as a model for pieces of this kind, which ought ſo much the leſs to be neglected, as they firſt offer themſelves to the Reader's view, and are deſigned to prejudice him in favour of the book itſelf (23). Caſaubon made the tranſlation of Polybius and Æneas Tacticus; and had a deſign to have added a Commentary upon the whole; but his death prevented him from executing it, and we have only a ſmall part of that work, printed after his death at Paris in 1617 in 8vo, under this title, Ad Polybii Hiſtoriarum Librum primum Commentarius. Our Author expected to have received a conſiderable preſent from the King for the dedication of his Polybius; but his Religion, as he informs us himſelf, prevented him from receiving any thing, to which Mr. Bernard adds (24), that Henry IV, who was no great ſcholar, did not know the value of the preſent. Huetius, afterwards Biſhop of Avranches, in his Treatiſe de optimo interpretandi genere (25) tells us, that Thuanus and Fronto-Ducæus the Jeſuit highly extolled our Author's induſtry in his Edition of Polybius; and that both of them were ſo pleaſed with his manner of tranſlating that writer, that they believed it was not eaſy to determine whether Caſaubon had tranſlated Polybius, or Polybius Caſaubon. Caſauboni in excolendo Polybio induſtriam Auguſtus Thuanus & Fronto-Ducæus ſummoperè extulerunt: ea verò utrique potiſſimum placuit interpretandi ratio, quam hoc opere tranſferendo tenuiſſet, ut non facile dici poſſe crederent, Polybiumne Caſaubonus, an Caſaubonum Polybius convertiſſet.

(23) Niceron, pag. 142.

(24) Pag. 17.

(25) Apud Blount, Cenſur. Celebrior. Authorum, pag. 884. edit. Genevæ in 4to, 1694.

[Z] Where he was extremely well received.] He met with the utmoſt civilities from all the men of learning and diſtinction there. He ſaw the King, and had the honour of eating with him ſeveral times. He received a preſent from him of 1000 French livres, becauſe the King knew, that he was to viſit the Univerſities of Oxford and Cambridge. He afterwards gave him two Prebends, one at Canterbury, and the other at Weſtminſter, with a ſalary of 2000 French livres. That Prince wrote at the ſame time to the Queen of France to give Caſaubon leave to ſtay longer in England than was at firſt allowed him (26). However in his 1056th letter of Mr. Almeloveen's Edition he complains, that he was more inſulted at London than he had ever been at Paris in the midſt of the Papiſts; that ſtones were thrown at his windows night and day; that he received a great wound as he went to Court; that his children were affronted in the ſtreets; and that he and his family were ſometimes purſued with ſtones. Mr. Bernard (27) tells us, that this was perhaps occaſioned by the hatred, which the common people bear to ſtrangers, and by ſeeing them dreſſed in a manner different from

(26) Bernard, pag. 18. and Niceron, pag. 130.

(27) Pag. 27.

ronius's Annals [AA]. His Exercitations upon them were finiſhed in eighteen months in the beginning of the year 1614 (p). He did not live long after this, for he died the firſt of July the ſame year in the fifty fifth year of his age. It was found after his death that he had a double bladder (q). He was interred in Weſtminſter-Abbey, where a monument was erected to him [BB]. He had ſeveral children by his wife Florence, the daughter of Henry Stephens [CC]. We ſhall give an account of the reſt of his works in the note [DD]. He received the higheſt elogiums from all the Men of Letters, who were (p) Bernard, pag. 20.

(q) Idem, ibid. and Niceron, pag. 130. See Dr. Raphael Thorius's Epiſtola de Iſaaci Caſauboni Morbi Mortiſque Cauſâ. Printed with our Author's Letters.

from that of the country. But the writers of the Hiſtory of the works of the Learned for September 1710 (28) obſerve, that this never ordinarily happens in London, where there is always a great concourſe of ſtrangers; ſo that it muſt have proceeded from ſome other cauſe.

(28) Pag. 599. edit. London in 4to.

[AA] Engaged in writing a confutation of Baronius's Annals.] A little time after he went to England, Peter du Moulin wrote to Dr. James Montague, Biſhop of Bath and Wells, to inform him, that Caſaubon had a great inclination to Popery; that there were only a very few Articles, which kept him among the Proteſtants; and that if he returned to France he would change his Religion, as he had promiſed; which would be the occaſion of great ſcandal and prejudice to the Proteſtants. He therefore deſired him to endeavour to keep him in England, and to engage him in writing againſt the Annals of Baronius, ſince he knew that he had materials ready for that ſubject. Mr. Bernard tells us (29), that he does not know whether this letter did the buſineſs; but that it is certain, that King James I engaged him to write the book, which he publiſhed againſt the Annals of Baronius, and which was entitled, Exercitationes contra Baronium, London 1614 in fol. Francfort 1615 in 4to. Geneva 1655 and 1663 in 4to. Some learned men are of opinion, ſays Mr. Bernard (30), that he has pulled down the pinnacles of that great building of Baronius; but that it is certain, that Caſaubon would have done more ſervice to the Commonwealth of learning, if he had been allowed to continue his labours upon profane Authors. And Father Niceron obſerves (31), that he was not equal to ſuch a work, becauſe he had not ſufficiently ſtudied Divinity, Chronology, or Hiſtory, and was not converſant enough in the Fathers; ſo that he is ſaid to have committed more errors than Baronius in a leſs compaſs. Our Author in his 1059 Letter directed to Dr. Richard Montague, afterwards Biſhop of Norwich (32), complains extremely that this Divine had undertaken to write againſt Baronius at the ſame time with himſelf; and threatens to complain of him to the King, who had commanded him to write againſt that Cardinal. He tells him, that he had been engaged a long time upon that ſubject; and that as he was the firſt, Dr. Montague ought not to interfere with him. This, ſay the Authors of the Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned (33), ſhews Caſaubon to have been a ſelfiſh, peeviſh man, and might occaſion his being hated by the people.

(29) Pag. 19.

(30) Ibid.

(31) Pag. 145.

(32) Mr. Bernard, pag. 27. erroneouſly ſays, Bath and Wells.

(33) September 1710, pag. 599.

[BB] Interred in Weſtminſter-Abbey, where a monument was erected to him.] The Epitaph upon it is as follows:

Iſaacus Caſaubonus:
(O Doctiorum quicquid eſt aſſurgite
Huic tam colendo Nomini,)

Quem Gallia Reip. Litterariæ bono peperit; Henricus IV Francorum Rex invictiſſimus Lutetiam litteris ſuis evocatum Bibliothecæ ſuæ præfecit; charumque deinceps dum vixit habuit; eoque terris erepto Jacobus Magn. Britan. Monarcha, Regum Doctiſſimus, doctis indulgentiſſimus, in Angliam accivit, munificè fovit, poſteritaſque ob doctrinam mirabitur. H. S. E. invidiâ major. Obiit æternam in Chriſto vitam anhelans Cal. Julii 1614. Ætat. 55. Viro opt. immortalitate digniſs. Thom. Mortonus Epiſcopus Dunelmenſis jucundiſſimæ quoad frui licuit conſuetudinis memor. Pr. S. P. Cu. 1631.

Qui noſſe vult Caſaubonum,
Non ſaxa, ſed Chartas legat,
Superfuturas Marmori,
Et profuturas poſteris.

[CC] He had ſeveral children by his wife, Florence, the daughter of Henry Stephens.] His eldeſt ſon John embraced the Roman Catholic Religion, as we have obſerved. We ſhall give an account of Meric in the next article. Another of his ſons, whoſe name was Auguſtin, having turned Papiſt, enter'd himſelf into the Order of the Capuchins, and was poiſoned with eleven others of his Order at Calais by one of the inhabitants of that city, as Mr. Ogier relates in the account of his journey. Mr. Du Pin informs us upon the teſtimony of Mr. Cotelier, that when this ſon of Caſaubon was determined to become a Capuchin, he went by the order of his Superiors to deſire his father's bleſſing before he took upon him the vow; and that Caſaubon gave it him very readily with theſe words: My ſon, I do not condemn thee; nor do thou condemn me; we ſhall both appear before the Tribunal of Jeſus Chriſt. There is no mention of this Auguſtin in Caſaubon's Letters (34).

(34) Niceron, pag. 132.

[DD] We ſhall give an account of the reſt of his works in the Note.] Publii Syri Mimi, ſive ſententiæ ſelectæ Latinè, Græcè verſæ, & Notis illuſtratæ per Joſephum Scaligerum, cum Præfatione Iſaaci Caſauboni. Leyden 1598 in 8vo. Inſcriptio vetus dedicationem fundi continens, ab Herode rege facta, cum Notis Iſaaci Caſauboni. This little piece, which was publiſh'd about the year 1607, is inſerted by Thomas Crenius in his Muſæum Philologicum. Caſaubon's Notes are ſhort, but very learned; however it appears, that he was miſtaken in aſcribing the Inſcription to Herod, King of Judæa, inſtead of Herodes the Athenian (35). He publiſh'd Joſeph Scaliger's Opuſcula Varia, at Paris 1610 in 4to, and Francfort 1612 in 8vo, with a Preface of his own writing. Ad Frontonem Ducæum Epiſtola, de Apologiâ Jeſuitarum nomine Pariſiis edita. London 1611 in 4to. The chief deſign of this Letter was to confute the Réponſe Apologetique à l'Anti-Coton, par François Benald. Au Pont. 1611 in 8vo, and to oppoſe the doctrine of the Jeſuits about the Authority of Kings. Mr. Bernard tells us (36), that this Letter was publiſhed almoſt againſt his will, and that he received a conſiderable preſent for it from King James. Epiſtola ad Georgium Michaelem Lingelſhemium de quodam libello Scioppii, 1612 in 4to. This Letter, which is dated Auguſt 9th 1612, is the 828th of Mr. Almeloveen's Collection. Epiſtola ad Cardinalem Perronium. London 1612 in 4to. This Letter, which is the 838th of Mr. Almeloveen's Collection, is dated November 9th, 1612. It is not ſo much a compoſition of our Author, as an exact account of the ſentiments of King James I, whoſe and the Church of England's Secretary, he tells us, he was, with regard to ſome points of Religion. It was therefore printed among the works of that King in the edition of them publiſhed by Dr. James Montague Biſhop of Wincheſter, in 1619. It is written with great moderation; and Cardinal du Perron wrote an Anſwer to it, which was left unfiniſh'd at his death. Valentine Smalcius, a famous Socinian, has endeavoured likewiſe to confute ſome paſſages of it in a little piece publiſhed under the name of Anthony Reuchlin, and intitled, Ad Iſaacum Caſaubonum Paræneſis, Racoviæ 1614 in 4to (37). Iſaaci Caſauboni Epiſtolæ. Hague 1638 in 4to. This edition was publiſhed by John Frederick Gronovius. A ſecond edition, 82 Epiſtolis auctior, & juxta ſeriem temporum digeſta, per Joannem Georgium Grævium, was printed at Magdeburg and Helmſtad 1656 in 4to. Theſe two editions are eclipſed by the following one, printed at Rotterdam 1709 in fol. and intitled, Iſaaci Caſauboni Epiſtolæ, inſertis ad eaſdem reſponſionibus, quotquot hactenus reperiri potuerunt, ſecundum ſeriem temporis accuratè digeſtæ. Accedunt huic editioni præter trecentas ineditas Epiſtolas Iſaaci Caſauboni Vita, ejuſdem Dedicationes, Præfationes, Prolegomena, Poemata, Fragmentum de Libertate Eccleſiaſticâ. Item Merici Caſauboni Epiſtolæ, Dedicationes, Præfationes, Prolegomena, & Tractatus quidam rariores. Curante Theodoro Janſon ab Almeloveen. i. e. "Iſaac Caſaubon's Letters, with all

(35) Idem, pag. 141.

(36) Pag. 19.

(37) Idem, pag. 144.

were his contemporaries, not only on account of his profound learning, but likewiſe of his modeſty, ſincerity and probity.

" all the Anſwers which could hitherto be found, " diſpoſed in a chronological order. To which are " added in this edition, beſides three hundred Letters " never before printed, Iſaac Caſaubon's Life, his " Dedications, Prefaces, Prolegomena, Poems, and " his Fragment concerning Eccleſiaſtical Liberty; and " alſo the Letter of Meric Caſaubon with his Dedica- " tions, Prefaces, Prolegomena, and ſome ſcarce " Treatiſes, publiſhed by Theodore Janſon ab Alme- " loveen." Sorbiere in the Sorberiana (38) ſays, that theſe Letters contain the hiſtory of a man of probity and learning, but have nothing very remarkable in them except the purity of the language, and the marks of a frank and ſincere mind. The Author of the Melanges d'Hiſtoire & de Literature, publiſh'd under the name of Vigneul-Marville, aſſures us, that they are all perfectly beautiful; and he makes no ſcruple to compare them with thoſe of Grotius and Scaliger with regard to learning, and to aſſert, that they exceed them for the eaſineſs and purity of ſtyle, which is entirely epiſtolary, and not at all affected. Caſaubon is blamed for mixing too much Greek in his Latin Letters; and tho', ſays Mr. Bernard (39), he excuſes himſelf from the example of Cicero and others, yet it is certainly a fault. Father Vavaſſor in his Treatiſe de Epigrammate (40) charges him likewiſe with Galliciſms; but theſe defects, and perhaps ſome others, do not hinder theſe Letters from being worth reading (41). In 1710 Mr. John Chriſtopher Wolfius publiſhed at Hamburg in 4to, Caſauboniana, ſive Iſaaci Caſauboni varia de Scriptoribus Libriſque Judicia, Obſervationes ſacræ in utriuſque Fœderis loca, Philologicæ item & Eccleſiaſticæ, ut & Animadverſiones in Annales Baronii Eccleſiaſticos ineditæ, ex variis Caſauboni MSS. in Bibliothecâ Bodleianâ reconditis nunc primum erutæ à Joan. Chriſtoph. Wolfio. Accedunt duæ Caſauboni Epiſtolæ ineditæ, & Præfatio ad Librum de Libertate Eccleſiaſticâ, cum Notis Editoris in Caſauboniana, ac Præfatio, quâ de hujus generis Literis diſſeritur. Father Niceron ſays (42), that there is nothing very conſiderable in this Collection. T.

(38) Pag. 50.

(39) Pag. 23, 24.

(40) Cap. 22.

(41) Bernard, pag. 24.

(42) Pag. 147.

☞CASAUBON (MERIC), ſon of the preceding, was born at Geneva Auguſt the 14th 1599 (a), and not in September, as Mr. Wood aſſerts in his Athenæ Oxonienſes (b). He began his firſt ſtudies at Sedan, and continued them in England, whither he came with his father in 1610 [A]. He was inſtructed by a private maſter till 1614, according to Mr. Wood (c), or 1616, according to Father Niceron (d), when he was ſent to Chriſt Church College in Oxford, where being put under a moſt careful tutor, Dr. Edward Meetkirk (e), afterwards the King's Profeſſor of Hebrew, he was ſoon elected a Student of that College, and made ſo great a progreſs in Logic and Philoſophy (e), that he took the Degree of Maſter of Arts June the 14th 1621 (f), being at that time very eminent for his extenſive learning (g). The ſame year he publiſhed a book in defence of his father againſt the calumnies of certain Roman Catholicks [B]. This book gained him the favour of King James I, and procured him a conſiderable reputation abroad, eſpecially in France, whence he had ſeveral offers of promotion there; his godfather Meric de Vicque, being then or ſoon after Keeper of the Great Seal of that Kingdom (h). The next book, which he publiſhed, was a Vindication of his Father, in Latin [C], written by (a) Niceron, Mémoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſt. des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 18. pag. 148. edit. de Paris 1732.

(b) Vol. 2. col. 485. 2d edit. London 1721.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Ubi ſupra.

(e) See Dr. Meric Caſaubon of Credulity and Incredulity, pag. 16. edit. London 1668.

(f) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 218.

(g) Idem, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 485.

(h) Idem, ibid.

[A] In England, whither he came with his father in 1610.] We obſerved in the preceding article that Iſaac Caſaubon came to England October 1610; and therefore as his ſon Meric was born in Auguſt 1599, Mr. Wood muſt certainly be miſtaken in his Athenæ Oxonienſes (1), where he tells us, that the latter was but nine years of age, when he was brought into England by his father.

(1) Vol. 2. col. 485. 2d edit. London 1721.

[B] He publiſhed a Defence of his father againſt the calumnies of certain Roman-Catholics.] It was printed at London 1621 in 8vo under the following title, Pietas contra maledicos Patrii nominis & Religionis hoſtes. In this Book he mentions ſeveral particulars relating to the Life of his father, and defends him againſt the reproaches of Caſpar Scioppius, Julius Cæſar Boulanger, Eudæmon-Joannes, and ſome others, who had caſt odious imputations upon his morals and religion (2).

(2) Niceron, Memoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſtoire des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 18. pag. 150, 151.

[C] A Vindication of his father in Latin.] It was printed at London 1624 in eight ſheets in 4to, and intitled, Vindicatio Patris adverſus Impoſtorem, qui Librum ineptum & impium de Origine Idololatriæ nuper ſub Iſaaci Caſauboni nomine publicavit. The occaſion of this book was as follows. In 1624 there was publiſh'd at London a Treatiſe, intitled, The Original of Idolatries, or the Birth of Hereſies. Firſt faithfully gathered out of ſundry Greek and Latin Authors, as alſo out of divers learned Fathers, by that famous and learned Iſaac Caſaubon, and by him publiſhed in French for the good of God's Church, and was tranſlated into Engliſh for the benefit of this Monarchy. By Abraham Darcie. It was dedicated to Prince Charles, afterwards King Charles I, and preſented to King James I, and all the Lords of the Council. Meric Caſaubon in his Neceſſity of Reformation in and before Luther's time, and what viſibly hath moſt hindred the progreſs of it, printed at London 1664 in 4to tells us (3), that " the chief end " and ſubject of the Book was to prove, that the " Maſs, (a word of great extent and antiquity, which " made the Authors of the Auguſtane Confeſſion, ſub- " ſcribed by Calvin, ſay, Falſè accuſantur Eccleſiæ no- " ſtræ, quod Miſſam aboleant, retinetur enim Miſſa apud " nos, & ſummâ reverentiâ celebratur,) or rather in- " deed the whole Liturgy, antient and late, and every " part of it, was derived from antient Heathens, Nu- " ma Pompilius, and I know not whom; ſome part " alſo of it is taken out of the Alcoran; which to " prove, his Authors for the moſt part are ſome late " collectors of Roman Antiquities, as Blondus, Alex- " ander ab Alexandro, and the like, who ſay no ſuch " thing; but from what they ſay of the Romans, he " makes his inferences and applications, as he liſts " himſelf, more like the dreams of a diſtemper'd man " than the words of a man endowed with ordinary " ſenſe and reaſon." Our Author therefore, at that time a young Student in Chriſt-Church, addreſſed himſelf to one of the Biſhops, who uſually waited on the King, who was then at Theobalds; and by the Biſhop's means a Letter of his was ſhewn to the King, who diſcovering the fraud, ordered Nathaniel Butter the Bookſeller, and Abraham Darcie to be committed to priſon (4); and it was with great difficulty, that Dr. Montague Biſhop of London made his Chaplain's peace on account of his licenſing of it (5). Soon after a French book, the original of the Engliſh Tranſlation, being produced, it was found, continues our Author (6), that an old title-page had been by art and cunning tranſformed, the years altered, and the name of Iſaac Caſaubon inſerted; and thus the world for mere gain and lucre, (for I do not believe, that there was any further myſtery in it at firſt) ſhamefully abuſed. Other editions or copies of the ſame book were found, and ſhewed to the King; yea tranſlations of it, that had been made, when my father was yet ſcarce born. Upon this our Author publiſhed his Vindicatio Patris, which by the King's command was tranſlated into French and Engliſh (7). And yet ſome years after the Book abovemention'd or Engliſh Tranſlation was reprinted at Amſterdam, as our Author ſuppoſes, with this title, The Original of Popiſh Idolatry; or the Birth of Hereſies. Publiſhed under the name of Caſaubon, and called in the ſame

(3) Pag. 157, 158.

(4) Ibid. pag. 158.

(5) Fuller's Church Hiſtory, Book 10. Sect. 7. num. 18. pag. 112.

(6) Ubi ſupra, pag. 159.

(7) Ibid.

by the command of King James (i). This was printed at London in 1624. And about the ſame time he was preſented by Dr. Lancelot Andrews, Biſhop of Wincheſter to the Living of Bledon in Somerſetſhire (k), and took the Degree of Bachelor of Divinity (l), and deſigned to have proceeded where his father had left off in the confutation of Cardinal Baronius's Annals, but was diverted from the execution of that deſign [D]. Some years after the publication of his two former books, he was made Prebendary of Canterbury by Archbiſhop Laud, and Rector of Ickham near that City (m). In 1631 he publiſhed at London in 8vo, Optati Libri VII de Schiſmate Donatiſtarum, cum Merici Caſauboni Notis & Emendationibus, and in 1634 a Tranſlation out of Greek into Engliſh of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus's Meditations concerning himſelf †, London in 4to, a ſecond edition of which reviſed and corrected was publiſhed the year following at London in 4to, and in 1664 in 8vo. Auguſt the 31ſt 1636 he was created Doctor of Divinity at Oxford, by command from King Charles I, when his Majeſty and the Queen were entertained in that Univerſity (n). In 1638 he publiſhed at London in 4to, a Treatiſe of Uſe and Cuſtom [E]. In the beginning of the civil war he loſt all his ſpiritual promotions, and lived retiredly with that little which he had left; though he ſtill continued to publiſh ſeveral excellent works [F]. In 1649 Mr. Greaves of Gray's Inn, an intimate friend

(i) Idem, ibid.

(k) Idem, ibid, See likewiſe Dr. M. Caſaubon's Treatiſe of Credulity and Incredulity in things natural, civil, and divine, pag. 115, 116, edit. London 1668.

(l) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(m) Idem, ibid.

† See the Article of MARCUS ANTONINUS Philoſophus, vol. 2. note [U], pag. 45, 46.

(n) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 272.

ſame year upon misformation. But now upon better conſideration reprinted with Allowance; being a true and exact Deſcription &c. Printed . . . 1630. A Preface alſo was added in juſtification of the book and the firſt editors of it, where among other things it is ſaid, "that they, that did ſuppreſs it, were either Papiſts "in their hearts, or ſuch as hold with Papiſts, that "ignorance is the mother of devotion, that the Goſ"pel of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt was departing from the "land &c." And ſince that a Pamphlet came out, without mentioning where it was printed, much to the ſame purpoſe, in the very front of which are theſe words by way of approbation: D. Caſaubonus ille eruditiſſimus Ceremoniarum Ethnicarum & Diabolicarum in Pontificias & Epiſcopales mutationem terris demonſtrare promittebat. Quod ego Caſauboni promiſſum judico digniſſimum, quod typographiæ beneficio ad manus plurium perveniat. This piece is but ſhort, as our Author obſerves (8), but all of the ſame ſtrain and ſpirit as the former book, to which it refers.

(8) Ibid. pag. 160.

[D] Deſigned to have proceeded where his father had left off in the confutation of Cardinal Baronius's Annals; but was diverted from the execution of that deſign.] Mr. Wood tells us (9), that about the time, that he was beneficed in Somerſetſhire, and took the Degree of Bachelor of Divinity, he reſolved upon that deſign, but was diverted by ſome accidental occaſions or provocations; and that at length, when he came to maturity of years for ſuch a work, and had acquainted Archbiſhop Laud, his great friend and patron, with his deſign, who was very ready to place him conveniently in Oxford or London, according to his deſire, that he might be furniſhed with books neceſſary for ſuch a purpoſe, the troubles and diviſions began in England; ſo that he had no certain place of habitation, and was obliged to ſell a good part of his books (10); and in concluſion after about twenty years ſuffering he was grown ſo old and infirm of body, that he could not expect to live many years, and thereupon was forced to give over that project.

(9) Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 485.

(10) See his Diſcourſe of Credulity and Incredulity, pag. 260. edit. London 1668.

[E] His Treatiſe of Uſe and Cuſtom.] He mentions this in the following paſſage in his Diſcourſe of Credulity and Incredulity (11). It is poſſible, the reader may light upon a book, intitled, A Treatiſe of Uſe and Cuſtom. It is not in the title, but might have been added (as here), in things natural, civil, and divine. That which gave occaſion to it, (for I muſt own it as mine, though ſet out without my name) was, I was at that time much troubled, and as I thought injured by what in the Law of this Realm goes under the name of Cuſtom, to me before little known. And as the buſineſs run often in my mind, (riding eſpecially, when I had nothing elſe to buſy my thoughts) it brought in time many things into my mind, which I read and obſerved concerning cuſtom in general, till at laſt it came to this, that was printed. "I needed not have owned it, ſome "may think, and better ſo perchance; yet the thanks "I have had for it from ſome, to whoſe judgment I "could not but aſcribe much, becauſe I knew them "very converſant in the ſtudy of Nature, whereof "alſo they have given good proof to the Public, hath "made me to adventure upon this acknowledgment. "However were it now to be reprinted, ſuch is the "largeneſs of the ſubject, it might be fitted for pub"lic uſe much more than ever it was. Now thoſe "things, that are atchieved only by art and ſtudy, "though they may ſeem not ſo properly natural in "that ſenſe we take natural here; yet as they are "referred to the power of uſe and cuſtom (a great my"ſtery of nature in our ſenſe, and the ſubject of much "admiration, as that Treatiſe will ſhew them, who "deſire further ſatisfaction about it) ſo they properly "belong to this account."

(11) Pag. 15. edit. London 1668, in 8vo.

[F] He ſtill continued to publiſh ſeveral excellent works.] The uſe of daily public Prayers in three poſitions. London 1641 in 4to. This is omitted in Father Niceron's Catalogue of our Author's works. Notæ & Emendationes in Marci Antonini Imperatoris de ſeipſo & ad ſeipſum libros XII. London 1643 in 8vo. In Monſr. Baillet's Jugemens des Savans (11), this edition is erroneouſly ſaid to be printed in 1621. The Latin tranſlation, which is publiſhed here with the Greek text of Antoninus, was done by William Xylander, but corrected in a variety of places by our Author, who has likewiſe added the notes of Xylander. The original cauſe of temporal evils: The opinions of the moſt antient Heathens concerning it examined by the Sacred Scriptures, and referred unto them, as to the ſource and fountain, from whence they ſprang. London 1645. in 4to, and not in 8vo, as Father Niceron tells us (12). A Diſcourſe concerning Chriſt his Incarnation and Exinanition, with an Introduction concerning the principles of Chriſtianity and Divinity. London 1646 in 4to, and not 8vo, as Father Niceron ſays. De Verborum uſu, & accuratæ eorum cognitionis utilitate Diatriba. London 1647 in 12mo. The ſame year he publiſhed at London in 8vo, a more compleat Edition of his Father's Notes on Perſius's ſatyrs, under the following title, Perſii Satyræ, cum Notis Iſaaci Caſauboni. In 1650 our Author publiſhed, De quatuor Linguis Commentationis Pars prior, quæ de Lingua Hebraicâ & de Lingua Saxoniâ. Acceſſerunt Guilielmi Somneri ad verba vetera Germanica Lipſiana Notæ. London in 8vo. He had not opportunity of finiſhing the other two languages, Greek and Latin (13). Terentius cum Notis Thomæ Farnabii in quatuor priores Comœdias, Merici Caſauboni in Phormionem & Hecyram. London 1651 in 12mo. Farnaby dying before he had finiſhed his Notes upon Terence, our Author was engaged by the Bookſeller to write Notes upon the Phormio and Hecyra, which the former had not written upon. Some Annotations in the Pſalms and Proverbs. He tells us in his diſcourſe of Credulity and Incredulity in things Natural &c. (14), that theſe Obſervations were extorted from him by the importunity of the Printers, "when "he was not well furniſhed either with books or lei"ſure, but worſt of all, of will, when nothing could "be expected to be acceptable and welcome, but what "reliſhed of ſchiſm and rebellion." Theſe Annotations were inſerted in one of the latter Editions of the Aſſembly's Annotations on the Bible, reprinted with ſome additions (15). Hierocles de Providentia & Fato, & Fragmenta ejuſdem, Græcè & Latinè, cum Lilii Gyraldi Interpretatione Symbolorum Pythagoræ. Accedunt aurea Pythagoreorum Carmina, & in ea Hieroclis Commentarius, Græcè & Latinè, interprete Joanne Carterio, cum (11) Tom. 2. num. 539. pag. 248. edit. Amſterd. 1725 in 4to.

(12) Ubi ſupra; pag. 152.

(13) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 487.

(14) Pag. 106, 107. edit. London 1668.

(15) Wood, ubi ſupra.

friend of our Author, brought him a meſſage from Oliver Cromwell, then Lieutenant General of the Parliament Forces, to bring him to Whitehall to confer with him about matters of moment; but his wife being then lately dead [G], and not, as he ſaid, buried, he deſired to be excuſed. Mr. Greaves afterwards came again; and our Author fearing ſome bad conſequence of the affair, deſired to know the meaning of it, which Mr. Greaves refuſed to acquaint him with. But at laſt returning he told him, that the Lieutenant General intended to promote him, and to employ his pen in writing the Hiſtory of the late war, deſiring at the ſame time, that the matters of fact might be impartially repreſented. Dr. Caſaubon returned his hearty thanks for the honour intended him, but declared that he was incapable in ſeveral reſpects for ſuch an employment, and could not ſo impartially engage in it, but that his ſubject would oblige him to make ſuch reflections as would be ungrateful, if not injurious to his Lordſhip. Notwithſtanding this anſwer Cromwell ſeemed ſo ſenſible of his worth, that he ordered, that upon the firſt demand there ſhould be delivered to him three or four hundred pounds by a Bookſeller in London, whoſe name was Cromwell, whenever his occaſions ſhould require, without acknowledging any benefactor at the receipt of it. But this offer he rejected, though his circumſtances were then mean. At the ſame time it was propoſed by Mr. Greaves, who belonged to the Library at St. James's, that if our Author would gratify Cromwell in the requeſt abovementioned, he would reſtore to him all his father's books, which were then in the Royal Library there, being given by King James, and give him a patent for three hundred pounds per annum to be paid to the family as long as the youngeſt ſon of Dr. Caſaubon ſhould live; but this was likewiſe refuſed. Not long after this there was a propoſal made to him by the Embaſſador of Chriſtina Queen of Sweden, to invite him to that Kingdom, where he was to have the government of one, or the inſpection of all the Univerſities, with a conſiderable ſalary for himſelf, and a ſettlement of three hundred pounds per ann. upon his eldeſt ſon during life. But this he alſo waved, being determined to ſpend the remainder of his life in England (o). At the Reſtoration he recovered all his ſpiritual preferments, and continued writing books to his death [H], which happened July the 14th tum Notis Merici Caſauboni. London 1655 in 8vo, and London 1673 in two volumes in 8vo. Caſaubon had at firſt a deſign to correct the Latin tranſlation of Hierocles, which appeared to have great occaſion for it; but not knowing that the work was printing till it was almoſt entirely finiſhed, he contented himſelf with adding only ſome Grammatical Notes (16). A Treatiſe concerning Enthuſiaſm, as it is an effect of nature, but is miſtaken by many for either Divine Inſpiration, or Diabolical Poſſeſſion. London 1655 in 8vo. This Treatiſe contains ſix Chapters, the firſt of which treats of Enthuſiaſm in general; the ſecond of Divinatory Enthuſiaſm; the third of Contemplative and Philoſophical Enthuſiaſm; the fourth of Rhetorical Enthuſiaſm; the fifth of Poetical Enthuſiaſm; and the laſt of Precatory Enthuſiaſm. De nuperâ Homeri Editione Lugduno-Batavicâ Hackianâ, cum Latinâ verſione & Didymi Scholiis: ſed & Euſtathio & locis aliquot inſignioribus ad Odyſſeam pertinentibus. Item ſuper loco Homerico dubiæ apud antiquos Interpretationis, quo Dei in hominum tam mentes quam fortunas imperium aſſeritur, binæ Diſſertationes. London 1659 in 8vo; and reprinted at the end of Almeloveen's edition of Iſaac Caſaubon's Letters. Epicteti Enchiridion, Græcè & Latinè, cum Notis Merici Caſauboni, & Cebetis Tabulâ. London 1659 in 8vo. The tranſlation is done by Jerom Wolfius. A tranſlation into Engliſh of Lucius Florus's Hiſtory of the Romans, with Notes. London 1659 in 8vo. He publiſhed likewiſe at London 1659 in fol. A true and faithful relation of what paſſed for many years between Dr. John Dee and ſome ſpirits &c. with a long Preface by our Author, in order to confirm the truth of the relation with regard to ſpirits. Mr. Leibnitz (17) ſtiles this Preface a very excellent one, and tells us that it deſerves to be tranſlated as well as the book itſelf.

(o) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 485, 486.

(16) Niceron, pag. 153.

(17) Miſcellanea Leibnitiana, pag. 221. edit. Lipſiæ 1718, in 8vo.

[G] His wife being then lately dead.] Father Niceron informs us (18), that ſhe died in the year 1651; which is inconſiſtent with what Mr. Wood aſſerts, where he tells us in the paſſage quoted in the text of this Article, that it was in 1649 that Mr. Greaves came from Cromwel to our Author, who deſired then to be excuſed on account of his wife's death, juſt before.

(18) Pag. 149.

[H] Continued writing books to his death.] We ſhall give an account of them as follows. I. A Vindication of the Lord's Prayer as a formal Prayer, and by Chriſt's Inſtitution to be uſed by Chriſtians as a Prayer &c. London 1660. The firſt occaſion of writing this Treatiſe was upon the report, that Dr. John Owen, who had the chief management of the Univerſity of Oxford from 1652 to 1657, had put on his hat, when the Lord's Prayer was repeated by the Preacher in the chief Church of Oxford; for which fact the reader may conſult Mr. Thomas Long's Book, intitled, No Proteſtant but Diſſenters Plot diſcovered and defeated; being an anſwer to the late writings of ſeveral eminent Diſſenters &c. (19); and the Apologia pro Miniſtris in Angliâ ejectis, ſaid to be written by Mr. Henry Hickman, who alſo blames Dr. Owen for it. But the fact was denied by the Doctor in a letter to Dr. Lewis du Moulin (20); but therein, ſays Mr. Wood (21), he doth err much, for ſeveral now living in Oxon know it well enough. II. A King and his ſubjects unhappily fallen out, and happily reconciled, in a Sermon at Canterbury on Hoſea 3. verſ. 4, 5. London 1660 in 4to. III. The queſtion, to whom it belonged antiently to preach, and whether all Prieſts might or did; diſcuſſed out of antiquity, as alſo what preaching is properly. London 1663 in 4to. IV. Notæ & Emendationes in Diogenem Laertium de Vitis &c. Philoſophorum. Theſe Notes were added to thoſe of his father in the editions of Laertius printed at London 1664 in fol. and Amſterdam 1692 in 4to. V. Of the neceſſity of Reformation in and before Luther's time, and what viſibly hath moſt hindred the progreſs of it. Occaſioned by ſome late virulent books written by Papiſts, but eſpecially by that intitled, Labyrinthus Cantuarienſis. Here beſides ſome other points, the grand buſineſs of theſe times, Infallibility, is fully diſcuſſed. By Meric Caſaubon, D. D. and one of the Prebends of Canterbury. London 1664 in 4to. This Book is chiefly deſigned as an anſwer to one printed at Paris in 1658, and intitled, Labyrinthus Cantuarienſis, being an anſwer to the late Archbiſhop of Canterburie's Relation of a conference; and intended to ſhew the neceſſity of a reformation, and that the ſeparation of our Church from that of Rome, upon that account, cannot be charged with ſchiſm; in oppoſition to what the Author of the Labyrinth maintains in the 11th, 13th, and 14th Chapter of his Labyrinth, that Proteſtants are Schiſmatics, and no part of the Catholic Church. VI. An Anſwer concerning the new way of Infallibility lately deviſed to uphold the Roman cauſe; the Holy Scriptures, the antient Fathers and Councils laid aſide; againſt J. S. (the Author of Sure-footing*) his Letter lately publiſhed.* London 1665 in 4to. The Letter by

(19) Pag. 167, 168. edit. London 1682, in 8vo.

(20) See Dr. John Durell's Vindiciæ Eccleſ. Angl. cap. 3. pag. 33.

(21) Col. 487.

14th 1671, in the seventy second year of his age, and not in the seventy fifth, as is mentioned in his epitaph [I], and he was interred in the Cathedral of Canterbury, where he had a monument erected to him. He had a design in the latter part of his days of writing his own Life [K]. Mr. Wood in his Historia & Antiquitates Universitatis Oxonienſis (p) tells us, that he was skilled in various parts of Literature, tho' not very accurately, but that his chief talent lay in critical Learning, in which he seems to have been greatly assisted by his father's papers. He was eminent for his piety, charity to the poor, and his courteous and affable disposition. Monsieur Bernard in his Nouvelles de la République des Lettres (q) observes, that though he was inferior to his father, yet he was a man of considerable learning; and that he ascribed to the Philosophy of Des Cartes the little inclination which people had in his time for the study of polite Literature. He left a great number of manuscripts to the University of Oxford (r). By his wife, whom he married in 1651, and with whom he had a considerable fortune, he had several children (s), and particularly a son whose name was John, and who was a Chirurgeon in Canterbury (t).

(p) Lib. 2. pag 282.

(q) Tom. 35. Mois de Juillet 1710, Art. 1. pag. 28.

(r) Wood, Hiſt. & Antiq. lib. 2. pag. 282.

(s) Niceron, pag. 149.

(t) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 486.

by J. S. that is, John Sarjeant, contained some exceptions against some passages in Dr. Casaubon's former Book Of the necessity of Reformation, &c. and this Letter was printed at the end of Sure-footing in Christianity, and follows the four Appendixes relating to Dr. Thomas Pierce, Dr. Daniel Whitby, Dr. J. Stillingfleet, and Dr. Jeremy Taylor, printed in 1664 in a large 8vo. VII. A Letter of Meric Casaubon D. D. &c. to Peter du Moulin, D. D. and Prebendary of the same Church, concerning Natural Experimental Philosophy, and some Books lately set out about it. Cambridge 1669 in 4to. pagg 36. VIII. Of Credulity and Incredulity in things Natural, Civil, and Divine; wherein, among other things, the Sadducism of these times, in denying spirits, witches, and supernatural operations, by pregnant instances and evidences is fully confuted; Epicurus his cause discussed, and the jugling and false dealing lately used to bring him and Atheism into credit, clearly discovered; the use and necessity of ancient learning against the innovating humour all along proved and asserted. London 1668 in 8vo. The second part was printed at London 1670 in 8vo, under the following title; Credulity and Incredulity in things Divine and Spiritual; wherein (among other things) a true and faithful account is given of the Platonic Philosophy, as it hath reference to Christianity; as also the business of witches and witchcraft, against a late writer fully argued and disputed. The late Writer, whom our Author attacks in this part, is John Wagstaff, who published at London 1669 in 8vo, The Question of Witchcraft debated, or a discourse against their opinion, that affirm Witches. Mr. Wood informs us (29), that the two parts of Dr. Casaubon's Book lying dead on the Bookseller's hands, they printed after his death a new title to them as follows; A Treatise proving Spirits, Witches, and Supernatural Operations by pregnant instances and evidences, &c. London 1672 in 8vo. IX. Notæ in Polybium, printed for the first time in the Edition of that Author published by James Gronovius at Amsterdam in 1670 in 8vo. X. Epistolæ, Dedicationes, Præfationes, Prolegomena, & Tractatus quidam rariores; published by Theodore Janson ab Almeloveen at the end of Isaac Casaubon's Epistles, at Rotterdam 1709 in fol. XI. De Jure Concionandi apud Antiquos, Mr. Wood, who mentions this piece in his Historia & Antiquitates Universitatis Oxonienſis (30), only tells us, that it was written in Latin. But perhaps he is mistaken; and it was only the English Tract mention'd above, N° 3.

(29) Col. 488.

(30) Lib. 2. pag. 282.

[I] His Epitaph] It is as follows (31): Sta & venerare Viator. Hic mortales immortalis ſpiritûs Exuvias depoſuit Mericus Caſaubonus, magni nominis eruditique generis par hæres; quippe qui patrem Iſaacum Caſaubonum, Avum Henricum Stephanum, Proavum Robertum Stephanum habuit. Hui quos Viros! Quæ Literarum Lumina! Quæ ævi ſui decora! Ipſe eruditionem per tot erudita capita traducem excepit, excoluit, & ad pietatis (quæ in ejus pectore Regina ſedebat) ornamentum & incrementum fæliciter conſecravit; Rempublicam Litterariam multiplici Rerum & Linguarum ſupellectile locupletavit. Vir, incertum doctior an melior, in pauperes liberalitate, in amicos utilitate, in omnes humanitate, in acutiſſimis longiſſimi morbi tormentis Chriſtianâ patientiâ inſigniſſimus. Gaudeat primaria hæc Eccleſia primariis Canonicis Caſaubonis ambobus, qui eundem in Eruditorum, quem ipſa in Eccleſiarum ſerie, ordinem obtinent. Obiit noſter pridie Idus Julii an. 1671. ætatis ſuæ 75, Canonicatûs ſui 46.

(31) See Wood, ubi ſupra.

[K] He had a design in the latter part of his days of writing his own Life.] He mentions this design in his Treatiſe concerning Enthuſiaſm, c. 3. p. 85; and he often declared (32), that he esteem'd himself obliged to write an account of it out of gratitude to divine Providence, which had preserved and deliver'd him from more hazardous occurrences than ever any man, as he thought, besides himself had encounter'd with; particularly in his escape from a fire in the night-time, which happened in the house where he lived while he was a boy, at Geneva in his recovery from a sickness at Christ-Church in Oxford, when he was given over for dead, by a chymical medicine given him by a young Physician (33); in his wonderful preservation from drowning, when overset in a boat on the Thames near London, the two watermen being drowned, and himself buoyed up by his Priest's coat; and in his bearing several abuses, fines, imprisonments, &c. "laid upon him, says Mr. Wood "(34), by the fanatical Reformers in the time of his "Sequestration, and other memorables. But these "things being by him deferred from time to time, "were at length hinder'd by death, which seized on "him sooner than he expected. T.

(32) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 488.

(33) See his Discourse of Credulity and Incredulity, pag. 16, 17. edit. London 1668.

(34) Ubi ſupra.

CASSANDRA, daughter of Priam and Hecuba, was tempted by Apollo, and deceived him. He promised to bestow upon her the gift of Prophecy, provided she would give him her maidenhead [A]. Cassandra seemingly consented to this exchange; but no sooner had she obtained the gift of Prophecy, but she laughed at the tempter, and broke her word with him. Apollo did not revenge himself, by bereaving her of the gift he had indulged her, but by causing no credit to be given, by any persons, to her predictions (a). She was considered as mad, before the things she foretold were come to pass;

(a) Apollodor. lib. 3. pag. m. 227.

[A] Apollo . . . promis'd to bestow upon her the gift of Prophecy, provided she would give him her maidenhead.] I have already observed several times, that nothing can be more ill contrived and connected than the system of the antient Heathens, of which we have a proof here. It was a tenet of the Pagan Doctrine, that the Priestess of Apollo at Delphi should always be a virgin, for that otherwise she could not be inspired (1). This being laid down, it ought not to have been supposed, that Apollo promised the gift of Prophecy to a virgin, upon condition that she would surrender up her maidenhead to him. Some writers imagine that this was owing to the artifices of the Devil, and his deep malice (2). But this supposes that the story of Cassandra's temptation is real fact, whereas it is no more than a poetical fiction. The Author whom I have here in view has committed another error. He supposes that the Sybil of Cumæ was tempted by Apollo, in the same manner as Cassandra had been; and to prove this (3), he cites some verses of Ovid (4), which make no mention of any promise of the gift of Prophecy. In order to find an exact conformity between these two temptations, it should have been said that Apollo offered, in general, to give Cassandra any thing she should ask of him, for so he promis'd the Sybil (5). A modern Writer supposes,

(1) See Petit. de Sybillâ, pag. 114.

(2) Ibid. pag. 121.

(3) Ibid. pag. 122.

(4) See lib. 14. Metam. Ovid.

(5) Elige, ait, virgo Cumæa quid optes, Optatis potiere tuis. Ovid. Metam. lib. 14. ver. 140. That is, "Wish, my "Cumæan maid, "whatever you "will, "It shall be "granted.—— paſs; and was not owned to be in her ſenſes, till after they were accompliſhed (b). Servius relates the manner how theſe were rendered ineffectual [B]. Some relate another ſtory [C]. However this be, when the Greeks took the City of Troy, this Propheteſs fled for ſhelter into the Temple of Minerva, and there ſaved her life, but not her honour [D]; for Ajax ſon of Oileus forced her in the midſt of the Temple. We have declared elſewhere (c), in what manner Minerva reſented this injury; and we ſhall here make ſome mention concerning the puniſhment of this obſcene impiety [E]. It is remarkable

(b) Plutarch. de præc. Reipubl. pag. 281.

(c) In the Remarks [B] and [C] of the article AJAX OILEUS, above.

poſes, that the promiſes made to Caſſandra were in reality confined to nothing; and that it was Caſſandra who made choice of the gift of Prophecy (6); but the authority of Apollodorus and that of Servius will not allow us to agree to this ſuppoſition. One of theſe Authors ſays, that Apollo promiſed Caſſandra that he would make her a Propheteſs (7); and the other, that he made her no promiſe; but that Caſſandra having deſired to be endued with the gift of Prophecy, as a reward for her laſt favour, was taken at her word (8). The Sybil being permitted to ſue for whatever bleſſings ſhe pleaſed, deſired long life; and having forgot to deſire perpetual youth, it was in her power to have obtained that alſo; it would have coſt Caſſandra only her maidenhead.

(6) Vigenere, in the Argument to the Caſſandra of Philoſtratus, tom. 1. pag. m. 630. edit. in 4to; and tom. 2. pag. 77.
(7) Apollodor. lib. 3. pag. m. 227.
(8) Servius, in Æn. lib. 2. ver. 247.

Excidit, ut peterem juvenes quoque protinus annos,
Hos tamen ille mihi dabat, æternamque juventam,
Si venerem paterer (9).

That is,

" I aſk'd long life, and my requeſt obtain'd.
" The precious bleſſing of unfading youth
" Would have been mine, had I my virtue yielded."

(9) Ovid. Metam. lib. 14. ver. 344.

But Caſſandra thought that eternal youth would be purchaſed too dear at that price; and conſequently ſhe ſet a high price upon her wares.

[B] Servius relates the manner how theſe Prophecies were rendred ineffectual.] Apollo's ſpittle produc'd this effect, which was ſo ſtrong, that Caſſandra's predictions could never obtain credit. The God was exaſperated at the fair-one, for refuſing what ſhe had promis'd him; however, he concealed his reſentment, and deſired her to grant him a kiſs at leaſt. She indulged his requeſt, upon which he ſpit in Caſſandra's mouth, and by that means the gift he had beſtowed upon her became of no uſe. Apollo cum amâſſet Caſſandram, petit ab ea ejus concubitus copiam; illa hac conditione promiſit, ſi ſibi ab eo futurorum ſcientia præſtaretur; quam cum Apollo tribuiſſet, ab illa promiſſus coitus denegatus eſt; ſed Apollo diſſimulata pauliſper ira, petiit ab ea, ut ſibi oſculum ſaltem præſtaret, quod cum illa feciſſet, Apollo os ejus inſpuit; & quia eripere Deo ſemel tributum munus non conveniebat, effecit ut illa quidem vera vaticinaretur, ſed fides non haberetur (10). Servius relates theſe particulars, in his Commentary on the following lines of Virgil.

(10) Servius, in Æn. lib. 2. ver. 247.

Tunc etiam fatis aperit Caſſandra futuris
Ora, Dei juſſu non unquam credita Teucris (11).

That is,

" Caſſandra . .
" Foretold our fate, but by the God's decree,
" All heard, but none believ'd the Prophecy."

(11) Virg. Æn. lib. 2. ver. 246.

[C] Some relate another ſtory.] It is this: Helenus and Caſſandra, who were twins, were carried in their infancy to the Temple of Apollo, and were left there a whole night, either out of forgetfulneſs, or becauſe it was the cuſtom. The next day, when the infants where ſought for, they were found with ſerpents twiſted round their bodies, and licking their ears. This action of the ſerpents endued both with the gift of Prophecy (12). This calls to my memory what is related of Melampus. One day, whilſt he was ſleeping, two ſerpents came and lick'd his ears; and waking afterwards, he was aſtoniſhed at his underſtanding the language of birds, whereby he was enabled to foretel a great many things (13).

(12) Tzetzes in Lycophron. Euſtathius in Iliad 6. Scholiaſtes Euripidis in Hecub. apud Meziriac. in Epiſt. Ovidii, pag. 479.
(13) Apollodorus, lib. 2. Scholiaſtes Homeri in Odyſſ. 11. Scholiaſtes Apollonii in lib. 1. apud Meziriac. ibid. pag. 480.

[D] She fled for ſhelter into the Temple of Minerva, and there ſaved her life, but not her honour.] Virgil did not think proper to ſay that ſhe had been raviſhed (14); and only repreſents the condition to which ſhe was reduced, when ſhe was dragged out of the Temple.

(14) Bene diſſimulavit de ſtupro Caſſandræ. Servius in Æneid. lib. 2. ver. 403.

Ecce trahebatur paſſis Priameïa virgo
Crinibus a templo Caſſandra adytiſque Minervæ;
Ad cœlum tendens ardentia lumina fruſtra;
Lumina, nam teneras arcebant vincula palmas.

That is,

" Behold the royal Propheteſs, the fair
" Caſſandra, dragg'd by her diſhevell'd hair;
" Whom not Minerva's ſhrine, nor ſacred bands,
" In ſafety could protect from ſacrilegious hands.
" On Heav'n ſhe caſt her eyes, ſhe ſigh'd, ſhe cry'd,
" ('Twas all ſhe cou'd;) her tender arms were ty'd."

Dryden.

But Quintus Calaber the Poet was not ſo ſcrupulous, he declaring expreſly, that Ajax the ſon of Oileus, raviſhed Caſſandra in the very Temple of Minerva (15). This is the general tradition (16); which was proved by public monuments in ſeveral cities of Greece (17). See the article of that AJAX. According to ſome Authors, Caſſandra was the Prieſteſs of Pallas (18); whilſt others relate, that ſhe was in that character with regard to Apollo (19); nevertheleſs, if Virgil may be credited, ſhe had been betrothed or promis'd to Corœbus.

(15) Quint. Calab. 13. ver. 421.
(16) See Servius in Æneid 1. ver. 41.
(17) Pauſanias, lib. 1. pag. 14; lib. 5. pag. 167; lib. 10. pag. 343.
(18) Servius, in Æn. 2. ver. 404.
(19) Tractata comis antiſtita Phœbi
Non profecturas tendebat ad æthera palmas.
Ovid. Metam. lib. 13. ver. 411. i. e. " Caſſandra " being dragged " by the hair, " lifted up her " unavailing " hands to hea- " ven." See alſo Euripides, in Troadibus, ver. 253.

——— ——— Juveniſque Corœbus
Mygdonides. Illis ad Trojam ſorte diebus
Venerat, inſano Caſſandræ incenſus amore,
Et GENER auxilium Priamo Phrygibuſque ferebat:
Infelix qui non SPONSÆ præcepta furentis
Audierat (20).

That is,

——— " Young Corœbus, who by love was led
" To win renown, and fair Caſſandra's bed:
" And lately brought his troops to Priam's aid:
" Forewarn'd in vain by the prophetic maid."

Dryden.

(20) Virgil. Æneid. lib. 3. ver. 341.

Homer mentions a Prince, who was come to ſue for Caſſandra in marriage; and promiſed at the ſame time to oblige the Greeks to raiſe the ſiege of Troy. This Prince was ſo inflamed with Caſſandra's beauty, that he did not require any dowry.

Ἦτοι δὲ Πριάμοιο θυγατρῶν εἶδος ἀρίστην
Κασσάνδρην, ἀνάεδνον· ὑπέσχετο δὲ μέγα ἔργον
Ἐκ Τροίης ἀέκοντας ἀπωσέμεν υἷας Ἀχαιῶν.

(21) Homer. Iliad. ver. 365.

That is,

" Caſſandra's love he ſought with boaſts of power,
" And promis'd conqueſt was the proffer'd dower."

Pope.

Priam conſented to this marriage. Homer calls this future ſon-in-law of Priam, Othryoneus, and makes him die in battle. Virgil alſo relates that Corœbus was killed the night that Troy was taken. Pauſanias mentions this Corœbus, as a man who was to marry Caſſandra (22).

(22) Pauſan. lib. 10. pag. 344.

[E] We ſhall take ſome notice, concerning the puniſhment of this obſcene impiety.] Plutarch obſerves, that it was not long ſince the Locri had diſcontinued the ſending virgins to Troy, to expiate the looſe action of Ajax (23). Theſe virgins ſpent their whole lives in a very melancholy manner, in ſweeping the Temple of the Goddeſs Minerva. I make uſe of Amyot's tranſlation, to ſhew their dreſs and employment.

(23) Plut. de ſera Numinis Vindicta, pag. 557.

Où les pieds nuds, ſans aucune veſture,
Sans voile aucun, ni honneſte coiffure,
Ne plus ne moiens qu' eſclaves, tout le jour
Des le matin elles ſont ſans ſejour
A balſier de Pallas la Déeſſe
Le temple ſaint juſques en leur vieilleſſe.

Thus tranſlated,

" Barefooted here, without or veil or gown,

" Or,

remarkable that the puniſhment fell on the ſex which had been injured; for the Locri were obliged to ſend, annually, young maids to Troy, where they paſſed their days in a very ſevere condition. They ſent maidens in this manner for ſeveral Centuries, and 'twas never known, that any one of them loſt their virginity (d). Theon the Sophiſt made an obſervation

(d) See in the remark [E], citation (31), St. Jerom's words.

" Or head-dreſs to confine their flowing hair,
" Like ſlaves they work; from morn to ſhadowing
" Eve,
" For ever they are ſweeping Pallas' Temple;
" Nor ceaſe, till frozen age benumbs their limbs.

After giving theſe verſes of Amiot, I ſhall make uſe of Vigenere's proſe, to explain more particularly the puniſhment, which Ajax's crime brought on the Locri. Timæus the Sicilian and Callimachus relate this more particularly, they declaring, that ſome three years after the death of Ajax, the Locri being afflicted with a grievous peſtilence, becauſe of the crime committed by their deceaſed Prince, the people were admoniſhed by the oracle, that they would be a thouſand years (from that time) appeaſing the Minerva of Troy; during which they muſt ſend to it, annually, two virgins, on whom the lot ſhould fall. Theſe poor creatures were obliged to ſet out privately in the night, by the moſt ſecret, ſolitary ways, in diſguiſe, in order to enter ſecretly into the temple of the Goddeſs; where if they arrived ſafe, they remained for her Miniſtry and ſervice, to ſweep and water the place; and whence they never dared to come out, nor approach the holy image, except in the night-time; being moreover ſhaved, cloathed in a wretched garment, and barefooted. But few among them could arrive there, becauſe the moment the Trojans were informed of their departure from Locris, (which was at certain ſtated ſeaſons) they uſed to lay in wait for them; and there, without the leaſt mercy, if any of them fell into their hands, they either were inhumanly ſtoned to death or killed with ſwords; then burnt upon the ſpot with the wood of trees, that do not bear fruit; and thrown their aſhes from mount Tracon (24) into the ſea. So ſeverely could the Gods of the Heathens take vengeance of thoſe who offended them (25).

(24) It ſhould have been Traron.

(25) Vigenere on Ajax the Locrian of Philoſtratus, tom. 1. pag. m. 711.

Vigenere cites Timæus the Hiſtorian, and Callimachus the Poet, as tho' the Books in which they related thoſe particulars were ſtill extant, which is an impoſition. That writer would have been more ſincere, as well as more exact, had he cited the Scholiaſt on Lycophron; for it is he who relates this incident, and produces the teſtimony of thoſe two Authors. He obſerves (26), that Peribœa and Cleopatra were the two firſt virgins whom the Locri ſent; and that there was ſome little variation in the method; for, at firſt, two virgins who were come to years of maturity were ſent; and afterwards children of but a year old, with their nurſes. In caſe the Trojans killed them before they arrived at the Temple, the Locri were obliged to proceed to a new choice. This cuſtom expired a thouſand years after the war of Troy. Χιλίων δ' ἐτῶν παρελθόντων μετὰ τὸν Τρωικὸν πόλεμον ἐπαύσαντο τῆς τοιαύτης θυσίας. We muſt read Τρωικὸν and not Φωκικὸν, as it is printed. The learned Caſaubon would have done better to correct the text in this manner, than to criticiſe Timæus, upon pretence, that there was only about 840 years, between the Trojan war, and the concluſion of the war of Phocœa (27). I am to obſerve, that he makes this remark, in commenting an Author who takes notice, that it is extremely difficult to guard ſufficiently againſt thoſe, who endeavour to introduce any thing in a clandeſtine manner. This Author mentions the Trojans as an inſtance, who though they employed the utmoſt precautions to prevent the Locrian Virgins from coming into Troy, they yet found all their endeavours fruitleſs. We ſee he ſpeaks of this cuſtom in the preſent tenſe, which is a proof that it ſtill exiſted (28). Μαρτύριον δὲ ὅτι τὰ εἰσειωπώμενα μετ' ἐπιβουλῆς χαλεπὸν φυλάξαι. Οἱ γὲν περὶ Ἴλιον ἄνθρωποι ἐκ τοσούτου χρόνου καὶ οὕτω διατεταγμένοι, οὔτω δύανται φυλάξαι μὴ εἰσελθεῖν αὐτοῖς τὰς Λοκρίδας. Καίτοι τοσοῦτον αὐτοῖς ἔσιν ἡ σπουδὴ καὶ ἡ φυλακή. ἀλλ' ὀλίγοι προσίχοντες τῷ λαθεῖν λανθάνουσι, πολλὰ εἰσάγοντες σώματα. i. e. " The great difficulty " there is of introducing a thing by ſtealth, may be " proved by an example. For the Trojans, tho' they " employed ſo much time, ſo much care and circumſpection, to prevent the Locri from entring the city " of Troy, they yet could not hinder it. But the few " who are to enter, deceived thoſe who watched for " them, and by that means many Locrian women are " brought into the city." Were this Author now living, he might confirm his aphoriſm by the example of a great multitude of Proteſtants, who eſcaped out of France, in ſpite of the well contrived meaſures which had been taken to prevent their leaving the Kingdom. I do not take notice of the ſucceſs of the ſtratagems by which contraband goods are brought in, in ſpite of the great number of Cuſtom-houſes and Officers,

(26) Tzetzes in Lycophron. ver. 1141.

(27) Caſaub. in Æneæ Poliorc. cap. 31. pag. m. 1784.

(28) Æneas in Poliorc. cap. 31. pag. m. 1704.

Et trompant de Colbert la prudence importune (29).
That is,
" Spite of ſage Colbert's well-concerted ſchemes.

(29) Deſpreaux, Sat. 8. ver. 195.

Caſaubon has committed a conſiderable error, tranſlating the paſſage where Polybius ſays, that there were, among the Locri, an hundred noble families, who were honoured with ſeveral prerogatives; and that the virgins who were ſent annually to Troy, were always to belong to theſe hundred families: Ἐξ ὧν ἔμελλον οἱ Λοκροὶ κατὰ τὸν χρησμὸν κληροῦν τὰς ἀποσταλησομένας παρθένους εἰς Ἴλιον (30). E quibus, according to Caſaubon's verſion, Locrenſes illas centum virgines ſorte legere ex oraculi reſponſo tenebantur, quæ erant quotannis ad Ilium mittendæ. This Latin ſignifies manifeſtly, that the Locri had ſent an hundred maidens annually to Troy; but this is not the tranſlation of Polybius's words, he not making any mention of the number of maidens who were ſent. I will here introduce a paſſage of St. Jerom. Juſtum eſt & Locras virgines non tacere, quæ cum Ilium mitterentur ex more, per annos circiter mille, nulla obſcœni rumoris & pollutæ virginitatis ullam fabulam dedit (31). i. e. " I muſt not omit the Locrian virgins, " who being ſent annually to Troy, according to a " cuſtom which prevailed about a thouſand years, ne- " ver gave occaſion to the leaſt evil report concerning " the violation of their chaſtity." He does not pretend to applaud theſe Locrian maidens, becauſe none of them had been raviſhed, but that none of them ſuffered her chaſtity to be violated; which certainly is a remarkable circumſtance, conſidering the length of the voyage, and the long duration of this cuſtom. We are not to wonder that the Trojans, who laid in wait for them, did not once attempt to enjoy them; for they conſidered them as ſo many victims who were loaded with curſes; they looked upon them as unclean animals, who deſerved only to be ſlaughtered and burnt, and their aſhes to be ſcattered in the air (32) by way of expiation. Tzetzes (33) obſerves, that one of them died on mount Traron near Troy; that the Locri buried her, ſaid nothing of it; but that they diſcontinued the ſending of any more maidens, becauſe they believed they had fulfilled the time preſcribed by the oracle. However, they were miſtaken; and their country began again to be afflicted with a famine, which made them reſume the cuſtom they had laid aſide; but now, inſtead of ſending two maidens, they ſent but one to Troy, imagining that this would be ſufficient to expiate for the future, the crime of Ajax. The Scholiaſt pretends, that they gave a wrong interpretation to the oracle, ſince Apollo, (without limitting any time) had commanded them to ſend two maidens, to expiate the injury which had been done to Caſſandra. But this is a bad remark; for he himſelf had juſt before ſaid, that the oracle had appointed a thouſand years (34); and this term of years is mentioned by ſeveral Authors (35). Ælian indeed ſuppoſes, that the oracle injoyned this puniſhment in general, till ſuch time as the Trojan Minerva ſhould be appeaſed (36). I muſt not omit what Strabo aſſerts, viz. that, in his time, it was generally ſaid by the Trojans, that the Greeks had never entirely ruined their city (37), which was proved in this manner, viz. that the Locri began to ſend maidens thither a very little after. To this Strabo anſwers two things. I, That Homer makes no mention of the raviſhing of Caſſandra: II, That the Locri did not begin to ſend

(30) Polyb. lib. 12. cap. 3. pag. 914. edit. Amſtel. 1670.

(31) Hieron. contra Jovinian. lib. 1. cap. 26.

(32) They uſed to be caſt in the Sea. Lycophr. ver. 1158.

(33) Tzetzes in Lycophron. ver. 1159.

(34) Idem, ibid. ver. 1141.

(35) Lycophron. ver. 1153. Scholiaſt. Homeri in lib. 13. ver. 66. ex Callimacho.

(36) Ælian. apud Suidam, pag. 623. in Ποινή.

(37) Strabo, lib. 13. pag. 413.

obſervation I ſhall here take notice of [F]. Caſſandra, in the diviſion of the plunder, fell to Agamemnon's lot. She was not diſpleaſing to this Prince [G]; and it is ſaid that Clytemneſtra was jealous of it, and that this was one of the motives which prompted her to murder her huſband (e) [H]. Caſſandra was not ſpared, ſhe being butchered at the ſame time; and two boys, (twins) whom ſhe had had by Agamemnon, met with the ſame fate (f). She was vaſtly beautiful, and had been ſought for in marriage by powerful Princes (g). A conteſt aroſe between the cities of Mycenè and Amicles about her tomb (h); each of them pretending to have it. A temple was built to her honour in Leuctra, where her ſtatue was honoured by the name of Alexandra (i) [I].

(e) Homer. Odyſſ. lib. 11. Hygin. cap. 17. Philoſtrat. in Caſſandra.

(f) Pauſan. lib. 2. pag. 147. edit. Lipſ. 1696.
(g) See the remark [D].
(h) Pauſan. lib. 2. pag. 147.
(i) Idem, lib. 3. pag. 277.

Lycophron ſpeaks of a temple of Caſſandra built by the Daunians, and by the inhabitants of the city of Dardanus. The ſtatue of this Lady was there an aſylum to ſuch maidens as were determined not to marry; and who grounded their refuſal on the uglineſs or mean extraction of thoſe who courted them. The remedy they employed on this occaſion was, to embrace the ſtatue of Caſſandra; but then they were obliged to put on the dreſs of furies, and change the colour of their complections, by dawbing their faces with certain drugs. They devoted themſelves in a particular manner to the worſhip of Caſſandra, and honoured her as a Goddeſs (k). There is not any paſſage in Lycophron expreſſed maidens, till the Monarchy of the Perſians. A conſiderable error is committed in the tranſlation of theſe words of Strabo: Αἱ γοῦν Δοκρίδες παρθένοι μικρὸν ὕστερον ἀρξάμεναι ἐπέμποντο κατ' ἔτος (38); for inſtead of Locrenſes quidem virgines paulò poſt cæperunt Ilium mitti quotannis, i. e. "A little after the Locrian virgins "uſed to be ſent to Troy every year," the tranſlator ſays Locrenſes, &c. mitti more uſitato: which ſignifies that this cuſtom was more antient than the war of Troy. In a word, this is a blunder of the tranſlator.

(k) Extracted from Lycophron, ver. 1128, & ſeq.

(38) Idem, ibid. edit. Genev. 1587.

[F] Theon the Sophiſt made an obſervation which I ſhall here take notice of.] It is a precept in Rhetoric, concerning the manner of refuting a narration. The Rhetorician, ſays he, muſt deny the fact, either by aſſerting that it is not poſſible, or that it is repugnant to probability; but, in caſe it be manifeſtly true, he muſt attack the narration on ſome other ſides; he muſt examine whether any thing be wanting; whether any uſeleſs particulars are introduced into it, or whether one part may be inconſiſtent or contradictory to the reſt. For, if the Rhetorician finds nothing amiſs in theſe reſpects, he then muſt oppoſe decency and utility; for, in the ſame manner as certain actions ought not to be committed, ſo they ought not to be related after they have been committed. It is better to bury them in everlaſting oblivion. It would therefore be very unſeemly, if, after repreſenting Ajax as impious as is related, the writer ſhould add, that he did not meet with any misfortune either at ſea or in his own houſe, and died in a happy old age. One may eaſily ſuppoſe, that Theon's meaning is, that if ſome Orators had related the actions of Ajax, without ever deviating from the rules but in that ſingle point, viz. their not ſuppreſſing the good fortune which followed his impiety; there would have been no other way of refuting their narration, but by ſhewing that they had not been ſilent in that place where they ought to have been ſo. The only engine that could be levelled at them, would be the common place of utility and decorum; they could be cenſured for nothing, but for exhibiting to public view an impious man made fortunate, an object that claſhes with decorum, and may be of prejudice to good manners. It will be neceſſary for me to quote the words of the Greek Sophiſt; for they contain I know not what, that is ſurprizing, and which does not agree very well either with the laws of hiſtory or with truth; but the Rhetoricians have ſome rules which are peculiar to their art only (39). Εἰ ὃ ταῦτα πάντα κατὰ τρόπον εἴη διατεθειμένα, ἀλλ' ὡς ἁπλῶς τι, καὶ ἀσύμφορον διωκτέον. Εἰ δὲ τῶν πραγμάτων, ἃ πραχθῆναι μὲν οὐκ ἐχρῆν, φθάσαντα δὲ πραχθῆναι, σωτῆρός συμφέρει, οἷον, εἴ τις τὸν Λοκρὸν Αἴαντα τοιαῦτα εἰπὼν εἰς τὰς Ἀθήνας ἀσεβῆσαι, οἷα λέγεται, ἔπειτα ὑπόθοιτο, μήτε ἐν τῇ θαλάττῃ, μήτε οἴκοι, κακόν τι αὐτὸν πιπονθότα, ἐν γήρᾳ μὲν εὐδαιμονίας τετελευτηκέναι (40). However it be, this makes for the tradition, concerning the puniſhment of Caſſandra's raviſher.

(39) See the Remark [A] of the Article CASTRITIUS (TITUS). See alſo the concluſion of the remark [B] of the Article CASSIAN Family.
(40) Theoph. in Progymnaſm. cap. 6. pag. 87, 88. edit. Lugd. Batav. 1626.

[G] Caſſandra . . . was not diſpleaſing to this Prince.] Agamemnon fell in love with her, if we may believe Euripides (41), and obtained her from the Greeks as a kind of gift. She was not diſpoſed by way of lot, but was ſet apart, in order to be preſented to that Monarch (42), who made her his concubine (43). I have ſpoke of Horace's wrong argumentation in the article BRESEIS (44). This Poet would prove, that his friend ought not to be aſhamed at loving his maid ſervant, ſince Agamemnon did not bluſh to love King Priam's daughter:

(44) Remark [E].

Arſit Atreides medio in triumpho
Virgine rapta (45).
Thus engliſhed,
"Fam'd Agamemnon, midſt his glorious triumphs,
"Sigh'd for the raviſhed virgin——

(45) Horat. Od. 4. lib. 2. ver. 7.

By the way, Hyginus ſhould not have aſſerted that Oeax, to revenge the death of his brother Palamedes, told Clytemneſtra a falſhood, by informing her, (in oppoſition to truth) that her huſband was bringing her a rival, or rather a concubine, viz. Caſſandra (46). This was not telling her a falſhood. Pauſanias informs us that Caſſandra, being got with child by Agamemnon, was delivered of twins, whom Ægiſtheus murthered on their father's grave (47).

(46) Hygin. cap. 117.

(47) Pauſan. lib. 2. pag. 59.

[H] . . . . Clytemneſtra was jealous of it; and this was one of the motives which prompted her to murder her huſband.] Hyginus, in the place before cited, relates, that the words of Palamedes's brother had a deſired effect. Clytemneſtra being informed that her huſband was bringing Caſſandra, reſolved to get rid of them both, and accordingly did ſo. She owns in Euripides, that the injury her huſband had done her, in ſacrificing Iphigenia, would not have prompted her to murther him; but he was returned, ſaid ſhe, with an enthuſiaſtic, frantic wench; he had put her into my bed, and we were two brides under one roof.

Ἀλλ' ἦλθ' ἔχων μοι Μαινάδ' ἔνθεον κόρην
Λέκτροις τ' ἐπεισέφρησε, κἀνόμφα δυοῖν
Ἐν τοῖς αὐτοῖσι δώμασι κατεύχομαι (48).

(48) Euripides in Electra, ver. 1032. pag. m. 627.

Meziriac pretends, that Pindar mentions theſe very two cauſes for Clytemneſtra's attempt, but he is miſtaken; Pindar's two cauſes are, the remembrance of Iphigenia's ſacrifice, and the fear of Agamemnon's anger. His wife had led ſo diſſolute a life (49), that ſhe did not think it poſſible, either that her crime could be concealed, or that her huſband would ſuffer her to go unpuniſhed. It is plain this is Pindar's thought, and I am ſurprized Meziriac did not perceive it. See his Commentary on Ovid's Epiſtles, pag. 891.

(49) Ἡ ἐτέρῳ λέχει δαμαλιζομένην Ἐννύχιοι παράγον κοῖται. Pindar. Pyth. Od. 11. pag. m. 470.

[I] She was honoured by the name of Alexandra.] She was very near as much known by this name, as by that of Caſſandra; witneſs the Poem ſtill extant of Lycophron, which is entitled Alexandra, becauſe it is a Prophecy made, as the Poet ſuppoſes, by Caſſandra. It is whimſical in Tzetzes to ſuppoſe, that ſhe was called Alexandra, παρὰ τὸ ἀλύξαι τὴν ἀνδρὸς συνουσίαν, (becauſe ſhe fled the amorous embrace) or, to uſe the expreſſion of Mr. de Meziriac of the French Academy, becauſe ſhe ſhunned all carnal copulation with men. I am of opinion that ſhe ſhunned full as much, fire, water and precipices. He therefore had as much reaſon to draw the etymology of her name from thence.

(41) Ἔρως ἐτόξευσ' αὐτὸν ἐν Διὸς κύρει. Euripid. in Troad. ver. 255.
(42) Ἐξαίρετόν νιν ἔλαβεν Ἀγαμέμνων ἄναξ. Ibid. ver. 249.
(43) Ibid. ver. 44. and 252.

expreſſed more clearly than this [K]; nevertheleſs, it is impoſſible to find the proofs of it in the Authors which have been handed down to us; and indeed we find the notes of our Commentators very dry and barren on this occaſion. Plutarch informs us, that there was in Thalamæ (l) an Oracle of Paſiphae; and that, according to ſome writers, Caſſandra died in that place, and was called Paſiphae, becauſe ſhe gave Oracles to all who came and conſulted her (m).

(l) A City of Peloponneſus.

(m) Ex Plut. in Agide & Cleom. pag. 799.

[K] Lycophron ſpeaks of a Temple of Caſſandra... There is not any paſſage in this Poet expreſſed more clearly.] Notwithſtanding this, the conſtruction of his words are ſuch, as may admit of many doubts. For the reader is not certain, whether the Poet means, that the ſtatue of Caſſandra will be as a preſervative to thoſe young maidens from marriage; or whether it aſcribes this virtue to the dreſs they ſhould wear, and to the ointments which would change their complections. This laſt ſenſe is not abſurd; for we may naturally ſuppoſe, that this new geer they appeared in, was a remedy for love. Conſider the words of this Poet.

Ἐμὼν περιπτύξουσιν ὠλένας βρίτας
Ἄλκαρ μίγιστον κλᾴμασι τυρφιμώτων
Ἐρινύων ἰσθῆτα καὶ ῥίπτας βαφὰς
Πεπαρμένας θρόνοισι φαρμακτηρίοις (50).

(50) Lycophron, ver. 1135.

Imitated,

" Their out-ſtretch'd arms ſhall wind around my
" ſtatue,
" And find the ſureſt remedy 'gainſt marriage;
" Having aſſumed the hideous dreſs of furies,
" And ſmear'd their faces with black odious oint-
" ments.

Such kind of aſylums were very rare; they doubtleſs were not found neceſſary. This perhaps is the only one that has been ſpoke of; and yet it was unknown to Hiſtorians and Geographers.

CASSIUS, a Roman Family. Thoſe Writers who only obſerve it to have been Patrician, are as much miſtaken as they who affirm it, ſimply and abſolutely, to have been Plebeian (a) [A]. Antonius Auguſtinus (b), and Corradus (c) ſay, with more foundation, that there were two families of this name, the one Patrician, the other Plebeian; for we meet with one Caſſius who was Conſul, a few years after the expulſion of the Kings, and a long time before the Plebeians had obtained, anno 387 of Rome, a right of enjoying the Conſular Dignity. We alſo find a Caſſius Tribune of the People, to which employment none but Plebeians could be raiſed; we ſee him, I ſay, inveſted with it, a little after the beginning of the ſeventh Century of the Commonwealth. There conſequently muſt have been either two families named Caſſius, the one a Patrician and the other a Plebeian, as Suetonius obſerves with regard to the Claudians (d); or that the ſame family Caſſia, being Patrician at firſt, afterwards became Plebeian, as was the caſe with ſome others. I believe it will not be very eaſy to decide this matter [B]. The antient Writers do not give us lights ſufficient for that purpoſe. Tacitus ſeems not to have known any other Caſſian family but that which was Plebeian [C]; or elſe that he was ſenſible, that the Plebeian family Caſſia did not deſcend from the Patrician Caſſius's.

(a) Glandorp. Onomaſtic. pag. 202.

(b) In Famil. Romanis.

(c) In Brutum Ciceron. pag. 178, but he is miſtaken, when he aſſerts, that ſeveral of the firſt Conſuls were named Caſſius; there being but one.

(d) In Tiberio, init.

CASSIUS

[A] Thoſe writers who content themſelves with declaring it to have been Patrician, are as much miſtaken as they who affirm it ſimply and abſolutely to have been Plebeian.] Richard Streinnius (1) ſhould not have ranked this family among the Patricians, without obſerving ſome diſtinction; ſince among the ſeveral Caſſius's mentioned by him, there is but one who was indiſputably a Patrician; and that all the reſt are probably of the ſame family with L. Caſſius Longinus, whom he declares to have been Tribune of the People, the year of Rome 616. He did not forget to cenſure Valerius Maximus, for making a Caſſius, who was a Patrician and of conſular dignity Tribune of the people (2); and, in the ſame page, he falls into much ſuch an error. Glandorp commits one of an oppoſite kind; for after ſaying at firſt that the Caſſii were Plebeians; he begins the liſt of the perſons ſo called, by the Caſſius who was ſentenced to die for treaſon, the year of Rome 269, after having been thrice Conſul (3). We muſt not rank Conſuls, in Plebeian families, till after the year of Rome 387; and we muſt never rank Tribunes of the people among Patricians, as being Patricians.

(1) In Stemmat. Gent. & Familiar. Romanar.

(2) Val. Maxim. lib. 5. cap. 8.

(3) Glandorp. Onomaſtic. pag. 202.

[B] There... either muſt have been two families, named Caſſius,... or that the ſame family Caſſia, being Patrician at firſt, afterwards became Plebeian.... I believe it will not be very eaſy to decide this matter.] Nevertheleſs Cicero ſeems to remove this uncertainty, when he aſſerts, that Caſſius the murtherer of Julius Cæſar ſprung from a family, which would not ſubmit to ſovereign Power, nor indeed to that of any one (4). It is very plain that he hinted at Spurius Caſſius, who was ſaid to have been condemned by his own father, for aſpiring to the regal Dignity, the year of Rome 269. Now it is very certain, that the Caſſius Longinus's, of whom he that conſpired againſt Cæſar was one, were of a Plebeian family; ſince therefore he was of the family, (natus in familia) which could not bear the ambition of Spurius Caſſius, may we not aſſert that the Plebeian Houſe Caſſia deſcended from that which was Patrician? But it may be anſwered, that Cicero's teſtimony is not to be very much depended upon on this occaſion; for, not to mention that he ſpeaks ſuccinctly and briefly of the affair of Spurius Caſſius, (which he would not have done had he been very certain of what he aſſerted) we find he ſuppoſes, in the ſame place, that Brutus, the aſſaſſin of Julius Cæſar, deſcended from him who drove out Tarquin. Nevertheleſs this is a very doubtful fact (5). We then muſt imagine, that Cicero acted on that occaſion like an able Pleader, who makes a merit of every thing that may ſerve his cauſe. See Corradus in his Commentary on the following words of the Brutus of Cicero: Conceſſum eſt Rhetoribus mentiri in Hiſtoriis, ut aliquid dicere poſſint argutius. i. e. " Rhetoricians " are allowed to advance ſome untruths in hiſtory, " that they may have an opportunity of ſaying ſome " ſmart things." Brutus and Caſſius were not diſpleaſed to have it ſuppoſed, that they ſprung from thoſe of the ſame name with themſelves, who had diſtinguiſh'd themſelves ſo much antiently; and there is no doubt but their friends ſpread ſuch a report as occaſion offered. A rumour was alſo ſpread, (tho' leſs probable) that Spurius Caſſius had been puniſhed by his own father. Cicero finding that all this made for his purpoſe, took advantage of it. It was not neceſſary, in an oratorical piece, that all theſe particulars ſhould be undoubted fact. Conſequently we ſhall ſtill be in as much uncertainty, notwithſtanding this authority.

(4) Quid? C. Caſſius in ea familia natus quæ non modo dominatum, ſed ne potentiam quidem cujusquam ferre potuit, me auctorem, credo, deſideravit? Cicero, Philipp. 2.

(5) See the Remark [K] of the Article BRUTUS (Marcus Junius.)

[C] Tacitus ſeems not to have known any other family (the Caſſian) but that which was Plebeian.] When he ſpeaks of L. Caſſius, who was married to Druſilla daughter of Germanicus, he declares him to be of a Plebeian Family, which however was antient, and illuſtrious by the public employments the individuals of it had exerciſed (6). Plebei Romæ generis, verum antiqui honoratique (7). Had Streinnius conſider'd this paſſage, he either would have changed the ſtate of this family, or have explained it better. All the Caſſius Longinus's were doubtleſs Plebeians. William Grotius (8) therefore committed a miſtake, in declaring that C. Caſſius Longinus was of a Patrician Family.

(6) Tacit. Ann. lib. 6. cap. 15.

(7) See the preceding remark.

(8) In Vitis Jurisconſultorum, pag. 198.

CASSIUS VISCELLINUS (SPURIUS) after having thrice enjoyed the Conſular Dignity; been once General of the Horſe (a) under the firſt Dictator that was created in Rome; and twice received the honour of a triumph; was condemned to die in the year of Rome 269, for aſpiring to the Regal Dignity (b). Moreri gives two articles inſtead of one on this occaſion [A]; and, beſides this, is guilty of four miſtakes [B]. He was not able to rectify the blunders of Valerius Maximus; and the Commentators on the laſt mentioned Author have rectified them but little better [C].

Hofman

(a) In Calepin, the General of the Horſe is not rightly diſtinguiſhed from Spurius Caſſius who was thrice Conſul, &c.

(b) See the Remark [A].

VALERIUS MAXIMUS, who is not very exact, is miſunderſtood by Moreri.

[A] Moreri gives two articles inſtead of one on this occaſion.] He has fallen into the worſt method poſſible with regard to our Spurius Caſſius, whom he makes a different perſon from him mentioned in Chapt. VIII, Book V of Valerius Maximus. One very eaſily perceives, by examining the originals carefully, that the Caſſius mentioned by Valerius Maximus in this place, is not different from him whoſe puniſhment he relates elſewhere (1), and whoſe hiſtory Livy and Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus have preſerved. There we meet with the puniſhment of but one man; but becauſe the circumſtances of it were variouſly related; and that Valerius Maximus, who is a very inaccurate compiler, has ſpoke in a different manner, at different times, (and never completely and fully) of this particular; Moreri choſe rather to multiply perſons without any neceſſity, rather than adhere to the moſt reaſonable, or rather, (if I dare ſay it,) the only reaſonable ſuppoſition, which is, to reduce (as I have done) the whole to the ſingle fact related by me in the text of this article. I will now lay open the grounds of this confuſion.

(1) Lib. 6. cap. 3.

DIFFERENT accounts of the condemnation of this Caſſius.

(2) Antiq. Rom. lib. 8.

(3) Lib. 2.

Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus (2) and Livy (3) allow, that the moſt probable ſuppoſition is, that the two Queſtors accuſed Spurius Caſſius before the people; and that having obtained ſentence of death to be pronounced againſt him, they cauſed him to be executed. Livy, however, informs us, (as a leſs probable tradition) that Caſſius had no other judge but his own father, who having brought his ſon to a trial in his own houſe, cauſed him to be ſcourged and put to death; which done, he conſecrated the peculium (eſtate) of this ſon, to the Goddeſs Ceres. Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus gives us likewiſe a ſecond tradition, (as leſs probable indeed) but nevertheleſs related by Authors worthy of credit: 'tis this, that Caſſius's father, being the firſt who entertained a ſuſpicion of his ſon, enquired very exactly into the whole affair; afterwards informed the Senate of it, and furniſhed proofs on which that Aſſembly condemn'd him; and that in conſequence of this, the father brought the criminal home, and put him to death. Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus argues againſt this; and, among other reaſons, employs the following; that, in his time, there was ſeen near the temple of Tellus or the Earth, the place where Caſſius's houſe had ſtood, which had been raz'd after his execution. He adds that, in proceſs of time, part of this ground was taken, in order to build the temple of Tellus upon it; and that the reſt of the ground was left empty and void. The only reaſon of my giving theſe circumſtances, is to ſhew the more evidently, that Moreri miſtook in ſuppoſing that he found two Caſſius's who were puniſhed with death, in the Authors he has given us as his authorities. For, had he carefully compared Valerius Maximus (the chief ſource of his error) with the two Hiſtorians above cited, he would have found, that this Author mentions only the Spurius Caſſius Viſcellinus of the other two. And indeed what does Valerius Maximus ſay in Chapter VIII of Book V? That Caſſius, imitating the example of Brutus, and knowing that his ſon, who was Tribune of the people, had propoſed a law which till then had been never heard of, (this was the Agrarian Law); and that he gained himſelf a ſtrong party by his many popular intrigues; condemn'd him (in conjunction with his friends and relations) in his own houſe, for having aſpired to the regal dignity; cauſed him to be ſcourged and put to death, and conſecrated his Peculium to Ceres. In the IIId Chapter of Book V, he ſpeaks of the indignation with which the people were fired againſt Spurius Caſſius; and obſerves, that they had leſs regard to his two Triumphs and three Conſulſhips, than to the ſuſpicions they entertained of his ambition; and that the Senate and people, not being ſatisfied with putting him to death, pull'd down his houſe, and built, on the place where it had ſtood, the temple of Tellus.

'Tis manifeſt, that all he ſays in theſe two places, (the groſs error excepted of making one of the family of Caſſius Tribune of the people at that time) (4) agrees with Spurius Caſſius Viſcellinus according to the various circumſtances of his trial, related by Livy and Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus. I will confeſs that he ſeems to be miſtaken in it; and that it is better, (ſince he cannot be altogether excuſed) to allow, that he has made two facts or incidents of one; than to ſay, that he falſified the circumſtances of a ſentence or trial, in order to make a double uſe of it; in the one, to give an inſtance of the ſeverity of a father, and in the other, an example of the ſeverity of the people. But Moreri ought to have rectified this Writer by the teſtimony of good Hiſtorians.

(4) He has alſo committed a miſtake, which will be mentioned below.

[B] .. Moreri ... beſides this, is guilty of four miſtakes.] I. He had been very much puzzled, had he been call'd upon to prove, that the father of our Caſſius had the prænomen Spurius. II. This pretended Spurius Caſſius ought not to have been placed in the 230th year of Rome; for as he is known to us only by the ſeverity he exerciſed towards his ſon, the time, when that ſeverity was put in execution, ought to agree pretty near with that time. But if it did agree with it, then Caſſius muſt neceſſarily have puniſhed his ſon under Tarquin's reign; and that there were Tribunes of the people before the expulſion of the Tarquins, which is falſe and abſurd; and conſequently the fixing it to the year 230 of Rome, is not a juſt date. III. I obſerve, that it ſerves to no other uſe but to confound the Author who employs it; for, if Spurius Caſſius lived at that time, then his ſon muſt have been Tribune of the people, much about the time that Livy and Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus fix the puniſhment of Spurius Caſſius Viſcellinus, that is, to the year of Rome 269; which ſhews that we muſt not ſuppoſe (with Moreri) two Caſſius's who were puniſhed much about the ſame time, the one by his own father, and the other by the people, for having a deſign to ſeat himſelf on the throne, by means of the Agrarian Law. For in caſe here had been, much about the ſame time, two perſons of the ſame name put to death for the ſame treaſon, moſt Hiſtorians would have taken notice of it; whereas not one of them ſays a word on that head. IV. Let us add, that Moreri ſhould not have barely ſaid, that Caſſius had a ſon who was Tribune; but Tribune of the people; and have refuted this pretended office which Valerius Maximus beſtows upon him. The learned Manutius was led into a miſtake by Valerius Maximus (5).

(5) Fuit in ea familia (Caſſia) qui necari filium voluerit, quod Agrariam legem Tribunus plebis tuliſſet, quaſi de regno cogitaret. Paulus Manut. in Cicer. Philipp. II.

(6) Ex nova recenſione A. Thyſii. Lugd. Batav. 1655, in 8vo.

[C] The Commentators of Valerius Maximus . . have rectified them but very little.] There is nothing in the Valerius Maximus Variorum (6), that may induce us to believe, that the Commentators of it had perceived the errors of their Author; no enquiry is made, whether the Caſſius in his Vth book, is the ſame with him in his VIth. No one thinks it ſtrange, that, in Valerius Maximus's Vth book, the ſentence and execution of Caſſius ſhould be a domeſtic affair; and in his VIth, an affair of the Senate and people. One of the Commentators makes the Caſſius of the VIth book live anno 668 of Rome; only four hundred years lower than it ought to be. Father Cantel, who publiſhed Valerius Maximus in uſum Delphini, obſerves no farther on the paſſage in queſtion of Book V, but that the Author does not agree either with Livy or Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus; but he ſhould alſo have declared, either in that place, or on the ſixth book, that he does not agree with himſelf. We are referred, with regard to the laſt paſſage, to places which take no manner of notice of what had been promiſed. Writers ought to be more careful in the numerical figures of ſuch books, as are deſigned for the inſtruction of youth.

ERROR of Valerius Maximus, with regard to the temple of Tellus.

The Commentators in queſtion have been ſo indulgent, as not to reproach their Author, with having written too negligently of this Temple of Tellus. He has Hofman, all things conſidered, is at leaſt as faulty as Moreri [D].

has ranged the words of his relation in ſuch a manner, as plainly ſhews that he intended to make his readers ſuppoſe, that the building of this Temple was one of the articles of the ſentence pronounced againſt Caſſius, and one of the principal reaſons of his puniſhment. Senatus populuſque Romanus, ſays he (7), non contentus capitali eum ſupplicio afficere, interempto domum ſuperjecit, ut penatium quoque ſtrage puniretur, in ſolo autem ædem Telluris fecit. Itaque quod prius domicilium impotentis viri fuerat, nunc religioſæ SEVERITATIS monumentum eſt. i. e. "The Senate and people of Rome, not "contented with executing him, pulled down his "houſe, that he might be puniſh'd in the ruin of his "houſhold-gods, and built on the ſame ſpot the Tem-"ple of Tellus. Thus that which was formerly the "houſe of an ambitious man, is now a monument of "religious SEVERITY." 'Tis plain he conſiders the building of this Temple, as part of the puniſhment inflicted on Caſſius by the Judges. Now, this is the very article for which a Commentator ought to have cenſur'd him; ſince he had obſerved on this occaſion (8), that the Temple of Tellus, devoted by T. Sempronius, ſtood, according to Servius, in the diſtrict or diviſion of the city called Carinæ; for it appears by Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, that the Temple of Tellus, built on part of the ſpot on which Caſſius's houſe ſtood before, was near that part of the city. This Temple was therefore not built till upwards of two hundred years after Caſſius's execution (9); conſequently it was not built with a deſign to aggravate his puniſhment; and in that caſe they would have ſet about it very late. And indeed, we don't find that Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus makes any relation between the puniſhment of this criminal and the Temple of Tellus; and denotes ſufficiently, that theſe two incidents happened at ſome diſtance one from the other.

(7) Lib. 6. cap. 3.

(8) In pag. 534. of Valerius Maximus Variorum, by Thyſius.

(9) Sempronius devoted it during the war with the Picentini; the year of Rome 485.

TEMPLE of Tellus in Pliny.

The Temple of Tellus, in Rome, mentioned ſomewhere by Pliny (10), was built long before that which was devoted by T. Sempronius. But this is of no uſe to juſtify Valerius Maximus, ſince (were we to ſtand to the deciſion of this paſſage, we then muſt ſuppoſe that this Temple of Tellus had preceded Caſſius's execution. And indeed, Pliny's words imply, that in the year 596, the cenſors cauſed ſeveral ſtatues to be removed; and even melted down that which Sp. Caſſius, who aſpired to the regal dignity, had raiſed in his own honour in the Temple of Tellus. Perhaps that, inſtead of the Temple of Tellus, it ought to have been, the Temple of Ceres; for as it was Spurius Caſſius, who, during his ſecond Conſulate, dedicated the Temple of Ceres (11), which Poſthumius the Dictator had devoted three years before; he very probably choſe to ſet his ſtatue there, preferably to any other place. However, I dare not affirm any thing on this head. I will only add, that neither the Dictionaries of Charles Stephens, Calepin, Lloyd, or Hofman, who all quote Valerius Maximus's words, take the leaſt notice of his error.

(10) Lib. 34. cap. 6.

(11) Dion. Halicarn. lib. 6.

REMARK on Pliny and Father Hardouin.

By the way I will obſerve, that Pliny has followed the tradition, which declared that the father judged and puniſhed his ſon in his own houſe (12); and Father Hardouin ſeems to endeavour to ſave Pliny's honour (with regard to his diſcernment) in that place; for after citing the words of Livy, which obſerve that ſome perſons had related the incident in this manner; he adds, that Valerius Maximus and Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus affirm it; whilſt others aſſert that Caſſius was thrown headlong from a rock. No reader would be able to gueſs from this the real opinion of Livy and of Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, which is far from coinciding with that of Pliny. If this paſſage be not quite ſo accurate as it ſhould be, we may very eaſily excuſe it in a writer, whoſe learned Commentary coſt him the utmoſt pains, and is the reſult of an application that is very rarely met with.

(12) Plinius, lib. 34. cap. 4. Florus alſo follows that tradition, lib. 1. cap. 26.

[D] Hofman, all things conſidered, is at leaſt as faulty as Moreri.] For if, on one ſide, Moreri is in an error, in making Spurius Caſſius's father live in the 230th year of Rome; Hofman commits a particular miſtake, in declaring that Valerius Maximus aſſerts, that after that the ſon had been ſcourged and put to death by his father's order, the plunder was applied to the building a Temple to Ceres. Templo dein Cereris ex præda extructo. We have already obſerved (13) that Caſſius dedicated this Temple, and conſequently it was not built after his death. Beſides, the confiſcated poſſeſſions of a rebel, are not called booty or plunder. In fine, if any would ſtill raiſe objections, from the multiplicity of Temples built in honour of Ceres, ought he not at leaſt to pay ſome regard to theſe words of an antient Author, Verberibus affectum necari juſſit, ac peculium ejus Cereri conſecravit (14)? i. e. "After "cauſing him to be ſcourged, he commanded him to "be put to death, and dedicated his eſtate to Ceres?" Does this ſignify a Temple built to Ceres? and if he were deſirous of ſpecifying the uſe to which the peculium conſecrated to this Goddeſs was employed, why did he not conſult Livy (15), Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus (16) and Pliny (17), who all affirm, that a brazen ſtatue was made out of it?

(13) The Citation (11) above.

(14) Val. Max. lib. 5. cap. 8.

(15) Lib. 2.
(16) Antiq. Rom. lib. 8.
(17) Lib. 34. cap. 4.

CASSIUS LONGINUS (LUCIUS) flouriſhed in the ſeventh Century of Rome. He was a Judge, and ſo famous for his inflexible ſeverity, that his tribunal was called the Rock of the Impeached [A]. I believe he is not the ſame LUCIUS CASSIUS whom Cicero mentions in his Treatiſe de claris Oratoribus, and in his third book de Legibus [B]; but [A] His tribunal was called the Rock of the Impeached.] 'Tis not Cicero who informs us of this particular, as Julian Brodeau ſuppoſed, who was very juſtly and modeſtly cenſured by Menage (1) on that account: 'tis Valerius Maximus (2), who relates it, to do the greater honour to Mark Anthony, grandfather of the Triumvir. This Mark Anthony was one of the ableſt Orators of his age. He was going into Aſia as Quæſtor, when news was brought him, that he was ſummoned (upon an accuſation of committing inceſt) before the dreadful Tribunal of L. Caſſius the Prætor, that Tribunal which was called Scopulum reorum. He did not fail making his appearance, and would not take advantage of the Law, which forbid the receiving of any accuſations, againſt thoſe who were abſent reipublicæ cauſa (upon affairs of the Commonwealth), and was acquitted (3). A modern Author thinks, that Caius Aquilius the Prætor is he whoſe Tribunal was called, the Rock of the Accuſed (4). This Aquilius was Prætor at the ſame time with Cicero (5).

(1) Amœnitat. Jurif. cap. 43. pag. 420. edit. Francofurt. 1680.
(2) Lib. 3. cap. 7. von 9. ut apud Menagium, ibid.

(3) See the article of MARK ANTHONY the Orator above, citation (a).
(4) See the Biblioth. Univerſ. tom. 13. pag. 121.
(5) Bertrand. in Vitis Juriſcon. pag. 223. citing the Topicks of Cicero.

[B] I believe he is not the ſame Lucius Caſſius, whom Cicero mentions in his Treatiſe of illuſtrious Orators, and in his third Book of Laws.] Cicero deſcribes him in ſuch a manner, as plainly ſhews that he ſpeaks of L. Caſſius Tribune of the people, anno 1616; for he aſcribes to him the Lex Tabellaria (6), enacted under the Conſulate of M. Lepidus, and C. Mancinus. There is no room to doubt, but that L. Caſſius, who was Conſul the year of Rome 626, and Cenſor anno 628, was the ſame with the Caſſius who was Tribune of the people anno 616. In my opinion therefore, it was not he, whoſe Tribunal was called the Rock of the Accuſed; for then we muſt ſuppoſe, that after having attained the higheſt employment in the Commonwealth, anno 628, he deſcended back to the Prætorſhip twelve or thirteen years after; ſince the Prætor mentioned by Valerius Maximus on occaſion of Mark Anthony's proſecution, muſt have been in office about the year of Rome 640; or elſe we muſt ſuppoſe, that this Author does not expreſs with a requiſite exactneſs the qualities of L. Caſſius.

(6) A Law enacted, by which the People were not allowed to give their votes by word of mouth, but in writing. See Mercerus on Alexander ab Alexandro, lib. 4. chap. 3. num. 894.

A FALSE citation of Father Cantel.

Father Cantel, in his Commentaries on Valerius Maximus in uſum Delphini (7), ſays a thing that removes the whole difficulty, viz. that L. Caſſius, by an extraordinary creation made Prætor, after his Conſulate and Cenſorſhip, becauſe of the reputation he had acquired of being very ſevere, obtained, by order of the people, the authority of taking cognizance of inceſtuous crimes, at the time that complaint was made, that the Prieſts had acted with too much indolence, againſt the Veſtals who were accuſed of incontinence.

(7) In Lib. 3. cap. 7. pag. 179 and 180.

but I take him not to differ from the Caſſius who gave vogue to the famous maxim cui 642

The misfortune is, that neither the epitome of Livy, nor Aſconius Pedianus, cited by Father Cantel, ſay any ſuch thing. The Abridgment of Livy (8) obſerves only, that Æmilia, Licinia and Martia, all Veſtals, were condemned for committing inceſt; and that it was related in what manner this inceſt had been committed, diſcover'd and puniſhed. What a noble piece of hiſtory is here loſt! What pity it is, that we have not this related by Livy's grave and majeſtick pen! It is pity too, we don't know all that Dion had related concerning the proſecution of theſe Veſtals. Some account is given of this in the Excerpta publiſhed by Valeſius in 1636 (9). But let us examine the words of Aſconius Pedianus; he deſcends pretty much to particulars, eſpecially with regard to L. Caſſius. At the time, ſays he (10), that Sextus Peduceus, Tribune of the people, accuſed L. Metellus the Pontifex Maximus, and the whole college of Pontiffs, of having judged unjuſtly the inceſtuous crime of the Veſtals, of whom Æmilia only had been condemned; the two others, viz. Marcia and Licinia, having been cleared; the people appointed L. Caſſius, a Judge of extraordinary ſeverity, to bring thoſe Veſtals to a new trial; which being done, Caſſius not only condemned them both, but ſeveral others; and it is likewiſe thought that he acted with too great ſeverity.

(8) Epiſt. 63.

(9) Pag. 628.

(10) Aſcon. Pedian. in Orat. Cicer. pro Milone.

It does not appear from this paſſage, that Lucius Caſſius had been Conſul and Cenſor before this; nor that the dignity of extraordinary Prætor was conferred on him. Nevertheleſs, we may gather from hence, by giving a little more latitude to the expreſſions, that the people inveſted him at that time, with an extraordinary and ſpecial Commiſſion, ſuch as the Grand Jours (Seſſions); or that iſſued to Mr. Boucherat (11) in 1680, to preſide in trials of poyſoning and witchcraft. Thus, provided we ſuppoſe that Valerius Maximus expreſſed himſelf wrong, in repreſenting to us ſimply as a Prætor, a man who had already filled the higheſt employments in the Commonwealth; and who was inveſted at that time with an extraordinary authority, in order for him to preſide over important cauſes; we then may believe, that L. Caſſius, Tribune of the people in 616, Conſul in 626, and Cenſor in 628, preſided in the trials for inceſt, about the year 640; and that he judged Mark Anthony the Orator. By the character Cicero has given of him (12), we ſhall conclude, that the talents he poſſeſſed were ſuch, as might naturally acquire him the character of being the Rock of the impeached or accuſed; but, on the other ſide, ſeverity was ſo common to his family, that it is impoſſible to determine from thence, whether the perſon who enjoyed that dreadful reputation, was the Tribune of anno 616, or his ſon, or brother, or nephew, or couſin. L. Caſſius, ex familia tum ad cæteras res tum ad judicandum ſeveriſſima (13). i. e. "Lucius Caſſius, ſprung from a family, famous for its "ſeverity in all things, and eſpecially in pronouncing "judgment." Add to this a paſſage from Tacitus. Ita dignum majoribus ſuis & familiæ Caſſiæ per illas quoque gentes celebrata (14). i. e. "Thus he was "worthy of his anceſtors, and of the Caſſian family, "and famous likewiſe among thoſe Nations."

(11) He was made Chancellor of France in 1685, and he had already filled ſeveral of the higheſt employments of the long Robe. He died in September 1699.

(12) Tum L. Caſſius multum potuit non eloquentiâ, ſed dicendo tamen; homo non liberalitate ut alii, ſed ipsâ triſtitiâ & ſeveritate popularis. Cicero in Brut. cap. 25. i. e. "Caſſius was at "that time very "powerful, not "by his elo-"quence, but "his manner of "delivering "himſelf; a "man who "made himſelf "popular, not "as others do, "by liberality, "but by his ſo-"lemnity and "ſeverity."

(13) Cicer. Verr. II. ſpeaking of a Caſſius who was made a military Tribune, at the time of Verres's proſecution.

(14) Tacit. Ann. lib. 12. cap. 12. ſpeaking of a Caſſius, Governor of Syria, who even in times of peace, maintained the ſtricteſt military diſcipline.

WHETHER we know to which Caſſius the maxim Cui bono belongs.

Nor can we determine the queſtion from this remark, viz. that Cicero, who has often mentioned the maxim Cui bono introduced by a very ſevere Judge, L. Caſſius by name, (doubtleſs the ſame perſon whoſe Tribunal was called Populus Reorum) does not ſay, on any occaſion, that he had been Conſul and Cenſor; for it may be anſwered, that when a perſon is only to exhibit the qualities of a good Judge, it is unneceſſary to mention his other employments; and that otherwiſe, it might be pretended that L. Caſſius Tribune of the people anno 616, him whom Cicero mentions in his treatiſe de claris Oratoribus, had not been either Conſul or Cenſor, ſince Cicero does not make any mention of this. If it ſhould be aſked, from what authority I pretend to aſſert, that L. Caſſius, the Rock of the Impeached, is the author of the maxim Cui bono, I ſhall refer them to the following beautiful paſſage of the Oration for Roſcius Amerinus. Luc. Caſſius ille, quem populus Romanus veriſſimum & ſapientiſſimum judicem putabat, identidem in cauſis quærere ſolebat CUI BONO FUISSET (15). Sic vita hominum eſt, ut ad maleficium nemo conetur ſine ſpe atque emolumento accedere. Hunc quæſtorem ac judicem fugiebant atque horrebant ii quibus periculum creabatur; ideo quod tametſi veritatis erat amicus, tamen naturâ non tam propenſus ad miſericordiam, quam implicatus ad ſeveritatem videbatur. Ego . . facile me paterer vel illo acerrimo judice quærente, vel apud Caſſianos judices, quorum etiam nunc illi quibus cauſa dicenda eſt, nomen ipſum reformidant, pro Sex. Roſcio dicere. i. e. "Lucius Caſſius, he whom the "Roman people conſider'd as the moſt upright and "wiſe Judge, uſed to enquire, from time to time, "when he ſet upon cauſes, whoſe is the profit? Such "is the nature of mankind, that no one will attempt "a wicked action but in the view of intereſt. All "who were in any danger, fled away and dreaded the "ſight of this inquiſitive Judge; for notwithſtanding "he was a friend to truth, he yet ſeemed, by his na-"ture, more inclined to ſeverity than to mercy. With "regard to myſelf . . . I ſhould not be any way afraid "to plead for Sex. Roſcius before that ſevere Judge "himſelf, or any of the Caſſian Judges, whoſe name "is now dreaded by thoſe whoſe cauſe is to be plead-"ed."

(15) Cicero makes the ſame remark in Orat. pro Milone. cap. 12. and Philipp. II. c. 14.

WHETHER a Conſul deſcended to the office of Prætor.

I obſerved one particular that merits a digreſſion. I ſuppoſed that they who had filled the higheſt employments in the State, did not deſcend back to the Prætorſhip; and yet we have examples of a perſon's returning to this employment, after having been Conſul: But our Lucius Caſſius is not in the caſe. A perſon returned to it, in order to requalify himſelf, after he had been diſgraced on ſome account. Plutarch informs us of this circumſtance (16), in the affair of Cornelius Lentulus Sura, who was diveſted of his quality of Senator after having been Conſul; and who was not reſtored to his firſt dignity, till after being Prætor a ſecond time. Dion obſerves the ſame of this Lentulus (17), and in another place (18), he obſerves, that Saluſt was made Prætor, the year of Rome 706, in order to requalify him for a ſeat in the Senate-houſe. It was doubtleſs from the ſame motive that the Triumvirs appointed Prætor a ſecond time, Ventidius (19), who had been declared an enemy to the commonwealth, together with Mark Anthony. Were there not this reaſon, this office might perhaps be beſtowed twice upon the ſame perſon; ſince we read in Aſconius Pedianus (20), that Marius Gratidianus was ſince Prætor, becauſe of the great love the people had for him; but it is very probable that there was no interpoſition of the Conſulate and the Cenſorſhip between the two Prætorſhips; conſequently this is not a proper example, to clear up the affair relating to our Caſſius. Nor is the example of Mancinus, who was Prætor after the diſgrace he ſuffered before Numantia, during his Conſulſhip (21), any more to the purpoſe; the caſe is of the ſame nature with that of Lentulus Sura; but Metellus Pius's gaining the offices of Prætor and Pontifex Maximus from his competitors who were of conſular dignity, would puzzle us a little, were we not to ſuppoſe that the following words of Aurelius Victor, Adoleſcens in petitione Prætoræ & Pontificatus, Conſularibus viris prælatus eſt (22), ſignify only this, that he was oppoſed in the Pontificate, by ſome perſons of conſular degree. We muſt not imagine that Aurelius Victor, nor thoſe who are ſuperior to him, obſerve the following rule of the Logicians, viz. that a propoſition compoſed of ſeveral ſubjects is falſe, unleſs the Attribute agrees ſeparately with each ſubject. With regard to the Quæſtorſhip, an office inferior to the Prætorſhip, I cannot deny but that it has been exerciſed by perſons who had been Conſuls; and here follows what a learned man has obſerved on this occaſion. "Altho' the Quæſtors had "no right of prediction; nor of ſummoning perſons "to appear before them, any more than of impriſon-"ing their perſons, neque vocationem neque prehenſionem haberent; yet perſons of conſular dignity did "not refuſe that employment. T. Quintus Capitolinus was Quæſtor with M. Valerius, after having "been thrice Conſul. Cato the elder was the ſame, "after having triumphed three times, and paſſed thro' "all the employments. And it was even enacted by "the Lex Pompeia, that none but perſons of conſular "dignity ſhould fill that employment (23). But ſince "there is no example of the like kind, with regard "to the Prætorſhip; I have reaſon to ſuppoſe, that a "difference was made, in that reſpect, between thoſe "two employments."

(16) In Vita Ciceronis.

(17) Dion. lib. 37.

(18) Lib. 42.

(19) Idem, lib. 47.

(20) In Oration. Ciceron. contra C. Anton. &c.

(21) Aurel. Victor.

(22) This paſſage puzzles the Commentator very much.

(23) Du Boulay, Thréſor des Antiquitez Romaines, pag. 825.

BONO [C]; nor from him, who, according to Saluſt, was Prætor the year of Rome 642 [D]. It is from the judicial ſeverity of this Caſſius, that very rigid Judges have been called Caſſiani [E]. The Preſident Bertrand miſtook, when he gives this honour to another Caſſius Longinus [F]. I will not omit an error of Corradus [G].

CASSIUS

[C] I take him not to differ from the Caſſius, who gave vogue to the famous maxim Cui bono.] The paſſage of the oration pro Roſcio Amerino, which I cited in the preceding remark, ſhews what was meant by this maxim, and the uſe which Lucius Caſſius the Prætor made of it. I add here, that this is a very judicious maxim, and grounded on a principle which admits of but very few exceptions in life, viz. that no one perpetrates crimes, but in the view of reaping advantage of it; and that, in criminal matters, the preſumption is very ſtrong againſt thoſe who reap ſome benefit from them. I ſpeak of ſuch crimes as are puniſhable by earthly judges. This it was made Caſſius the Prætor preſume very naturally in trials for crimes, that many things might be brought to light, in caſe it could be diſcovered, what benefit the perſon accuſed would have gained by the crime with which he was charged. Not but that ſome perſons are incapable of committing a crime, what advantage ſoever might accrue to them from it (24); and others, who are capable of ruſhing upon guilt, for a very trifling profit; or even from the bare deſire of continuing in the wickedneſs to which they have accuſtomed themſelves (25). However, this does not deſtroy Caſſius's maxim; it is well enough known, that in matters of this kind, rules ought not to be of a metaphyſical, or even phyſical Univerſality. See in what manner this maxim has been applied by Hobbes in his Leviathan, Chap. LVII; la Mothe le Vayer, in his diſcourſe of Hiſtory, pag. 201 of Tom. II, of the 12mo Edition; and the Author of Various Thoughts on Comets, page 683.

(24) This remark is of Cicero pro Milone, in the ſame place where he ſpeaks of the maxim of Caſſius, Illud Caſſianum CUI BONO FUERIT, in his perſonis valeat, etſi boni nullo emolumento impelluntur in fraudem, improbi ſæpe parvo.

(25) Si cauſa peccandi in præſens minus ſuppetebat, nihilominus inſontes ſicuti ſontes circumvenire, jugulare. Scilicet ne per otium torpeſcerent manus aut animus, gratuitò potius atque crudelis erat. Salluſt. in Bell. Catil. ſpeaking of the horrid crimes Catiline made his Partizans perpetrate. See Cicero, de Officiis, lib. 51. cap. 24.

(26) Salluſt. in Bello Jugurthino, cap. 32, fin.

[D] Nor from him, who according to Saluſt, was Prætor the year of Rome 642.] This Prætor may very probably be Author of the maxim cui bono, and the rock of the impeached; for Saluſt repreſents him as ſo very famous for his probity, that as much confidence was reposed in his private promiſes, as in the public faith, a circumſtance which prevailed with Jugurtha, to ſurrender himſelf to the mercy of the Romans; Caſſius, who had been deputed to Jugurtha, to perſuade him to come to Rome, having not only given him a ſafe conduct from the commonwealth, but alſo his private word. Privatim præterea, ſays Saluſt, fidem ſuam interponit, quam ille (Jugurtha) non minoris quam publicam ducebat. Talis ea tempeſtate fama de Caſſio erat (26). If this were the ſame with him whom Valerius Maximus mentions with reſpect to Mark Anthony the Orator, he would be different from the tribune of the people of anno 616; for what probability is there, that a man who had been Cenſor in 628, had been no more than Prætor in 642?

The Variorum Commentary on Saluſt, publiſhed at Leyden by Thyſius in 1656, ſets before us two very different opinions. Some aſſert, that Caſſius the Prætor, who was deputed to Jugurtha, is he who, during his Tribuneſhip, cauſed the Lex Tabellaria to be enacted; and others declare it was he, who being Conſul a little after the expedition of Numidia (27), and commanding an army in Gaul, was cut to pieces by the Tigurini (28). This laſt opinion, which is likewiſe that of Sigonius (29), and of Glandorp, is much preferable to the other; for if L. Caſſius, defeated by the Tigurini the year of Rome 646, was Tribune of the people anno 616; he muſt have been Conſul a ſecond time in 646, of which no mention is made in the conſular tables. It is rather the ſon of this Tribune, as Sigonius believes, than the Tribune himſelf. A circumſtance which I look upon as very certain is, that L. Caſſius, Author of the maxim cui bono, and the rock accuſed, is either he who was Tribune of the people in 616; or the Caſſius, who being Prætor in 642, was deputed to Jugurtha. The Dauphin Scholiaſt on Tully's Oration, is of the laſt opinion. Valeſius (30) had already joined in it; but without criticizing Lindenbrog, who had followed the other opinion, and whom he criticizes upon another affair in the ſame note. Corradus, in his Commentary on the Brutus of Cicero, and the Dauphin Scholiaſt on the ſame Book; Glandorp and ſeveral others join in opinion with Lindenbrog. I hope this will excite the learned, to enquire more exactly into this matter.

(27) Glandorp, pag. 203. declares there were ſix years between the Prætorſhip of this Caſſius, and his defeat, when there were but four.

(28) The Swiſs of Zurich.

(29) In Faſtis Conſul.

(30) In Amm. Marcell. lib. 22. pag. 321. edit. in folio 1681.

[E] It is from the judicial ſeverity of this Caſſius, that very rigid judges have been called Caſſiani.] We have already ſeen this in a paſſage of Cicero (31), and here follows another from the ſame Author (32). Non quæro judices CASSIANOS, veterem judiciorum ſeveritatem non requiro. i. e. "I do not ſtand in need of "CASSIAN Judges; I do not require the ſeverity of an- "tient Judges." Cicero had ſaid a little before, in an ironical way. Etiam illum ipſum quem tu in Cohorte tua CASSIANUM judicem habebas. i. e. "That "very CASSIAN Judge whom you had in your Co- "hort." To this the following paſſage from Book XXVI of Ammianus Marcellinus is relative: Jura quidem prætenduntur & leges, & Catonianæ vel CASSIANÆ ſententiæ, fuco perliti reſident judices. i. e. "The laws and privileges ſubſiſt indeed in appearance, "as well as the Catonian and CASSIAN deciſions; "and there is ſtill the ſhadow or reſemblance of "Judges:" and this other of Marcus Aurelius (33); Puto me non erraſſe, ſiquidem & tu notum habes Caſſium, hominem CASSIANÆ ſeveritatis & diſciplinæ. i. e. "I think I was not in an error, ſince even you are "acquainted with Caſſius, a man of Caſſian ſeverity "and diſcipline." To which we may alſo add theſe words from the XXXth Book of Ammianus Marcellinus, concerning the Emperor Valentinian. Judices nunquam conſulto malignos elegit: ſed ſi ſemel promotos agere didicit immaniter, Lycurgos inveniſſe ſe prædicabat & CASSIOS, columnia juſtitiæ priſcæ, ſcribenſque hortabatur aſſidue ut noxas vel leves acerbius vindicarent. i. e. "He never purpoſely made choice of ſevere "Judges; but if, when once they were raiſed to the "bench, he heard that they acted with cruelty, he "then would ſay that he had met with Lycurgus's and "Caſſius's, the pillars of antient Juſtice, and uſed to "exhort them daily by letters, to be very ſevere even "on the ſlighteſt offences." I am to obſerve that Lindenbrog refers the firſt paſſage of Ammianus Marcellinus, not to Lucius Caſſius, but to Caius Caſſius, who lived under Tiberius, and after him; and who was the chief of the Caſſian Sect among the Civilians. He ſhould have called to mind, that on theſe words of Book XXII of that Hiſtorian, Judicibus Caſſiis triſtior & Lycurgis, he had ſaid that the Judices Caſſiani were ſo called from L. Caſſius, whom Cicero mentions in Bruto, and of whom he pretends Marcellinus ſpeaks in that place.

(31) At the end of the third paragraph of the remark [B].

(32) In the fifth Oration againſt Verres, which is alſo called the 3d in Verrem; becauſe among the Orations which relate to Verres's cauſe, two are only in a preliminary way. Valeſius the younger in Amm. Marcell. pag. 471. applies one of theſe paſſages to the 1ſt in Verrem, cited by his brother; this probably is an error of the Preſs, as veterem which is there for Verrem; for pag. 321. the elder Valeſius cites 3 in Verrem.

(33) Epiſt. ad Præf. Prætor.

[F] The Preſident Bertrand miſtook, when he transferred this honour to another Caſſius Longinus.] The paſſages we juſt now cited form the greateſt elogium that poſterity could employ, to do juſtice to the integrity of L. Caſſius; and to immortalize the ſtrong endeavours he had uſed, to have the laws ſtrictly executed in his time. Preſident Bertrand is very much miſtaken on this occaſion (34). He remarks after Suetonius, that Caius Caſſius Longinus who lived under Nero, was blind; and he pretends that this is a ſignal mark of an extreme ſeverity, which he proves from the examples of Caſcellius, of Appius, and of Catulus Meſſalinus. He adds, that this Caſſius was a judge of ſo extraordinary a ſeverity, that his tribunal was called ſcopulum reorum. This however is a blunder, for the Caſſius whoſe tribunal was ſo entitled, was contemporary with Mark Anthony the Orator, about the year of Rome 640, that is, upwards of 150 years before Nero's reign. Menage has obſerved this (35); William Grotius, brother to the famous Hugo Grotius, had remarked it long before (36). It is true indeed he makes Bertrand ſay, that Caſſius got himſelf that character by his too great cruelty, propter nimiam Sævitiam; whereas Bertrand employs only the word Severitas; but perhaps the leaſt criticiſm on this would be renewing the Caſſian ſeverity.

(34) Lib. 2. de Juriſper. pag. m. 274.

(35) Amœnitat. Juris, cap. 43.

(36) In Vitis Juriſconſultorum quorum in Pandectis extant Nomina: A work, which lay a long time among the papers of the Deceaſed; and deſerved to be more correctly printed. It was printed at Leyden in 1690.

[G] I will not omit an error of Corradus.] I have cited a paſſage of Cicero, where mention is made of one L. Caſſius, who having been elected Military Tribune, could not have judged Verres, had the cauſe been CASSIUS LONGINUS (CAIUS) one of the murtherers of Julius Cæsar, and he who said to one of the accomplices, Strike, tho' the dagger should go through my body (a), was one of the greatest men in his time. It must indeed be confessed that he was a little hot; and that to him are imputed the Counsels which sometimes prompted Brutus to carry matters too far (b). He was a great Epicurean; and yet he practised better the duties of a worthy man, and was infinitely more regular in his morals, than most of the Idolaters. He never drunk wine (c). It is universally known that the elogium was given him, of being the last of the Romans (d). He married Junia sister to Brutus, and seems not to have had great reason to believe that she was very chaste [A]. He was a great soldier, of which he gave a signal proof after the defeat of Crassus. The Parthians, to take advantage of their victory, entered Syria, and besieged Antioch. Cassius repulsed them with so much vigour, that he forced them to raise the siege; and took such excellent measures, in order to defeat their parties, and draw their army into a disadvantageous spot of ground, that he defeated it; killed Osaces their General; and forced Pacorus, the King's son, to abandon Syria (e). When we consider these transactions attentively, we may easily invalidate most of Glandorpi's criticisms on Rutilius [B], as the reader will see in the remarks. Mark Anthony did not doubt any longer of the victory, when news was brought him that Cassius was dead.

(a) In cæde dubitanti cuidam, vel per me, inquit, feri, Aurel. Victor, de Viris illust. pag. m. 104.

(b) Plutarch, in Bruto, pag. 1006.

(c) Seneca, Epist. 83.

(d) See the remark [B] of the Article BRUTUS (Marcus Junius.)

(e) Dio, lib. 40. See the remark [A].

been put off to the year following. Corradus (37) imagined either that the Commentary of Asconius Pedianus has been corrupted in that passage, or that this Commentator mistook, in pretending that Cicero speaks of the same Lucius Cassius, who enacted the Lex Tabellaria the year of Rome 617 (38). If Asconius had such a thought, he must have committed a very childish error; for there being, according to Corradus's calculation, an interval of sixty seven years at least between that law, to the time of Verres's trial; how strange a blunder would it be, to suppose, that a man sixty seven years after his having been Tribune of the people, was elected, (at about an hundred years of age,) Tribune of the soldiers? But there does not appear the least error in Asconius, and it is Corradus who did not rightly understand him. Asconius (39), in order to shew that Cicero had reason to say, that the Cassian family was very severe, as well in jucidiary, as in other matters, observes, that it gave rise to the Leges Tabellariæ, and that the Cassius who asked the question cui bono sprung from it.

(37) In Brutum Ciceronis, pag. 179.

(58) Corradus fixes it to this year, and not, as others do, to 616.

(39) In Proœm. Act. in Verrem.

[A] He married Junia, sister to Brutus; and seems not to have had great reason to believe, that she was very chaste.] In case he thought her so, he was ignorant of the common reports, at least of the suspicions and raillery of the most eloquent Orator in Rome. Here follows a passage wherein Cicero supposes that Servilia, not contented with prostituting herself to Cæsar, abandoned to him her daughter Junia, Cassius's wife. Mater M. Bruti Servilia, cum preciosum ære parvo fundum abstulisset à Cæsare subjiciente hastæ bona civium, non effugit dictum tale Ciceronis: Equidem quo melius emptum sciatis, comparavit Servilia hunc fundum Tertia deducta. Filia autem Serviliæ erat Junia Tertia. Eademque C. Cassii uxor, lasciviente dictatore tam in matrem quam in puellam, tunc luxuriam senis adulteri civitas subinde rumoribus jocisque carpebat, ut mala non tantum seria ferrent (1). i. e. "Servilia, mother to Marcus Brutus, having bought, "for a small sum of money, a noble farm of Cæsar, "who was exposing the effects of the Citizens to public sale, could not escape this taunt of Cicero. "That you may be the more sensible of the cheapness "of this farm, know that Servilia bought it Tertiâ "deducta. Now Junia Tertia was Servilia's daughter "and wife to Cassius. As the Dictator had an affair both with the mother and daughter, his lechery was the subject of the conversation and jest "of the whole City." Glandorp refers us to this passage of Macrobius, and yet does not know against which of Servilia's two daughters Cicero's taunt was levelled. He is in doubt whether it related to Junia wife of Lepidus the Triumvir, or to Junia Cassius's wife: Utra Tertia fuerit in quam jocatus est Cicero (locus est apud Macrobium Lib. 2. Saturn. capite 2.) non facile dixerim (2). Was it possible for one who had read this whole passage to be in any doubt which it was? I am to observe, that Cassius's wife survived her husband threescore and four years (3).

(1) Macrob. Saturn. lib. 2. cap. 2. See also Suet. in Cæsare, cap. 50. I shall cite his words in the remark [A] of the article SERVILIA.

(2) Glandorp. Onomast. pag. 498.

(3) Tacit. Ann. lib. 3. sub fin.

[B] When we consider . . . that he defeated the Parthians, killed their General . . . we may easily invalidate most of Glandorp's criticisms on Rutilius.] The greatest part of his critique (4) on a passage of Bernardin Rutilius (5), in which it is related that Cassius, Pompey's Lieutenant and Governor of Syria, made war upon the Parthians, is ill grounded. The error there may be entirely removed, by only suppressing these two words Pompey's Lieutenant; for, we may allow all Rutilius says there, that circumstance excepted. And indeed Dion declares, that altho' Cassius had not accepted the command of the army which the soldiers offered him, and Crassus permitted him to accept; he yet was afterwards Governor of Syria (6), when Crassus's defeat, and the invasion of the Parthians necessarily required it. I have already taken notice of the success with which he carried on the war; and he obliged the Parthians to abandon the Province where he commanded. Glandorp was not ignorant of this circumstance, in page 205 (7); whence it is scarce possible to understand the reason employed by him against the Rutilius, in page 470. It is true, says he, that after Crassus had been defeated, Cassius the Quæstor, seeing himself block'd up in Antioch, made some very successful sallies upon the Parthians; but this was without an express declaration of war against them, bellum nullum justum aut indictum cum illis gessit. Was it not enough that this was the continuation of the war, which Crassus had carried into their country? And can there be a more express war, than for the person who commands in a Province, to fight against those who entered it in a hostile way, in consequence of a victory even over the aggressors? Had not Glandorp employed this reason which quite spoiled his criticism, and had he contented himself with supposing that Rutilius had a view to the time in which Cæsar and Pompey were waging war one against the other, his remark would have been to purpose. Here follows the manner in which Cicero speaks of Cassius, Commander in Syria, after Crassus's defeat. Neque verò classes deerunt: tanti Tyrii Cassium faciunt, tantum ejus in Syria nomen atque Phœnice est. Paratum habet Imperatorem C. Cassium P. C. Respublica contra Dolabellam, nec paratum solum sed peritum, atque fortem. Magnas ille res gessit ante Bibuli summi viri adventum, cum Parthorum nobilissimos duces maximasque copias fudit, Syriamque immani Parthorum impetu liberavit (8). i. e. "Nor will Fleets be wanting, so highly do the Tyrians esteem Cassius, and so great is his fame in Syria "and Phœnicia. . . Fathers, the Commonwealth has "a General, C. Cassius, prepared against Dolabella; "and not only prepared, but skilful and brave. This "Cassius atchieved mighty actions before the arrival "of Bibulus that great man; he having defeated the "ablest Generals and the choicest forces of the Parthians, and deliver'd Syria, when invaded by a "numberless multitude of Parthians." Read also the same Cicero in Letter XX of Book V to Atticus, in which he declares, that he had intimidated the Parthians, and encouraged Cassius by his march. Rumore adventus nostri, & Cassio qui Antiochia tenebatur, animus accessit, & Parthis timor injectus est. Itaque cedentes ab oppido Cassius insequutus rem bene gessit, quâ in fugâ magnâ auctoritate Osaces Dux Parthorum vulnus accepit, eoque interiit paucis post diebus. i. e. "Upon the report of my advancing, Cassius, who "was hemmed up in Antioch, was animated; and the "Parthians were terrified. And now these drawing "off

(4) Onomastic. pag. 470.

(5) An Italian Civilian who wrote the Lives of the Civilians, printed at Basil in 1537 and 1557.

(6) Τῆς Συρίας ἐν τε τῷ παρόντι καὶ μετὰ ταῦτα ἦρξεν. "He then "commanded over Syria, and "even afterwards." Dio, lib. 40.

(7) Syriam adversus Parthos defendit, Osace duce cum magnâ copiarum parte interempto. Glandorp. Onom. pag. 205. i. e. "He "defended Syria "against the "Parthians; "Osaces the General, and a "great part of "the troops, being slain."

(8) Cicero, Philipp. XI. cap. 12.

(f) Cujus morte inaudita, Antonius exclamaſſe dicitur, Vici, Aurel. Victor. de Viris illuſtr. pag. 104.

dead (f). Moreri has not many errors in this Article [C]. Furetiere has publiſhed a notorious falſity concerning Caſſius [D]. Plutarch ſeems to have contradicted himſelf, where he ſpeaks of the death of this illuſtrious Roman [E], and Dion has not argued very juſtly [F]. The Chronicle of Euſebius is incorrect on this occaſion [G]. I am ſurpriſed that Plutarch and the reſt of the Hiſtorians, did not take notice of Julius Cæſar's ghoſt appearing to Caſſius [H].

Here

" off from the city, Caſſius followed them with ſuc-
" ceſs; and in their flight, Oſaces General of the " Parthians, and a man of great authority received a
" wound, of which he died a few days after." The reader may alſo ſee Joſephus, Chapter XII of Book XIV of his Antiquities of the Jews.

[C] Moreri has not many errors in this article.] His aſſertion, viz. that Caſſius was vanquiſhed by Cæſar, is a miſtake; for Caſſius, after Pompey's defeat, ſubmitted to the Conqueror, and delivered up to him the Fleet he commanded, without ſtriking a blow; and harbour'd from that time a deſign upon Cæſar's life (9). Nor is it true, that when Auguſtus, Mark Anthony, and Lepidus, made a league in order to revenge the death of Cæſar, Caſſius went into Syria; for both he and Brutus had before ſecured to themſelves ſuch countries as they thought moſt convenient for their affairs. The inſtant they perceived that Mark Anthony and young Octavius were more powerful in Italy than the aſſaſſins of Cæſar; they left that country, and did not retire to thoſe provinces which the Senate had allotted them, but to poſſeſs themſelves of ſuch as were more powerful; and for this purpoſe, Caſſius who was very well known and greatly eſteemed by the Syrians, made choice of Syria, whilſt Brutus ſecured Macedonia; as appears from Dion, Plutarch and ſeveral other Hiſtorians. Moreri ſhould have cited Florus, Book 4. Chap. 7; and not Book 3. Chap. 6. He has alſo cited Book I of Epicurus's Life by Gaſſendi, inſtead of Book II; and has given the name of Dandorus to the Freedman whom Plutarch and Dion call Pindarus (10).

(9) C. Caſſius . . me auctorem credo deſideravit: qui etiam ſine his clariſſimis viris hanc rem in Cilicia ad oſtium fluminis Cydni confeciſſet, ſi ille ad eam ripam quam conſtituerat, non ad contrariam navim appuliſſet. Cicero, Philipp. 2. cap. 11.

(10) It was by this man that Caſſius cauſed himſelf to be ſlain.

[D] Furetiere has publiſhed a notorious falſity concerning Caſſius.] I fancy it will not be an error to aſſert, that the following words of Aulus Gellius were at leaſt the remote cauſe of it: Eum Caſſium poſtea ſatis notum eſt victis Parthis fuſoque exercitu ſuo miſeram mortem oppetiiſſe (11). Aulus ſpeaks of a certain fatality which was ſaid to be inſeparable from the horſe Sejanus, which brought all who were poſſeſſed of him to an untimely end; and in enumerating the examples that were pretended to be given of this, he mentions that of Caius Caſſius, who had that horſe after Dolabella's untimely end. He then adds, that it is generally known, that Caſſius periſhed miſerably, after having defeated the Parthians (12), and after the loſs of his own army. Nothing could have been more improper, than to relate, on ſuch an occaſion, the advantages which Caſſius had gained over the Parthians ſo long before. Either the paſſage muſt be corrupted, and Parthis muſt have been put for Partibus (13), or Aulus Gellius did not think of what he was about. Beſides, either Furetiere, who ſays that Caſſius, poſſeſſor of the horſe Sejanus, after Dolabella, died in a war againſt the Parthians (14), took it upon truſt; or gave no attention to Aulus Gellius's words; for in giving ever ſo little, we ſhall find that he ſpeaks of Caſſius, the aſſaſſin of Julius Cæſar; and it is univerſally known, that this Caſſius died in the battle of Philippi, in which he was overcome by Mark Anthony, as is ſeen in Moreri, and not in a war againſt the Parthians.

(11) Aulus Gell. lib. 3. cap. 9.

(12) Or after that the Parthians had been defeated.

(13) See Glandorp. Onomaſt. pag. 470. It is partibus in the beſt editions of Aulus Gellius.

(14) Dictionaire Univerſel. under the word Cheval.

[E] Plutarch ſeems to have contradicted himſelf, where he ſpeaks of the death of this illuſtrious Roman.] In one place he informs us, that Caſſius killed himſelf with the ſame dagger, with which he had ſtabbed Cæſar; and admires this as a very myſterious circumſtance (15); but, in another place, he only ſays, that Caſſius made Pindar his Freedman kill him (16); and even obſerves, that this Freedman ſtruck the blow, by cutting off his head (17). Velleius Paterculus enforces this circumſtance. Lacerna caput circumdedit, ſays he, extentamque cervicem interritus liberto præbuit. Deciderat Caſſii caput cum &c (18). i. e. "Wrapping up " his head with his cloak, he undauntedly ſtretched
" out his neck to his Freedman. Caſſius's head was
" ſtruck off, when &c." Now a dagger is not a very proper inſtrument for this purpoſe; and it is certain, that moſt of Cæſar's murtherers employed daggers (19). The only way left Plutarch to be conſiſtent with himſelf, was to ſay, either that Caſſius deſired his Freedman to make uſe only of the dagger with which he (Caſſius) had ſtabbed Julius Cæſar, or that the Freedman had then no other (20).

(15) Plut. in Vita Cæſaris, pag. 740.

(16) Idem, in Vita M. Antonii, pag. 924. and in Vita Bruti, pag. 1004.

(17) Idem, in Vita Bruti, ibid.

(18) Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 70.

(19) Sueton. in Cæſare, cap. 72, & ibi Pitiſcus.

[F] . . . Dion has not argued very juſtly.] Having related, about the end of Book XLVII, that Caſſius cauſed Pindarus one of his Freedmen to kill him; and that Brutus cauſed himſelf alſo to be ſlain by one of thoſe who accompanied him; he begins the XLVIIIth book with ſaying, Thus died Brutus and Caſſius, ſtabbed with the ſame ſwords with which they had killed Cæſar (21). But with all the reſpect that is due to the antient Hiſtorians, we may venture to aſſert, that this relation is not perfect in every part; and that no attentive and judicious reader will perceive one good conſequence in it. Brutus and Caſſius cauſed themſelves to be killed by one of their retinue; and therefore they fell by the very ſwords with which they had murthered Julius Cæſar. This would ſooner be believed, did it appear that they had killed themſelves. Suetonius indeed tells us, that ſome of the aſſaſſins killed themſelves with the ſame dagger; but then he does not name any one. Nonnulli ſemet eodem illo pugione, quo Cæſarem violaverant, interemerunt (22).

(20) There is the figure of Brutus and Caſſius's dagger in a medal of Brutus, given by Spanheim, pag. 270. of his Commentary on the Cæſars of Julian.

(21) Ὁ μὲν δὴ Βροῦτος ὅτι Κάσσιος αὐτὸς ἀπ' αὐτοῦ ξιφισίου διὰ τῶν Καίσαρα ἀπειργασμένων σφαγέντες. Dion. lib. 48. init.

(22) Sueton. in Julio, ſub fin.

[G] The Chronicle of Euſebius is incorrect on this occaſion.] We therein are told, that Caſſius conquered Judæa, and plundered the Temple of Jeruſalem, before Julius Cæſar's death (23). Now theſe are all falſities. There was no occaſion to conquer Judæa, ſince it obeyed peaceably the Romans at that time. Caſſius never plundered the city of Jeruſalem; for had this been true, Joſephus would not have omitted it; nor have contented himſelf with barely ſaying, that Caſſius demanded a large ſum of money from the Jews. This was done by him after Cæſar's death, when he went to ſecure the Province of Syria (24). Had Euſebius ſaid, Caſſius plunder'd the Temples of the Rhodians, this would have been more juſt; but then he ought not to have fixed this incident, as he does in his Chronicle, two years after the death of Julius Cæſar. Scaliger declares that he miſtook two years (25), but I am of opinion it was but one. However this be, Caſſius having conquered the Rhodian Fleet, carried off their ſhips and treaſure, and plundered their Temples. He left them nothing but the chariot of the Sun; and would have treated them ſtill more rigorouſly, had he not called to mind, his having ſtudied among them. The Rhodians imagined they were infallibly ſure of victory, ſince they ſhewed him the chains they had prepared for ſuch Romans as they ſhould take priſoners (26). See in what manner Valerius Maximus, to give the better ſcope to his myſterious conceits, has related the particulars concerning the Chariot of the Sun (27).

(23) Euſeb. In Chron. num. 1973.

(24) See Scaliger, Animadverſ. in hunc locum. Chron. Euſeb. pag. 158. where he obſerves that Jornandes, according to his uſual cuſtom, tranſcribed thoſe errors of St. Jerom.

(25) Ibid. pag. 160.

(26) Dio, lib. 47. pag. 395.

(27) Val. Max. lib. 1. cap. 5. num. 8.

[H] Plutarch, and the reſt of the Hiſtorians . . . have not taken notice of Julius Cæſar's ghoſt appearing to Caſſius.] I am ſurprized that Plutarch ſhould take no notice of Cæſar's appearing to Caſſius, at the battle of Philippi. How could ſuch an incident eſcape this Hiſtorian, who collected ſo carefully the prodigies concerning the war againſt Brutus and Caſſius; and who related ſo great a number of them, that he thought himſelf obliged to inform us, that Caſſius began at laſt to waver a little in his Epicurean Principles (28)? Dion, who is as induſtrious on this article as Plutarch, is alſo ſilent with regard to this memorable apparition; and I don't remember any one who has mentioned it except Valerius Maximus. At the battle of Philippi, ſays he (29), Caſſius driving forward with extreme fury, ſaw Cæſar, who, under a more auguſt form than is ſeen among mortals, was riding full ſpeed to attack him. But Caſſius was ſo aſtoniſhed at what he ſaw, that he turn'd his back, after ſaying: It is high time to give over: If the killing of him was doing little or nothing, what can be done more? C. Caſſius . . . cum acie Philippenſi ardentiſſimo animo perſtaret, vidit . . Julium . .

(28) Plut. in Vita Bruti.

(29) Valerius Maximus, lib. 1. cap. ult.

Here follows a very remarkable circumſtance. Caſſius believed, according to the doctrine of Epicurus, the mortality of the ſoul; and nevertheleſs he offered up prayers to the Manes of Pompey the Great, the day that Julius Cæſar was aſſaſſinated [I]. He had forgot his Philoſophy on this occaſion: Nature was more powerful than Art. He did not behave in this manner, when Brutus told him that he had ſeen an apparition; for notwithſtanding that he ſhould naturally have been uneaſy, with regard to futurity, in the preſent ſtate of their affairs, he nevertheleſs argued very calmly; endeavoured to refute this apparition philoſophically; and concluded with ſaying, that he wiſhed the common belief, with regard to the exiſtence of Genii, were true [K]. The reaſons he gave to corroborate it, were very well adapted to fill his friend with hopes; and, at the ſame time, ſhew us, that Infidels are not always inclined to unbelief from motives of ſelf-love (g). I ſhall examine the religious expreſſions which it is ſaid he employed in haranguing his ſoldiers [L].

(g) See the Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes, num. 187. pag. 586.

CASSIUS.

humano habitu auguſtiorem, purpureo paludamento amictum, minaci vultu, & concitato equo in ſe impetum facientem: quo aſpectu perterritus, tergum hoſti dedit, voce illa prius emiſſa, quid enim amplius agas, ſi occidiſſe parum eſt? I ſhould be more ſurprized that ſuch an incident ſhould be found but in one Author, did I not know that there are very many ſingular ones, that have tranſmitted to poſterity by one writer only. And it ſometimes happens, that this ſingle Author ſpeaks of it only occaſionally, and a long time after the incident happened. Several examples of this are ſcatter'd up and down in different parts of this work, and here follows one. Ammianus Marcellinus is the only writer who informs us of the expedient Alexander employed, in order to drive ſleep from him (30); and we probably ſhould not have known this circumſtance, had not that Author been deſirous of giving Julian the apoſtate ſome ſuperiority over Alexander.

A REMARKABLE incident concerning Alexander, that is found only in Ammianus Marcellinus.

(30) Ammian. Marcell. lib. 16. cap. 5.

[I] He believed . . the Mortality of the Soul; and nevertheleſs offered up prayers to the manes of Pompey the Great, the day that Julius Cæſar was aſſaſſinated.] Plutarch does not relate this without joining a reflection to it; he obſerving, that the greatneſs of the enterprize, and the dangers with which it was ſurrounded, inſpired ſuch an enthuſiaſm as made Caſſius forget his principles of Philoſophy. Καὶ γὰρ ἂν λέγεται Κάσσιον εἰς τὸν ἀνδριάντα τὸν Πομπηΐου περὶ τῆς ἐγχειρήσεως ἀποδιδόναι, ἐπικαλεῖσθαι σιωπῇ, καίπερ οὐκ ἀλλοτρίων ὢν τῶν Ἐπικούρου λόγων, ἀλλ' ὁ καιρὸς (ὡς ἔοικεν) ἤδη τῷ θυμῷ παρεσῶντος, ἐνθουσιασμὸν ἐποίει καὶ πάθος, ἀντὶ τῶν προτέρων λογισμῶν (31).

(31) Plutarch. in Julio Cæſare, pag. 739. A. See alſo in Bruto, pag. 991, D.

[K] When Brutus told him that he had ſeen an apparition . . . he nevertheleſs argued very calmly; endeavoured to refute this . . philoſophically, and concluded with ſaying, that he wiſhed the Roman Belief, with regard to the Exiſtence of Genii, were true.] 'Tis Plutarch informs us of all theſe particulars. Δαίμονας δ' οὔτ' εἶναι πιθανὸν, οὔτ' ὄντας ἀνθρώπων ἔχειν εἶδος, ἢ φωνὴν, ἢ δύναμιν εἰς ἡμᾶς δηλήσασαν. ὡς ἐγὼν' ἂν ἐβουλόμην ἵνα μὴ μόνον ὅπλοις καὶ ἵπποις καὶ ναυσὶ τοσαύταις, ἀλλὰ καὶ θεῶν ἀρωγαῖς ἐπιθαῤῥοῦμεν, ὁσιωτάτων ἔργων καὶ καλλίστων ἡγεμόνες ὄντες (32). i. e. "Neither is it credible that there are "Genii, nor, if there be ſuch beings, that they wear "a human ſhape, and are endued with a voice and "ſtrength ſuitable to us. I indeed wiſh it were ſo, "for then, we ſhould not rely ſo much on our horſe "and foot, and ſo mighty a fleet; but confiding in the "aid of the Gods, we ſhould atchieve the moſt holy "and moſt illuſtrious exploits." Theſe words of Caſſius appeared ſo beautiful to de Balzac, that he made a paraphraſe on them, purpoſely to give the idea of the converſaion of the Romans. "In the "following light, ſays he (33), Caſſius ſet a ſubject ſo "unpleaſant in itſelf; and ſo highly does he improve it "for the uſe of converſation: and without appearing "to be either a ſilly admirer or an obſtinate unbe-"liever, he ſays thus pleaſantly to his friend." That "the cares of the Soul, the ſtruggles of the mind, the happineſs of the body, the gloom of the night, might have "created the viſion, and raiſed that ſtrange image before "him. That with regard to himſelf by the principles of "the Philoſophy he profeſſed, he did not believe there were "ſuch beings as Dæmons, much leſs that they were viſible; "however, that he could wiſh they did exiſt, and that his "Philoſophy were falſe; becauſe that probably thoſe incorporeal ſpirits, being ſo juſt and virtuous, and the action "committed on the ides of March, ſo beautiful and "heroic, and their cauſe ſo juſt, they doubtleſs would "come and ſhare in it: That thus they would be as ſoma "ny unexpected friends and allies of the Commonwealth, "who would come to their aid; and as ſo many corps de "reſerve, who would fight for them whenever their aſ-"ſiſtance would be wanted. That this being the real "fact, they then need not to compute merely in their "party, ſo many companies of foot, ſo many troops of horſe, "ſo many legions, and ſo many ſhips; but that there was, "over and above, an army of immortals, who would "not require any pay, but would declare for the cauſe of "virtue, and, above all, would never join with Mark "Anthony againſt Brutus, nor prefer tyranny to liberty. "Theſe, Madam, are the dying words of the Com-"monwealth, after which it expired. This was the "characteriſtic of the ſpirit of Rome, and was the "language natural to Majeſty. Don't you think "Caſſius greatly eloquent in that language? Should "you not be glad to become better acquainted with "this excellent man; to ſee him engaged on other "ſubjects; and to hear him argue on leſs diſagreea-"ble topicks; and at another time than on the even-"ing before the battle of Philippi (34)?"

(32) Idem, in Bruto, pag. 1001, B.

(33) Balzac, Oeuvres diverſes, Diſcourſ. 2. pag. m. 51, 52.

(34) Balzac is miſtaken, for Plutarch, in Bruto, pag. 1001, informs us, that Brutus and Caſſius had this converſation the day after the apparition; and that they then were not come out of Aſia into Europe.

Plutarch obſerves, that Caſſius's arguments were a great conſolation to his friend Brutus. They were ſpecious: but ſome will ſay, did not the phantom declare, that he was Brutus's evil Genius? Does not this imply, that all Genii do not favour the cauſe of virtue, as Caſſius ſuppoſed they did? Now, if we fear as much the evil offices of ſpirits as hope for good offices from them, is not this exactly the ſame as if no ſuch beings exiſted? To this I anſwer, that to follow only the light of nature, we are more inclined to believe that Genii are beneficent ſpirits, than to ſuppoſe them malicious; and hence Brutus might be more ſtrongly affected with the reflections of his friend, than with the words of the apparition.

[L] I ſhall examine the religious expreſſions, which it is pretended he employed in haranguing his ſoldiers.] Brutus and Caſſius reviewing their army near the Gulph Menas (35), did not forget to harangue them according to the uſual cuſtom. Caſſius being the oldeſt, ſpoke firſt; and expreſſed himſelf ſo happily, that the ſoldiers cried aloud, Let us march; we'll follow wherever you lead. Overjoyed at this exclamation, he harangued them again, and began with this wiſh: May the Gods who preſide over wars undertaken on a juſt account reward your fidelity (36). He then tells them, the good order the Generals had put every thing, they having employ'd the moſt prudent meaſures that the military ſcience could furniſh: Such, ſays he, are the precautions which human foreſight could ſuggeſt, the reſt depends on your valour and the divine bleſſing (37): whatever has been promiſed you ſhall be paid; and as we have already recompenſed your fidelity, we will not fail, with the aſſiſtance of the Gods (38), to reward you nobly when you ſhall have obtained the victory. Now does not a man who employs ſuch expreſſions, abandon the principles of Epicurus? Muſt we not conclude that Caſſius, at the ſight of the deciſive battle on which his whole fortune lay at ſtake, had recourſe to the ſame Deities whoſe providence he had been taught to deny? Was he not one of thoſe men who, when on the brink of danger, forgets all his free-thinking maxims? To this I anſwer two things: firſt, that we are not certain, that his ſpeech was inſerted in Appian's work, literally as he ſpoke it. The Hiſtorians diſpoſed theſe kind of

(35) In Thrace.

(36) Θεοὶ μὲν ὅσοι πολέμων δικαίων δυνάσται τῆς πίστεως ὑμᾶς, ὦ συστρατιῶται, καὶ προθυμίας ἀμείψοιντο. Appian, lib. 4. Bell. Civil. pag. 646.

(37) Τὰ δὲ λοιπὰ αὐτοῖς ἀνάλογον ἀναντίοιν παρὰ τε ὑμῶν καὶ παρὰ τῶν Θεῶν. Idem, ibid. pag. 647.

(38) Κατὰ γνώμην Θεῶν. Ibid.

CASSIUS LONGINUS (CAIUS) a great Lawyer in the reign of Nero. Some Criticks pretend, that Pomponius (a) confounded him with Lucius Caſſius Longinus, who married a daughter of Germanicus [A]. This would be leſs ſurpriſing than the little agreement that is found between the contemporary Authors, concerning the puniſhment which Nero inflicted on our Lawyer [B]. Some ſay he baniſhed him, and others that he of harangues as they pleaſed: they alter'd them as they thought proper, and interwove their own thoughts. My ſecond anſwer is, that Caſſius, tho' he believed as ſtedfaſtly as ever the doctrine of Epicurus, nevertheleſs might have ſpoke the words related by the Hiſtorian. He was ſenſible that ſuch expreſſions would be very grateful to the ſoldiers; from this he conceived great hopes, and therefore it was his buſineſs to improve them. An able General, on ſuch an occaſion, does not accommodate his words to the philoſophical opinions he himſelf entertains, but to the prejudices of his ſoldiers.

(a) De Origine Juris, leg. 2. § ult.

[A] Some Criticks pretend, that Pomponius confounded him with Lucius Caſſius Longinus, who married a daughter of Germanicus.] I ſhall not diſpute either for or againſt him. It is pretended that he made but one perſon of two; having confounded together Lucius Caſſius Longinus, and Caius Caſſius Longinus; the former of whom was Conſul in the year of Rome 783, and afterwards married to Druſilla daughter of Germanicus, anno 785, and at laſt put to death by Caligula's order: the latter was Governor of Syria under the Emperor Claudius, and condemn'd to baniſhment under Nero. Lipſius, who after Glandorp has cenſured Pomponius upon that account, is himſelf criticiſed by the Preſident Bertrand, and by William Grotius. This affair may perhaps be examined on another occaſion.

I now ſhall only obſerve, that if it be true, as Lipſius aſſerts (1), that the Caſſius who married Druſilla the year of Rome 785, had been Conſul in 783; it is ſurprizing that Tacitus ſhould be quite ſilent on that head; ſince with reſpect to the marriage, he tells us who this Caſſius Longinus was, whom Tiberius had made choice of for a huſband to his adopted granddaughter; and that he deſcends ſo far for particulars, as to inform us, that this man was indeed of a Plebeian Family, but at the ſame time of conſiderable antiquity, and illuſtrious from the public employments it had filled: and that the Caſſius in queſtion had received a very ſevere education under his father, and was more commendable for the tractableneſs of his temper, than for the greatneſs of his underſtanding (2). Would any Writer, how exceſſively fond ſoever he might be of conciſeneſs, not (if he knew it) have added on ſuch an occaſion, that a man had been Conſul, and how he had behaved in his Conſulſhip? This Caſſius therefore was not Conſul in 783; or (which is very unlikely) Tacitus muſt not have known that he exerciſed that employment. On the other ſide, if Pomponius believed that his Caſſius Longinus was Conſul in 783, how could he poſſibly be ignorant of a circumſtance much more glorious than the Conſulſhip; how, I ſay, came he not to know that the Caſſius in queſtion had the honour two years after, to marry Tiberius's granddaughter? It is ſtrange and inconceivable, that this writer ſhould miſtake, in aſcribing to Caius Caſſius the Conſulſhip of Lucius Caſſius; and that after this, he ſhould not give him Lucius Caſſius's wife alſo.

But, in fine, it will be ſaid in favour of Lipſius, that Suetonius declares expreſly, that Druſilla was married to Lucius Caſſius Longinus, a man of conſular dignity. To this I anſwer, that Suetonius ſays only, that Caligula took Druſilla his ſiſter, from her huſband Caſſius, a man of Conſular Dignity. Now theſe two things differ widely. There was an interval of five years between Druſilla's marriage, and Caligula's acceſſion to the Throne. During this interval, L. Caſſius may have been another's proxy in the Conſulſhip; and in this manner Druſilla's huſband may have been of conſular dignity when his wife was taken from him, without his being ſuch at the time he married her. Such are the falſe reaſonings to which a Writer expoſes himſelf, when he does not examine with a Caſſian exactneſs all the circumſtances of the paſſages he intends to cite. Suetonius ſays, Lucio Caſſio Longino Conſulari collocatam (Druſillam) abduxit (Caligula) (3). Lipſius without ſpeaking either of Caligula, or the abduxit, aſcribes only the following words to Suetonius. Druſillam collocatam L. Caſſio Longino Conſulari, expreſſions which being laid down in this random manner, and as a proof of Lipſius's particular opinion, cannot be interpreted more juſtly than in the following manner. Druſilla was married to L. Caſſius Longinus a man of conſular dignity. Des Cartes has ſaid very juſtly, that the greateſt cauſe of our errors in Philoſophy, ariſes from our including more things in our judgments, than our diſtinct ideas preſent to us of them. It may alſo be aſſerted, that nothing occaſions greater falſities in criticiſm, than the liberty which Writers take to extend to an undue length, the authorities on which ſuch Writers ground their aſſertions.

(1) Lipſius, in Tacit. Annal. lib. 6. cap. 15.

(2) Caſſius plebei Romæ generis, verum antiqui honoratique, & ſevera patris diſciplina eductus, facilitate ſæpius, quàm induſtria commendabatur. Tacit. Annal. lib. 6. cap. 15.

(3) Suet. in Calig. cap. 24.

[B] There is little agreement .... between the cotemporary Authors, concerning the puniſhment which Nero inflicted on our Lawyer.] The ſplendor in which our Caius Caſſius Longinus lived, does not ſeem to allow the two quite oppoſite relations, which Authors have given of the treatment he met with from Nero. Some Writers aſſert, that this Emperor put him to death; and others, that he baniſhed him to Sardinia. Theſe are two contradictory aſſertions; it is declaring that Nero did and did not, put him to death. How could Writers relate the ſame incident in a direct oppoſite manner, grounded on the relation given by Authors who lived pretty near the time when the incident happened? It would not be leſs ſurprizing, ſhould people begin already to aſſert, that Barnevelt was only baniſhed, and that Mr. Fouquet was put to death. But whether there is occaſion here for our wonder or not, it is certain, that on one ſide ſeveral ingenious men, from the authorities of Suetonius and Juvenal; maintain, that Nero put Caius Caſſius to death; and on the other ſide, that ſeveral learned men from the authority of Tacitus and Pomponius, affirm in the moſt expreſs manner, that he only baniſhed him.

We will begin with the laſt teſtimonies; Tunc Conſulto Senatus, ſays Tacitus (4), Caſſio & Silano exſilia decernuntur,—DEPORTATUSQUE IN INSULAM SARDINIAM Caſſius, & Senatus jus expectabant (5). i. e. "Then Caſſius and Silanus, by a decree of the Senate, "were condemned to baniſhment. Caſſius was carried into exile &c." Caſſius is left there, and no notice taken of what became of him afterwards: but we are elſewhere informed, that having been reſtored by Veſpaſian, he died in peace. Plurimum in civitate auctoritatis habuit, eo uſque donec eum Cæſar CIVITATE PELLERET; PULSUS AB EO IN SARDINIAM revocatus à Veſpaſiano, diem ſuum obiit (6). i. e. "He had "great authority in the city, till Cæſar drove him "from it; and being baniſhed by that Monarch into "Sardinia, he was recalled by Veſpaſian, and died at "home." Let us now ſee, whether Suetonius and Juvenal declare as clearly, that Nero put him to death. Suetonius having ſaid, that this Emperor uſed to put to death whomſoever he pleaſed, for the moſt trifling fault; without obſerving the leaſt meaſure or diſtinction, adds, with regard to four perſons, the crimes with which they were charged (7), Caſſius Longinus the Lawyer, one of theſe four was accuſed (ſays he) of having left in the Genealogical Table of his family, the picture of Caſſius, one of Cæſar's murtherers: Quod in vetere gentili ſtemmate C. Caſſii percuſſoris Cæſaris imagines retinuiſſet. Now this is directly one of the articles of the impeachment, drawn up againſt this great man, according to Tacitus. Objectavit Caſſio (Nero) quod inter imagines majorum etiam C. Caſſii effigiem coluiſſet, ita inſcriptam DUCI PARTIUM (8), i. e. "It was objected to Caſſius by Nero, "that among the images of his anceſtors, he vene"rated that of C. Caſſius, on which was the follow"ing inſcription, TO THE LEADER OF THE PARTY." This ſhews that the two Hiſtorians in queſtion ſpeak of the ſame Caſſius; and nevertheleſs one of them declares expreſly, that he was only baniſhed; and the other, that he was put to death: for Suetonius muſt have been in a dream; had he ſpoke in the manner he has done, without intending to inform us thereby, that Nero cauſed this Lawyer to be put to death.

(4) Tacit. Ann. lib. 16. cap. 9.

(5) Theſe laſt words which Lipſius looked upon as inexplicable, have been ingeniouſly corrected by Preſident Bertrand, and by William Grotius, very near in the ſame way. The firſt reads, nec Senatus jus exſpectabatur; the ſecond, nec Senatus juſſus exſpectabatur. The conjecture of Nicholas Heinſius, which appeared to Mr. Rijck, Animadv. ad Tacit. pag. 282. the moſt probable of all, is, that we are to read & ſeneſtus ejus reſpectabatur. But Don Nicholas Antonio, de Juribus exulum, lib. 1. pag. 72. pretends that we are to read, ut ſenex tutius aſpectabatur, or deſpectabatur.

(6) Pomponius, in L. II. de Orig. Juris, § ult.

(7) Suetonius in Nerone, cap. 37.

(8) Tacit. Ann. lib. 16. cap. 7.

he put him to death. Commentators have not taken the leaſt pains to clear up theſe blunders [C]. In my opinion, they are miſtaken, who affirm, that Germanicus's ſon-in-law was a Lawyer (b) [D]. The omiſſion of a ſingle word has occaſioned the aſſertion of a great falſhood in de Chevreau's Hiſtory [E]; and it was not corrected in the Hague edition, printed anno 1698.

(b) Glandorp. Onomaſt. pag. 204 and 468.

(9) Juven. Sat. x. ver. 12, &c.

With reſpect to Juvenal (9), he ſeems to me to write in as poſitive terms. Not but that the baniſhment into the iſland of Sardinia, which paſſed for a very deſolate, unhealthy country, might have appeared to him ſo great a puniſhment as to make him ſay, that Caſſius Longinus whoſe great riches had occaſioned his exile to ſuch a place, would be an example of the calamities to which rich men, but not the poor are expoſed; and this is the common place he treats of on that occaſion. But laſtly, he had a little before confined himſelf to that ſpecies of misfortune or calamity, which he would aſcribe to riches: he had obſerved, that the too aſſiduous amaſſing of wealth had brought many to an ill end.

Sed plureis nimia congeſta pecunia cura
STRANGULAT.

That is,

" But more have been by avarice oppreſs'd
" And heaps of money crowded in the cheſt.
Dryden.

Therefore, the two examples which he gives immediately after, viz. Longinus and Seneca muſt be examples of perſons brought to an evil end.

Temporibus diris igitur, juſſuque Neronis
Longinum & magnos Senecæ prædivitis hortos
Clauſit, & egregias Lateranorum obſidet ædes
Tota cohors.

That is,

" For this, in Nero's arbitrary time,
" When virtue was a guilt, and wealth a crime,
" A troop of cut-throat guards were ſent to ſeize
" The rich men's goods, and gut their Palaces.
Dryden.

Tacitus obſerves alſo, that Caſſius's riches were one of the two cauſes of the perſecution he ſuffered; whence it is evident, that both he and Juvenal mean the ſame perſon. Nullo crimine, ſays he, in Chapter VII of the XVIth Book of Annals, niſi quod Caſſius OPIBUS vetuſtis & gravitate morum præcellebat. i. e. " Caſſius " had no crimes, but his great riches, and the fame " of the ſeverity of his manners." The other cauſe of this perſecution was, Caſſius's ſevere virtue, which was hereditary in his family, and of which he himſelf had given ſo many examples, either in maintaining the troops in Syria under the moſt ſevere military diſcipline, even in times of peace (10); or in voting for the continuing of that law, which condemned to death all the ſlaves belonging to a maſter, when one of them had killed him (11).

(10) Tacit. Annal. lib. 12. cap. 12.
(11) Idem, Annal. lib. 14. cap. 43. See alſo chap. 48. of the 13th book, and chap. 41.

[C] . . . . Commentators have taken no manner of pains to clear up theſe blunders.] It cannot eaſily be conceived, why they did not take the pains to examine, either the error of Tacitus and Pomponius, or that of Juvenal and Suetonius. The Commentators on Juvenal (12), and of Suetonius (13) relate, that Nero put Caſſius Longinus to death, but at the ſame time take no notice of what is related by Tacitus, who gives a very different account. Neither do the Commentators on Tacitus (14) mention the opinion of the other two, and ſpeak only of his baniſhment. The Author of the lives of ancient Lawyers do the ſame (15). There are even ſome Writers, who cite Suetonius, with regard to the obſervation he made, viz. that Caſſius was blind (16); but they do not ſeem to have read in almoſt the ſame place, that Nero put him to death.

(12) Britannicus, Autumnus, Farnabius, Prataeus &c. This is not affirmed poſitively of all. The ſame is to be underſtood of what follows.
(13) Suetonius Variorum, Græevii, Pitiſci. Ch. Stephens, and Lloyd do the ſame
(14) Lipſius, Ryckius.
(15) Bertrand, Guil. Grotius.
(16) Glandorp, pag. 205. Bertrand, pag. 274.

[D] In my opinion, thoſe are miſtaken, who affirm that Germanicus's ſon-in-law was a Lawyer.] Had he been of that profeſſion, Tacitus would not have omitted it, where he mentions his good qualities, on occaſion of his marrying Tiberius's grand-daughter. Suetonius, who ſpeaks of him where he informs us that Caligula took away his wife, and afterwards put him to death (17), would certainly have taken notice of his being a Lawyer, had he been as Glandorp pretends (18), that celebrated Lawyer, who ſucceeded Maſurius Sabinus in that profeſſion, and whoſe mother, daughter of Tubero was grand-daughter of Sulpitius, the oracle of Civil Law. Suetonius has not omitted to call C. Caſſius Longinus, a Lawyer, he being really ſuch (19); but why ſhould he not have been equally accurate with regard to L. Caſſius Longinus? Tacitus has not forgot to obſerve, that Caius Caſſius was greatly ſkilled in the Civil Law. Ea tempeſtate Caſſius cæteris præminebat peritia legum (20).

(17) Sueton. in Caligula, cap. 24, 57.
(18) Onomaſt. pag. 204.
(19) Sueton. in Nerone, cap. 37.
(20) Tacit. Ann. lib. 12. cap. 12.

ERROR of Hofman.

Mr. Hofman multiplies here the Lawyers in another manner. He makes one of theſe, he whom Nero put to death, according to Suetonius; and another, he who was only baniſhed into Sardinia, by the ſame Nero, according to Tacitus.

[E] The omiſſion of a ſingle word, has occaſioned the aſſertion of a great falſhood, in de Chevreau's Hiſtory.] It is I believe an error of the preſs. In chapter IX, of book III, of his Hiſtory of the world, we read, that Nero put Caſſius Longinus to death, for having placed among the pictures of his anceſtors, that of Julius Cæſar. The Printer had left out theſe words of the murtherer; the Corrector, not remembring the ſtory, and finding, notwithſtanding the omiſſion, a cauſe that was plauſible enough to induce Nero to put people to death, he therefore let the period ſtand as he found it; and in Holland they did not believe there was any occaſion to rectify this blunder. This conjecture is very probable; and would to God the error I have here taken notice of, was the only one which ſuch omiſſions of Copyiſts and Printers have occaſioned in Books.

Since the firſt impreſſion of this Dictionary, a new Edition has been publiſhed (21) of Mr. Chevreau's Hiſtory, agreeable to the alterations made by himſelf in almoſt every page of the preceding Editions (22). But I have not found any alteration in the paſſage relating to our Caſſius; ſo that I cannot any longer believe, that the Printers committed this error.

(21) At the Hague, in 1698.
(22) The Bookſeller's Preface.

CASSIUS HEMINA (LUCIUS) a Roman Hiſtorian, lived in the beginning of the ſeventh Century of Rome. He compoſed four books of Annals. By the particulars which are cited from it (a), we may ſuppoſe, that he traced the Roman Hiſtory to the times which preceded Romulus; and that he continued them thro' the ſeries of the ſucceſſors to that King, to his own times. He wrote the account of the ſecond Punic war in his laſt book (b). Theſe writers who make him live under Auguſtus, are very much miſtaken [A]; and

(a) See Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 27, 110.

(b) Bellum Punicum poſterior. Priſcianus, lib. 7. apud Voſſium, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 27. Antiently the nouns in or, were of the common gender. Voſſius, ibid.

[A] Thoſe writers who make him live under Auguſtus, are very much miſtaken.] Voſſius has diſcovered the cauſe of their miſtake. Priſcian, ſays he (1), cites at one time Caſſius ad Mecænatem; and at another, Caſſius ad Tiberium, upon which it has been pretended, that theſe related to Caſſius Hemina. Firſt, we have ſeen Simler aſſert in his Epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheca, that Caſſius Hemina had dedicated his Hiſtory and his Annals to Mecænas and to Tiberius. La Popeliniere afterwards aſſerted the ſame thing (2). Guilandin and Dalechamp have gone ſtill farther; in their opinion, Pliny ought not to have added the epithet of moſt ancient, vetuſtiſſimum to an Author who lived but ſeventy years before him, conſidering the perſons to whom he had dedicated his Books; for this reaſon they altered vetuſtiſſimum into veriſſimum (3). The truth is, Caſſius Hemina was living when the ſecular games were celebrated the fourth time, the year of Rome 608 or 607. As for Priſcian's Caſſius, he is Caſſius Severus the Orator, if Voſſius (4) and Father Hardouin (5) may be credited.

(1) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 27.
(2) Caſſius Hemina wrote Annals and ſome Hiſtories, which he ſent to the Emperor Tiberius and Mecænas. La Popeliniere, Hiſt. des Hiſtoires, pag. 318.
(3) Caſſius Hemina vetuſtiſſimus Auctor Annalium Plinius, lib. 13. cap. 13.
(4) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. p. 27.
(5) In Indice Autorum Plinii, where an error has crept into the article of Caſſius Hemina, viz. they placing the beginning of Tiberius's reign under the year of Rome 780.

and confounded him with Caſſius Severus [B]. There is a wretched miſtake in Charles Stephens's Dictionary, concerning Caſſius Hemina [C].

[B] . . . . and have confounded him with Caſſius Severus.] Voſſius does not talk improbably, when he aſcribes this error to ſome of Tertullian's Copyiſts (6). It is doubtleſs much better to make this ſuppoſition, than to attack Tertullian himſelf: be this as it will, we ſee Caſſius Severus cited in Tertullian's apology, with Cornelius Nepos; and that to juſtify a particular which it is very certain Caſſius Hemina writ upon; whereas it is not very much ſo, that the other Caſſius wrote a Hiſtory properly ſo called. Voſſius is therefore of opinion, that Tertullian had barely cited Caſſius, but that he underſtood Hemina; and that the word Severus had at laſt crept into the text, by the ignorance of the Copyiſt. He confirms this conjecture by obſervation, viz. that Minutius Felix and Lactantius (repeating Tertullian's objection) cite Caſſius without adding Severus. They indeed rank him after Cornelius Nepos; but we muſt not infer from thence, that theſe meant as tho' his Hiſtory were poſterior to that of Cornelius Nepos; otherwiſe we ſhould be alſo obliged to conclude from hence, that Lactantius pretended, that Varro lived under Tiberius; for he places Varro after Caſſius, Latini Nepos, & Caſſius, & Varro (7). Thoſe who exclaimed ſo much againſt Calvin, for ſaying, ſoon after he had ſpoke of Arius, ſurrexit poſtea Sabellius, i. e. afterwards Sabellius appeared, have been ſhewn, that perſons extremely well ſkilled in Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory and Chronology, have ſometimes placed Hereſiarchs in a very inaccurate manner, when the buſineſs was not to denote the exact time in which each of them had lived (8).

(6) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 110.

(7) Lactant. Divinarum Inſtit. lib. 1. cap. 13.

(8) See Epiſtola Apologetica J. Sarravii, impreſſa Burdigalæ, 1607, wherein is cited the following words of Nicholas Vignier, Apud Alexandriam congregata fuit Synodus, conſtans probis & Catholicis Epiſcopis, per quos rurſus hæreſis utraque Arii & Sabellii damnata fuit; and theſe of Carranza, damnavit item Calixtum, Arium, Photinum, & Sabellium.

[C] There is a moſt wretched miſtake in Charles Stephen's Dictionary concerning Caſſius Hemina.] We there find Caſſius Hemina a Surgeon in Rome, honoured with the freedom of that city, becauſe of his great ſkill in Surgery; and allowed to have a ſhop in the region or part of the city called Acilia. This is related, as from the authority of Pliny, Chap. VII, of Book XXV; and Chap. III, of Book XXX. But there is nothing like what is here aſſerted; either in the places cited, or in any other part of Pliny. The only circumſtance this Author tells us, which can have any relation to this, is in the firſt Chapter of the XXIXth Book: Caſſius Hemina, ſays he, one of the moſt antient Authors affirms, that the firſt Phyſician who came to Rome, was Archagathus ſon of Lyſanias, who arrived thither from Peloponneſus, in the 535*th year of Rome, where he was made free of the city, and allowed a ſhop which was bought for him at the public expence, in the region or diviſion called Acilia.* The Reader ſees evidently enough, the prodigious difference there is between what is aſcribed to Pliny, and what he really ſays; and it is vaſtly ſurprizing, that neither Frederic Morellus Regius Profeſſor, Lloyd, nor Hofman, ſhould have corrected this blunder of Charles Stephens. It is at full length in the edition of 1620, and in that of 1662. Lloyd has only changed the numerical figures of the citation from Pliny, which is far from rectifying the miſtake: he reducing them to the following. 7. 25. Hofman has tranſcribed word for word from Lloyd. Immediately after, they give us from Voſſius's Obſervations a good article of Caſſius Hemina the Annaliſt, the only one they ought to have mentioned, after expunging the chimerical Surgeon of that name.

CASSIUS SEVERUS (TITUS) a famous writer in the reign of Auguſtus, diſtinguiſhed himſelf chiefly by his ſatyrical humour, which at laſt occaſioned his baniſhment, and plunged him into miſeries, from which death only freed him (a). Moreri has confounded him with another CASSIUS ſirnamed Parmenſis [A] a great verſifier, and one of the aſſaſſins of Julius Cæſar. This made him fall into a great many errors [B], beſides

(a) See the remark [G].

[A] Moreri has confounded him with another Caſſius ſurnamed Parmenſis.] I have not found that they call him Severus; nevertheleſs Father Hardouin tells us (1), that he was called Caſſius Severus Parmenſis, and that the Orator Caſſius Severus, to prevent his being confounded with him, is ſurnamed Longulanus, from Longula the place of his birth (2). I wiſh he had given proofs of all this, and alſo whether the Poet is ſurnamed Parmenſis, becauſe he was a native of Parma. We may doubt the truth of this, becauſe Horace calls him Hetruſcum, a Tuſcan; and that Parma was then in Gallia Ciſalpina; but as it had belonged to the Tuſcans, who knows whether a native of Parma might not ſtill be called Hetruſcus? Father Hardouin obſerves, that the preceding editions of Pliny, expreſſed the name Caſſius Severus, Longulanus, as tho' two Authors were underſtood by theſe; and that it is certain Simler, in the Abridgment of Simler's Bibliotheca, ſpeaks of Longulanus ſingly, as an Author. He adds alſo, that we have an Epigram written by Caſſius Parmenſis on Orpheus; which Pitho inſerted in his Collection of ſmaller Poems of the Antients, publiſh'd at Paris in 1590. To this I add, that the Epigram in queſtion had been publiſh'd before Pithou's Collection. Achilles Statius was the firſt who publiſh'd it (4). Afterwards, N. Chytræus wrote a Commentary on it. Several perſons are of opinion that it is a ſuppoſititious piece, of which Achilles Statius is the true Author (5). There is no perſon but has heard, in what manner Muretus impoſed upon the greateſt critick of his time (6), in palming upon him as verſes of Trabeas (7), found in an old manuſcript, thoſe which Muretus had compoſed himſelf. Might not therefore Achilles Statius have had the like inclination, to try the judgment of the Public? Sigonius intended this, as appeared by the Book de Conſolatione, which he endeavoured to aſcribe to Cicero.

(1) Comment. in Plin. tom. 1. in Indice Autorum.

(2) A city of Italy in the country of the Volſci near Rome.

(3) Lib. 1. Sat. 10.

(4) In his Commentary upon Suetonius, de claris Rhetoribus.

(5) See Voſſius, de Poet. Lat. pag. 24. and the Theſaurus Scholaſticæ Eruditionis.

(6) Joſeph. Scaliger.

(7) An antient Comick Poet.

[B] . . . This occaſioned his falling into a great many errors.] 1. He obſerves in the firſt place, that the compoſitions of this Caſſius, which were a little too much to the diſadvantage of Perſons of Quality, made Auguſtus reſolve to inſpect all famous pieces that ſhould be publiſh'd hereafter. That is a very wrong interpretation of the following paſſage of Voſſius: Scriptis ſuis procacibus procidiſſe viros fœminaſque illuſtres, eaque re occaſionem dediſſe Auguſto, ut DE LIBELLIS FAMOSIS COGNITIONEM SUSCIPERET (8). Who would have believed, unleſs he ſaw it, that the Emperor Auguſtus could be found in this paſſage, deſirous of being informed of ſuch celebrated works as were publiſhing; and not fired with a juſt indignation againſt abuſive libels, and ordering the Judges to make ſearch for, and puniſh the Authors of them? I fancy Moreri would not have committed ſo many errors, had he trac'd back to the ſource which Voſſius directed him to, I mean, to the firſt Book of Tacitus's Annals; for he there would have found, that Auguſtus was the firſt, who, according to the Law de Majeſtate, took cognizance of ſuch Books as the Latins called famoſos; whence he would have concluded, that it was not out of the curioſity he had to peruſe celebrated pieces, but in order to cauſe enquiries to be made in a judiciary way, againſt works of the ſame kind with thoſe of Caſſius Severus, that the Emperor was induced to eſtabliſh this new Tribunal. Now, of what ſpecies were thoſe compoſitions of Caſſius? Satyrs, in which the reputation of ſeveral illuſtrious perſons of both ſexes had been furiouſly attacked. Tacitus ſpeaks in the following manner: Primus Auguſtus cognitionem de famoſis libellis ſpecie legis ejus (Majeſtatis) tractavit, commotus Caſſii Severi libidine, qua viros fœminaſque illuſtres procacibus ſcriptis diffamaverat (9). i. e. "The Monarch "who firſt took cognizance of defamatory libels was "Auguſtus, by virtue of the law de Majeſtate; ex"cited thereto by the outrage of Caſſius Severus, "who had aſperſed many perſons of diſtinction of "both Sexes in his writings." II. Moreri ſays ſecondly, that Caſſius Severus was one of the conſpirators againſt Cæſar; that after the defeat of Brutus and Caſſius, in the year of Rome 712, he followed young Pom-

(8) Voſſius, de Hiſtoric. Lat. pag. 109.

(9) Tacit. Ann. lib. 1. cap. 72.

fides those he committed abstractedly from this. I shall take notice of them below, and the mistake committed by a learned Advocate for Cardinal Mazarine [C]. Vossius has also confounded the Orator with the Poet [D]; and was censured for it by remarks, all which however are not just. Other writers, on the contrary, have made two men of this Cassius [E]. He is not the Cassius to whom Ovid wrote [F]. Scaliger knew very well who he was, but employed bad reasons to refute this error [G]. Some difficulties pey and afterwards Anthony; and that at last, Augustus ordered Varus to kill him; and that the latter finding Cassius in his study, set fire to it, and burnt him together with his books. All this is false, and relates to another Cassius, who is a very different person from him in question, as will be observed hereafter (10). III. Tacitus nevertheless says, adds he, that he was banished into the Island of Crete, by the command of Tiberius. This is not so erroneous, since the abovementioned banishment belongs properly to our Cassius. But Moreri does not long continue in the right path, without stumbling. Tacitus does not inform us, that Tiberius banished Cassius into the Island of Crete; he observes only, that in the year 777, which was the 10th of Tiberius's reign, Cassius's punishment was increased; since instead of leaving him in his banishment in the Island of Crete, he was confined to the little Island of Seriphus, and prohibited the use of fire and water (11). This passage does not inform us, whether it was under Augustus, or since his death that Cassius was banished into the Island of Crete; and though this had happened under that Emperor, Moreri would have nevertheless been mistaken, in ascribing to Tacitus, what really was not asserted by him. What then will the reader say, when he shall find that Cassius was banished under Augustus? which circumstance is verified in the following manner. Cassius, according to St. Jerom, died the year of our Lord 33 (12), and the 25th of his banishment. He therefore must have been banished into the Island of Crete in the 8th year of Christ, and in the 50th of Augustus's reign; now, since Augustus died but in the 56th year of his Empire, Cassius's exile must consequently have preceded, five or six years, the accession of Tiberius to the Imperial Throne. And accordingly we find, that Scaliger fixes the banishment of Ovid, and of Cassius to pretty near the same time (13). IV. This plainly shews another error of Moreri, viz. his saying that St. Jerom affirms, that Cassius died, after fifteen years banishment, the 4th year of the CC Olympiad, i. e. about the 24th year of the Christian Æra. A slight inspection into St. Jerom's Chronicle will shew, that Cassius died in the 25th year of his exile, the 4th of the CCIId Olympiad, the 33d of our Lord, and the 19th of Tiberius. This cannot be said to be an error of the Printer, from his mistaking one figure for another; for besides that in the abovementioned article of Moreri, some numbers are expressed at length in words; is it possible for a Printer to mistake three times in the figures, with the symmetry which is here seen between the errors? V. The last blunder is the following: Moreri ascribes to Cassius Severus, what Horace says only of Cassius Parmensis, viz. that his poetic genius flowed with greater rapidity than a violent stream &c. I do not reckon as errors, the Authors which are cited at the foot of the article, tho' they make no mention of our Cassius Severus.

(10) In the note [L].

(11) Tacit. Annal. lib. 4. cap. 21.

(12) Andrew Schottus was in an error when he wrote 39 in his Treatise, De claris apud Senecam Rhetoribus.

(13) Scaligeri, Animadv. in Euseb. pag. 187. ad numerum 2048.

[C] I shall take notice below, of a mistake committed by a . . . Advocate for Cardinal Mazarine.] I mean Gabriel Naudæus. Cassius Parmensis, says he (14), having wrote against Augustus, Albius Tibullus promis'd indeed to write in his defence;

Scribere quod Cassî Parmensis opuscula vincat? *

But for the Emperor, he did not shew any resentment at it. Never was a passage placed more improperly than those verses of Horace; for that Poet does not assert, that Tibullus composed verses which related in any manner to Cassius Parmensis; he speaks of this only in a doubtful way; and he also supposes, that in case Tibullus wrote upon this subject, it was not to refute a Satyr written against Augustus; but only by way of attempting to excel Cassius Parmensis. Read attentively the following Verses, and consult Dacier's Notes on them!

(14) Naudæus, Dialog. de Mascurat, pag. 642.

* Horat. lib. 1. Epist. 4. ver. 3.

Albi nostrorum sermonum candide Judex!
Quid nunc te dicam facere in regione Pedana?
Scribere quod Cassi Parmensis opuscula vincat?
An tacitum sylvas inter reptare salubres,
Curantem quicquid dignum sapiente bonoque est (15)?

(15) Idem, ibid.

That is,

"Albius, the fairest Critick that I know,
"What shall I say, that you are doing now?
"In Pedan fields do you design to write
"More great than Cassius, and with higher flight?
"Or do'st thou gravely walk the healthy wood,
"Considering what befits the wise and good?"

Creech.

[D] Vossius has also confounded the Orator with the Poet.] Dacier has censured this error in his excellent Commentary on Horace (16). If it were true, that the Poet was called Severus (17), I should find but one proof of Vossius's having confounded him with the Orator; for in that case, he might have called the Poet Cassius Severus Parmensis, without confounding him with the Orator. And as for the passage of Quintilian, wherein Cassius the Orator is mentioned; and which Dacier produces to shew, that Vossius had confounded together the two Cassius's; this cannot prove the matter in hand, since Vossius had not the abovementioned passage in view, but cites another from Quintilian, which does not relate to Cassius Severus the Orator, but to Cornelius Severus the Poet (18). Dacier has therefore but the following proof left, viz. that Vossius ascribes to Cassius Parmensis what the old Scholiast on Horace says of Cassius Severus, in Ode VI of the Vth Book. Dacier might therefore have said, that Vossius ascribes to the Poet Cassius, not only what relates to no one but to the Orator; but also, what is relative only to Cornelius Severus the Poet. Vossius had not committed those errors, in his work on the Latin Historians; for he ascribes to Cassius Severus the Orator, the Ode of Horace in question; he also distinguishes him from Cornelius Severus, and censures la Popeliniere for having confounded them (19).

Dacier's Criticism of Vossius examin'd.

(16) Tom. 5. pag. 147. sive in VI Ode Epod. aut Libri V.

(17) Father Hardouin in Indice Autorum Plinii, affirms it.

(18) Vossius, de Poetis Lat. pag. 24.

(19) See Vossium, de Hist. Lat. pag. 109.

[E] Others on the contrary have made two men of this Cassius.] We shall see presently, that if on one side Cassius Severus and Cassius Parmensis, have been made one person; on the other side, Cassius has been made two persons. And indeed, Glandorp having mentioned most of the particulars which are related of him, speaks immediately after of another Cassius Severus, flourishing under Vespasian, and spoken of by Pliny in chapter XI, of Book XXXV (20); but this is the individual person who was banished for his calumnies. This appears at first sight, when we consider on what occasion Pliny speaks of this Cassius, viz. after having taken notice of certain Dishes of so prodigious a size, that luxury had perhaps never displayed itself more than on this occasion; he says, that Vitellius's Dish was not more infamous than that of Asprenas, which had poisoned 130 guests, as Cassius Severus, the accuser of Asprenas, objected to him. Now we find by Suetonius (21), that it was under Augustus Asprenas was prosecuted by Cassius Severus, for being a poisoner.

(20) Glandorp, Onomastic. pag. 209.

(21) In Aug. cap. 56.

[F] He is not the Cassius to whom Ovid wrote.] Glandorp had committed another error a little before, viz. in being of opinion, that T. Cassius Severus was the person to whom Ovid wrote the VIIIth Epistle of the first Book de Ponto. Father Andrew Schottus committed the like mistake (22), as also Vossius (23); tho' Scaliger had refuted him, upon L. Giraldi's doubting, whether the Orator Cassius Severus, and the Severus to whom Ovid wrote, were the same person.

(22) De claris apud Senecam Rhetoribus.

(23) Vossius, de Hist. Lat. pag. 109.

[G] Scaliger . . . had employed bad reasons to refute this error.] There is as much difference, says he (24), between the one and the other, as between the family of the Cassii, and that of the Cornelii: for he to whom Ovid wrote, was Cornelius Severus the Poet; and the other

(24) Scalig. Animadv. in Chron. Euseb. pag. 187. edit. Amstel. 1658.

culties may be ſtarted with regard to the time in which Caſſius was puniſhed for his Satyrs [H]; for Authors do not agree with regard to the Laws, which Auguſtus cauſed to other was Caſſius Severus the Orator. 'Tis plain from theſe words, that Scaliger was perſuaded, that the Caſſius in queſtion was of the family Caſſia, one of the moſt illuſtrious in Rome; but that is not true, ſince, according to Tacitus, this Orator was of mean extraction (25). With regard to Scaliger's other reaſon, I don't know what to make on't: and I have read over the following paſſage ſeveral times, without being able to underſtand it. Cornelius Severus, ſays he, was ſtill living after the death of Auguſtus; but Caſſius Severus had been baniſh'd five years before the death of that Emperor, almoſt at the ſame time that Ovid was ſent into exile. The Printers muſt certainly have omitted a word, Romæ for inſtance; otherwiſe Scaliger would argue wretchedly; and if we ſuppoſe he aſſerted, that Cornelius Severus lived at Rome after Auguſtus's death, this manifeſtly ſhews, that the Cornelius in queſtion was not Caſſius Severus, who having been ſent into baniſhment before the death of Auguſtus, never returned from it. This is certainly the true way to remove Giraldi's doubt, and to refute the opinion of Glandorp and Voſſius. We will but refer them to the Epiſtle of Ovid in queſtion, which they will find dated the fourteenth year of his baniſhment; and directed to a man who enjoyed all the pleaſures of Rome, and all the delights of his country-ſeat. But theſe circumſtances did not any way ſuit the Orator Caſſius, baniſh'd into the Iſland of Crete. If Giraldi's doubt related to the ſecond Epiſtle of the fourth Book de Ponto, this may likewiſe be removed, by the Epiſtle itſelf, ſince it is directed to a Poet who was at that time in proſperity.

I muſt here inform the reader, that beſides the VIIIth Epiſtle of the firſt Book de Ponto, there is another (26) in the Vth Book written to a Severus who was profeſſedly a Poet, as one may eaſily ſuppoſe, from the manner in which Ovid writes to him. This very probably was Cornelius Severus, as Voſſius (27), and Briet (28) ſuppoſed. In this manner, the VIIIth Epiſtle of the 1ſt Book de Ponto, and the IId of the 4th Book, were written, according to Voſſius, to the ſame friend. If this be true, we are not to ſuppoſe, that thoſe Epiſtles are placed in the true order of time; the IId Epiſtle of the 4th book, is of an older date than the VIII of the firſt Book; ſince in the former, Ovid makes an apology to his friend, for not having wrote to him before. Beſides, conſidering his friend as engaged in ſeveral employments, in the VIIIth Epiſtle of the firſt Book; he ſays nothing which intimates, that he was writing to a Poet. Such a circumſtance would be very ſingular, with regard to perſons who ſet up for Poets; and applied themſelves ſo much to that art as Ovid and Cornelius Severus did. For this reaſon, there is ſome little room to doubt, whether theſe two Epiſtles were written to Caſſius Severus.

[H] Some difficulties may be ſtarted, with regard to the time in which Caſſius was furniſhed for his Satyrs.] St. Jerom's calculation, with regard to the baniſhment of this ſatyrical Writer, is enough to perplex very much other calculations. Caſſius juſtly deſerves the name of a ſatyrical Writer; he might even be look'd upon as a martyr to ſlander; ſince having brought a ſevere baniſhment upon himſelf, by the very ſeverity of his Satyr, and not ſoftening his pen, after that calamity, he made himſelf new foes, without having pacify'd thoſe he had before exaſperated (29). This brought a more ſevere puniſhment upon him, and reduced him to ſuch an extreme poverty, that he had ſcarce money wherewithal to purchaſe even rags, to cover his nakedneſs (30). He died in this miſerable condition in the 25th year of his baniſhment, according to St. Jerom; now as this happened in the 19th year of Tiberius's reign, Caſſius's exile muſt have begun five or ſix years before Auguſtus's death. But in what manner ſhall we reconcile this with Dion, who relates, that Auguſtus did not puniſh ſome libellers; nor gave orders to reſtrain the licentiouſneſs of Satyriſts till the year of Rome 765, i. e. two years before the death of that Emperor? We are not to doubt but that theſe proſecutions and regulations occaſioned Tacitus to ſay, that Auguſtus, exaſperated at the libels of Caſſius Severus, was the firſt who gave orders for proſecuting on the law de Majeſtate, the Authors of ſuch pieces. Neither are we to doubt, but that this Writer was baniſhed from Rome, about the ſame time that the Emperor made theſe new laws; conſequently, either St. Jerom's Chronology or that of Dion, are not accurate. Suetonius will not clear this doubt. He indeed tells us, that Auguſtus made ſuch laws; but he does not inform us in what year of his reign this happened. Nor does Tacitus mention the time; but only tells us the occaſion on which they were enacted.

If it be difficult to fix the Æra of Auguſtus's Edict againſt Libels, 'tis not, I believe, difficult to find in general, that he publiſh'd it in the latter part of his life. Whence it appears, that thoſe are miſtaken who pretend, that Horace had this Statute in his eye, where he introduces a friend telling him, that there were laws in force againſt ſatyrical Poets (31). On this occaſion Chabot the Commentator ſays, that Suetonius ſpeaks of the ſame law hinted at in theſe words of Horace; and cites Suetonius very improperly, firſt, by entirely diſguiſing the paſſage; and ſecondly by his adding notes, and explications to it; the whole in Italic, ſo that it is impoſſible for the reader to diſtinguiſh the words of Suetonius, from thoſe which are not ſo. But the greateſt blunder is, his aſſerting that Horace had in view the law which Suetonius ſpeaks of; a law that was not enacted till long time after the death of this Poet, which happened the 36th year of Auguſtus's reign; twenty years before the death of that Emperor. Torrentius has committed the like error, in his Commentary on Suetonius: Ad novum Auguſti, ſays he, hæc de re edictum reſpexit haud dubie Horat. L. II. ad Trebatium. Si mala condiderit, &c. i. e. "Horace doubtleſs had an eye to Auguſtus's new E-"dict, concerning this matter, in Book II, ad Trebatium, &c. The Author of the new Commentary Variorum on Suetonius, in 8vo, is of the ſame opinion with Torrentius. The Dauphin Scholiaſt (32) goes ſtill farther; for he aſſerts, that Horace had alſo in view the Edict of Auguſtus in the firſt Epiſtle of the ſecond Book; where it is more evident, that he ſpeaks of an antient law, enacted on account of the unbounded licentiouſneſs of Farce-players;

——— ——— Quin etiam Lex
Pœnaque lata, malo quæ nollet carmine quemquam
Deſcribi. Vertere modum formidine fuſtis,
Ad bene dicendum delectandumque redacti (33).

That is,

"Till laws commanded to regard men's fame,
"Severely laſh the vice, but ſpare the name.
"Fear made 'em civil, and deſign to write
"With modeſty, ſpeak well, and to delight.
CREECH.

It is generally thought, that the Poet ſpeaks there only of a Decree made by the laws of the twelve Tables, to prevent defamation of any kind. Forſterus has committed a more egregious blunder than any of thoſe I have yet mentioned; he aſcribes (34 to the Edict of Auguſtus, not only the above cited verſes of Horace, but alſo the following words from his Art of Poetry.

——— ——— Lex eſt accepta, chorusque
Turpiter obticuit, ſublato jure nocendi.

That is,

"Thus was the chorus loſt; their railing Muſe
"Grew ſilent, when forbidden to abuſe. Creech.

Now could the Æra of Auguſtus's Edict, mentioned by Dion, and pointed out by Tacitus, be criticized with any ſhadow of reaſon, were the affair of Labienus quoted, whoſe books were condemned to the flames, before Caſſius Severus had been proſecuted for his ſatyrical writings? This, at firſt ſight, ſeems an objection; ſince it cannot be aſſerted with truth, that Auguſtus's proſecution of Libels began by thoſe of Caſſius Severus; or two years before this Emperor's death, if it be true that the Senate burnt Labienus's Books, at a time when Caſſius was unmoleſted in his houſe. Now it appears from Seneca, that this happened about ſuch a time,

HORACE miſunderſtood with regard to the Laws enacted againſt Satyrs.

(25) Relatum de Caſſio Severo exſule, qui SORDIDÆ ORIGINIS, maleficæ vitæ, ſed vrandi validus, &c. Tacit. Annal. lib. 4. cap. 21.

(26) The ſecond.

(27) De Poetis Lat. pag. 34.

(28) Ibid. pag. 28.

(29) Per immodicas inimicitias et judicio jurati Senatus in Cretam amoveretur, effecerat. Atque illic eadem actitando, recentia veteraque odia advertit, exitiſque exutus, interdicto igni atque aqua, ſaxo Scribonio conſenuit. Tacitus, Annal. lib. 4. cap. 21.

(30) XXV exilii ſui anno in ſumma inopia moritur, vix panno verenda contectus. Chr. Euſebii.

(31) Si mala condiderit in quem quis carmina jus eſt Judiciumque. Horat. Sat. 1. lib. 2. ver. 82.

(32) In Sueton. Aug. cap. 55. pag. 176.

(33) Horat. Epiſt. 1. lib. 2. ver. 152.

(34) Forſterus, Hiſtor. Juris Civil. lib. 1. cap. 31. pag. m. 222.

THE works of Labienus condemned to the flames.

to be enacted againſt Libels. Plutarch was far from being exact in Chronology, where he ſpeaks of our Caſſius [I]. The ſatyrical diſpoſition of Caſſius prompted him to ſet up for an Accuſer or Informer; and though he was very unſucceſsful in his proſecutions, he yet would never leave off that infamous practice [K]. The manner in which he tormented Ceſtius the pleader (b), who had made an anſwer to Cicero's ſpeech pro Milone, is a time, ſince, when he regrets the loſs of thoſe Writings of Labienus, and the reſolution which the Author of them had formed of ſhutting himſelf up in the monument of his anceſtors, in order that he might not ſurvive the loſs of his compoſitions, he obſerves, that whilſt theſe books were burning, Caſſius Severus ſaid: they muſt now burn me alive; ſince I know them by heart (35). "Caſſi Severi hominis Labieno junctiſſimi "bellè dictares ferebatur; ILLO TEMPORE QUO LIBRI "LABIENI EX SENATUS-CONSULTO UREBANTUR, "nunc me, inquit, vivum uri oportet, qui illos edidici (36)."

(b) See the article CESTIUS, and Seneca, Præf. lib. 3. Declam. pag. m. 337.

(35) Some Authors relate this, as tho' Caſſius had ſaid it of his own books. Eraſmus, Apophthegm. lib. 8. pag. m. 659. Jeremie de Pours, pag. 667. of La divine Melodie, wherein he calls him Caſſianus; Chriſtianus Liberius, pag. 3. Exercitation. de ſcribendis & æſtimandis Libris; and others.

(36) Seneca, Præfat. lib. 5. Controverſiarum.

It may be anſwered, that Labienus's Writings were not properly defamatory Libels, or Satyrs directed at random againſt every one: but that they were Hiſtories wherein he had ſpoke, as being a Republican, very much in favour of Pompey, and of thoſe who had endeavoured to reanimate his party; that indeed ſuch ſort of pieces give as much offence as ſlanderous Libels; and that Auguſtus thought himſelf obliged to proſecute the Authors of them; but that it might be on a quite different foot, than when he came to enact the decrees ſpoken of by the Hiſtorians above cited.

Whatever may be ſaid on this ſubject, I can never be perſuaded, that Labienus's Works were condemned, merely becauſe the Author ſpoke well of Cæſar's enemies. It is true indeed, that under the cruel and bloody Tiberius, an Author loſt his life (37), for praiſing Brutus, and for ſaying that Caſſius was the laſt Roman; but at the ſame time the Hiſtory obſerves, that this was the firſt proſecution ever commenced on ſuch an account; and we find by the oration of the perſon impeached, that Auguſtus did not diſcontinue his eſteem for Livy, nor remove Aſinius Pollio, and Meſſala Corvinus, though they had ſpoken very handſomely of Cæſar's enemies. We find even there, that ſeveral pieces had been ſuffered to go uncenſured, tho' highly injurious to that Emperor, or to Auguſtus. Whence it may eaſily be inferred, that in caſe the Books of Labienus were condemned to the flames, it was becauſe they were filled with invectives againſt a numberleſs multitude of perſons. It is indiſputably manifeſt from Seneca, that they were of this caſt, he ſpeaking of them as follows: Libertas tanta ut libertatis nomen excederet, ut quia paſſim ordines hominesque laniabat Rabienus vocaretur. Animus per vitia ingens, & ad ſimilitudinem ingenii ſui violentus, & qui Pompeianos ſpiritus nondum in tanta pace poſſuiſſet. . . . Memini aliquando cum recitaret hiſtoriam, magnam partem convolviſſe & dixiſſe, Hæc quæ tranſeo poſt mortem meam legentur. Quanta in illis libertas fuit, quam etiam Labienus extimuit (38). i. e. "The liberty he "aſſumed was ſo great, that it exceeded the name "of liberty; ſo that by tearing to pieces whole orders "of men, and all without diſtinction, he was called "* Rabienus. He was a very wicked man and ſavage, "as he muſt naturally be; and ſtill preſerv'd the ſpirit of "the Pompeian party, even in ſo profound a peace. . I "remember once, when he was reciting his Hiſtory, "and had read a great part of it, he ſaid; the inci- "dents which I paſs over will be read after my death. "What a prodigious liberty was taken in them, a li- "berty which Labienus himſelf dreaded?" Had he writ in as general terms as Livy, he would have met with the ſame indulgence; and not have found in Caſſius Severus an intimate friend, and a great admirer of his works. Farther, Seneca declares, that till Labienus's books were condemned to the flames, no ſuch proſecutions had been ever heard of; and he congratulates the public, that this kind of puniſhment was not thought of, when Cicero was put to death; but at a time when there were no writers of genius: Res nova & inſueta ſupplicia de ſtudiis ſumi: bono hercle publico iſta in pœnas ingenioſa crudelitas poſt Ciceronem inventa eſt. Quid enim futurum fuit ſi Triumviris ingenium libuiſſet Ciceronis proſcribere? Dii melius quod eo ſeculo iſta ingeniorum ſupplicia cœperunt quo & deſierunt (39).

(37) Cremutius Cordus. See Tacitus, Annal. lib. 4. cap. 34.

(38) Seneca, Præf. lib. 5. Controverſiarum.

* As tho' we ſhould ſay, a mad, outragious creature. Addit. by the Tranſlator.

(39) Idem, ibid. DISAGREEMENT between Tacitus and Dion.

The reſult of theſe authorities is, I, that the works of Labienus were not committed to the flames, on account of the partiality which appeared in general, in them, with regard to Pompey's friends; and of this Cremutius Cordus's ſpeech is a proof. II, That theſe writings were very ſatyrical, Seneca plainly hints. III, That theſe were the firſt works of this kind that were ever burnt. IV, That this was done, either before Caſſius Severus was proſecuted either in his perſon or his writings. But this will never be reconciled either with Dion or with Tacitus: the latter ſays, that Caſſius's libels occaſioned Auguſtus to enact the law de Majeſtate againſt ſatyrs; whilſt the other affirms, that the decree which ordained that informations ſhould be taken out againſt libels, and burnt, and the puniſhing of ſome ſatyrical Authors, preceded the death of Auguſtus but two years. As St. Jerom computes Caſſius Severus to have been twenty five years in baniſhment, which Caſſius died the 19th year of Tiberius; he therefore would not be very well qualified to reconcile this matter. Some of theſe writers muſt neceſſarily have been very inaccurate. Now could this be Seneca; and is it poſſible for us to ſuppoſe that he had confounded the periods? The words which Caſſius ſays only in his baniſhment, could Seneca have aſcribed to him, as a ſmart ſaying ſpoke in Rome before his exile? But if Seneca miſtook in a circumſtance that happened in his time, and which related to two Orators of his acquaintance; how can we depend on any thing he affirms? But in caſe he has told us the truth, we have there a convincing proof, of a circumſtance which Voſſius conſiders as doubtful, or at moſt but as likely, viz, that Labienus died under Auguſtus (40).

(40) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 117.

[I] Plutarch was far from being exact in Chronology, when he ſpeaks of our Caſſius.] He affirms that Tiberius being one day in the Senate, a Senator repreſented to the Aſſembly, that it would be proper for every perſon to deliver his ſentiments with freedom; and declare, without the leaſt diſguiſe, whatever concerned the public welfare. This preamble having raiſed the attention of the whole aſſembly, the Senator directed himſelf to Tiberius; to inform him, that great complaints were made concerning him; and at the ſame time that no perſon dared to diſcover his uneaſineſs to him, viz. of his undergoing too much toil for the ſake of the Commonwealth; he ſacrificing his diverſions and health to its welfare. As he was going on with great volubility in the ſame ſtrain, we are told, adds Plutarch, that Caſſius Severus the Orator ſaid, the liberty this man takes, will occaſion his death (41). It is impoſſible, that Caſſius would have ſaid this, the very day that the Senator threw out theſe flattering expreſſions; ſince Caſſius, who was ſent into exile before the death of Auguſtus, was never recalled from it. I am ſurprized that as Theophilus Raynaud had ſo prodigious a memory, he did not call to mind this inſtance of the puniſhment of defamatory libels, where he ſpeaks of what was done by the Romans on thoſe occaſions (42).

(41) Plutarch, in his method how to diſtinguiſh the flatterer from the friend.

(42) Theoph. Rayn. Erotemat. de malis ac bonis Libris, pag. 72. BAD character of this Caſſius. He took a pleaſure in informing againſt others.

[K] The ſatyrical diſpoſition of Caſſius prompted him to ſet himſelf up as an accuſer; and tho' he was very unſucceſsful in his proſecutions, he yet would never leave off that infamous practice (43).] If ever man did not deſerve to be pitied for the calamities he ſuffered in his baniſhment, it was certainly Caſſius Severus; for, beſides the character or caſt of his ſlander, which was an immoderate and incorrigible ill nature; he took ſuch pleaſure in impeaching perſons, that one would have thought, he had ſet up for a common accuſer. This black diſpoſition engaged him to undertake the defence of the moſt groundleſs cauſes; and not to be diſheartened at the ill ſucceſs of his proſecutions. It was ſo uſual to ſee people acquitted in thoſe proſecutions, that this wiſh has been ranked among the ſmart ſayings of Auguſtus, viz. that the Architect of the Forum he was building, and which was carried on too ſlowly, might be accuſed by Caſſius (44). Auguſtus's thought is founded only on the ambiguous ſignification of the word abſolvere; it ſignifying, both to finiſh and acquit.

(43) This gave riſe to the following banter of Auguſtus; Cum multi Severo Caſſio accuſante abſolverentur, & Architectus Fori Auguſti exſpectationem operis diu traheret, ita jocatus eſt, Vellem Caſſius & meum Forum accuſet. Macrob. Saturn. lib. 2. cap. 4.

(44) See the preceding citation.

is ſufficient to ſhew, that no man in the world ever carried chicane and wrangling to a more extravagant height: and it is a very odd circumſtance, that Caſſius never undertook the defence of perſons impeached or accuſed (c), except when he was forced to plead his own cauſe, when he himſelf was impeached. Hofman has miſtook in certain things [L]. Writers are not agreed with regard to the country of (c) Seneca, Epiſtom. Diclamat. lib. 3. pag. 336.

Caſſius

acquit. This ſaying is therefore a mere pun or ſilly banter, according to the taſte of this time; I ſay of this time, becauſe it is not fifty years ſince, that ſuch equivocating expreſſions paſſed for the brighteſt wit (45). Be this as it will, this pun is no leſs a proof of Caſſius's inclination to impeach, than the exclamation he made in opening his plea againſt Aſprenas, whom he accuſed. By the favour of the Gods, I am ſtill alive; and have wherewithal to make life agreeable, ſince I ſee Aſprenas proſecuted. Nothing can be more judicious than Quintilian's reflection on this exordium. Sine dubio in omnibus ſtatim accuſationibus hoc agendum eſt, ne ad eas libenter deſcendiſſe videamur; ideoque mihi illud Caſſii Severi non mediocriter diſplicet; Dii boni, vivo; & quo me vivere juvet Aſprenatem reum video. Non enim juſta ex cauſa, vel neceſſaria, videri poteſt poſtulaſſe eum, ſed quadam accuſandi voluptate (46). i. e. "Doubtleſs in all impeachments this is firſt to be "taken care of, that we do not ſeem to undertake "them with pleaſure; and for this reaſon I am not a "little diſguſted at the following expreſſions of Caſſius "Severus; Ye Gods! I live; and live with pleaſure, "becauſe I ſee Aſprenas impeached. For he does not "ſeem to have impeached him for any juſt cauſe, or "out of neceſſity, but merely from a certain delight "he took in impeaching others." This Caſſius was certainly a moſt deteſtable villain; and thoſe who reſemble him, in every age, deſerve to die as miſerably as he did; and to have the following words ſpoke of him, according to Amyot's tranſlation

(45) As is manifeſt from the verſes above of St. Amant, in the article BAUTRU (WILLIAM), citation (1).

(46) Quintil. Inſtit. Orator. lib. 11. cap. 1.

Que deſormais autant en puiſſe-il prendre
A qui voudra telle choſe entrependre (47).

That is,

"Henceforward, may ſuch fate attend the wretch,
"Who ſhall engage in vile attempts like Theſe.

(47) This is a tranſlation of a verſe from Homer, applied by Scipio Africanus to the death of Tiberius Gracchus. See Plutarch, in Vita Gracchor. pag. 834.

For, if under the Roman Republic, at which time impeachments were conſidered as a ſtep for young Lawyers of quality to riſe in the world (48), and as a noble career for Orators to improve themſelves in (49), and at the ſame time a terror to wicked men (50); nevertheleſs thoſe who ſet up for accuſers were deſpiſed and hated; what expreſſions are there odious enough to employ under the Chriſtian diſpenſation, and in States which are governed in a different manner from the Commonwealth of antient Rome; what terms, I ſay, can one find to expreſs ſufficiently our indignation, againſt thoſe who ſet up for ſuch? I will again cite Quintilian; who declares, that there is but very little difference between a highwayman and a profeſſed informer. Accuſatoriam vitam vivere & ad deferendos reos præmio duci proximum latrocinio eſt (51). Cicero conſiders, as an indelible ſtain on the family Junia, its having given birth to an Orator, who exerciſed the horrid profeſſion here ſpoke of. Iiſdem temporibus M. Brutus, in quo magnum fuit, Brute, dedecus generi veſtro, qui cum tanto nomine eſſet patremque optimum virum habuiſſet & juris peritiſſimum, accuſationem facitaverit, ut Athenis Lycurgus. Is magiſtratus non petivit, ſed fuit accuſator vehemens & moleſtus, ut facile cerneres naturale quoddam ſtirpis bonum degeneraviſſe vitio depravatæ voluntatis (52). i. e. "At that time lived M. Brutus, "who, O Brutus! was a great diſgrace to your family. "This man, tho' he had acquired ſo exalted a repu"tation, and had ſo excellent a perſon for his father, "and a moſt able Lawyer, he yet made a trade of "impeaching others, as Lycurgus did at Athens. "This Brutus did not aſpire to the moſt exalted em"ployments in the State, but was a furious and vex"atious accuſer; ſo that it was manifeſt that the good "diſpoſition inherent in his family had been corrupt"ed by the depravity of his inclinations." He obſerves in another place, that that perſon muſt have almoſt renounced the name and nature of man, who could make it his conſtant practice to endanger the lives of many; and that whenever ſuch a one profeſſes himſelf an informer, he brands his reputation with the blackeſt infamy. Duri hominis vel potius vix hominis videtur periculum capitis inferre multis; id cum periculoſum ipſi eſt, tum etiam ſordidum ad famam committere, ut accuſator nominetur, quod contigit M. Bruto ſummo genere nato, illius filio, qui juris civilis in primis peritus fuit (53). What would he ſay in this age were he a Chriſtian, and ſaw perſons whoſe character in life required a quite different behaviour, ſet up for Knights of the Poſt, and perpetual Informers; one while by printed Libels, at other times by anonymous letters, include affairs of all kinds in their informations; as high-treaſon and hereſy; to ſet themſelves at the head of all Spies and News Mongers; and be no more diſheartened than Caſſius Severus was, to ſee thoſe they impeach for ever cleared &c. what would he ſay? This we may eaſily gueſs. We meet in Balzac's converſations, with a very beautiful chapter (54). Here follows the latter part of of it. "There is ſtill extant a "fragment of the plea of Calvus the Orator, againſt "that man ſo univerſally deteſted, I mean the infa"mous Vatinius; and this fragment is inſerted in the "collection of antient Orators, in the following words, "if my memory does not fail me. Hominem noſtræ "civitatis audaciſſimum, factioſum, ſordidum, accuſa"torem; i. e. "a man of our city, very bold, fac"tious, ſordid, and an accuſer:" wherein I find he does not omit, among Vatinius's other ill qualities, that of his being an accuſer or informer. Once again, it was infinitely more excuſable in that age, to ſet up for an informer, than at this time; for what arts are not employed in a Commonwealth, to win the favour of the people? Now thoſe of Rome were greatly pleaſed, to ſee informations brought againſt ſuch as had exerciſed any employment in the State; they conſidered informers as ſo many maſtiffs who ruſhed upon wolves. Ἐδόκει δ' ἡ ἄλλως αὐτοῖς (Ῥωμαίοις) ἀνὴρ προφάσεως οὐκ ἀγαπὴς εἶναι, τὸ τῆς κατηγορίας ἔργον, ἀλλὰ καὶ πάνυ τοὺς νέους ἐσπουδάζετο ποιεῖν ἀδίκων ἐπιφυομένους ἐρᾶν, ὥσπερ θηρίους εὐγενεῖς σκύλακας. Et quidem videbatur alioqui vel non ſuppetente cauſa res non pudenda accuſatio, ſe delectabantur juvenibus improbos ut generoſis canibus feras conſectantibus (55). Thus in Republicks, there is no ſurer way of gaining the applauſe of the common people, than by railing heartily from the pulpit againſt the Magiſtrates.

(48) Quintil. lib. 12. cap. 7. Apuleius in Apologia. See his words above, in citation (11) of the article ALLUTIUS (TITUS).

(49) Cicero, de Officiis, lib. 2. cap. 14.

(50) Quintil. lib. 12. cap. 7.

(51) Idem, ibid.

(52) Cicero, in Bruto, cap. 34.

(53) Idem, de Officiis, lib. 2. cap. 14.

(54) It is the 5th of the Entret. 34. pag. m. 329.

(55) Plutarch. in Lucullo, init. See above the note [D] of the article S. BERNARD, at the break.

[L] Hofman has miſtook in certain things.] He is a little more accurate on this occaſion than Moreri, and yet he is not ſo exact as he might have been; quiſque ſuos patitur manes.

I. In the firſt place, Hofman gives a ſeparate article of Caſſius Severus the Orator, with the judgment which Quintilian forms of him; to which Hofman adds, that Caſſius's Writings were ſuppreſſed by a decree of the Senate; he cites Suetonius for this purpoſe, and at laſt refers us to Voſſius. This Article is inſerted at full length in the Dictionary of Lloyd, who tranſcribed it without the leaſt amendments from Charles Stephens, excepting that he refers to Voſſius, which he added to it. We may cenſure all three, with regard to the quotation from Suetonius (56); for as he only mentions the ſuppreſſing of Caſſius's Writings, merely to inform us, that they were again ſuffered to be publiſhed by Caligula, with thoſe of Cremutius Cordus and of Labienus; they ſhould not have taken notice of the decree which prohibited the peruſal of them, or elſe they ſhould have told us, that this prohibition was taken off ſome time after. Ildly, After this Article, Hofman gives us another, viz. that of Caſſius Severus Parmenſis the Orator, of whom he relates ſeveral particulars which relate only to the Caſſius Severus of the preceding Article. He cites ſeveral Authors, as Horace in Satyr 19 (57), of the firſt Books, Velleius Paterculus, Appian, Oroſius, all who make not the leaſt mention of this Caſſius. So that, not ſatisfied with having drawn up two Articles for one and the ſame perſon; he falſly gives the ſurname Parmenſis, to Caſſius Severus the Orator; and aſcribes to him what was ſaid of another Caſſius. The worſt

(56) One of them at leaſt ſhould have given it us in a more preciſe manner, by citing the 16th chapter of Caligula's Life.

(57) It ſhould be 10 and not 19; the 1ſt book of Horace's Satyrs containing but 10, and the 2d only 8.

Caſſius Severus [M]. We ſhall give in the remarks the miſtakes of Petrus Crinitus [N].

I am obliged in juſtice to Caſſius, to conſider him alſo on his favourable ſide. So great was his eloquence, that it made him triumph over his Auditors, he moulding their paſſions, and diſpoſing of their anger as he pleaſed. They were ſo delighted with hearing him, that they were always vexed at his leaving off. He had two perfections in his voice which are ſeldom found together; I mean that it was ſtrong and very ſweet at the ſame time; and being of a majeſtic ſtature, it might be affirmed, that his body correſponded very well with his mind. The gravity which he did not aſſume in his ordinary behaviour, diſplayed itſelf with the utmoſt ſtrength and beauty in his words; for when he waved his raillery, his expreſſions had all the dignity of a Cenſor's harangue (d). His preſence of mind was ſo great, that he ſucceeded much better in ſuch things as he ſpoke unprepared, than in thoſe he got by heart. His extempore ſpeeches at the bar charmed much more than thoſe he had meditated upon. They who pleaded againſt Caſſius, never interrupted him; knowing, that to provoke him, was adding freſh ſtrength to his eloquence, and that it was of advantage to Caſſius to have the thread of his diſcourſe broken. He ſucceeded better in unexpected caſes, than in thoſe he had meditated upon in his ſtudy (e). Nevertheleſs, no man ever took more pains in preparing himſelf. His ſpeeches were prodigiouſly laboured; he did not ſuffer any thing to ſlip him that had the air of negligence; they were filled with noble thoughts; every expreſſion was of ſome import; and when an Auditor happened to be ever ſo little abſent in mind, he certainly loſt ſome valuable particular (f). Though Caſſius was always ſo ſucceſsful in his extempore ſpeeches, this did not make him leſs careful of preparing himſelf; for he was not ſatisfied with meditating ſtrongly on circumſtance is, that he finiſhes his Article with the doubtful interrogation following, with regard to a particular which does not admit the leaſt difficulty, an idem cum Caſſio Poëta? whether he be the ſame with Caſſius the Poet? Caſſius the Orator, baniſhed by Auguſtus into the iſland of Crete and by Tiberius into that of Seriphus, where he died in the 25th year of his exile, is he the ſame perſon with Caſſius Parmenſis the Poet, whom Auguſtus cauſed to be put to death at Athens a little after the battle of Actium; upwards of forty years before Tiberius's acceſſion to the Imperial Throne? IIIdly, Hofman is condemned by his own words; for he had given us, in the preceding page, the Article of Caſſius Parmenſis the Poet; wherein he had ſaid, that after the defeat of Brutus and Caſſius, this Poet retired to Athens; and that Varus, whom Auguſtus ſent to kill him, found him ſtudying; and having killed him, carried off all his books and his ſtrong box. This Article has been copied verbatim by Lloyd, who had tranſcribed it in like manner from Charles Stephens, whom he ſhould rather have corrected, in as much as he has ſuppreſſed all the actions of that Caſſius, from the time of the battle of Philippi to that of Actium; for it is not true, as all three aſſert, that after the defeat of Brutus and Caſſius, he retired to Athens: for he joined with Pompey's ſon, and afterwards with Mark Anthony; and had employments under both; and did not retire to Athens till after the battle of Actium, in the year of Rome 722. He was the only one who ſurvived of all Cæſar's aſſaſſins (58): but he did not live long after his retreat (59); and it is not thought, that he lived quite fourteen years after Cæſar's murther (60). Be this as it will, Hofman who fixes his death ſooner than it ſhould be, by making him retire to Athens ſoon after the battle of Philippi, the year of Rome 712, makes him the more improper to be confounded with Caſſius Severus, confined in the iſland of Seriphus, under the reign of Tiberius.

(d) Quamdiu citra joces ſe continebat, cenſoria oratio erat. Seneca, Præf. lib. Declamat. pag. 336.

(e) Melius ſemper fortuna quam cura de illo merebat. Idem, ibid.

(f) Nulla pars erat quæ non ſua virtute ſtaret: nihil in quo auditor ſine damno aliud ageret: omnia intenta aliquò petentia. Idem, ibid.

(58) Vell. Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 87.
(59) Valerius Maximus, lib. 1. cap. 7. num. 7.
(60) See Caſaubon. ad Suet. in Jul. cap. ult.
(61) Sueton. ibid.
(62) Petav. Rationar. Temp. Part 1. lib. 4. cap. 20.
(63) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 110.
(64) Lib. 4. Epiſt. 28.
(65) Catanæus calls this Severus by the name of Julius, without giving any reaſon for it; and conſequently makes him different from the other to whom the 6th Epiſtle of the 3d book is written, whom he declares to be of the ſame country with Pliny.

Obſerve by the way, that according to Suetonius, hardly any one of Cæſar's murtherers ſurvived him above three years (61). It is nevertheleſs certain, that a conſiderable number of them out-lived that term. Petavius has made Suetonius ſpeak without exception: nullus triennio amplius ſuperſtes fuit .... ut ait Suetonius (62). Chevreau, in the IVth Chapter of the IIId Book of his Hiſtory of the world ſays, that none of them could have ſurvived Cæſar above three years.

[M] Writers are not agreed, with regard to the Country of Caſſius Severus.] Father Hardouin's opinion, on the Country of this Caſſius, is very different from that of Voſſius. For the latter (63) aſſerts, that when the younger Pliny (64) deſires for Herennius Severus the pictures of Cornelius Nepos and of Titus Caſſius, countrymen of the Severus (65) to whom he writes, he hints at our Caſſius Severus. If this be true, the latter was not a native of Longula, as Father Hardouin pretends (66), ſince Cornelius Nepos was born in the neighbourhood of the Po (67); which circumſtance the inhabitants of Verona interpret to their advantage (68), in order that their City may have the honour of having given birth to Cornelius Nepos. But Catanæus diſputes this honour with them very warmly; and affirms that Parma is nearer the Po than Verona; and that ſince Titus Caſſius was a native of Parma, Cornelius Nepos muſt have been ſo too (69). Let them take the diſpute to themſelves. It is certain, that Catanæus ſeems not to be acquainted with the difference which is between Caſſius Parmenſis the Poet, and Caſſius Severus the Orator. Perhaps Voſſius miſtook after Glandorp (70), by taking the Titus Caſſius of the younger Pliny, for Caſſius Severus the Orator; for one would imagine, that had Pliny aſked for the picture of Caſſius Severus, from a perſon named Severus, and for another who alſo was called by that name, he would have taken ſome notice of this conformity of names. But I own, that this is not a convincing proof. Be this as it will, Pliny ſays nothing that denotes, whether he ſpeaks of a learned man ſurnamed Severus, or that the perſon he mentions is rather Caſſius the Orator, than Caſſius the Poet: they both might have had Titus for their prænomen. Beſides, the Readings of old Manuſcripts are extremely various (71); ſome have it Titi Catii, others Titi Atii, and in the margin Attici or Catili.

(66) In Indice Autorum Plinii. I am of opinion that he founds his opinion on the Catalogue of Authors, of the 35th book of Pliny.
(67) Padi accola. Plin. lib. 3. cap. 18.
(68) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 69.
(69) Catan. Comment. in Plinii Epiſtolam 28. lib. 4.
(70) Onomaſtic. Roman. pag. 209.
(71) See Gruteri Notas in Plin. Variorum, edit. Lugd. Bat. 1669.

[N] We ſhall give in the remarks, the miſtakes of Peter Crinitus.] He ſays (72), in the firſt place, that Caſſius Severus, a native of Parma as Authors relate, was rank'd by Ovid among the Poets his cotemporaries, ſuch as Sabinus, Montanus, Meliſſus, Propertius. II, That it was he who after having ſignalized himſelf in the war of Brutus and Caſſius, retired to Athens, and there was put to death by Auguſtus's command. III. That Horace owed him a ſtrong grudge, as appears from ſeveral paſſages in his works, and eſpecially from ſome iambicks imitated from Archilochus. IV. That he muſt not be confounded either with Cornelius Severus, nor with Caſſius Severus the Orator. 'Tis evident that he commits the ſame error for which he cenſures others, I mean, that he confounds Caſſius Parmenſis with Cornelius Severus, and with Caſſius Severus; for ſince he owns, that the firſt was put to death in his retirement at Athens; he ſhould have conſider'd him as dead, ever ſince about the year of Rome 723. Now, as Ovid was at that time but twelve or thirteen years of age, we muſt not imagine, that he rank'd him in the Catalogue of the Poets his cotemporaries; that Catalogue I mean which he gave in his old age. This does not admit of any difficulty, when we examine the Catalogue in queſtion (73), where Ovid oppoſes to the cenſures of a Critick, the reputation he enjoyed in Rome, at a time when he lived there with ſuch and ſuch perſons; thoſe whom Crinitus mentions, viz. one Severus and ſome others. Let the reader judge, whether this Severus is not Cornelius Severus, whom Crinitus

(72) De Poet. Lat. cap. 47.
(73) It is in the 16th Letter of the 4th book de Ponto.

on ſubjects, but wrote down the greateſt part of what he was to ſpeak. This is the ſubſtance of Seneca's judgment on this Orator (g); and which he has introduced by way of preface, to a curious narrative [O]. Quintilian's judgment does not agree in all reſpects with that of Seneca. I am to obſerve, that our Caſſius reſembled ſo exactly one of the ſword-players who uſed to divert the Roman people, that it was very difficult to diſtinguiſh them [P].

(g) Idem, ibid.

nitus is diſpleaſed to ſee confounded with Caſſius Parmenſis. Beſides, it is certain, that the verſes imitated from Archilochus, are only the ſixth Ode of the fifth Book of Horace (74), which is levelled only at Caſſius Severus the Orator. The reader will obſerve, without my telling him, that Crinitus falls into the errors above hinted at, concerning the ſuppreſſion of Caſſius Parmenſis's warlike exploits, between the battles of Philippi and Actium.

(74) This Ode ſhews, that at firſt Caſſius Severus dared to exerciſe his Satyr on ſuch ſubjects only as were ſafe; but that he grew bolder afterwards. See Tacitus, Ann. lib. 1. cap. 72.

[O] Seneca gives a judgment of this Orator which he has made as a Preface to a pretty curious narrative.] This Relation contains the anſwer which Caſſius made, when he was aſked, why he ſucceeded infinitely better in ſuch cauſes as he really pleaded, than in thoſe harangues which he ſpoke on imaginary ſubjects, which was very much the cuſtom at that time. Seneca, who had put this queſtion to Caſſius, relates the anſwer which was made him. Caſſius made excellent Obſervations on this ſubject, which I would adviſe my readers to peruſe in the original. I have only copied ſome part of Seneca's preamble. We find therein, that many Orators who were admired at the Bar, would often miſcarry in their imaginary ſpeeches; and that no one was more remarkable for this than Caſſius Severus. In nullo hoc fiebat notabilius (75). On the preſent occaſion Seneca makes an Elogium on this Orator's Eloquence, and gives the characteriſticks of it. He poſſeſſed all the qualities, adds Seneca, requiſite to declamation. His expreſſions were well choſen, his ſtyle was full and nervous, and contained more ſentiments than words; and yet Caſſius, in his Declamations, uſed to fall ſhort of himſelf, and of many others: ſo that he never would declaim unleſs deſired by his friends. Omnia habebat, quæ illum ut bene declamaret, inſtruerent: phraſim nec vulgarem, nec ſordidum, ſed lectum: genus dicendi non remiſſum aut languidum, ſed ardens & cogitatum: nec lentas, nec vacuas explicationes, ſed plus ſenſus quam verborum habentes: diligentiam, maximum etiam mediocris ingenii ſubſidium, tamen non tantum infra ſe cum declamaret, ſed etiam infra multos erat. Itaque raro declamabat, & non niſi ab amicis coactus (76). I am to obſerve, that his eloquence was more beautiful to hear than to read; the pieces he publiſhed, did not anſwer to the fame he had acquired: there generally was a greater diſproportion between them, than is commonly found between an harangue when ſpoke, and the fame when printed. Non eſt quod illum ex his quæ edidit æſtimetis. Sunt quidem & hæc quibuſdam grata. Verum eloquentia ejus longe major erat quam lectio. Non hoc ea portione illi accidit qua omnibus fere, quibus majori commendationi eſt audiri quàm legi, ſed in illo longe majus diſcrimen eſt (77).

(75) Seneca in Præf. lib. 3. Epitomes Declamat. pag. m. 335.

(76) Idem, ibid. pag. 336.

(77) Idem, ibid.

[P] Our Caſſius reſembled another man ſo exactly, .. that it was very difficult to diſtinguiſh them.] Pliny and Solinus take notice of this particular. Caſſio celebri Oratori Armentarii Mirmilloni (78) objecta ſimilitudo eſt (79). Armentarius Mirmillo & Caſſius Severus Orator ità ſe mutuò reddiderunt, ut ſi quando pariter viderentur dignoſci non poſſent, niſi diſcrepantiam habitus indicaret (80). i. e. "It was objected to the famous Orator Caſſius, that he reſembled Armentarius the Gladiator. Armentarius the Gladiator, and Caſſius Severus the Orator were ſo very like, that when ſeen together, they could not be diſtinguiſhed except there was ſome difference in their dreſs." I am ſurprized, that Solinus did not expatiate on the circumſtance which Pliny had hinted at, viz. that this reſemblance was objected to Caſſius. Had he commented this, he perhaps would have informed us, that the wags uſed to ſay, the reſemblance of theſe two men was owing perhaps to ſome private gallantries. How do we know, whether it was not ſaid, that they were alike in temper and diſpoſition; and that the one was as much a Gladiator at the Bar, as the other in the Amphitheatre?

(78) Father Hardouin pretends that Armentarius ſignifies in this place a Shepherd, and that Mirmillo is here a proper name, Salmaſius in Solin. pag. 30. is of a quite different opinion.

(79) Plin. lib. 7. cap. 12.

(80) Solin, cap. 1. pag. m. 8.

CASSIUS (CHÆREA) the ringleader of the Conſpirators who murthered Caligula, was Captain of the Guards [A]. He had been Captain in the Legions which mutinied in Germany, a little before the death of Auguſtus (a). He cut himſelf a way with his ſword through ſuch ſoldiers as abuſed the Captains. He was a brave, worthy man (b); and it was with reluctance he executed the ſevere command of Caligula. The compaſſion he had for the oppreſſed people, made him levy, with leſs diſpatch than the Emperor required, the monies ariſing from the taxes and tributes (c); he was at the head of this commiſſion. Caligula looked upon the humanity he exerciſed on this occaſion, as a mark of cowardice, and thereupon this cruel tyrant inſulted and reproached very outragiouſly this Captain of his Guards. In giving out the Word to him, he ever made uſe of ſuch a ſatyrical term as was expreſſive of indolence and effeminacy [B]; which was ſure to ſet the officers and ſoldiers a laughing, to whom Caſſius was obliged to give out the word (d). Exaſperated to find himſelf made the Emperor's laughing-ſtock, and the ſport of the regiment

(a) Tacit. Ann. lib. 1. cap. 32.

(b) Tum adoleſcens & animi ferox inter obſtantes & armatos ferro viam patefecit. Idem, ibid. Ἄλλως τε γὰρ ἐρχαιότροπός τις ἀνὴρ ὁ Χαιρέας ἦν. Dio, lib. 59. pag. m. 762.

(c) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 29. cap. 1.

(d) Idem, ibid.

[A] He was Captain of the Guards.] Seneca calls him General Tribunus Militum (1), but Suetonius is more accurate: Primas ſibi partes, ſays he (2), Caſſius Chærea Tribunus cohortis prætoriæ depopoſcit. The learned Mr. Bentley, pag. 81 of his Notes on the Chronicle of Malala, calls our Caſſius a Tribune of the People. This is a ſlight error, which is far from any way reflecting on the aſtoniſhing erudition of this Author.

(1) Seneca, de Conſtantia Sapientis, cap. 18.

(2) Suet. in Calig. cap. 56.

[B] Caligula .. in giving out the word to him, ever made uſe of ſuch a ſatyrical term, as was expreſſive of indolence and effeminacy.] See Joſephus, who expatiates very largely on this ſubject (3). Suetonius expreſſes himſelf as follows: Quem (Caſſium Chæream) Caius ſeniorem jam ut mollem & effeminatum denotare omni probro conſuerat, & modo ſignum petenti Priapum aut Venerem dare, modo ex aliqua cauſſa agenti gratias oſculandam manum offerre formatam commotamque in obſcænum modum (4). i. e. "Whom (Caſſius Chærea) now advanced in years, he uſed to treat very ſhamefully, as tho' he were a ſoft effeminate man; and ſometimes, when he aſked for the word, he would anſwer Priapus or Venus; ſometimes when he thank'd the Emperor for ſome favour, he would give him his hand to kiſs, moving it about obſcenely." Seneca ſpeaks to pretty near the ſame purpoſe; but adds, that Chærea's ſhrill and effeminate voice, gave ſome occaſion to theſe railleries; and that he did not ſeem to be the man he ſhewed himſelf afterwards, in ſtriking Caligula with ſo much vigour. Chæreæ tribuno militum ſermo non pro manu erat, languidior ſono & infracta voce ſuſpectior. Huic Caius ſignum petenti modo Veneris, modo Priapi dabat, aliter atque aliter exprobans armato mollitiam. Hæc ipſe perlucidus, crepidatus, armillatus. Coegit itaque illum uti ferro, ne ſæpius ſignum peteret. Ille primus inter conjuratos ſuſtulit: ille cervicem mediam uno ictu decidit, plurimum deinde undique publicas ac privatas injurias ulciſcentium gladiorum ingeſtum eſt; ſed primus vir fuit qui minimè viſus eſt (5). i. e. "Chærea, the military Tribune, had a ſhrill, effeminate

(3) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 19. cap. 1.

(4) Sueton. in Calig. cap. 56.

(5) Seneca, de Conſtantia Sapientis, cap. 18.

regiment he commanded, he formed a conſpiracy. He made choice of accomplices, and animated them whenever it was neceſſary; in a word, he conducted his plot with ſo much art, that Caligula was murthered (e). However, he reſerved to himſelf the advantage of ſtriking the firſt blow [C]. Some Authors ſay, that he gave him a deep wound in the nape of the neck; and others, that after ſtaring him in the face, he beat out his jaw-bone (f). Caligula being killed (g), Caſſius fled to the houſe of Germanicus (h), and hearing that the Senate were pleaſed with what he had done, he ſhewed himſelf to the people. One of the Conſuls made a long Oration in praiſe of Liberty; and concluded with declaring, that all the conſpirators, eſpecially Chærea, ought to be raiſed to the greateſt honours. Chærea went to the Conſul's to know the Word, who gave him the word Liberty. This he gave out to the Cohorts, who obeyed the Senate; and as he was the ſoul of this party, he ſent one Lupus a Tribune to kill Ceſonia, wife of Caligula, with their daughter (i). Nevertheleſs Claudius was ſaluted Emperor in the Prætorian Cohorts; and the Senate was forced to approve of this election. The new Empetor did not fail to puniſh Chærea [D], who ſuffered death with great reſolution (k).

(e) Idem, ibid.

(f) Sueton. in Calig. cap. 58.

(g) It was in the year of our Lord 41, the 24th of January.

(h) Joſeph. Antiquit. lib. 19. cap. 1.

(i) Ibid. cap. 2.

(k) Ibid. cap. 3.

" minate voice which no ways anſwered his bravery. " Whenever he aſked the word, Caligula would anſwer " either Venus or Priapus; reproaching him a variety " of ways, as a ſoldier, with effeminacy, tho' no one " could be more luxurious and effeminate than the " Emperor himſelf. He therefore forc'd Chærea to " employ the ſword, in order that he might not be " often forced to aſk the word. He was the princi- " pal conſpirator. It was he who ſtruck off the Em- " peror's head at one blow: a multitude of ſwords " ruſhed in upon him, to revenge public and private " injuries; but Chærea was the firſt who ſhewed him- " ſelf a man; he who had been thought the leaſt ſo."

[C] He reſerved to himſelf the advantage of ſtriking the firſt blow.] See Suetonius in the remark [A]. Tillemont (6) did not ſufficiently weigh the expreſſions of Seneca. According to him, Seneca tells us, that Chærea cleaved Caligula's head in two with one blow. But this is not the ſenſe of the following words, cervicem mediam uno ictu decidit; or, as ſome read, diſcidit. Tillemont is miſtaken in another thing (7): He ſays that Cornelius Sabinus, according to ſome Authors, forced away Caligula's jaw-bone, by a cut with his ſword: Suetonius, whom he cites, aſcribes this blow to Chærea, according to ſome people.

(6) Hiſt. des Empereurs, tom. 1. pag. m. 302.

(7) Idem, ibid.

[D] Claudius . . . the new Emperor, did not fail to puniſh Chærea.] 'Twas confeſſed that Chærea had ſhewn great bravery; but that 'twas at the ſame time a treacherous action, and ought to be puniſh'd, as a terror to thoſe who ſhould afterwards attempt to murther an Emperor (8). According to Suetonius, the conſpirators who were put to death were puniſhed, partly to ſerve as an example; and partly becauſe they had intended alſo to kill Claudius, Caligula's ſucceſſor. Exempli ſimul cauſſa, & quod ſuam quoque cædem depoſciſſe cognoverat (9). Dion deſerves to be heard. Claudius, ſays he (10), was overjoyed at Caligula's murther, and yet he put to death Chærea. He did not think himſelf under any obligations to thoſe perſons whoſe conſpiracy had paved his way to Empire; but was exaſperated againſt the man, who had dared to kill an Emperor; and he provided, at a diſtance, for his own ſafety. There is ſomething unaccountable in the Politicks of Princes. They do all that lies in their power to ſeduce and corrupt the ſubjects of each other. They give an aſylum to conſpirators, they protect rebels; and at the ſame time they don't conſider, that this is ſetting an example to their own ſubjects for them to rebel; and to hope for aſſiſtance in their rebellion. This extravagant conduct is owing to their thinking only on the time preſent: for did Princes conſider the ill conſequences which would flow from it, not one of them would contribute either money or exhortations in favour of inſurrections.

(8) Joſeph. lib. 19. cap. 3.

(9) Sueton. in Claud. cap. 11.

(10) Dio, lib. 60. pag. 765.

CASTALIO (SEBASTIAN) born in the country of the Allobroges [A], in the year 1515, deſerves an honourable place among Authors [B]. His principal Work is a Latin

[A] He was born in the country of the Allobroges.] I have been forced to make uſe of this general expreſſion, becauſe I have not been able to diſcover any thing more particular. In his Epitaph they have given him the epithet of Allobrox. This may equally ſignify, either that he was of Dauphiné, or that he was of Savoy. Mr. Allard has preferred the former ſignification (1): but he grounds his opinion on an Author who has not ſaid what he makes him ſay; for theſe words of Sammarthanus, Ex aſperis & ſalebroſis Allobrogum montibus humili ortus fortuna (2), do not ſignify that a man was born in the mountains of Dauphiné. La Croix du Maine makes Caſtalio a native of the country of Savoy (3). Dr. Spon (4), and Signor Leti (5), make him a native of Chatillon en Breſſe.

(1) Allard, Biblioth. de Dauphiné, pag. 68.

(2) Sammarthanus, Elog. lib. 2. pag. m. 126.

(3) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Franc. pag. 453.

(4) Spon, Hiſtoire de Geneve, liv. 3. pag. m. 257, at the year 1544.

(5) Leti, Iſtoria Genevrina, tom. 3. pag. 79.

[B] He deſerves an honourable place among Authors.] His works would be very conſiderable on account of their quality and number, even tho' it were not known that he lived but forty eight years. He ſhewed himſelf ſkilful in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. He publiſhed at Baſil, in 1545, four Books of Dialogues which contain the principal Hiſtories of the Bible in elegant Latin, ſo that youth might thereby at the ſame time make a proficiency in piety and in the Latin tongue. They were reprinted in the year 1548, and afterwards with corrections and additions in the year 1551 (6). Theſe three Editions have been followed by ſeveral others (7). He publiſhed in 1546, with notes, the Tranſlation which he had made of the Sibylline Verſes (8) and of the Books of Moſes (9). This was followed in 1547 by his Latin Verſion of the Pſalms of David, and all the other Songs found in Scripture. In 1548 he printed a Greek Poem on the life of John the Baptiſt, and a Latin Poem which is a Paraphraſe of the Prophet Jonas. I ſay nothing of his Tranſlation of ſome paſſages of Homer, and ſome Books of Xenophon and St. Cyril (10); and as to the moſt important of his labours, I ſhall ſpeak of them in the ſubſequent remark. Let us only add here, that he tranſlated into Latin ſeveral Italian Treatiſes of the famous Ochinus, and particularly the XXX Dialogues, ſome of which ſeem to favour Polygamy. Martin Ruarus is in the wrong to find fault with Calovius for having attributed the tranſlation of thoſe Dialogues to Caſtalio. Scribis Caſtellionem XXX Ochini Dialogos in Latinam linguam tranſtuliſſe. Id ego ut ut mihi dubium, cum nonniſi à Caſtellionis inimicis mera ſuſpicione ductis affirmatum videam, in medio tamen relinquam (11). i. e. " You " write that Caſtalio turned the XXX Dialogues of " Ochinus into Latin. This, however doubtful it be with " me, ſince I find it affirmed by none but the enemies of " Caſtalio who were led by meer ſuſpicion, I ſhall " not determine." But he is not in the wrong to cenſure him for having ſaid that Lælius Socinus publiſhed it under the name of Felix Turpio. It is certain that this fictitious name appears not in the work, and that the true name of Ochinus is put to it. Let it not be inſiſted that Bullinger has obſerved that Ochinus cauſed it to be printed by a friend of his, an Italian (12); for this Italian is no other than Peter Perna a Printer at Baſil, who ſet his name according to cuſtom at the end of the Book. How could Lælius Socinus, who died in the year 1562, have cauſed a Book to be printed which was not put to the preſs till 1563? Calovius's miſtake was occaſioned by their being certain Dialogues of Caſtalio to which Fauſtus Socinus

(6) Epitome Bibliothec. Geſneri, pag. 745.

(7) I make uſe of that of Leyden, 1620, in 8vo.

(8) In Latin Heroic Verſe.

(9) In Latin Proſe.

(10) Extracted from Geſner's Epitome, pag. 745.

(11) Mart. Ruarus, Epiſtolâ 47, Centur. 1. pag. 226, 227.

(12) Bullinger. in Præf. Simleri Libris præfixâ, apud Ruar. ibid. pag. 227.

Latin and French Verſion of the Scripture. It is ſpoken of in a very different manner; ſome find great fault with it, and others commend it highly [C]. He gained the eſteem and friendſhip of Calvin during the ſtay he made at Straſburgh in 1540, and 1541, and he even lodged ſome days at his houſe (a). It was Calvin who procured him a Schoolmaſter's place in the College of Geneva, or rather earneſtly perſuaded him to accept cinus, who publiſhed them, prefixed a preface under the name of Felix Turpio Urbevetanus (13). Caſtalio is the Author, not the Tranſlator of thoſe Dialogues: they treat de Prædeſtinatione, de Electione, de libero Arbitrio, de Fide, i. e. "Of Predeſtination, Election, "Free-will, and Faith," and were printed with ſome other pieces of the ſame Author (14), in the year 1578. Ruarus aſſures us it was at Baſil: if ſo, the title was falſified; for it is Areſdorffii, per Theophil. Philadelph.

(a) See the Remark [G].

I ſhall make mention here and there of ſome other Writings of Caſtalio in the Remarks of this Article. I propoſe it as a queſtion to be examined by the curious whether he be not the Author of the Latin Tranſlation of ſome Treatiſes of St. Chryſoſtom and St. Cyril, of which Geſner's Epitome ſpeaks under the word Johannes Theophilus (15). It is a fictitious name which our Author gave himſelf in the title of a Tranſlation (16): it is thought that in another work he put on the maſk of Martinus Bellius. I have ſpoken of it more than once (17); but without ſaying that he denied before the Miniſters of Baſil, who cited him before them, that he was the Author of that compilation. Appellatus coram Baſilienſis Eccleſiæ Miniſtris Bellii farraginem . . . . falſo ejuraſti (18). It is Beza who thus reproaches him with having falſly denied it on oath, and who adds that it was tranſlated into French, and printed in that tongue at Lyons, whither it was carried in manuſcript by Caſtalio's brother. Our Author publiſhed very ſingular opinions in the Work which he intitled Moſes Latinus (19), as for inſtance, that the bodies of malefactors ought not to be left on the gibbet, that thieves ought not to be puniſhed with death, and that it would be better to revive the ancient cuſtom of reducing them to ſlavery. His foundation was that the political laws of Moſes are obligatory on all nations (20). His notes on the Epiſtle to the Romans were condemned by the Church of Baſil, becauſe they oppoſed the doctrine of Predeſtination, and of effectual Grace (21). However he got them ſold in the ſame city, after they had been tranſlated into French (22).

[C] Some find great fault with his Verſions of the Scripture, and others commend them highly.] Thuanus ſays ſeveral perſons judged that Caſtalio put his unclean hands to this work with an inſolent raſhneſs. Impuras manus multorum judicio ad ſacra tractanda attulit, cum à rebus ad tantum opus neceſſariis homo imparatiſſimus novam Bibliorum interpretationem inſolenti temeritate molitus eſt (23). The fault which has been the moſt generally condemned in his Latin Tranſlation, is the affectation of making uſe of none but claſſical Latin terms. This is the reaſon why he has ſaid Genius inſtead of Angelus, lotio inſtead of baptiſmus, Reſpublica inſtead of Eccleſia, and Collegium inſtead of Synagoga. Voſſius (24) and ſeveral other learned men juſtly cenſure him for it. He is accuſed of having run into the other extreme in his French Tranſlation (25), that is, of having made uſe of low and vulgar terms. Here follow the examples which a Jeſuit gives of this, after having criticiſed ſome effeminate expreſſions, and the frequent diminutives in the Latin Tranſlation of the Canticles. "In his French Tranſlation he is "yet more ſhameleſs; for he makes open mockery "of the Holy Spirit in ſix or ſeven places, as when "inſtead of ſaying a Jew, he ſays un Rongné *, that "is Circumciſus: as when he tranſlates theſe words of "St. James in the IId Chapter, Superexaltat miſeri- "cordia judicium, that is, ſays this ſcoundrel, La mi- "ſericorde FAICT LA FIGUE au jugement †: as when "he ſpeaks of David in the ‡ LXXVIIth Pſalm, and "tranſlates his own words De poſt fœtantes accepit "eum, that is, ſays this mere ſwineherd, Il le tira "du cul d'une charrue ‡. In fine, tranſlating theſe "words of David in the VIIIth Pſalm, Ex ore in- "fantium & lactantium perfeciſti laudem, he turns "them very badly, tho' a Turner by trade, Des petits "MORVEUX qui ſont à la mammelle ⁂ (26)." Take notice that in the two laſt examples the Tranſlation is not ſuch as is repreſented (27). Henry Stephens has exclaimed no leſs than the Jeſuit againſt Sebaſtian Caſtalio, who has ſtudied, ſays he (28), to find out beggarly words, or ſuch at leaſt as ſhould make the readers laugh, rather than engage them to conſider the ſenſe of the paſſage. He quotes for example miſéricorde fait la figue au jugement. This manner of tranſlating appears to him the ſtrangeſt kind of blaſphemy ſpoken of by him in that Chapter. and he adds: He has not only taken a pleaſure in the cant words of beggars, and their ways of ſpeaking, but has taken liberties of all ſorts; calling her whom a huſband entertains beſides his wife, and whom the Latins called Pellex, (by a word borrowed from the Greeks, who had likewiſe borrowed it from the Hebrews,) arriere femme, i. e. a backwife, (as we ſay arriere boutique i. e. a back-ſhop,) and making uſe of the word Avantpeau inſtead of Prepuce, i. e. foreſkin; ſaying Rongné inſtead of Circoncis, i. e. circumciſed, aud Empellé inſtead of Incirconcis, i. e. Uncircumciſed. He alſo transforms God into a Monſieur de Rochefort. In a word, even the expreſſion faire carous, i. e. to carouſe, has found a place in this Tranſlation. Behold the new invention which the Devil has found out in our days, to infringe the authority of the Holy and Sacred Word of God; who in his mercy, provided againſt it in good time, by permitting the Author of the ſaid Tranſlation (of whom a very good opinion had been entertained for a while) to condemn himſelf out of his own mouth, and to make known by what ſpirit he was led (29). Theodore Beza was not ſilent on this occaſion: he maintained that the jargon of Poictou, the coarſeſt of all the jargons of France, may ſeem leſs barbarous than the ſtyle of Caſtalio (30). Obſerve that Father Simon aſſerts, that there appears in Caſtalio's French Tranſlation the ſame affectation of writing in an elegant and polite ſtyle, as does in his Latin Verſion (31). He gives a judgment of the latter which, all things conſidered, is glorious for Caſtalio (32). You will find ſome paſſages of it in the Additions of Mr. Teiſſier (33). You will alſo find there that three learned perſons (34) have ſpoken of that Verſion with elogy. One of them was ſo charmed with it, that as he praiſed it he felt a poetical Enthuſiaſm riſe, which obliged him to join the language of the Muſes to his proſe, to expreſs his admiration (35). Sir Thomas Pope-Blount has collected a great many paſſages, ſome diſadvantageous to Caſtalio, and others advantageous (36): I refer you to them, and add only that he has forgotten the commendations which Epiſcopius has given to this Tranſlator of the Scripture (37), and the invective which is to be ſeen in a Preface to the New Teſtament printed at Geneva in the year 1560 (38). Let us not forget that Caſtalio began his Latin Verſion at Geneva in 1542, and that he finiſhed it at Baſil in 1550. It was printed at Baſil in 1551, and dedicated by the Author to Edward King of England. He gave a ſecond Edition of it in 1554, and another in 1556. The Edition of 1573 is more eſteemed than any of the other (39). The French Verſion was dedicated to Henry II, and printed at Baſil for John Hervagius, in the year 1555. As to the diſputes which aroſe between Caſtalio and Theodore Beza concerning the Tranſlation of the Scripture, conſult the Author whom I cite (40). It muſt not be forgotten that he complained that having been the firſt who had made an exact deſcription of Solomon's Temple, he had no thanks for it; but that on the contrary, he received ill language from thoſe who made advantage of his labour. Nonnihil mirari ſe dicebat tuorum ingenuitatem, qui cùm ſubtilem effigiem Templi apud Ezechielem, in qua una exprimenda primus potiſſimum elaboraverat, ſurripuiſſent, non modo in ſuis Bibliis quibus eam inſerebant non laudarunt auctorem, cujus labore ſuas merces ornabant, ſed etiam eum infinitis convitiis onerarunt (41). It is Baudouin who ſpeaks thus to Theodore Beza.

Caſtalio's Latin Bible has been lately reprinted in Germany (42), and they have joined to it ejuſdem (Caſtellionis) Delineatio Reipublicæ Judaicæ ex Joſepho;

(13) This anſwers to Fauſtus Sozinus Senenſis.

(14) Quæſtio an perfectè Legi Dei obediri poſſit. Reſponſio ad Borrhaum de Prædeſtinatione. Defenſio adverſus Calvinum de Calumnia.

(15) Epit. Geſneri, pag. 503.

(16) See the Remark [F].

(17) Above, in the Article BEZA, Remark [F]; and in the Article SOCINUS (Marianus) grandſon &c. Remark [B], in the firſt paragraph where I ſpeak of Lælius.

(18) Beza, ad Defenſ. & Repreb. Caſtell. pag. 451.

(19) It is the Tranſlation of the Books of Moſes, of which I have ſpoken above, Citation (9).

(20) Extracted from Theodor. Beza, ad Defenſ. & Repreb. Caſtellion. num. 6. in Lucam, pag. 451. Oper. tom. 1.

(21) Beza, de Prædeſtin. adv. Caſtellion. pag. 384. tom. 1. Oper.

(22) Idem, ad Defenſ. & Repreb. pag. 431.

(23) Thuan. lib. 35. in fine.

(24) Voſſius, Inſtitut. Oratoriar. lib. 4. cap. 1.

(25) See Sammarthan. Elog. lib. 2. pag. 126.

* One that has been clipped.
† Mercy makes mows at judgment.
‡ The LXXVIII according to our Tranſlation.
‡ He took him from the ploughtail.
⁂ Snotty-noſed children at the breaſt.

(26) Garaſſe, Doctrine curieuſe, pag. 202, 203.

(27) See the end of this Remark.

(28) Henri Etienne, Apol. d'Herodote, liv. 1. chap. 14. pag. m. 96.

(29) Idem, ibid. pag. 97.

(30) Beza, ad Defenſ. & Repreb. Sebaſt. Caſtell. init. pag. m. 430, 431, Oper. tom. 1.

(31) Simon, Hiſt. Critique du Vieux Teſt. liv. 2. chap. 25. pag. m. 349. They have added a Marginal Note in the Rotterdam Edition, which acquaints us that Henry Stephens reproaches this Tranſlator with ſpeaking Beggars Gibberiſh.

(32) Ibid. chap. 21. pag. 324, &c.

(33) To the Elogies taken from Thuanus, tom. 1. pag. m. 223, 224.

(34) Hiperius, Humfred. & Furius Ceriolanus.

(35) You will find theſe Verſes in Simon's Critical Hiſtory of the Verſions of the New Teſtament, chap. 24. pag. 274.

(36) Pope Blount, Cenſur. Autor. pag. 493, & ſeq.

(37) Epiſcopius, Inſtitut. pag. 277.

(38) Father Simon produces it, Hiſt. Crit. des Verſions du Nouv. Teſtam. pag. 275.

(39) Simon, Hiſt. Critiq. du Vieux Teſtam. pag. 324.

(40) Simon, Hiſt. Crit. du Nouv. Teſtam. chap. 24. pag. 273, &c.

(41) Reſp. ad Calvin. & Betzam pro Franc. Balduino.

(42) In 1697, at Leipſic, by Thomas Fritſch, in folio.

accept it (b). Caſtalio having exerciſed it near three years, was forced to quit it in the year 1544, and to ſeek out another abode, for having maintained ſome peculiar opinions [D]. He retired to Baſil, and had there the employment of Greek Profeſſor conferred on him (c). He paſſed all the reſt of his life in that place, and died there the 29th of December 1563 (d). He was interred in the Great Church of Baſil, by the care of three Poliſh Gentlemen, who had been his ſcholars (e) [E], and cauſed an honourable Epitaph to be put on his tomb. He had the misfortune to expoſe himſelf to the indignation of Calvin and Theodore Beza, who loaded him with ill language. They were perſuaded he deſerved it, for having followed a method not quite ſo ſtrict in matters of Predeſtination, and for having diſapproved of the puniſhing of Heretics (f), The Latin Tranſlation which he made of ſome Works of Ochinus brought on him great ſuſpicions of Heterodoxy. He was alſo accuſed of favouring Enthuſiaſts [F]. To judge of (b) See the ſame Remark [G].

(c) See his Epitaph at the end of his Dialogi Sacri.

(d) See the ſame Epitaph.

(e) Their names are in the Epitaph.

(f) See the Remark [F] of the Article BEZA, and the Remark [B] of the Article SOCINUS (Marianus) grandſon &c.

Nota prolixior in Caput IX Epiſtolæ ad Romanos, nec non Defenſio Verſionis novi Fœderis contra Th. Bezam.

I cannot forbear imparting to you a ſmall diſtruſt which I have had, and the effect it has produced. What Theodore Beza, Henry Stephens, and Garaſſe, ſay of Caſtalio's French, made me conclude at firſt that Writer had treated the Scripture as Scarron did Virgil: but afterwards I thought their word was not to be taken, and that poſſibly paſſion had induced them to amplify. In this uncertainty, I took Caſtalio's French Bible, and opened it in ſeveral places. I ſought very carefully for thoſe burleſque phraſes with which he has been ſo much reproached, but could find none of them, except only that of faire la figue. I found neither the cul de la charrue, nor the petits morveux, quoted by Father Garaſſe; and I cannot ſufficiently admire at the impudence of that Calumniator. It muſt be confeſſed here that ſome people are unfortunate; they can never avoid the ſtrokes of ſlander. If any other than Caſtalio had made this Tranſlation of the Scripture, his language would not have been greatly exclaimed againſt. As to the words avant peau, rogné, &c. they are not low or vulgar, but full as noble as prepuce, and circoncis. He who made uſe of them is only to be blamed for a needleſs innovation: his good intention (43) does not juſtify him.

(43) See his Preface.

[D] He was forced to quit his Schoolmaſter's place . . for having maintained ſome peculiar opinions.] He was ſo angry that he could not get Calvin to approve the impertinencies of his French Tranſlation of the New Teſtament, that he began to broach ſome errors, and to maintain that the Song of Solomon was a ſmutty compoſition which ought to be ſtruck out of the Canon of Scripture. He abuſed the Miniſters who oppoſed his deſign. He was ſummoned to appear before the Senate, where he was heard, and declared convicted of calumny, and was ordered to retire elſewhere. It is thus that Theodore Beza relates the matter. Indignatus quòd ſuas ineptias in Gallica Novi Teſtamenti verſione Calvino non probaſſet, eouſque efferbuit, ut exotica quædam docere non contentus, palam etiam Canticum Salomonis tanquam impuram & obſcœnam cantionem ex Canone expungi juberet, & repugnantes Miniſtros atrociſſimis convitiis proſcinderet. Id illi verò ſibi non ferendum meritò rati, hominem ad Senatum vocant: ubi pridie Calend. Junii patientiſſimè auditus, cognitâque cauſâ calumniæ damnatus, ex urbe excedere juſſus eſt (44). See the margin (45). This relation ſeems to be ſtrained too far, if compared with an Atteſtation which Calvin gave this Schoolmaſter of Geneva. It imports that he voluntarily reſigned his place; that he had behaved himſelf in it in ſuch a manner that he was judged worthy to be a Paſtor; and that nothing had hindred his being promoted to that office, but the peculiar opinion which he held concerning the Canticles, and the article of Chriſt's deſcending into Hell; and in fine, that this was the only reaſon why he quitted Geneva. In eo teſtimonio tu teſtaris, thus Caſtalio ſpeaks to Calvin (46), mihi à vobis diſcedendi unam cauſam fuiſſe, diſcordiam illam de Cantico Canticorum, & de interpretatione tua capitis fidei de Chriſti deſcenſu ad inferos. Tua verba ſunt hæc: Hoc breviter teſtamur, talem fuiſſe à nobis habitum, ut noſtro omnium conſenſu jam ad munus paſtorale deſtinatus eſſet. Et in fine verba ſunt hæc: Ne quis ergo aliud quippiam cauſa eſſe ſuſpicetur, cur à nobis diſcedat Sebaſtianus, hoc quocunque venerit teſtatum eſſe volumus. Scholæ miniſterio ſponte ſe abdicavit. In eo ita ſe geſſerat, ut ſacro hoc miniſterio dignum judicaremus. Quominus autem receptus fuerit, non aliqua vitæ macula, non impium aliquod in fidei noſtræ capitibus dogma, ſed hæc una, quam expoſuimus, cauſa obſtitit. He declares that he had ſhewn this Atteſtation to ſeveral perſons, and even to ſome Miniſters. Conſult Dr. Spon, who does not ſay he was turned out of the city, but only that he was depoſed (47). See below the Remarks againſt Mr. Teiſſier.

(44) Beza, in Vita Calvini, ad ann. 1544, pag. 372. Op. tom. 5.

(45) Hoc eodem anno per Sebaſtianum Caſtellionem fictæ pietatis hominem Satan vos fidemque veſtram impellere & levi primùm, ut videbatur, ictu ſed periculoſiſſimo quatere voluit: quo tamen malo & occulto veneno civitas veſtra anno XLV homine ipſo tanquam ſpuma expulſo purgata eſt. i. e. "The "ſame year Satan by means of "Sebaſtian Caſtalio, a man of "feigned piety, "deſigned to puſh "at you and "your faith, "and to ſhake "you firſt by a "light blow, as "it ſeemed, but "really a moſt "dangerous one: "of which viru-"lent and latent "poiſon how-"ever your city "was purged in "the year 45, "by ſpewing out "the man him-"ſelf."

Danæus, Epiſt. Dedic. Libr. de Hæreſ. ad Senatum Genevenſem.

(46) Caſtellio, in Defenſ. ad Author. Libelli cui Titulus eſt Calumnia Nebulonis, pag. m. 19.

(47) Spon, Hiſt. de Genève, liv. 3. pag. 257.

[E] He was interred in the great Church of Baſil, by the care of three Poliſh Gentlemen . . . his Scholars.] I have learned this particular from the Inſcription of an Epigram, which is at the end of his ſacred Dialogues (48). A very memorable particular is to be found in the Scaligerana: Caſtalio had been laid in the tomb of the family of the Grynæus's; but a Profeſſor of that family cauſed him to be taken up again. This perhaps was what induced the three Poliſh Gentlemen to take care of Caſtalio's funeral. Scaliger's judgment follows. Si non cum affectu vel ignominia Simon Grynæus juſſit Caſtalionem ex ſuo ſepulchro educi & alibi ſepeliri, nihil mali. Sunt qui nolunt alios in ſuo ſepulchro ſepeliri; ſed in noſtra religione non deberet fieri (49). He excuſes the action of Grynæus, and blames it at the ſame time. He excuſes it, in caſe it was not produced by paſſion, and was attended with a moderation which caſt no ignominy on the memory of the deceaſed; and he blames it, becauſe he ſuppoſes thoſe of the Proteſtant Religion ſhould not be ſubject to the infirmity of not ſuffering another to be interred in their ſepulchre. It is difficult to imagine that Simon Grynæus was free from paſſion in this affair, and that ſeveral conſiderations of human intereſt did not induce him to behave in the manner he did. We ſhall ſee preſently that they had made Caſtalio as black as a Devil.

(48) Aliud (Epitaphium) de monumento quod ei tres Poloni . . . locarunt in ſummi Templi Baſil. periſtylio in pavimento.

(49) Scaligerana, Voce Grynæus, pag. m. 101.

[F] He was accuſed of having favoured Enthuſiaſts.] This is what Beza means by cenſuring him for having attempted to enervate the authority of the Scripture, as if it contained not that ſublime Divinity which St. Paul taught by word of mouth to ſuch of his diſciples who were the greateſt proficients. Ut qui ſua quadam in Sacrorum Bibliorum perverſionem præfatione palàm verbi divini ſatis perſpicuam auctoritatem convellere ſtuduiſſet, ſuiſque in priorem ad Corinth. Epiſtolam adnotationibus, ut à verbo ſcripto tanquam imperfecto nos abduceret, diſertè ſcripſiſſet, Paulum quandam Theologiam ea quam ſcriptis tradidiſſet reconditiorem, perfectos neſcio quos ſuos diſcipulos docuiſſe (50). i. e. "As one who "had openly endeavoured, in a certain preface of his "to a perverſion of the Holy Bible, to derogate from "the ſufficiently evident authority of the Divine "Word, and in his Annotations on the firſt Epiſtle "to the Corinthians, had, with a deſign to draw us "away from the written word as imperfect, expreſly "written, that Paul taught certain of his diſciples a "more recondite Theology than what he had delivered "in writing." Scaliger ſaid that Caſtalio was tainted with ſeveral doctrines of the Anabaptiſts (51). Nothing has contributed more to his being ranked among the Enthuſiaſts, than his Latin Tranſlation of the Theologia Germanica: it is a Book full of fanaticiſm, and was the ſpoiling of a great many people in the Low Counries. Here is what Sainte Aldegonde wrote to Theodore Beza in the year 1567. Eſt genus novum ἐνθουσιαζῶν qui tum ex illa, quam noſti, Theologia Germanica dudum à Caſtellione Latine reddita, tum ex Taulero deliro ſanè Monacho, tum porrò ex aliorum quorundam & veterum & recentiorum hæreticorum furoribus, eas conſuunt rhapſodias, quæ non jam ſuperſtitioſæ ac rudi plebeculæ, ſed ipſis etiam viris, & mediocri eruditione, & non contemnenda pietatis ſpecie præſtantibus, ita vehementer arrident, ut certatim omnes ad eorum libros quaſi ad reconditum aliquem theſaurum accurrant. Omnia eorum deliramenta percenſere, nimis foret longum, & ipſe non potes pleraque ignorare, cui fuerit cum hujuſmodi

(50) Beza, in Vita Calvini, ad ann. 1553, pag. 377.

(51) Scaligerana I. pag. m. 28.

of him by the Picture which his Adverſaries drew of him, we muſt take him not only for a very ill man, but even for a profligate wretch [G]. I ſhall ſet down (g) ſeveral Fragments of the Apology which he publiſhed; but I would not have them conſidered as the

(g) In the Remark [G].

juſmodi monſtris (in quibus Caſtellionem ego non infimo loco poſuerim) perſæpe conflictandum (52). i. e. "There "is a new ſort of Enthuſiaſts who from the German "Theology which you are acquainted with, and was "ſometime ago tranſlated into Latin by Caſtalio, "from Taulerus a crack-brained Monk, and alſo from "the ravings of certain other heretics both ancient "and modern, patch up thoſe Rhapſodies which ſo "violently pleaſe not only the ſuperſtitious and ignorant multitude, but even men who have a moderate "ſhare of learning, and no contemptible appearance "of devotion, that all flock with eagerneſs to their "books, as to a hidden treaſure. It would be tedious to enumerate all their wild notions, nor can you "be ignorant of the greater part of them, having "been frequently obliged to encounter ſuch monſters, "among whom I rank Caſtalio not in the loweſt "place." Beza was perſuaded that Caſtalio had tranſlated that Book into Latin; however, he durſt not aſſert it in a public work, before he had informed himſelf whether it was poſſible to produce ſufficient proofs of it, in caſe Caſtalio ſhould deny it. A wiſe precaution, and which ought not to be neglected ſo often as it is. Let us ſee what he wrote to a Phyſician at Baſil. Hoc amabò reſcribo, ſi quam fecero in mea reſponſione mentionem Bellii, & Theologiæ Germanicæ, & ille ſe eorum librorum authorem inficietur, num id poſſim ità ſecurè affirmare, ut ſi neceſſe fuerit, teſtibus etiam aut idoneis argumentis convinci poſſit. Nam de re ipſa, id eſt, quin revera libros illos ac præſertim præfationem Bellianam ediderit, non dubito: ſed videndum nobis eſt, ut non tantùm detegatur iſte, verum etiam convincatur, ut tandem omnes norint quæ ſit ſancti iſtius viri conſcientia (53). i. e. "Write me word, I entreat you, whether "if I ſhould make mention in my anſwer of Bellius, "and the Theologia Germanica, and he ſhould deny "himſelf to be the Author of thoſe Books, I may "affirm it with ſafety, ſo that, if occaſion be, he may "be convicted by witneſſes or proper arguments. For "of the thing itſelf, that is, that he really publiſhed "thoſe Books and eſpecially Bellius's preface, I make "no doubt: but it is our buſineſs to ſee, not only "that he be detected, but convicted likewiſe, that all "the world may at length be acquainted with this "ſanctified perſon's conſcience." Hoornbeeck did not underſtand the whole ſenſe of theſe words (54); he did not perceive that Beza intended to ſpeak of Caſtalio as the Author of the Latin Tranſlation, and not as the Author of the work itſelf intitled Theologia Germanica. He adds that this work was alſo tranſlated into Latin, and printed at Antwerp in the year 1558, under the name of John Theophilus. He had already ſaid that the Dutch Tranſlation had been very imprudently commended by Martin Luther. He did not know that the firſt edition of the Latin Tranſlation is of Baſil, 1557. The Epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheca, acquainting us with this, obſerves that Caſtalio is the man who tranſlated that work under the name of Joannes Theophilus (55). Dr. Spon makes him the Author of the work itſelf, and is miſtaken: He wrote, ſays he (56), another Book intitled Theologia Germanica, and a Treatiſe of the old and new man. Mr. Jurieu has made almoſt the ſame miſtake, ſince he ſays that John Theophilus is the Author of a Book intitled Theologia Germanica (57). Here is another fault of Dr. Spon's: he did not know that the Treatiſe of the old and new man, is no more than the French Tranſlation which Caſtalio made of the Theologia Germanica. This is what we find in la Croix du Maine (58), who was ignorant on the other hand that the Latin Work is only a Tranſlation. Take notice that Caſtalio denied before the Miniſters of Baſil that he had any hand in that Book (59).

(52) Philippus Marnixius, Epiſt. ad Bezam. It is the 6th among Beza's Letters, pag. m. 206. tom. 3. Operum.

(53) Beza, Epiſt. ad Gulielmum Gratarolum. It is the 46th Oper. tom. 3. pag. 257. See the 451ſt page of the 1ſt vol. of his Works.

(54) Hoornbeeck, Summa Controverſ. lib. 6. pag. m. 409.

(55) Epitome Geſneri, pag. m. 745.

(56) Spon, Hiſt. de Geneve, pag. 252.

(57) Jurieu, Apolog. pour les Reformat. tom. 1. pag. 106.

(58) La Croix du Maine, Bibliot. Franc. pag. 453.

(59) Beza, ad Defenſ. & Reprch. Caſtell. init. pag. 431. Oper. tom. 1. See alſo pag. 451.

[G] To judge of him by the picture which his adverſaries drew of him, we muſt take him . . . . for a profligate wretch.] He wrote an Apology in the year 1558, wherein he complains particularly of two Pieces of Calvin's (60): one was intitled Anſwers to certain calumnies and blaſphemies, &c. and appeared in the year 1557; the title of the other was Calumniæ Nebulonis cujuſdam, &c. which was printed in year following. He maintains that he never ſaw the two Works which Calvin attributed to him (61). Vocas me ſub-inde, ſays he (62), in Gallico libello, blaſphemum calumniatorem, malignum, canem latrantem, plenum ignorantiæ & beſtialitatis, plenum impudentiæ, impoſtorem, ſacrarum literarum impurum corruptorem, Dei prorſus deriſorem, omnis religionis contemptorem, impudentem, impurum canem, impium, obſcœnum, torti perverſique ingenii, vagum, balatronem. Nebulonem verò (ſic enim interpretor Brouillon) appellas octies, & hæc omnia longè copioſius, quàm à me recenſentur, facis in libello duorum foliorum, & quidem perparvorum. De Latino verò, quid multis opus eſt? Tituluseſt: Calumniæ Nebulonis. Finis eſt: Compeſcat te Deus, Satan: media ſunt ejuſdem coloris. i. e. "You frequently call "me, in the French pamphlet, blaſphemous ſlanderer, "malignant, barking dog, full of ignorance and be"ſtiality, full of impudence, an impoſtor, an impure "corrupter of the holy Scriptures, a very mocker of "God, a contemner of all religion, impudent, im"pure dog, impious, obſcene, of a crooked and per"verſe mind, a vagabond, and a worthleſs fellow. "You call me a pragmatical knave (for ſo I interpret "Brouillon) eight times; and all theſe you beſtow on "me much more plentifully than I have enumerated, "in a pamphlet of two ſheets, and thoſe very ſmall "ones. As to your Latin piece, what need many "words? The title is; The Calumnies of a Knave. "It ends with; The Lord rebuke thee, Satan: the inter"mediate contents are in the ſame ſtrain." He repreſents to him not only what the Goſpel denounces againſt him who injures his brother, but alſo what Calvin himſelf had written in the Life of a Chriſtian. Nihil ne te movet (ut cætera taceam,) tui ipſius libellus ille, quem ſcripſiſti de Vita hominis Chriſtiani? Qui libellus ita ſancta, ita pia præcepta continet, ut nuper præſente me dixerat quidam, operæ precium eſſe, ut tibi ſcribat aliquis epiſtolam, in qua te interroget, utrum fieri poſſit, ut horum duorum libellorum, videlicet, Vita hominis Chriſtiani, & Calumniæ Nebulonis &c, idem ſit author (63). i. e. "Are you nothing moved (to omit other things) "by your own Book of the Life of a Chriſtian man? "a Book which contains ſuch holy, ſuch pious pre"cepts, that a certain perſon lately ſaid in my pre"ſence, that it would be worth while for ſomebody to "write you a Letter, and therein aſk you, whether "it be poſſible that the ſame man could be the author "of theſe two books, viz. The Life of a Chriſtian man, "and The Calumnies of a Knave." He juſtifies himſelf in particular from the crime of theft, as will be ſeen below, and from thoſe of treachery, cruelty, and blaſphemy. Hæc accuſationis tuæ ſumma eſt, ſays he (64), after having quoted Calvin's own words, in qua me infimulas ſuperbiæ, perfidiæ, inhumanitatis, ingratitudinis, fraudulentiæ, impudentiæ, ſcurrilitatis, blaſphemiæ, denique impietatis. i. e. "This is the ſum "of your accuſation, wherein you charge me with "pride, perfidiouſneſs, inhumanity, ingratitude, de"ceit, impudence, ſcurrility, blaſphemy, and impiety." If you know me to be ſuch a man while I abode with you, proceeds he to aſk him, why did you almoſt conſtrain me to teach in the College of Geneva? Can one in conſcience commit the education of children to ſuch a perſon? Si jam tum talem cognoviſti, quæro ex te, qua conſcientia me poſtea iſtic ludo literario præfeceritis, & multum recuſantem pertraxeritis, tu & unà duo tui ſummi amici, & ſummæ in Sabaudia authoritatis viri concionatores. Quæſo te, quorum hominum eſt pueris inſtituendis præficere hominem, quem tu ſceleratum eſſe ſcires, idque in ea urbe, quam vos ſanctam etiam impreſſis libris appellatis (65)? Why did you give me a Teſtimonial of my leading a good life, after I had taught in that College about three years? Thereupon he lays before him the words which you have read in the Remark (D) (66). You cannot ſay, continues he (67), that you did not know me to be ſuch a perſon till after that time; for, beſides that you manifeſtly intimate quite the contrary, you would be the moſt ſtupid man alive, if I had been ſuch a man as you ſet me forth, while I lodged with you, and taught in the College of Geneva, and yet you had not diſcovered it. He confeſſes he had not been exempt from vanity (68), and he relates an effect of it which I ſhall ſpeak of below (69); he owns alſo that he loved merry conceits, but not in matters of Religion. I have always cenſured thoſe, ſays he (70), who were guilty of drollery

(60) Caſtellio, Defenſ. pag. 2.

(61) Idem, ibid. pag. 3.

(62) Idem, ibid. pag. 5.

(63) Idem, ibid. pag. 7.

(64) Idem, ibid. pag. 17. See the 267th Letter of the Collection intitled, Epiſtol. Eccleſiaſtic. & Theolog. of the Amſterdam Edition, 1684, in folio.

(65) Idem, ibid. pag. 18.

(66) Citation (46).

(67) Caſtellio, Defenſ. pag. 19, 20.

(68) Idem, ibid. pag. 22.

(69) In the Remark [M].

(70) Caſtellio, Defenſ. pag. 24.

the faithful portraiture of his enemies: it will be ſufficient for my purpoſe if they be taken for a general image of the corruption of nature, and for a ſubject of reflections. An infinite number of other people agree in commending him as having led a good life [H].

What

drollery in ſuch matters; two of your beſt friends know it well. One of them having publiſhed a jocoſe book intitled Zoographia, I went to his houſe to give him my advice, and not finding him, I ſent it him by a third perſon. Far from making a good uſe of it, he publiſhed a ſecond piece of the ſame nature, intitled Paſſavantius, and has mortally hated me ever ſince. The other is a man to whom I have great obligations, he has entertained me in his houſe, and I ſaw he was a perſon of ſome piety: I wrote to him that he would do well to publiſh no more facetious Books on ſacred ſubjects; and he did not take the caution I gave him amiſs, as the other had done. Take notice that he obſerves (71) Calvin had prefixed a Preface to a Piece of this nature, written by one of thoſe two Authors.

(71) Idem, ibid.

As to Calvin's reproaching him with having entertained him in his houſe (72), his Anſwer is this. He owns that he lodged with him at Straſburgh, but that he went away at the week's end, to make room for Madamoyſelle du Verger, who would have lodgings in Calvin's houſe as well for herſelf as for her ſon, and her ſon's ſervant (73). You deſired me civilly to quit my room to that ſervant: I did ſo, and paid you for my board. Some time after I was deſired by your people to come and attend your ſervant, a countryman of mine, who was ſick. I went thither, I aſſiſted him till his death, that is to ſay, for ſeven days, and I lived on your bread; but ſince that time I have not lodged with you (74). He mentions ſome ſervices which he did to Calvin's family while the latter was gone to the Diet of Ratiſbon, and concludes that he could not be reproached either with ingratitude or treachery.

(72) Cum te domi meæ aluerim.

(73) Caſtellio, Defenſ. pag. 26.

(74) Idem, ibid. pag. 27.

The Appendix to his Apology is remarkable. He there upbraids Calvin and Theodore Beza with too greedily picking up the flying reports concerning their enemies, and inſerting them immediately in the firſt Book they publiſhed. You hate me, ſays he to them; and that is the reaſon why you eaſily give credit to all the ill which is ſaid of me, and why you believe not, or turn to a bad ſenſe, the good which you hear of me. Accedit in vobis ad levitatem illam capitale odium mei: quo fit, ut de me quicquid mali dicitur, id quia vultis, facillimè credatis: facilè enim (inquit idem Cæſar) credunt homines quæ volunt. Rurſumque ſi quid boni dicitur, id vel non credatis, vel maligna interpretatione depravetis (75). Your emiſſaries report, or write to you, all the ſtories which may hit your taſte; you take your meaſures according to their news, and thereby expoſe yourſelves, ſooner or later, to confuſion. Talia de me jactant leviſſimi homines, & ea vobis veluti conducti, vel referunt, vel ſcribunt, quia vos talia libentur audire ſciunt. Atque ita ineunt à vobis certè non honeſta mercede gratiam. Vos hiſce rumoribus, atque auditionibus permoti de re non levi, leve conſilium initis, auditiones illas etiam monimentis literarum mandatis: quorum vos ſi non e veſtigio, at certè aliquando pœnitere neceſſe erit, cum incertis rumoribus ſerviatis, & plerique ad voluntatem veſtram ficta reſpondeant (76). If your emiſſaries deceive you, you alſo deceive them in your turn: they hear from you a hundred falſe reports, which they ſpread up and down on every ſide (77). You have endeavoured to render me odious to all the world, and to that end have repreſented me as a dangerous caballer, who had people in pay, in town and country, at the city gates and in the taverns. Some Frenchmen, who come hither (78) from Straſburgh with this formidable idea which you give of my perſon, were greatly ſurprized to find me poor and quiet, and teſtified an extreme indignation againſt the Authors of ſo many fables. Pateſcunt artes, conatuſque veſtri, ſicuti nuper patuere quibuſdam juvenibus Gallis, qui huc ab Argentina profecti ſic habebant aures imbutas iſtis de me rumoribus, ut me putarent paſſim emiſſarios habere non ſolum in diverſoriis, verum etiam ruri, & in portis urbis. Denique eam de me opinionem imaginemque animo conceperant, ut me arbitrarentur magnum aliquem, & opibus, atque authoritate pollentem virum, quaſique ſatellitum caterva ſtipatum cujus inſidias eſſet effugere difficile. Ubi deinde nihil tale deprehenderunt, contraque homuncionem viderunt, pauperem, vilem, abjectum, quietum, nihil molientem, nullius nec ſplendoris, nec authoritatis, mirati ſunt, non abſque ſtomacho, illa mendacia, mecumque tandem congreſſi, tam ab illis abhorruerunt, mihique adhæſerunt, quàm ante cognitam veritatem à me abhorrentes illis adhæſerant (79). You excite the Magiſtrates againſt me, and not being able to perſuade them to ſatisfy your paſſion, you practiſe all ſorts of artifices to ruin my reputation, and to prevent my writings being read. You publiſh works againſt me, and endeavour to prevail that I may not be permitted to anſwer you (80). You forbid your people to ſpeak to me, and if any of them venture to do it, they become ſuſpected to you, and you become their enemies. This is the reaſon why ſeveral, who would come to viſit me, dare not do it. Quoniam illi (Magiſtratus) veſtræ cupiditati, vel non obſequuntur, vel nondum obſequuntur, vos (quod proximum eſt) me toto orbe, quibuſcunque modis fieri poteſt, certatim infamatis; mea ſcripta (ut papam poſſis agnoſcere) ne legantur pro virili prohibetis: ipſi contrà ſcribitis, mihi ne reſpondere permittatur, quoad ejus fieri poteſt, cavetur. Veſtris ne me conveniant vetatis, ſi qui convenerint plerumque ſuſpectos habetis, & abhorretis. Quo metu fit, ut multi me, quamvis cupientes, convenire non audeant, id quod nonnulli, & mihi, & aliis confeſſi ſunt (81). You conceal your hatred under the ſpecious pretence of the love of truth, and you make an ill uſe of your eloquence and wit to make your accuſations appear probable to the people; which is not difficult, there being nothing ſo wholeſome which may not be poiſoned, nor any thing ſo ugly which may not be covered with paint. Interea nomine ſtudii tuendæ veritatis odium veſtrum prætexitis: veram ejus cauſam (quippe vobis parum honeſtam) diſſimulatis, cauſamque veſtram apud imperitos probabilem redditis ea arte, quæ docet de quavis re propoſita probabiliter diſputare in utramque partem. Qua quidem arte ſic inſtructi eſtis, (atque utinam tam præclaris ingeniis, vobiſque divinitus longè alios ad uſus conceſſis non abuteremini) ut vix quicquam vel tam benè dici, aut fieri poſſit, quin id interpretando deformare, vel tam malè quin fucare poſſitis, præſertim judice mundo, apud quem valere maledicta quid mirum, cum nullum ſit ipſi ſuavius pabulum (82)? The remainder of this Appendix contains excellent admonitions; and it muſt be agreed that Caſtalio, let him be as much a heretic as you pleaſe, has given more ſignal examples of moderation in his Writings, than the Orthodox who attacked him.

(75) Idem, ibid. pag. 36.

(76) Idem, ibid. pag. 38, 39.

(77) Neque verò plus illi vobis, quàm vos illis nocetis. Nam & à vobis illi viciſſim multa falſa audiunt, quæ deinde diſſeminant, quo fit ut utrique cæteros decipiendo, ſcandalis Eccleſiam repleatis. Caſtellio, Defenſ. pag. 39.

(78) That is, to Baſil.

(79) Caſtellio, Defenſ. pag. 40.

(80) Here are the words which Baudouin, Reſponſ. III. folio 168 verſo, ſuppoſes Caſtalio made uſe of ſpeaking of Beza: De ſingulari æquitate tua quam admirabatur neſcio quid narrabat, cum te diceret miris artibus efficere ut illi quem impotentiſſime laceſſebas, non liceret aut reſpondere aut reſponſionem edere, propterea quæ tuæ clementiæ gratias ageret, qua eum hoc labore liberabas.

(81) Caſtellio, Defenſ. pag. 41.

Father Garaſſe tells us, that Calvin teſtifies of Caſtalio, that when he drank, he uſed to ſay before he taſted the wine, Tu quis es? i. e. "Who art thou?" and when he had taſted it, if it was paſſable, or tolerably good, he anſwered; Ego ſum qui ſum, i. e. "I am that I am:" but if it was excellent, he anſwered; Hic eſt filius Dei vivi, i. e. "This is the "ſon of the living God (83)." I do not believe that Calvin ever ſaid this.

[H] An infinite number of . . . . people agree in commending him as having led a good life.] There appeared in him great ſimplicity, and an extreme averſion to oſtentation (84). Theodore Beza acknowledges this to be fact, tho' he gives it the worſt turn he poſſibly could (85); but we muſt conſider that he ſpoke as an enemy. During the diſputes concerning Arminianiſm, they reprinted in Holland Conſilium ad vaſtatam Galliam anno 1567 datum per Sebaſtianum Caſtalionem, ubi cauſæ præſentis tum belli ſimulque medicina ejus indigitantur, ac præſertim diligenter examinatur ac perpenditur an conſcientiis vis ſit adhibenda. i. e. "Advice to France laid deſolate, given in the year "1567 by Sebaſtian Caſtalio, wherein the cauſes of "the preſent war, and alſo the remedy thereof, are "pointed out, and the queſtion whether conſciences "may be forced is particularly and carefully examined "and weighed." Theodore Bomius, who procured this new Edition was cenſured for it by the Anti-Remonſtrants. They blamed him for having taken up the ſtinking bones of Caſtalio out of the grave (86). He anſwered, that that man deſerved all manner of commendation; he alledged the fair Teſtimonial which the Univerſity of Baſil gave him, he quoted the letters of Melanchthon, &c. (87). Bomius (in Veredario

(82) Idem, ibid. pag. 42.

(83) Doctrine curieuſe, pag. 201.

(84) Homo ſimplex, & ab omni faſtu alienus. Sammarth. Elogior. lib. 2. pag. 126.

(85) Erat quadam ταπεινοφροσύνης ſpecie ineptiſſime ambitioſus. Ac plane ex eorum genere quos Græci ἰδιογνώμονας appellant. i. e. "Under a "certain appearance of humility, he was "moſt fooliſhly "ambitious: "and perfectly "one of thoſe "whom the "Greeks call "ἰδιογνώμονας, "men fond of "their own opinion." Beza, in Vitâ Calvini, ad ann. 1544, pag. m. 372.

(86) Quod fœtentia Caſtalionis oſſa è ſepulchro produxerit. Salomon Theodotus, in Pacificatorio diſſecti Belgii, pag. 103.

(87) Idem, ibid. pag. 103, 104.

What he anſwered, when he was accuſed of theft, will ſhew us that he was poor [I]. Sentiments are not divided as to his poverty; no body denies but that he had a great deal of difficulty to get bread for himſelf and his children which were not few, for he left four ſons and as many daughters (b). Montagne laments the hard fate of this Author [K]. There are ſeveral people who ſay he was a Miniſter; but there is ſome reaſon ſuo edito anno 1617, pag. 20.) adverſario huic reſpondens, mirifice Caſtalionem commendat; honorificum de eo citat teſtimonium Univerſitatis Baſileenſis in qua Theologiæ (88) Profeſſorem egit. Ex Philippi quoque Melanchthonis & Chriſtophori Carleili ad ipſum datis literis laudes ejus exaggerat. Let us confirm this by a paſſage taken from the letter of an Arminian Miniſter: "The Divines of Baſil give S. Caſtalio a great teſti- "mony of excellent piety; and even Polanus, a great "Predeſtinarian, confeſſes that Caſtalio was of holy "life and exemplary converſation. . . . I do not find "that their adverſaries (89) have ever given them a "good teſtimony, as Polanus has done to Caſtalio, "even in the place where he diſputes againſt him "concerning Predeſtination (90)." One may make, methinks, a general reflection, which will be a ſtrong proof of the good morals, and of the learning of this man. His enemies cried him down as the peſt of Orthodoxy, and a diſturber of the Reformed Church. They endeavoured to prevail with the Magiſtrates of Baſil to expel him. The Conſiſtory of Baſil did not ſpare him; he was cited before them with relation to ſome Books which were imputed to him: and one of his works was condemned by them (91). Some Profeſſors of the Univerſity wrote againſt him (92). It is ſaid, that having been confounded in a public diſputation concerning Predeſtination, the Curators of the Univerſity ordered him not to tranſgreſs the bounds of his profeſſion, and not to meddle with Divinity. Omnes norunt, quum in diſputatione publica de prædeſtinatione tibi os occluſum eſſet, adeò ut quod hiſceres non haberes, niſi illud unum tui ſimilibus ſolenne, te ſcilicet iſta myſteria non capere, tibi (inquam) tum, & aliàs aliquoties, ab Academiæ præfectis edictum fuiſſe ut in tuæ profeſſionis finibus maneus, à theologicis rebus abſtineres (93). All this teſtifies that no indulgence was ſhewn him. It is therefore very plain, that if he was not expelled, he was beholden to his learning for it, and to the edification which he afforded to the whole city by his piety and virtue. Caſtàlioni fecerunt injuriam cum doctus eſſet, faſtum objecerunt, ſaid Scaliger (94); i. e. "They wronged Caſtalio, taxing him with pride, "becauſe he was a learned man."

(b) See the Latin Verſes on his Death, at the end of his Dialogi Sacri.

(88) It ſhould be Linguæ Græcæ.

(89) That is, the Adverſaries of Calvin and Beza.

(90) Letter of Charles de Nielles. It is the 634th among the Epiſt. Eccleſ. & Theolog. Ed. Amſtel. 1648, pag. 951.

(91) See the Remark [B], Citation (21).

(92) See Theod. Beza, ad Defenſ. & Repreh. Caſtell. init. pag. 43. tom. 1. Operum.

(93) Idem, ibid. init. pag. 431.

(94) Scaligerana, pag. m. 46.

Let us take notice, by the way, of the fault which has ſlipped into the title of the Work which Bomius cauſed to be reprinted. The year 1567 is wrongly inſerted therein. I think it ſhould have been the year 1562: for this Writer dying in the year 1563, could not have given that advice to France made deſolate, on any other occaſion than that of the firſt religious civil war. La Croix du Maine obſerves that he is ſaid to be the Author of a Book intitled Le Conſeil à la France deſolée (95). The firſt Edition is not of the year 1578, as the Author whom I cite (96) aſſerts: it was precedent to the peace of 1563. Baudouin, in his anſwer to Beza (97), ſpeaks of this Advice, as of a Book printed about the time that Anthony King of Navarre died.

(95) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Franc. pag. 453.

(96) Salom. Theodotus, in Pacificatorio diſſecti Belgii, pag. 103.

(97) Fol. 68 verſo.

[I] What he anſwered, when accuſed of theft, will ſhew us that he was poor.] Calvin reproaches him with having ſtolen ſome wood. Quæro ex te dum proximis annis tibi harpago in manu erat ad rapienda ligna, quibus domum tuam calefaceres, an non te propria voluntas ad furandum impulerit? tibi ſi ad juſtam damnationem hoc unum ſufficit, quod ſciens, & volens, turpe, & ſceleratum lucrum, ex damno alieno captas, quicquid de neceſſitate obſtrepis minime te abſolvet (98). i. e. "Pray tell me, when of late years you had a drag- "hook in your hand to ſteal wood with to burn at "home, did not your own will induce you to commit "theft? If this alone be ſufficient to condemn you, "that knowingly and voluntarily you ſeek a ſordid "and wicked gain by your neighbour's loſs, all the "noiſe you make about neceſſity will never acquit you." How do you know this? anſwered Caſtalio (99). You did not ſee it, and you ought not to have believed it on a hearſay: why did you not examine your informers? why did you not aſk them whether they had been eye-witneſſes, and whether the circumſtances of the action do not exempt it from the charge of theft? The chit-chat of your Clients, and your credulity which foments it, have deceived you here, as they have on a hundred other occaſions. Decipit hic te profectò, ut & in multis aliis rebus, & tuorum linguacitas, & ejuſdem allectrix tua credulitas. Scis illud, Facile credunt homines quæ volunt (100). He then relates the fact. He ſays that being in extreme want, and unwilling notwithſtanding to quit his Tranſlation of the Scripture, he took a drag-hook at his hours of leiſure, to pull out the pieces of wood which floated on the river: this wood belonged to nobody, but to the firſt who laid hold of it; I might therefore, adds he, appropriate it to myſelf without fraud, to ſerve me for fewel at home. The fiſhermen and many others exerciſed their hooks as well as I, and this was done in ſight of the whole city. In eo ſtudio cum ità totus eſſem, ut vel mendicare mallem quam deſiſtere, & in ripa Rheni habitarem, capiebam interdum ſuccidivis horis harpagone ligna, quæ ſolet, dum exundat Rhenus, ſecum rapta devehere, quibus domum meam calefacerem. Hoc tu furtum interpretaris. Certè non bonus, neque candidus interpres. Publica ſunt illa ligna, & primi occupantis (101). He adds, that during the overflowing of a river which diſcharges itſelf into the Rhine above Baſil, there were above two hundred perſons who employed themſelves in ſtopping the pieces of wood which were driving down towards the city, and that himſelf and four of his friends ſtopped a great deal of it, as a recompenſe for which the Magiſtrates ordered them to be paid four pence a piece, and left them the wood. He takes the city of Baſil, and divers men of learning in particular, to witneſs, that his pretended theft conſiſted only in this (102). He proteſts before God and men, that he had from his youth up a ſingular averſion to lying and ſtealing (103). He concludes with ſaying that he knew the fable of his thieving had been told about in Geneva; but that he had imagined it to be only the diſcourſe of John Calvin's friends, people accuſtomed to ſpread abroad without judgment whatever might defame their patron's enemies. I did not believe, continues he, that you who knew me would give credit to this ſtory, and I could not eaſily have believed you would have publiſhed it, tho' I knew you ſo well. Putabam ſermones eſſe tuorum, qui de iis à quibus te abhorrere ſciunt, quælibet ſpargere ſolent nullo judicio. Sed te, te (inquam) qui me noſſes, hæc credere non putabam. Ut verò etiam publicato libro in totum orbem, & ad poſteritatem ſpargeres, ita me Deus amet, quamvis te noſſem, non facilè credidiſſem (104).

(98) Calvin. in Calumniis Nebulonis, pag. m. 748. Tractat. Theolog.

(99) Caſtalio, in Defenſ. pag. 11.

(100) Idem, ibid. pag. 12.

(101) Idem, ibid.

(102) Idem, ibid. pag. 14.

(103) Idem, ibid. pag. 15.

(104) Idem, ibid.

[K] He had a great deal of difficulty to get bread. . . . . Montagne laments the hard fate of this Author.] They who ſay he employed himſelf by turns in digging the ground, and in inſtructing his ſcholars (105), intended without doubt to inſinuate to us that his fortune was very narrow. Mr. Varillas explains their words in this manner: Caſtalio, ſays he (106), ſtruggled with ill fortune all his life long, and eſpecially after he had been driven from Geneva: his friends aſſiſted him but ſparingly in his extreme indigence; and he complains of it in an ingenious manner to one of them, to whom he dedicates his Moſts, telling him that the oil fell only drop by drop into his lamp. They ſay he was at laſt reduced, by the neceſſity of maintaining his numerous family, to divide his time, and to ſpend the morning in ſtudy, and the reſt of the day in tilling the ground; and that he nevertheleſs died for want, his misfortune having touched no Author with compaſſion except Montagne.

(105) Suburbanum prædium ſua ipſe quotidiè manu foderet, ſuſceptamque juventutis erudiendæ curam alterno telluris colendæ labore adæquaret. Sammarth. Elog. lib. 2. pag. 126.

(106) Varillas, Hiſt. de l'Herefie, tom. 6. lib. 26. pag. 22.

Is it not a very deplorable thing, that a man ſo full of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, ſhould be ſo poor? He died for want, if we take Scaliger's word for it (107). Thoſe who would ſet the lives of the Ancients and of the Moderns in parallel, ſhould match this man with that Valerius Cato whoſe poverty ſerved Bibaculus for ſport (108): Vixit ad extremam ſenectam, ſed in ſummâ pauperie, & pene inopiâ, abditus modico gurguſtio, poſtquam Tuſculana villa creditoribus ceſſerat, ut auctor eſt Bibaculus:

(107) Mortuus eſt ex pauperiate. Scaligerana, pag. 46.

(108) Sueton. de illuſt. Grammat. cap. 11.

(i) See the Remark [L].

reaſon to believe they do not ſay true (i). I ſhall not have many things to ſay againſt Moreri, or againſt Mr. Varillas, or Mr. Teiſſier [L]. A Remark muſt be made on the Si quis forte mei domum Catonis,

Depictas minio aſſulas, & illos
Cuſtodis videt hortulos Priapi;
Miratur quibus ille diſciplinis
Tantam ſit ſapientiam aſſecutus,
Quem tres cauliculi, & ſelibra farris,
Racemi duo, tegula ſub una
Ad ſummam prope nutriant ſenectam.

Et idem rurſus:

Catonis modo, Galle, Tuſculanum,
Tota creditor urbe venditabat.
Mirati ſumus unicum magiſtrum,
Summum grammaticum, optimum poëtam,
Omnes ſolvere poſſe quæſtiones,
Unum difficile expedire nomen.
En cor Zenodoti, en jecur Cratetis.

That is,

" He lived to extreme old age, but in the utmoſt " poverty, and almoſt in want of neceſſaries, ſhut " up in a little hut, after his farm at Tuſculum was " ſeized on by his creditors, as Bibaculus writes:

" If any chance to ſee friend Cato's houſe,
" The boards red-painted, and ſmall garden plot,
" He needs muſt wonder by what diſcipline
" That man ſuch paſſing wiſdom could attain,
" Whom colworts three, and half a pound of meal,
" With a few grapes, have to old age ſupported,
" Under the ſhelter of a ſingle tile.

" And again;

" But juſt now, Gallus, Cato's creditors
" Put up to ſale his Tuſculan Eſtate.
" We wondred that this grand Philoſopher,
" This top Grammarian, and this beſt of Poets,
" Could ſolve all queſtions, yet ſhould be ſo puzzl'd
" To clear one ſingle debt. The quinteſſence
" Behold of Crates and Zenodotus!

However, the words of Montagne deſerve tranſcribing. " I hear, to the great ſhame of our age," ſays he (109), " that in our ſight, two perſons of excellent " learning have died for want of having wherewith to " fill their bellies; Lilius Gregorius Giraldus in Italy, " and Sebaſtian Caſtalio in Germany: and I believe " there are a thouſand men who would have invited " them on advantageous terms, or have aſſiſted them " where they were, if they had known it. The world " is not ſo univerſally corrupted, but that I know a " man, who could wiſh with all his heart that the " means his friends have put into his hands were " employed, ſo long as fortune pleaſes that he ſhall " enjoy them, in ſheltering from neceſſity perſons re- " markable for any valuable qualifications, whom ill " fortune ſometimes perſecutes even to extremity, and " would put them at leaſt in ſuch a condition, that " it ſhould be entirely for want of a juſt way of think- " ing, if they were not contented." Two reaſons have engaged me to copy this paſſage: one is taken from the ſolidity of the reflection which accompanies this curious fact: the other, from the conſideration of the difficulty which the greater part of my Readers, who had a mind to know what Montagne has ſaid, muſt have been under to give themſelves that ſatisfaction; for the Alphabetical Table to his Eſſays would have been no help to them for the finding of this place, and he is not an Author who facilitates the ſearch of what one remembers to have read in his Eſſays, either by the titles of his Chapters, or by the connection of the ſubjects. Local memory knows not what to lay hold on in that Writer. For which reaſon the Table of matters ought to have been much better than it is. Caſtalio ſhould have appeared there under his name, or at leaſt under a Poor Scholar, the Poverty of certain learned perſons, &c. How ill is that Table made; and how many others are like it!

(109) Montagne, Eſſais, liv. 1. chap. 34. pag. m. 353.

[L] I ſhall not have many things to ſay againſt Moreri, or againſt Mr. Varillas, or Mr. Teiſſier.] The firſt aſſerts, without any proof, that Caſtalio was of the mountains of Dauphiné (110). Theſe words: Beza himſelf, who was of his ſide, acknowledges it (111) was full of faults, and adds that Caſtillon thought it a matter indifferent to follow any Religion a man had a fancy to; theſe words, I ſay, are very abſurd, for it is evident to the laſt degree that Theodore Beza was never of the ſame ſide with thoſe who held the indifference of Religions. Beſides, is it not viſible, that having made a Tranſlation of the New Teſtament, he was Caſtalio's rival, and that nobody therefore was ſo much diſpoſed as he to find faults in the Tranſlation of the latter? Add hereto, that he eſpouſed the quarrels of Calvin, the great enemy of Caſtalio, even before the Bible of the latter was publiſhed. Moreri perfectly reſembles thoſe who ſhould ſay, The Verſion of the New Teſtament by Meſſieurs de Port-Roial is not a good one: Father Bouhours himſelf (112), who is of their ſide, acknowledges it to be full of faults. In a word, it cannot be ſaid, without groſs ignorance, that Theodore Beza thought Caſtalio was of the Reformed Religion. I do not find in the Book cited by Moreri (113), that the indifference of Religions was the hereſy which Beza attributed to Caſtalio.

(110) See the Remark [A].

(111) That is, Caſtalio's Tranſlation of the Bible.

(112) He has likewiſe made a French Tranſlation of the New Teſtament.

(113) The Life of Calvin, by Theod. Beza.

I ſhall begin my Critique on Varillas with this, ſince he aſſerts that Beza ſays Caſtalio quitted Geneva becauſe he held all Religions to be indifferent (114). It is more probable, continues he, that his ſtyle, which was incomparably more florid than that of Calvin, inſpired him with jealouſy. Here are two faults; for, in the firſt place, it is not true that Caſtalio equalled Calvin in writing elegant Latin: all who are judges of ſtyle, will readily grant me this. In the ſecond place, Caſtalio had not yet ſhewn the ornamental graces of his pen, when he left Geneva. He tranſlated the Scripture with ſo much delicacy, that the paint appears almoſt every where in his ſtyle, and in ſuch abundance, that it frequently gives diſguſt inſtead of pleaſure. This propoſition of Varillas is not true; and though it were, yet the following would not be ſo: It muſt however be owned, in requital, that no other Tranſlation comes near it, for beauty and clearneſs (115). Is not a man who delivers theſe two judgments of the ſame Tranſlation, an excellent Critic? He ſeems to ſay in his Argument on the Canticles, that the ſubject is not the myſtical love between Chriſt and his Church; but the ſcandalous amours of Solomon and one of his miſtreſſes (116). I have fully verified theſe words to be falſe: I find no Argument on the Canticles, either in the French or in the Latin Bible of Caſtalio (117).

(114) Varillas, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, liv. 26. pag. 21.

(115) Ibid. pag. 22.

(116) Ibid.

(117) I have conſulted five Editions.

Mr. Teiſſier (118) is in the wrong to ſay that our Author always called himſelf Caſtalio, after the adventure of which I ſhall ſpeak preſently. He was, continues he, firſt a Miniſter at Geneva. The Atteſtation of Calvin, mentioned above (119), invincibly refutes this, and convicts Theodore Beza of not having obſerved the Laws of Hiſtory, which require that no obſcurity be left in a Relation, with ſufficient exactneſs. He tells us that the city of Geneva being afflicted with the plague in the year 1542, thoſe who were infected wanted a Paſtor whoſe proper office it ſhould be to comfort them (120). Moſt of them were afraid of the contagion; but Calvin, Caſtalio, and Blanchet offered themſelves. The lot fell upon Caſtalio, who nevertheleſs impudently rejected that employment (121). It is natural to conclude from theſe words, that he was one of the Miniſters of Geneva; therefore they have not all the perſpicuity which is neceſſary. The term Comforter ſhould have been put inſtead of Paſtor which Beza makes uſe of, and in that caſe his readers would have had no room to imagine that Caſtalio was a Miniſter; for tho' a man be not one as yet, he may notwithſtanding offer himſelf to comfort the infected. We may ſee by the abovementioned Atteſtation, that he aſpired to the Miniſtry, and that he would have been admitted to it, had he not maintained certain opinions. I believe, with Dr. Spon, that he had preached ſometimes (122); but this only proves that he aſpired to the office of a Paſtor. I conclude that the Jeſuit Garaſſe is as many times miſtaken as he has called him Miniſter. He has done it frequently, and always with groſs

(118) Teiſſier, Addit. aux Eloges, tom. 1. pag. 222.

(119) In the Remark [D], Citation (46).

(120) Paſtoris conſtantis ac ſedu li opera rtquireretur. Beza, in Vita Calvini, ad ann. 1542, pag. m. 371.

(121) Dr. Spon, Hiſt. de Geneve, pag. 251. and Signor Leti, Iſtor. Genevr. tom. 3. pag. 76, do not ſay this.

(122) Spon. Hiſt. de Geneve, pag. 251. Note that Signor Leti, Iſtor. Genevr. tom. 3. pag. 79, 80, ſays expreſly that Caſtalio was a Miniſter.

the name Caſtalio [M]. I might make another, but I will not, on the imprudence of this learned man. If he had kept within the bounds of his profeſſion, he would have done more conſiderable ſervice to the Commonwealth of Learning than he has, as Peter Ramus has well obſerved [N], and would have ſecured himſelf from a thouſand vexations. Inſtead of that, he ſet up for godlineſs and devotion, and medled with the moſt nice and obſcure queſtions in Divinity. He ſhould have left them to thoſe they belonged to by virtue of their office, or if he muſt needs thruſt himſelf into ſuch ſort of buſineſs, he ſhould have applied Eſop's advice (k) to himſelf. I have heard people who paſſed for wiſe ſay, that not having regulated his conduct according to that advice, he did the ſame thing which is ſaid of the laſt Duke of Burgundy, with reſpect to his irruption into Germany (l).

(l) While he ran his head againſt that potent Germanic body, which is all of iron. Mezerai, Abregé Chronol. tom. 3. pag. m. 325. at the year 1475; add hereto the fragilem truci commiſit pelago ratem of Horace, Ode 3. Book 1.

(k) Ναι ευγε, ſaid he to Solon, either not to approach Kings, or elſe to ſay nothing to them but what may pleaſe. Plutarch. in Solone. Mr. Bayle quotes Mr. Dacier's Tranſlation, pag. 461, of the Dutch edition.

groſs abuſes. Here is an example of it: "We hear "that Sebaſtian Caſtalio, who was by trade a Carpen- "ter (113), has really hewed the holy Scripture, if his "daughters have ſpun it; this ſorry fellow, of a very "mechanical and ſervile turn of mind, and fit to be "a Miniſter, as indeed he was, beſides his vocation of "a Carpenter, has ſo planed the Scripture, and ſpoiled "it in ſo many important paſſages, that he makes us "juſtly apprehenſive of ſeeing the Bible reſigned and "given up into the hands of mechanics and idi- "ots (124)."

(123) This is a fact of which I am very uncertain.

(124) Garaſſe, Doctrine Curieuſe, pag. 506, 507.

Mr. Teiſſier ſuppoſes that Caſtalio was baniſhed: this is contrary to the Atteſtation of Calvin, and note that Sig. Leti relates that Caſtalio being threatened with baniſhment and depoſition, in caſe of a relapſe, waited not the effects of thoſe menaces, but retired to Baſil (125). Of the three cauſes of his exile aſſigned by Mr. Teiſſier, two are falſe ones: for his Preface to the Verſion of the Bible, and his Notes on the firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians, were not made till ſeveral years after his retreat from Geneva. All the Authors whom I have conſulted ſay, as Beza does, that he retired directly to Baſil. Mr. Teiſſier is the only one whom I have read, who ſays he retired to Bern, and that he was expelled thence on account of his errors.

(125) Leti, Iſtor. Geneur. pag. 80.

[M] A remark muſt be made on the name Caſtalio.] He owns that in his younger days he ſuffered himſelf to be drawn to vanity. Inſoleſcebat animus ſtulta quadam & juvenili perſuaſione cognitionis earum ſcientiarum, & linguarum, quibus ſæpe ſolent earum ſtudioſi plus tribuere quàm ſpiritui (126). i. e. "My mind "grew vain from a fooliſh and youthful perſuaſion of "my ſkill in thoſe ſciences and tongues, to which they "who are fond of them uſually attribute more than "to the ſpirit." He produces this proof of it. When I was at Lyons, before I went to you (127) at Straſburgh, ſomebody by miſtake called me Caſtalio, inſtead of Caſtellio. I was highly delighted with it, calling to remembrance the fountain Caſtalius which was conſecrated to the Muſes: thereupon I became in love with that falſe name, I preferred it to that of my family, and I adorned my ſelf with it at the head of a work. Quod ego nomen audiens, à Muſarum fonte Caſtalio derivatum, adamavi, atque amplexus ſum, meque, omiſſo deinceps Caſtellionis nomine patrio, Caſtalionem appellavi. Quin etiam hoc idem nomen primis mei Prodromi literis primorum verſuum conſignavi, videlicet, ut eſſet inſignior etiam ad poſteros mea ſuperbia. Eram enim, ſi Muſis placet, Poëta, & Græcæ planè levitatis Muſopatagus *. Hæc ego confiteor, & execror, nec ſolum nunc confitens erubeſco, verùm etiam antea ſæpe ſolus cogitans, cùm me majorem veri cognitionem adeptum conſcientia pro mille teſtibus accuſaret, pudore ſuffuſus ſum. Itaque deinceps omiſſa illa gloriola Græca, nactus, quam ſæpe optavi, occaſionem mutandi, patrio me nomine Caſtellionem appellari cupio (128). i. e. "Which name "when I heard, derived from the Caſtalian ſpring of "the Muſes, I grew in love with it, and embraced "it, and laying aſide my paternal name Caſtellio, "thenceforward called myſelf Caſtalio. I alſo ſet "this name at the beginning of the firſt verſes of my "Prodromus, that my pride might be the more con- "ſpicuous to poſterity. For I was a Poet, and pleaſe "the Muſes, and a moſt vain and obſtreperous Reciter "of my verſes. All this I acknowledge, and de- "teſt, nor is it the firſt time I have confeſſed and "bluſhed at it, having oftentimes before been covered "with confuſion, when I reflected thereon in private, "and conſcience, on a nearer acquaintance with truth, "accuſed me as ſtrongly as a thouſand witneſſes. "Wherefore laying aſide for the future this little Gre- "cian vanity, having met with an opportunity, which "I had often wiſhed for, of making the change, I de- "ſire to be called by my paternal name Caſtellio." The end of this paſſage ſhews us that he did not perſiſt in that little vanity, and that he returned to his true name. In the title of his French Bible he calls himſelf Sebaſtian Chateillon.

(126) Caſtell. Defenſ. pag. 21.

* Μυσοπάταγος Recitator clamoſus, vel perſonare omnia faciens, ſive verſificator obſtreperus.

(128) Caſtell. Defenſ. See the Scaligerana prima, pag. m. 41.

[N] If he had kept within the bounds of his profeſſion, he would have done more conſiderable ſervice to the Commonwealth of Learning, as Peter Ramus has well obſerved.] I ſet down his words, that they may ſerve for a Supplement to the Collections of Sir Tho. Pope Blount (129). Utinam tanti ingenii tamque bonis artibus ac literis eruditi vis illa in hoc unico Græcæ profeſſionis argumento verſari maluiſſet, nihil mea quidem ſententia in iſto genere laudis Baſilea comparandum habuiſſet (130). i. e. "I wiſh the force of ſo great a "genius, and ſo excellently learned, had choſen to "confine itſelf wholly to the profeſſion of the Greek "Tongue; Baſil, in my opinion, would have had "nothing comparable in that kind of merit." It is thus that Ramus ſpeaks, after having mentioned ſome Books which Caſtalio had tranſlated.

(127) He directs his diſcourſe to Calvin.

(129) He has not cited this paſſage of Ramus in his Cenſura Authorum, pag. 493, where he collects the Judgments on Caſtalio.

(130) Petrus Ramus, in Baſilea, pag. m. 52.

CASTELLANUS (a) (PETER) Great Almoner of France in the ſixteenth Century, was a very worthy and learned man. His father, who was a younger brother to a Walloon Gentleman, bore arms all his life-time, and ſettled at Archi in Burgundy [A]. He

(a) His true name was Du Chaſtel.

[A] His father . . . younger brother to a Walloon Gentleman, ſettled at Archi in Burgundy (a).] If Gallandius did not pay a mere compliment to his friend with regard to his extraction, the Author of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the Reformed Churches, and Moreri have been very much in the wrong. According to Gallandius Caſtellanus (Du Chatel) was not only a Nobleman, but of a very ancient family (1), and the ſon of a brave Knight, Eques Auratus magna ſcientiæ militaris & fortitudinis laude ſtipendia fecit (2). That is, "He was a Knight, and ſerved in the Armies, with "great reputation as well for his ſkill in military af- "fairs, as for his courage." Beza ſpeaks of him quite in another manner. This good Biſhop, ſays he (3), ſurnamed Chatelain, was of a very mean extraction. And Moreri ſuppoſes, that Francis I having aſked Caſtellanus, whether he was a Gentleman, the latter replied, that he did not well know from which of Noah's three ſons, who were in the Ark, he was deſcended. This is inconſiſtent with Gallandius's account. Obſerve alſo that all thoſe, who mention Caſtellanus's native place, ſuppoſe that he was born at Langres, and yet Gallandius gives him a native place much more obſcure. It is a common thing for the learned, who are born in ſome village, to borrow a ſurname from the neareſt city. Thus a man was ſurnamed Aurelianenſis (from Orleans) tho' he was not born at Orleans, but in the neighbourhood. I imagine that for the like reaſon Caſtellanus was ſurnamed Lingonenſis,

(1) Petrus Gallandius, in Vita Caſtell. pag. 1.
(2) Ibid. pag. 2.
(3) Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſ. liv. 2. pag. 80.

(a) Mr. de la Monoye has obſerved, in the fourth volume of the Menagiana, p. 124, of the Paris Edition 1729, that there is neither city nor town called Archi in Burgundy, and that theſe words in Gallandius Archii in Burgundia, ſhould be tranſlated Arc in Barrois or in the Dutchy of Bar; and the Abbot Papillon aſſerts, that this was really the native place of Caſtellanus, who was ſurnamed Lingonenſis, only becauſe he belonged to the Dioceſe of Langres (a). CRIT. REM.]

(a) From the Remarks printed at the end of Mr. Bayle's Dictionary, Paris edition.

He married there, and had two ſons, of whom our Peter Caſtellanus was the youngeſt; this child had the misfortune to loſe his father and mother before he came to years of diſcretion, and his guardians took very little care both of his eſtate and of his education; however in the eleventh year of his age he was ſent to Dijon, to ſtudy under a famous Tutor (b), and made ſuch a conſiderable progreſs as amazed his teachers. He learned the Greek Tongue without the aſſiſtance of any maſter; and he had not been above ſix years at Dijon, when he was choſen to teach a form there [B]. He diſcharged his duty in that ſtation in ſuch a manner as was very honourable to him, and he met very ſoon with a good opportunity to diſplay his wit and genius in a full audience [C]. He afterwards travelled in order to ſatisfy the deſire he had of being acquainted with the learned men, and eſpecially with Eraſmus. He went firſt into Germany, where he ſaw ſeveral men of letters, and ſtopt at laſt at Baſil to continue with Eraſmus [D], who having ſoon diſcovered that this young man had a great ſtock of learning, recommended him to (b) His name was Peter Turreau, in Latin Turrellus. See the Remarks [B] and [C].

[B] He had not been above ſix years at Dijon, when he was choſen to teach a form there.] Beza was not ill informed with regard to this particular. He was firſt, ſays he (4), a teacher at Dijon under Peter Turreau, who paſſed for one of the greateſt Soothſayers in his time.

(4) Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſiaſtique, liv. 2. pag. 80.

[C] He met very ſoon with an opportunity to diſplay his wit and genius in a full Audience.] We have ſeen juſt now that Peter Turreau paſſed for a great Soothſayer. He was proſecuted for it, and was in danger of being condemned as guilty of a crime committed both againſt the Laws of God, and thoſe of men. Turellus præceptor impietatis accuſaretur, quod contra jura canonica & civilia, contraque ſacras literas ex Aſtris fata hominibus eventura prædicere diceretur (5). That is, "Turreau was accuſed of impiety, becauſe it was ſaid, "that he told people their fortune by the Stars, againſt "the Canon and civil Laws, and againſt the holy "Scriptures." Caſtellanus full of gratitude for his Maſter, pleaded his cauſe with ſo much ſtrength, that he was acquitted. He diſcourſed with a great deal of learning and eloquence upon Aſtrology, and the divinations depending upon it; he ſhewed that ſome are very innocent, and ſome very criminal; but that Turreau did not meddle with the latter. This is the ſubſtance of his plea in Gallandius. Caſtellanus's youth rendred his diſcourſe more worthy of admiration, and no doubt but the Judges imagined, they ought to have a very great regard for the extraordinary merit of ſuch an Advocate. Ipſe ſingulari pietate præditus, calore juvenili effervescens, veluti egregius ciconiæ parenti nutritia perſolvens pullus, defenſionem ſui præceptoris profeſſus ad Judicum ſubſellia laureatus acceſſit (6). . . Quem ita diſſerentem incomparabili quadam eloquentia & animi magna incitatione cum audiviſſent Judices, qui ad ſævitiam inflammati, ut ferè fit in rebus, quæ ad religionem ſpectant, ad damnandum reum ad tribunal venerant, ita ſtupentes & attoniti redditi ſunt, ut vix verbum ullum proloqui poſſent. . . Ita eo perorante & vultu & animo immutati ſunt, ut non modo de abſolutione Turrelli, ſed etiam de adoleſcente generoſo & diſerto laude & præmio ornando cogitarent. Inter quos cum ſederet Boudetus Lingonenſis antiſtes, homo doctus, advocatis aliquot Theologis, adoleſcentem non vulgariter laudavit, & honorario munere donatum dimiſit. i. e. "He, who had a very great re- "gard for his Maſter, and was animated with a youth- "ful eagerneſs, as a noble young ſtork, which feeds "his dam, undertook to plead the cauſe of his Ma- "ſter, and came before the Bench of the Judges his "head crowned with laurels. . . . He pleaded with ſo "incomparable an eloquence and with ſo much zeal, "that they, who being inclined to ſeverity, as it ge- "nerally happens in ſuch affairs as relate to Religion, "were come to the Court with an intention to con- "demn the priſoner, were ſo ſurprized and aſtoniſhed, "that they could not ſpeak a word. . . His diſcourſe "changed their countenance and their reſolution to ſuch "a degree, that they not only reſolved to quit Tur- "reau, but alſo to honour the noble and eloquent "youth with praiſes and rewards. Amongſt the "Judges ſate Boudet Biſhop of Langres, a learned "man, who having adviſed with ſome Divines, not "only beſtowed uncommon praiſes on the young man, "but even made him an honourable preſent."

(5) Gallandus, in Vita Caſtell. pag. 13.

(6) Idem, ibid.

(7) Idem. pag. 18, 19.

[D] He ſtopt at Baſil to continue with Eraſmus.] Beza was not unacquainted with this journey of Caſtellanus, but it ſeems he has been miſtaken as to the time of it; he thought that Caſtellanus did not go to Baſil but after he had ſtudied the Law at Bourges under Andrew Alciat, whereas he ſhould have ſaid that he went to ſtudy the Law at Bourges after his journey to Baſil. From Bourges he went to ſtudy at Baſil, where he made ſome progreſs in Philoſophy and in Divinity, living with Sebaſtian Munſter the Rector (8). This is not at all mentioned in his Life; on the contrary, it is obſerved there, that he left Baſil, when the Catholic Religion was exploded thence, and after he had openly preached againſt a ſeditious Miniſter. Secuta Baſileæ & aliis in Germaniæ locis tragica e templis imaginum exturbatione, & variis de Religione tumultibus exortis, cum Eraſmum, Baſilea relicta, Friburgum proficiſcentem animadverteret, ipſe quoque (poſtquam publicè concionatorem ſtudioſum confutaſſet) in quietiora paratioraque loca demigrare ſtatuit (9). i. e. "The images hav- "ing afterwards been miſerably thrown out of the "Temples at Baſil, and in other places of Germany, "and ſeveral tumults having been raiſed on the ac- "count of Religion, Caſtellan finding that Eraſ- "mus was going to leave Baſil and to retire to Fri- "burg, he alſo (after he had publickly confuted a ſe- "ditious Preacher) reſolved to retire to a more quiet "place." If it could be ſaid, that Caſtellanus went twice to Baſil, it would reconcile the oppoſite accounts of Gallandius and Beza. There is a Letter from Eraſmus to Caſtellanus (10), which ſeems to favour the opinion of thoſe, who would think that the latter was twice at Baſil. He had been there before the Roman Catholic Religion was quite exploded thence, which happened in the year 1529. Gallandius aſſerts it; and he was there in the year 1531, as may be concluded, it ſeems, from the Letter, which Eraſmus wrote to him from Friburg September the 14th, after the printing of his Apophthegms. Now the Dedication of that Work is dated February the 26th 1531, and the Letter of Eraſmus, which I mentioned, contains the Author's thanks for the praiſes, which Caſtellanus had beſtowed upon him in a Letter on account of theſe Apophthegms: it follows therefore, that Eraſmus's Letter could not have been written before the month of September 1531. That letter ſhews, that Caſtellanus lived then, not far from Friburg; it mentions ſome partridges, which Caſtellanus had ſent to Eraſmus (11); it teſtifies that Caſtellanus would be very welcome whenever he would go and eat a fowl with Eraſmus. Si tantus eſt amor in me tuus, ornatiſſime juvenis, ut juvet etiam cum umbra colloqui, iſtius quidem voluptatis ſcito tibi paratam fore copiam, quoties erit commodum. Quod ſi quando poſſis iſtam ſi non tragicam, certe ſplendidam perſonam, quam tibi fortuna impoſuit deponere, & uno Claudio Alberico velut Achate comitatus ad pullum ſimul lacerandum, venire familiariter, aut etiam invocatus, ſi libet, obrepere, quemadmodum Naſica ſolet Ennio, juvaret interdum tali contubernio repubeſcere. i. e. "If you love me ſo much, moſt accompliſh'd youth, "that you delight to converſe even with a ſhadow, you "may have that pleaſure, whenever you will be at lei- "ſure. And if you can caſt off that, if not awful, yet ma- "jeſtic air, with which fortune endowed you, and "come freely with Claudius Albericus as with a faith- "ful Achates, to eat a chicken together, or even ſteal "upon us without being invited, as Naſica does in "Ennius, I ſhould be glad to grow young again by ſuch "a gueſt as you are." All this might very well intimate that Caſtellanus lived then at Baſil, in which caſe Beza was not miſtaken. Another Letter dated February the 7th 1532 (12) informs us, that Caſtellanus had met with a Biſhop, for his patron, and that he

(8) Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſ. liv. 2. pag. 80.

(9) Gallandius, in Vita Caſtellani. pag. 21.

(10) It is the 23d of the 27th book.

(11) De perdicibus jam iterum miſſis habeo gratiam. Eraſm. Epiſt. 23. lib. 27. pag. 1516.

(12) Septimo Idus Februarii, MDXXXI, juxta veſtram ſupputationem. Eraſm. Epiſt 24. lib. 26. pag. 1437.

to Frobenius, who took him to correct the proof-ſheets of the Greek and Latin Authors, which he printed (c). This was alſo an advantage for Eraſmus, who by Caſtellanus's advice corrected ſeveral errors, which otherwiſe would have remained in his works [E]. They left Baſil together, when the Roman Religion was entirely aboliſhed there. Eraſmus retired to Friburg; and Caſtellanus returned into France; he deſigned to take a journey to Italy, when he was deſired by ſome perſons of Dijon, to be Tutor to ſome young ſcholars, whom their relations deſigned to ſend to Bourges, to ſtudy the Law under the famous Alciat. They, who begged this favour of Caſtellanus, were the chief Members of the Parliament of Burgundy; he granted their requeſt, but as the young men were not yet ready to be committed to his care, he employed himſelf in the mean time in two things of a very different nature; he read publick Lectures upon the Greek Text of St. Paul's Epiſtle to the Romans, and made love in private to his landlord's daughter; or to ſpeak more properly, that girl, who was very beautiful, courted and tempted him to ſuch a degree, that he could not reſiſt her dangerous allurement. When he perceived that ſhe was with child, he told it her mother, begged her pardon, and humbly deſired her to do her beſt endeavours, that her daughter might be delivered ſo ſecretly, that no body might hear of it. The kind mother complied with his requeſt, and managed the whole affair with ſo much diſcretion and prudence, that even her huſband heard nothing of it. A year after this girl was brought to bed, ſhe was married to a man of her own rank, and given for a pure virgin [F]. As for the boy of which ſhe was (c) Eum Frobenio commendavit, atque ut honeſto loco & ſtipendio ſibi in emendandis Græcis Latiniſque exemplaribus adjutor eſſet, effecit. Gallandius, in Vita Petri Caſtellani, pag. 20.

he had wrote to Eraſmus, he would ſoon leave Paris. This Biſhop was no doubt the ſame with him whom Gallandius mentions; he was of the family of the Tonnerre's, and Biſhop elect of Poitiers. Caſtellanus had taught him polite Literature at Bourges, and accompanied him afterwards to Paris. Utebatur familiariter Comite Tonorienſi, Epiſcopo Pictavienſi deſignato, qui tum in eodem legum ſtudio Alciato quoque operam dabat, quem etiam politioris doctrinæ literas Græcas & Latinas ſubceſivis horis docebat. . . Percurſo legum veluti ſtudio cum eo Epiſcopo Lutetiam reverſus (13). i. e. "He was an "intimate friend of the Count de Tonnerres, Biſhop "elect of Poitiers, who ſtudied then alſo the Law "under Alciat. Caſtellanus taught him polite Lite-"rature at his leiſure hours . . and having gone thro' "his ſtudies of the Law, he returned with him to "Paris." The difficulty is, that we cannot meet in Peter Gallandius's account with any vacant time, in which this ſecond journey to Baſil can be placed, after Caſtellanus had finiſhed his ſtudies at Bourges. For from Bourges Gallandius ſends his friend to Paris with the Biſhop elect; then he makes him go to Rome with a Biſhop of Auxerre. Let us obſerve that we find, from two Letters of Eraſmus to Caſtellanus, that they both wrote a very bad hand. Eraſmus ſeems to be very ſorry, that he did not make a better uſe of Caſtellanus's aſſiſtance, whilſt they were together, but Caſtellanus was very well ſatisfied with Eraſmus's kindneſs and civility to him. Quod mihi ſubinde occinis, comitatem, humanitatem, atque etiam merita neſcio quæ in te mea, uſque adeo nihil eorum agnoſco, ut me mei pudeat, quoties mecum reputo quam parvam habuerim, quum apud nos eſſes, tuæ dignitatis rationem. Sed ita eſt hominum ingenium, præſentem virtutem, ſi non odimus, ut ait Flaccus, certe negligimus, ſublatam ex oculis quærimus invidi, aut ſi minus invidi, certe incogitantes. Quo magis admiror ſingularem iſtius ingenii candorem, qui toties prædices humanitatem meam, cujus Scythicam inhumanitatem merito poſſes incuſare: neque gravabor hanc culpam ſarcire pro viribus, ſi vel ſeſe dederit occaſio, vel tu ſubmonueris quibus in rebus tibi poſſim commodare (14). i. e. "You mention very often my civility and kindneſs "to you, and even my good offices; but all this is ſo "unknown to me, that I am aſhamed, when I think, "how little regard I had for your merit, when "you was at my houſe. But this is the genius of "men; virtue, when preſent, is, if not hated, yet "deſpiſed by us, as Horace ſays, and when abſent, "we enquire after it out of envy, or if not out of "envy, at leaſt without much reflection. Wherefore "I ſo much more wonder at your candor, for ſo much "commending my civility to you, whereas you might "juſtly upbraid me with a ſavage rudeneſs. I would "be glad to make amends for it, if any opportunity "offers, or if you would yourſelf hint to me in what "I can ſerve you."

(13) Galland. in Vita Caſtell. pag. 25.

(14) Eraſm. Epiſt. 24. lib. 26. pag. 1436.

[E] By Caſtellanus's advice Eraſmus corrected ſeveral errors, which otherwiſe would have remained in his work.] Eraſmus's railleries againſt the French raiſed ſuch an emulation in Peter Caſtellanus, that he ſtudied the Greek Tongue and Divinity and all parts of Literature, day and night. With ſuch an application, together with his genius and natural talents, he could not but acquire a great deal of learning, by which he ſoon diſcovered, that Eraſmus was not extremely well ſkilled in the Greek Tongue. Beſides Eraſmus ſpent ſo little time in the compoſing of his Books, that he could not but commit ſome blunders. It was a happineſs for him, that his works went thro' the hands of ſo learned a Corrector as Caſtellanus was. Hic Juvenis Eraſmicæ Gloriæ emulatione, & ejus falſis in ingenia Gallica, quibus parum in literis tribuebat, cavillationibus incenſus, noctes & dies in Græcarum Literarum, Theologiæque atque omnis humanioris doctrinæ commentatione ita verſabatur, ut Eraſmum ſatis præcipitanter commentantem (15), & e Græco non probe intellecta in Latinum ſermonem male vertentem, frequenter ſuorum erratorum admoneret. Quæ ille, qui plurimum Caſtellani opera uteretur, cum agnoſcere, atque emendare ejus admonitu cogeretur, plurimum illi tribuebat atque deferebat. Memini Caſtellanum mihi frequenter dicere, Eraſmum in literis Græcis ſupra vulgus tum parum promoviſſe, in auctoribus, qui ab uſu communi remoti eſſent, inſigniter hæſitaſſe. Itaque quæ ex illis vertebat aut commentabatur, majore ex parte adjuvantibus doctis, qui ei hanc operam navabant, præſtitiſſe (16).

(15) See above, the Article BUDEUS, Quotation (61).

(16) Gallandius, in Vita Caſtell. pag. 20.

[F] His landlord's daughter . . . courted him, . . was with child, . . . was married, ... and given for a pure virgin.] The queſtion is, whether the next day, the huſband agreed, that Agar was very much in the right to ſay, that there are three things which are wonderful, yea four which I know not, the way of an Eagle in the air, the way of a ſerpent upon a rock, the way of a ſhip in the midſt of the ſea, and the way of a man with a maid (17). Who knows, but in the enjoyment he repeated to himſelf the following lines of Lucretius?

(17) Proverb. 18, 19.

Avia Pieridum peragro loca nullius ante
Trita ſolo; juvat integros accedere fontes,
Atque haurire, juvatque novos decerpere flores,
Inſignemque meo capiti petere inde coronam,
Unde prius nulli velarint tempora Muſæ (18).

(18) Lucret. lib. 4. init. Compare this with the Rem non novam, of the Remark [B] in the Article BULGARUS.

Laſtly, who knows but ſome ſkilful Anatomiſt had forewarned him againſt all events, by ſome diſcourſe like this? Gentlemen, if you meet with no obſtacle in your paſſage, if the victory be not bloody, yet you ought not to have the leaſt ſuſpicion to the advantage of your ſpouſes. Believe me, in ſuch an occaſion, as in many others, a pleaſing error is better than a diſagreeable truth. This is what the Sieur Lami told his audience in a Lecture on Anatomy (19).

(19) Lami, Diſcourſ. Anatom. pag. m. 89.

Somebody may perhaps imagine, that it is not at all probable, Gallandius ſhould have ſaid, that Caſtellanus his friend got his landlord's own daughter with child; for it ſeems that this landlord was the father of Caſtellanus's diſciple, in which caſe the crime would have been ſo heinous, that the Hiſtorian would certainly have paſſed it over in ſilence, not to expoſe his friend's reputation. I ſhall therefore tranſcribe was delivered, Caſtellanus's brother took it, and educated it as his own ſon. The time for conducting the young ſcholars to Bourges being come, Caſtellanus accompanied them thither, and ſtudied the Law, in which he made a conſiderable progreſs; yet he was not ſo much taken up with that kind of ſtudy, but he could ſpare time to apply himſelf alſo to the Belles-Lettres. His application and diligence were very ſurpriſing [G]. He ſtill deſired to ſee Italy, and had ſoon an opportunity to ſatisfy himſelf; for the Biſhop of Auxerre, who was going Embaſſador into Italy, would have him accompany him in the quality of a learned man belonging to him. He did not make a long ſtay at Rome, where nothing almoſt pleaſed him, but the remains of Antiquity [H]: he went to Venice, and found an employment fit for him in the capital City of the Iſland of Cyprus. The Biſhop and the inhabitants of that City were enquiring for a man who underſtood Greek and Latin, and could teach polite Literature: they offered Caſtellanus a penſion of two hundred crowns; he accepted it, and read Lectures in their City for two years with great ſucceſs; ſo that they were very ſorry when he left them to go into Egypt. He here the words of the original, that I may not be thought to have put a falſe ſenſe upon them. Verſabatur in ædibus honorati & primarii cujuſdam civis, cui puella erat forma admodum venuſta & eleganti, a qua frequenter multis illecebris ad amores & voluptatem invitabatur. Itaque etſi ea erat virtutis & continentiæ indole, ut . . . tantis tamen puellæ blandimentis, quibus non modo adoleſcentia lubrica, verum etiam ætas corroborata caperetur, captus, eam gravidam reddidit. Quod ubi cognovit, nihil antiquius ducens quàm ut cui juvenili cupiditate incenſus ſtuprum obtulerat, citra ignominiam, quantum fieri poſſet, conſuleret, ſenili quadam prudentia ad matrem acceſſit, culpam confeſſus, & veniam precatus, per omnia ſacra rogare cæpit honeſta aliqua occaſione, in eum locum filiam abduceret, ubi citra infamiæ notam clam parere, & citra turpitudinis ſuſpiciones in ædes paternas reduci poſſet. Quod ita matris prudentia adminiſtratum eſt, ut non modo alios, ſed & patrem ipſum flagitium latuerit, & anno poſtquam puella enixa eſt, in matrimonium honeſtiſſime collocata ſit (20). You ſee that Gallandius very plainly hints, that Caſtellanus lodged at the girl's father's; for if he meant only, that Caſtellanus viſited her often, the expreſſion he makes uſe of (21), would have been at leaſt improper, becauſe it might be underſtood in a manner very diſhonourable to Caſtellanus. It is a phraſe, of which the moſt natural, moſt common and moſt reaſonable ſenſe, is that which I put upon it; it leads us directly to a notion, which aggravates Caſtellanus's crime, tho' his Hiſtorian has carefully avoided to make uſe of any expreſſion, which might intimate that Caſtellanus was a domeſtic tutor in the family of his miſtreſs. I own that on the other hand, it would be more difficult to excuſe him, if he had not lived under the ſame roof with her; for in that caſe, he would have ſought himſelf for the opportunities, which he ought to have avoided; but living in the ſame houſe with his fair tempter, the opportunities offered whether he would or not. The Author of his life thinks, that he acted very prudently, in the care he took to ſave the girl's reputation. Quæ tanta in conſulendo honori puellæ prudentia, & tegendo flagitio induſtria me adduxit, ut ne hanc quidem adoleſcentiæ labem ſilentio prætereundam eſſe exiſtimaverim (22). i. e. "His great prudence "in taking care of the girl's reputation, and his "pains in hiding the crime, made me think, "that I ought not to omit this fault of his younger "years." But there is nothing in all this, that deſerves the leaſt commendation. He ſhould have begun, with acquainting the mother not with her daughter's being with child, but with the girl's bad inclination; otherwiſe it was doing like thoſe, of whom it is truly ſaid, that they act and then they think. It happened luckily for Caſtellanus, that Beza, and the other writers on the Proteſtant ſide, knew nothing of this ſtory.

(20) Galland. in Vita Caſtell. pag. 21, 22.

(21) Verſari in ædibus.

(22) Galland. in Vita Caſtell. pag. 23.

[G] His application and diligence were very ſurprizing.] He ſlept ſcarce three hours a night; he uſed to lay himſelf down on the ground without any other pillow but his night-gown, in which he wrapped up his head; and as ſoon as he waked, he run with the utmoſt eagerneſs to his Books. In vain did his friends adviſe him not to apply himſelf ſo much; he would not hearken to ſuch advice (23). When he was made reader to the King, he again ſtudied with the ſame application, and that he might have more time to ſpare for his ſtudies, he never dined, but took a piece of bread at eight in the morning, and ſupped at five of the clock in the afternoon. He waited upon the King when he went to bed, and did not retire till the King was aſleep. Then he went to reſt four hours for the utmoſt, and then ſtudied without interruption till ten of the clock, when the King uſed to go to his Devotion. Hanc perſonam ubi tanti Regis judicio & voluntate ſibi impoſitam eſſe vidit, noctes & dies, veluti Prometheus Caucaſo, ſe rurſum libris affixit, nullum non auctorum genus in omnibus linguis ita manibus pervolutavit, ut in ſingulis totam vitam contriviſſe quivis etiam exercitatiſſimus eum diceret (24). i. e. "When he ſaw "this place conferred upon him by the judgment, and "good pleaſure of ſo great a King, he again fixed him-"ſelf to his Books day and night, as Prometheus on "the Caucaſus, and ſtudied all kinds of Authors with "ſo much application, that even the moſt learned "men would have thought that he ſpent all his life "upon every ſingle one of them." Tres ipſe horas, quatuor ad ſummum dormiebat, quibus exactis nocte intempeſta, excitatus in horam decimam, donec Rex Sacris operaretur, in literarum ſtudia indefeſſus incumbebat (25).

(23) Ibid. pag. 25.

(24) Idem, ibid. pag. 41.

(25) Idem, ibid. pag. 42.

[H] He did not make a long ſtay at Rome, where nothing almoſt pleaſed him, but the remains of antiquity (26).] The corruption of morals he obſerved at the Court of Rome, ſcandalized him to ſuch a degree, that even ſeveral years afterwards, he could not think nor ſpeak of it, without the utmoſt concern. He went ſo far, as to believe, that at Rome Religion was nothing but a mere ſhew, which ſerved only to impoſe upon mankind, and to keep up the authority of the Pope. Calvin did not go much farther; Calvin, I ſay, who has been ſo much inſulted, and treated as a Calumniator for having wrote the following words. The firſt article of their ſecret Theology, he ſpeaks of the Popes and the Cardinals, which is admitted amongſt them, is that there is no God. The ſecond, that all that is written or preached concerning Jeſus Chriſt is nothing but untruth and deceit. The third, that what the Scriptures teach of eternal life and the reſurrection of the body, are mere fables (27). Compare this with the following paſſage from Caſtellanus's life, and you will not find a great difference between theſe two paſſages. Memini eum aliquando, cum Pontificum Romanorum ſupinas libidines, avaritiam & rapacitatem, religionis contemptum, ſuperbiamque Cardinalium, luxum, ignaviam, nundinationeſque, cauponationes, & flagitia reliqua aulicorum Romanenſium deſcriberet, & cætera, quæ tunc vidiſſet commemoraret, ita animo concitari, & indignatione commoveri conſueviſſe, ut ei non modo in facie color, ſed & toto corpore geſtus motuſque immutarentur; ut etiam mihi frequenter diceret, ſibi eſſe perſuaſiſſimum, ne Pontifices quidem Romanos, Religionis & ſacrorum antiſtites, tot ſuis ſuorumque flagitiis ſceleribuſque contaminatos, vere & ex animo Chriſtum colere, quæ autem in Religione facerent, retinendæ dominationis cauſa, veluti larva ad fallendum appoſita, egregiè ſimulare (28). i. e. "I remember, that ſometimes when he deſcribed the "lewdneſs, avarice, and extorſions of the Popes, the "haughtineſs of the Cardinals and their contempt "for Religion, the luxury, indolence, trading, ſimony, "and the other crimes of the Roman Courtiers, with "the other diſorders he had obſerved in that city, "he uſed to be in ſuch a paſſion, and ſo full of indigna-"tion, that not only his face, but even all the motions "and the whole geſture of his body were altered. He "uſed often to tell me, that he was firmly perſuaded the "Popes

(26) Cum omnia fere, præter Antiquitatis veſtigia quædam improbaret. Galland. Vita Caſtell. pag. 27.

(27) Inſtitut. liv. 4. chap. 7. num. 27. Quoted by Jean Hay, Défenſe des Demandes, pag. m. 27.

(28) Galland. in Vita Caſtell. pag. 27.

He travelled through that country like a man of ſenſe, for by his obſervations he qualified himſelf to ſpeak of every thing that concerned Egypt, as though he had lived there all his life-time. Having been told, that the Sieur de la Forêt his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty's Embaſſador at Conſtantinople treated the French there with the utmoſt kindneſs, he had a mind to ſee that City; and in his journey thither he ſtaid two months at Jeruſalem. Monſieur de la Forêt conceived a very great eſteem for him, and recommended him effectually to Francis I, and to ſeveral Lords of the French Court. Cardinal Du Bellai, and ſome other Noblemen recommended him to the ſame Prince as a very learned man; and Caſtellanus himſelf confirmed the teſtimonies they had given of him in the converſations he had with the King, with which the King was ſo well pleaſed, that whilſt he was at dinner or at ſupper, he made Caſtellanus diſcourſe to him of a thouſand different things [I]. Some time after he made him his Reader, which place had been filled before by Colin [K], who fell under his Majeſty's diſgrace. This obliged Caſtellanus to ſtudy more than ever, in order to make himſelf more capable to anſwer all his maſter's queſtions, who was a great lover of the Belles-Lettres. He read him to ſleep every night, by explaining to him ſome paſſages of the Ancients (d); he alſo ſpent ſome hours in inſtructing Princeſs Margaret that Prince's daughter. He employed the favour he enjoyed for the good and improvement of the Sciences, and cauſed ſome very good regulations to be made to the advantage of the Profeſſors, and to the improvement of the King's Library. It is aſſerted in his life, that he laboured very much for ſupporting the Catholic Religion againſt thoſe, that would perſuade the King of France to ſhake off the yoak of the Pope; not but that he was ſenſible as much as any body elſe, that the Church wanted to be reformed; but he foreſaw, that if Francis I ſeemed to be in the leaſt remiſs and indifferent with regard to the Innovators, they would arrive to ſuch a pitch of audaciouſneſs, as to overthrow every thing, and to involve the State in the deſtruction of Popery. He thought therefore that it was proper to indulge the inquiſitors and accuſers a little [L], though it often happened that they accuſed innocent perſons. On the other hand he did not approve of capital puniſhments, and even involved himſelf in ſome

(d) Franciſco Regi ad quietem ſe comparanti, Latinas Græcaſque Hiſtorias & Tragœdiai od verbum pene vertens interpretabatur, & dormitu-rienti aſſidens inter legendum præclari alicujus loci ſententiæve explicatione, tanquam emodulata Pythagoreorum muſica, eum ad quietem tranquillam deterſis curis omnibus & perturbationibus componebat. Galland. in vita Caſtell. pag. 42.

" Popes of Rome, and the Prelates, men guilty of " ſuch heinous crimes did not truly and from their heart " believe in Chriſt, but that all their religious perfor- " mances were nothing but pageantry, artfully calcu- " lated to impoſe upon the world, and to keep up " their authority." See what I quote from Eraſmus in the Remark [GG] of the Article of CALVIN.

[I] Francis I made him diſcourſe of a thouſand different things.] Caſtellanus was not only very well ſkilled in Polite Literature, but he alſo ſpoke with a very good grace, ſo that he was always heard with a great deal of pleaſure and attention, whenever he diſcourſed upon the queſtions which Francis I propoſed to him. Prandenti Regi fere ſemper aſtabat; & ad ea quæ in percontando ab eo proponebantur, ſic reſpondere ſolitus erat, ut facile quivis naris non obeſæ, eum omnia ingenio ſummo, acerrimis ſtudiis, atque uſu maximo cognita & perſpecta habere judicaſſet. Huc acceſſerat vocis ea lenitas, vultus geſtuſque compoſiti decor, & ſermonis comitas, elegantia & gratia, ut quod de Pericle prodidit Eupolis, Pitho quandam flexaminam in ejus labris ſeſſitare homines putarent. Itaque quoties diſſerebat, Regem, ſilentibus aliis omnibus, in eum oculos conjicere, ex ejus ore veluti auribus ſuſpenſum pendere, & ſingula verba ab eo emiſſa tanquam oracula probare animad-vertiſſet (29). i. e. " He always almoſt waited upon the King, " when he was at dinner, and anſwered his Majeſty's " queſtions in ſuch a manner, that men not of the loweſt " capacity might eaſily underſtand, that he was perfect- " ly well acquainted with the things he ſpoke of, " by his ſublime genius, cloſe ſtudies, and great expe- " rience. Add to this, the ſweetneſs of his voice, " his agreeable look and decent geſtures, the eaſineſs, " elegance, and gracefulneſs of his ſtile, which was " ſuch, that what was ſaid of Pericles by Eupolis, " could be applied to him, that he had ſome perſuad- " ing Muſe ſitting upon his lips: ſo that whenever " he ſpoke, all were ſilent about him, and the King " himſelf liſtened to him with the utmoſt attention, " and ſeemed to approve every word he ſpoke as " ſo many oracles." The very firſt converſation he had with the King pleaſed his Majeſty extremely (30); and becauſe ſome perſons of note were become very jealous of him, and endeavoured to put him out of countenance, and to prevent his gaining the King's favour by his fine diſcourſes, the King bid the Dauphin to tell him, that he muſt not mind any body's threatnings, but continue to ſpeak with courage and freedom. Cumque eſſent, qui ejus felicitati invidentes, ſilentium ei imperare contenderent, atque ab hoc de rebus omnibus apud Regem dicendi inſtituto deterrere pararent, per filium natu maximum Delphinum Rex ipſe eum hortatus eſt, ut intrepidè & conſtanter ad ſuam menſam loqueretur, neque cujuſquam interpellatione aut minis de ſententia deduceretur (31).

(29) Ibid. pag. 42.

(30) De variis rebus diſſerentem & ſermocinantem avidiſſimis auribus Rex inter cænandum & prandendum eum audiret, & repudiatis aliorum opinionibus in ejus ſententiam deſcenderet. Galland. in vita Caſtell. pag. 38.

(31) Galland. in Vita Caſtell. pag. 39.

[K] The King made him his Reader, which place had been filled before by Colin.] Gallandius pretends (32), that Colin made himſelf odious by his diſcourſes, which cauſed ſome diſturbances; and that as on the one hand his enemies recommended Caſtellanus, and on the other hand that young man's own merit ſpoke in his favour, Colin was diſmiſſed, and Caſtellanus put in his place, tho' he never thought of ſuch a poſt, and had choſen ſome preferment in the army rather than in the Church. Beza relates this affair otherwiſe; he ſays, that Caſtellanus went to wait on James Colin, then Reader in ordinary to Francis I, and that it pleaſed God that Colin ſhould preſent Caſtellanus to the King, who loved to hear men of ſenſe talk when he ſat at table, and eſpecially ſuch as could learn him ſomething new (33). The conſequence was, that Caſtellanus ſupplanted Colin, and continued in favour with the King till his death. Another Author relates, that Colin and Caſtellanus happened to diſpute one day before the King, upon ſomething, Colin quoted the authority of books, and Caſtellanus talked as an eye-witneſs, and proved that the Authors quoted by Colin were miſtaken. This gained Caſtellanus the King's favour in ſuch a manner, that he was ordered to ſtay at Court, and was afterwards promoted to the Biſhoprick of Tulle. Narrat Petrus a Sancto Juliano in præfatione ad Hiſtoriam Burgundionum, cum incidiſſet quæſtio quædam inter eum & Caſtellanum, coram Franciſco primo, Colinuſque librorum auctoritate tantum uteretur, Caſtellanus vero, qui rem, de qua agebatur, etiam oculis uſurparat, ſua auctoritate teſtibuſque approbaſſet vera his libris non contineri, tantum hinc iſtum gratiam aſſecutum eſſe apud Regem, ut in Aula manere juſſus ſit, indeque Epiſcopatu Tutelenſi donatum (34). A man is the worſe for recommending a more able perſon than himſelf; I do not doubt but Caſtellanus did a great prejudice to Colin, either without any deſign, or in the manner Beza relates it.

(32) Ibid. pag. 40.

(33) Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſ. liv. 2. pag. 80.

(34) Baluzius, Not. ad Vitam Petri Caſtellani, pag. 147.

[L] He thought . . . it was proper to indulge the inquiſitors and accuſers a little.] He knew that there were in the Roman Catholic Church, a great many ſlanderers, who out of hatred, jealouſy, ambition, or covetouſneſs, perſecuted innocent perſons, by charging them falſly with being Lutherans: but he thought that ſuch accuſers deſerved to be ſupported, tho' their ſuſpicions ſome difficulties, for having interceded in behalf of ſome pretended Heretics, who, it was reported, were to be put to death (e). His zeal for maintaining the rights of Epiſcopacy againſt the pretenſions of the Court of Rome, rendered him odious on the other ſide of the Alps; and the Sorbonne was extremely diſpleaſed at him, for the protection he granted to Robert Stephens [M]. He was the occaſion of the Aſſembly held at Melun (f), in which ſome Prelates, and ſome Doctors of Divinity prepared inſtructions for thoſe who were to be ſent to the Council of Trent. He never appeared more eloquent, grave and majeſtic, than when he prepared Francis I for death, and when he delivered the Funeral Oration of that Prince [N]. I forgot to obſerve, that he was promoted to the Biſhoprick of Tulle, and afterwards to that of Mâcon. He intended to retire from buſineſs after the death of Francis I, but Henry II would have him continue to attend the Court, as he had done before, and as ſoon as the place of Great Almoner became vacant, he conferred it upon him. This is a very important poſt, and may enable a man to do an infinite deal of good, when it is filled up by a perſon, who knows and practiſes all that ſuch a poſt requires of him. This is what our Caſtellanus did; and with regard to the good uſes he made of the money, of which he had the diſpoſal, we muſt not omit to mention what he did concerning the lewd women [O]. He reſigned the Biſhoprick

(e) He appeaſed the King's anger againſt the Waldenſes befose the ſlaughter of Cabrieres and Merindol. Vita Caſtell. pag. 6. and he once delivered Dolet out of priſon. Ibid. pag. 62.

(f) In the year 1545. See the laſt Remark.

ſuſpicions were ill-grounded. For, ſaid he, they who are falſly accuſed, get themſelves acquitted, and they who are guilty cannot be puniſhed, if they are not accuſed. He quoted to that purpoſe a paſſage from Tully (35), whence he concluded, that in order to deter the bold innovators, it was neceſſary to protect and encourage the dogs, that barked after them. Neque fieri poſſe, quin in factione quoque diverſa calumniatores eſſent, qui odio, invidia, vel nimio ſtudio ſuas opes & dignitates retinendi potius, quam pietatis affectu, bonos aliquando viros pro Lutheranis perſequerentur; ferendos tamen eſſe, quoties in ſuſpicione a qua etiam crimen abeſſet, ſuſpectos in judicium vocarent. Quod ſi innocentes eſſent accuſati, abſolvi poſſent. Condemnari autem nocentes, niſi accuſarentur, non poſſent. Quam ad rem locum illum ex Cicerone pro Roſcio de canibus Capitolinis adducebat, ut illos olim, cum fures internoſcere non poſſent, recte latratu appetere ſolitos eſſe, quicunque noctu Capitolium ingreſſi eſſent; ita metu lymphaticorum quorundam comprimeretur audacia, quoties moribus & longo uſu in Eccleſia recepta privata auctoritate abrogarent, aut ſeditioſe damnarent, latratores, à quibus appeterentur, Reipublicæ cauſa favore proſequendos eſſe (36). The paſſage quoted from Tully is in his oration pro Sex. Roſcio Amerino, in which he ſays, that tho' dogs cannot diſtinguiſh thieves from honeſt men, yet their barking at every body is uſeful, to alarm the people, and make them be upon their guard. Thus it is the intereſt of the State to encourage accuſers, in order to deter thoſe who would diſturb the public tranquillity by endeavouring to alter thoſe uſes and cuſtoms, which have long prevailed in the Church. This is the ſenſe of the latter part of the paſſage we have juſt now quoted. It cannot be denied, but the maxim here laid down by Caſtellanus, may be of ſome uſe for the public good, eſpecially when the State is diſturbed by parties, tumults, and ſeditions. But it is certain on the other hand, that this maxim may give occaſion to a thouſand unjuſt actions. We muſt lament the fate of men, and the fatal neceſſity there is of ſacrificing on ſo many occaſions the rights of private perſons to the public good. The reputation and innocence of a whole family are but too often the prey of a ſuſpicious or wicked accuſer. It would be juſt to make ſuch an accuſer undergo an exemplary puniſhment either for his raſhneſs, or for his malice; but the public good requires that ſuch men ſhould be ſuffered to bark on againſt every body, and that they ſhould go unpuniſhed, when they happened to miſtake the innocent for the guilty. This keeps the malecontents in awe; and it is better to accuſe ten times without reaſon, than to omit once accuſing thoſe who deſerve it. This is the reaſon why ſo many honeſt men are neglected, whilſt wicked men enjoy the greateſt credit. An honeſt man ſcorns to be a ſpy and an informer; whereas a wicked man is glad of the employment, and thus makes himſelf uſeful and often neceſſary. However that be, you ſee what was Caſtellanus's reaſon for ſparing thoſe unjuſt informers, who blaſted the reputation of ſo many innocent perſons. The good of the Church required, that there ſhould be dogs, to bark not only at heretics, but at all thoſe, who became obnoxious by their moderation and tolerating ſpirit. Caſtellanus is not the only perſon, who admitted that principle.

(35) See above, Quotation (9) of the Article St. BERNARD.

(36) Gallandius, in Vita Caſtell. pag. 58.

[M] The Sorbonne was .... diſpleaſed at him, for the protection he granted to Robert Stephens.] His protection did not laſt long enough; for he ſuffered himſelf to be carried away by the torrent of the Sorboniſts, and gave Robert Stephens up to them. Stephens complained of it after this manner. Immediately after, as tho' he had been hurried by a kind of madneſs, he made him a prey to the Divines, whom he had defended againſt ſuch furies, by an inſtinct from God rather than thro' any true and real kindneſs. It was in hopes of getting a Cardinal's cap, that he ſubmitted to them without reaſon, and in ſo ſervile a manner, for he hated them from his heart (37). Caſtellanus altered his mind ſoon after, and was ſorry that ſuch a learned man ſhould be oppreſſed, and forced to retire into another country (38). We may wonder at the fate of Caſtellanus; he was himſelf ſuſpected of being a Lutheran, becauſe he underſtood Greek and Hebrew, and alſo, becauſe he did not like the cruelty of the inquiſitors, and condemned ſome abuſes in the Church; and when he undertook to perſecute others, in order to clear himſelf from the ſuſpicions that were entertained of him, it was pretended, that he perſecuted only out of ambition. Gallandius himſelf acquaints us with all this. A quibuſdam, qui quicquid politioribus literis tinctum eſſet, aut ex Græcis Hebræiſque literis erutum, ſtatim Lutheranum eſſe clamitant, affinem ei ſectæ, ab aliis vero Aulæ Pontificiæ corruptos mores, nundinationes rerum ſacrarum, & quam vocant ſuperſtitionem improbantibus, purpurei galeri deſiderio fictum & perſonatum ſimulatorem habitum eſſe non ignoro (39).

(37) Robert Etienne, Réponſe aux cenſures des Théologiens de Paris, fol. 22. edit. 1552, 8vo.

(38) Ibid. fol. 24, verſo.

(39) Gallandius, in Vita Caſtell. pag. 55.

[N] He delivered the funeral Oration of Francis I.] It conſiſted of two Sermons, which Mr. Baluze cauſed to be printed, when he publiſhed the life of Caſtellanus written by Gallandius. All the world knows the complaints of the Sorbonne, occaſioned by Caſtellanus's expreſſing himſelf very plainly concerning purgatory: he declared, that he believed the King's ſoul was gone directly to heaven. The Deputies of the Sorbonne fell into the hands of a certain banterer (40), who laughed at them. I am very well acquainted, ſaid he to them, with the late King's humour; he ſeldom continued long in the ſame place; and if he went into purgatory, be ſure it was only to taſte the wine. Beza (41) and Thuanus (42) give a particular account of this whole affair.

(40) Mendoza the King's Steward.

(41) Hiſt. Eccleſ. liv. 2. pag. 80.

(42) Thuan. lib. 3. pag. 58.

[O] We muſt not omit to mention what he did concerning the lewd women.] I intend to ſpeak only of thoſe, who had been ſhut up in a Convent as repenting maids, and yet deſerved nothing leſs than ſuch a name, for they were neither repenting nor maids. They had led a diſſolute life, and afterwards confined themſelves in a Monaſtery to expiate their ſins; but not finding there a ſufficient maintenance, they went a begging from door to door, by which means they found opportunities to return to their ancient trade. Caſtellanus did all that lay in his power to provide a fund ſufficient to maintain theſe creatures, and ordered amongſt other things, that they ſhould work for their bread. He had a great deal of trouble to perſuade them, that they muſt no longer ſtroll about the ſtreets, but keep religiouſly in their Cloiſter. Vix verbis exprimi poteſt, quantis ſudoribus & moleſtiis operam dederit

Bishoprick of Mâcon, to be translated to that of Orleans, which was in the neighbourhood of those places, in which Henry II loved to pass the greatest part of his life. When this Prince was preparing himself for his journey into Germany, he went from Amboise to Orleans, and gave the Great Almoner leave to be absent from Court for two months. Castellanus had begged that favour of him, in order to regulate the affairs of his Diocese; he had not time to reform all that was amiss in it, but he cleared it of an infinite number of vagabond and ignorant Priests, who led a scandalous life [P]. He preached often, but it happened one day, that whilst he was preaching, he had a fit of the palsy, which soon turned into an apoplexy, and carried him off in a very little time. He died February the 3d 1552 (g). The Protestants made a great many reflections upon his death [Q]. He was rit ut mulieres, quæ Lutetiæ corpore vulgato quæstum meretricium feciſſent, ex vitæ contaminatæ penitentia ad caſtitatem, bonam frugem, & religioſam vitam in Monaſterio profitendam converſæ, vere id, quod profiterentur, præſtarent. Nam cum iis reditibus, qui ad uſus vitæ neceſſarios requiruntur deſtitutæ, vicatim & oſtiatim mendicare cogerentur, ut ejus rei occaſione ſuâ copiam magno cum probro facere vulgo dicerentur, re prius diligenter multumque cum prudentibus boniſque viris communicata, illis demum multis rationibus, quamquam ægrè, perſuaſit, ne monaſterium ſemel ingreſſæ, cum hoc ignominioſa boni nominis & famæ jactura, per urbem in poſterum divagarentur (43).

(g) Taken from his Life, written by Peter Gallandius, his friend, and published by Mr. Baluze at Paris in the year 1674.

(43) Gallandius, in Vita Caſtell. pag. 110.

[P] He cleared his Dioceſe of vagabond and ignorant Prieſts, who led a ſcandalous life.] He began the reformation of his Dioceſe with the Prieſts, and ordered, that all those, who had no settled habitations, and who only wandered up and down, begging every where for Masses to be said for a pennyworth, should leave the country immediately. In a fortnight's time he drove so many of those idle Priests out of his Diocese, that they might have made a pretty numerous army. Doctrinæ & vitæ ſui populi cognitionem, inſtaurationemque a capite, hoc eſt, a Sacerdotibus exorſus, eorum, qui nullam certam ſtationem habentes, velut errones circumforanei, Miſſas undiquaque aucuparentur, tantum numerum intra dies quindecim epiſcopatûs ſui finibus exegit, ut ex iis juſtus propemodum exercitus cogi poſſe videretur (44). Having examined the Priests, he found them very ignorant and very vicious; yet he gave them wherewithal to pay the charges of their journey. It was a great grievance to suffer such men, who went from door to door offering to say Mass at a very low price. Cum eos interrogatos literarum omnium ignaros, omnium ſordium maculis infames, nulli certo homini aut loco auctoratos mercedula ſe veluti venales ad ſacra obeunda obtrudere didiciſſet (45). This grievance has been a little reformed, but is still very great, and drew very heavy complaints from a Roman Catholic Author, whose work was printed in Holland in the year 1681. "It is very odd, says he, to see in Italy ten or twelve "Priests waiting in the Vestry till some fool or another come and give them for a Mass, a Julio * to "buy a bit of bread, and often the Sexton drives them "away before they have earned one penny. No such "thing is seen at Paris; but then we have above a "thousand of those strolling Priests, who belong to no "parish, and can hardly get their bread by saying "Mass. I avoid them like so many pick-pockets, "and I am pleased with myself when I think, that "never a Priest nor a Monk received any of my money for the payment of their Masses; I should look "upon it as a kind of sacrilege. Holy Orders should "never be conferred upon any person, without a sufficient title; this would deliver us of all these "strollers (46).

(44) Ibid. pag. 134.

(45) Ibid. pag. 135.

* A piece of money worth about five pence.

(46) Moiens ſurs & honnêtes pour la Converſion de tous les Héretiques, Part 2. pag. 26, 27.

[Q] The Proteſtants made a great many reflections upon his death.] Let us first transcribe those of Beza. Lastly, says he speaking of Castellanus, he was promoted to the Biſhopric of Mâcon, and then to that of Orleans, after many bargains for livings. He had a great deal of wit, ſpoke Latin very well, and at firſt he favoured the Reformed Religion, ſo far, that he ſupported for a great while the cauſe of Robert Stephens . . when he was attacked by the Sorbonne, who found fault with the Bible, which he had printed (47). . . But this good Biſhop ſtooping ſo low as to perſecute thoſe he excuſed before to the utmoſt of his power, was tranſlated to the See of Orleans; but there God had decreed to ſnatch him away; for the day before he was to make his entry, being arrived at a monaſtery, called St. Vuerte (48), and being got into the pulpit to preach before a very numerous audience, it being a new thing to ſee a Biſhop preach, as he was threatning very ſeverely thoſe, who are called Heretics, he was taken with ſo ſudden and ſo violent a fit of the cholic, that being carried away, he died miſerably the following night (49), to make his entry into another place than Orleans. Five days after, namely on the 9th of July, were alſo executed, &c. Beza is mistaken with regard to the day and the year. According to him Castellanus died July the 4th, 1549, but he died February the 3d, 1552. To Beza let us add another witness, a good Protestant. Since we have mentioned the Clergy, it puts me in mind of a Prelate, who is ſeldom forgotten, when the queſtion is concerning ſuch judgments of God; I mean Peter Caſtellanus, for he is, as much as any one can be, an inſtance of God's judgment: having profeſſed the Goſpel publicly under the reign of Francis I, ſo far as to draw upon him for that reaſon the hatred of the Sorbonne (whom he did not fear, becauſe he knew the King ſupported him) turned his coat under the reign of Henry II, becauſe he found that they, who profeſſed the Goſpel, were not well received at Court; nay, he turned his coat ſo well, that it could not be known any longer. Nor was this enough for him, but he came to Orleans (of which City he had lately been made Biſhop) in order to preach with the utmoſt zeal againſt the ſame Religion, which he had formerly ſupported. And indeed he aſcended the pulpit ſometimes; but it happened once, that as he was uttering his blaſphemies againſt the true Religion, in ſpite of his own conſcience, he was ſeized with an illneſs, which did not ſuffer him to come out of the pulpit in the ſame condition as he went into it. It is ſaid, that his illneſs was ſuch, that one part of his body burnt like fire, whilſt the other was as cold as ice; they alſo mention a bloody flux: However that be, he died within few days, lamenting and groaning in a dreadful manner (50). D'Aubigné (51) quotes a Book, intitled Dan, in which it was said, that Bishop Castellanus, who in cold blood sent the Protestants to the stake to be burnt, died half frozen and half burnt. Chassanion gives the same account of this Prelate's death, as Beza and Henry Stephens. See the pages 106 and 107 of a Book which he published in 1586 with this title; Hiſtoires remarquables des grans & merveilleux jugemens de Dieu. i. e. "Remarkable "Histories of the great and wonderful Judgments of "God."

(47) Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſ. liv. 2. pag. 80, 81.

(48) Du Peirat, Antiquitez de la Chapelle, pag. 384, says, that this Prelate was taken with a fit of Apoplexy, as he was preaching the Word of God in the Church of St. Lawrence at Orgeres, before he had made his entry into the City of Orleans.

(49) Gallandius says, pag. 135, that Caſtellanus had a fit of Apoplexy. (Thus Mr. Bayle says, perhaps he means a Palsy) firſt on the left ſide, then on the right, and that afterwards he could not breathe, and was ſuffocated in leſs than three days time. Ante triduum ſuffocatio ſecuta ſit.

(50) Henry Etienne, Apologie pour Herodote, pag. 312.

(51) D'Aubigne, tom. 1. liv. 2. chap. 11. pag. m. 112.

I think, I may observe three things upon this subject. I. That Beza and Henry Stephens, &c. have acted not from a spirit of detraction, but from a zeal for Religion. II. That what they have said, is very serviceable to the cause they espoused, by confirming those, who are already confirmed in their opinions. III. That it is probable they were too hasty in their decisions. Calvin, Beza, and several others imagined, that all those, who at first favoured the Reformation, either by endeavouring to render the persecutors less cruel, or by shewing a great desire to see an end of the evils, which the Church suffered, were so many apostates, and acted against their own conscience, if they continued in the Church of Rome, or if they altered their conduct towards the Reformed. I say, that this was a rash judgment. To believe that the Church wants to be reformed, and to approve of a particular manner of reforming it, are two different things. To blame those, who oppose a Reformation, and to blame at the same time the conduct of them who reform the Church, are two things which are not in the least inconsistent. One may therefore imitate Erasmus, without being either an apostate or a traytor, without sinning against the Holy Ghost, and without acting against the dictates of one's own conscience. Beza does not seem to have understood this; he imagined, that was very well ſkilled in the Oriental Languages (b), and had ſuch an univerſal learning, that Francis I, who boaſted that he had not ſeen one learned man, whoſe ſtock of learning he could not exhauſt in two years time [R], declared, that he never found Caſtellanus at a ſtand. He wrote but little [S]. They relate very ſurpriſing efforts of his eloquence [T]. We ſhall throw into one note our obſervations upon the errors of Moreri, and of ſome other Authors [V], and we ſhall relate what Mr. de Varillas obſerves concerning all thoſe, who granted that Calvin and Luther were in the right with regard to ſeveral things, muſt for that reaſon be fully perſuaded, that it was neceſſary to ſeparate immediately from the Church, to raiſe altar againſt altar, to break and throw down the images, and not to ſtop even at the ſight of the ſlaughter and bloodſhed which is to follow. This is a wild fancy; there were no doubt ſeveral perſons, who thought, that ſince the Reformation met with ſuch great obſtacles, which were attended with the utmoſt deſolation throughout all Europe, it was a token from God, that the time for reforming the Church, was not yet come. There are a great many perſons, who will always adhere obſtinately to this maxim, that it is a leſs evil to ſuffer the grievances of Church and State, than to endeavour to redreſs them by ſuch means as tend to the overthrow of the Government (52). It would be difficult to determine, whether Caſtellanus was one of them: But all perſons free from prejudice will own, that one ought to be very careful how to charge others with preaching againſt their conſcience. Chancellor de l'Hôpital made very good verſes upon Caſtellanus's dying almoſt in the pulpit; he has beſtowed great praiſes upon this Prelate (53). It has been ſaid that Caſtellanus was poiſoned, and Peter de St. Julien aſſerts (54), that it was the opinion of that Biſhop's ſervants.

(b) See Colomiés in Gall. Orient. pag. 14, 15.

(52) Expediebat quaſi ægræ ſaucieque Reipublicæ requieſcere quomodocunque, ne vulnera curatione ipſa reſcinderentur. Florus, lib. 3. cap. 23.

(53) Du Peirat, Antiquitez de la Chapelle, pag. 384. Mr. Baluze, Not. ad Vitam Caſtell. pag. 165. Colomiés, Gall. Orient. pag. 13. have quoted the verſes of this Chancellor, they are alſo in Moreri.

(54) In the Antiquitez de Mâcon, pag. 245. apud Colomeſium, Gall. Orient. pag. 12.

[R] Francis I boaſted that he had not ſeen one learned man, whoſe ſtock of learning he could not exhauſt in two years time.] This deſerves to be taken notice of. Francis I boaſted that amongſt ſeveral very learned men, with whom he had entered into converſation, he had found none but Caſtellanus, who could hold out telling new things for two years. That is to ſay, that all the others had in a ſhort time nothing more to ſay, and were reduced either to be ſilent, or to repeat what they had ſaid before; in a word, their ſtock was out. Whereas Caſtellanus was a running ſpring, which was never dry. Gallandius's words are ſo elegant, that they deſerve to be here tranſcribed. Cum de doctis hominibus loqueretur (Rex), dictitare ſolebat, ſe permultis extra communem aliorum aleam poſitis doctis hominibus perſæpe familiariter uſum eſſe, & delectatum, verum præter Caſtellanum neminem ſibi ad eam diem viſum, cujus eruditionem omnem non intra biennium exhauſiſſet. Hunc veluti omnium artium quendam Oceanum ſemper vivo gurgite redundantem ad ſe accedentem ſemper videri novum nec unquam ante auditum. Eam eſſe ejus immortalis ingenii vim, & doctrinæ fœcunditatem, ut nunquam in ulla diſputatione hæſitare & titubare viſus eſſet (55). There are perhaps no perſons in the world, whoſe converſations are more to be dreaded for a learned man, than thoſe of a great Lord, who loves the ſciences. For as they are uſed to ſpeak ex tempore upon thoſe ſubjects, which belong to their province, they entertain an ill opinion of a man, who cannot anſwer directly to ſuch queſtions as relate to his profeſſion. There are a great many very learned Divines, who would be extremely puzzled, if they were to anſwer directly the queſtions, that might be put to them, concerning the ſubject, the time, the proceedings, the ſucceſs, and the principal circumſtances of any Council. I have ſeen a famous Hiſtorian of France, who could not tell, in what Century Philip the Fair lived. The more one reads, the more collections one makes, the leſs one is capable to anſwer directly the queſtions which relate to matters of fact; ſo that there are ſome men, who are not more admired for the learning, which appears in their works, than for the ignorance they diſcover in converſation. The Blondels and the Salmaſius's and a few more of the ſame claſs, are not ſubject to that misfortune; but the others are in a very dangerous ſituation, when they have to anſwer the repeated queſtions of a Man of Quality, who loves books. I have been told, that Marſhal de Crequi, when he was retired to a country-ſeat during his diſgrace at Court (56), aſked for the moſt learned man in the neighbourhood, The Prior of a Monaſtery was introduced to him, but he had ſcarce been a fortnight with him, but the Marſhal ſaid, they had brought him the moſt ignorant man in the world. Not but that the Monk knew a great many things, and could have ſatisfied Monſieur de Crequi, if he had had time to prepare himſelf; but to tell ex tempore proper names, dates, and ſuch other circumſtances, was what he could not do. See the quotation (57) in the margin.

(55) Galland. in Vita Caſtell. pag. 71.

(56) In 1672, when he refuſed to ſerve under Marſhal de Turenne.

[S] He wrote but little.] There is a Latin Letter from Francis I to Charles V, aſcribed to him, it was publiſhed in 1543 (58). I have already mentioned his Funeral Oration on Francis I.

(57) The Preſident de Mêmes was a learned man, and loved ſo well to converſe with the learned, that it was ſaid of him, that in a week's time he could exhauſt the learning of a Doctor. Suite du Menagiana, pag. 216.

(58) Mezerai, tom. 2. pag. 1017. Varillas, Hiſt. de François I tom. 2. pag. 440.

[T] They relate very ſurprizing effects of his eloquence.] He made ſuch moving diſcourſes in the hoſpitals, priſons, and convents at Paris that he drew tears from all his audience, and inſpired them with a ſtrong deſire of living well (59). Having ſpent two months in perſuading an Abbeſs of Pontoiſe into her duty, who miſmanaged the income of an hoſpital founded by St. Lewis, he would not leave the Abbey without preaching a Sermon to the Nuns; his diſcourſe affected them to ſuch a degree, that they threw themſelves down upon the ground, ſighed and ſobbed, beat their breaſts, ſhed abundance of tears, and promiſed that for the future they would acquit themſelves of their duty better than they had done before. Ea vi eloquentiæ, rerumque & ſententiarum e ſacris literis deprompturam tum gravitate, tum copia, de virginitatis, caritatis & miſericordiæ officiis, mundique contemptu nobis præſentibus diſſeruit, ut omnes ſeſe humi affigentes, maximis ſingultibus & ſuſpiriis editis, ſua pectora pugnis contenderent, & maximam vim lachrymarum profundentes ſe longe aliter quam ſuperioribus temporibus officium facturas profiterentur (60). When he preached to repenting maids *, he uſed to begin with a lively deſcription of the abominations of a lewd life, and cloſed his diſcourſe with the praiſes of repentance and converſion; each part of his Sermon had its particular effect. In the firſt he conducted the ſinners to the very brink of deſpair and deſtruction, and in the ſecond he filled them with comfort and hopes. Gallandius has expreſſed this very nobly; here follow his words. Ad virum aliquando paſſas, ſed vitæ contaminatæ tædio in monaſterio caſtitatem profeſſas, ingreſſus, cum fœditatem veneream graviſſimis verbis inſectatus eſſet, ea verba de reſipiſcentia & pœnitentia fundebat, ea è ſacris exempla & teſtimonia ad laudem ejus vitæ ad pudicitiam ſanctam converſæ adducebat, ut quæ prima oratione capillo paſſo humi conſternatæ ad pectora pugnis acriter tunderent, faciem unguibus deformarent, & lamentis atque ejulatis omnia complerent, oratione poſtrema ad ſe revocatæ, manibus ad cælum verſis, Deo gratias agerent, ſe longe fæliciſſimas prædicarent, & in ſuſcepto vitæ inſtituto conſtanter perſeveraturas iterum atque iterum voverent (61). Let us add to this, what the Chevalier Caſal wrote to Pope Paul III. The Biſhop of Mâcon made King Francis I's Funeral Oration in a very learned manner, and very much to the purpoſe; ſave only that he could not be well heard becauſe of the loud lamentations and heavy ſighs occaſioned by the very words he ſpoke. I ſhall endeavour to get a tranſcript of his Diſcourſe, which I ſhall ſend to your Holineſs. You will find this in the Epiſtles of the Princes collected by Ruſcelli, and tranſlated by Belleforeſt (62).

(59) Galland. in Vita Caſtell. pag. 110.

* Ladies of Pleaſure. The Repenting Maid, les filles repenties, is the name of a Convent at Paris, where ſuch ladies are put to repent of their former pleaſures.

(60) Ibid. pag. 124.

(61) Galland. Vita Caſtell. pag. 124, 125.

(62) Fol. m. 151 verſo.

[V] We ſhall throw into one note our obſervations upon the Errors of Moreri, and of ſome other Authors.] I. Moreri ſuppoſes, againſt the expreſs aſſertion of Gallandius, that Caſtellanus was of Langres and a Plebeian. II. That Francis I made him his Preacher, becauſe of a certain anſwer he made him, and which I have related above (63). Was it not turning that great Prince into ridicule, to pretend that he would reward a witty ſaying, by ſo ſacred a poſt as that of a Preacher? It was by no means that pretended witty ſaying, which gained Caſtellanus the favour of that Monarch; concerning the Aſſembly of Melun [X]. Obſerve that the Chancellor Poyet was a great enemy of Caſtellanus, and conſult upon this the Continuation of the Menagiana, pag. 289 of the Dutch edition.

(63) In the Remark [A].

Monarch; but his fine and learned diſcourſes: the poſt which was conferred upon him, was that of reader to the King, and not of his Preacher (64). III. If he had taught the Belles Lettres at Paris, as Moreri aſſerts, Gallandius would have mentioned it; his ſilence upon this ſubject muſt be taken for a good confutation of Moreri's aſſertion. But further, what likelihood is there, that the King's Reader, who was every day at his maſter's table, and at his couchee, ſhould trouble himſelf with teaching in a College? Moreri is more in the right, when he ſays, that Caſtellanus was the ſame King's Library-Keeper after Budeus. IV. They did not begin, as he ſays, to reward his virtue by making him Abbot of Auberive. He meant, no doubt, the Abbey of Hauvilliers (65), which Gallandius calls in Latin Abbatiam Altovillarenſem; but it is ſo far from being true, that this was the firſt reward Caſtellanus received, that on the contrary he obtained it only when he reſigned his Biſhoprick of Tulle; and he reſigned it, when he was promoted to the Biſhoprick of Mâcon. He obtained the Abbey of Hauvilliers in the year 1543, and he had been made Biſhop of Tulle in 1539. Mr. Baluze has obſerved (66), that Gallandius was miſinformed, when he ſaid, that Francis I gave three livings to Caſtellanus in the ſame year, viz. the Provoſtſhip of Eſſaus (67), the Biſhoprick of Tulle, and the Abbey of Belleperche (68): Intra unius anni ſpatium tribus ſacerdotiis, Præfectura Envaonienſi, Epiſcopatu Tutelenſi, & Abbatia Bellopercenſi eum ornavit (69). For John de Cardaillac was Abbot of Belleperche from the year 1484 to the year 1543, as appears by his Epitaph publiſhed by the Sammarthani in their Gallia Chriſtiana. So that that Abbey was not conferred on Caſtellanus till four years after he had obtained the Biſhoprick of Tulle, to which he was certainly preferred in the year 1539. V. It is not true that the poſt of great Almoner of France was conferred upon him before the Biſhoprick of Mâcon: He had the Biſhoprick in the year 1544, and was made great Almoner under the reign of Henry II, November the 25th 1547 (70). Thuanus has committed a blunder here; he thought Francis I made Caſtellanus great Almoner (71); ſeveral others have committed the ſame blunder (72), as du Peirat obſerves: Nor is he himſelf free from all errors, ſince he believes, that Caſtellanus was Chaplain in ordinary to King Francis I, and Biſhop of Macon in the year 1531 (73). This is abſolutely falſe. F. Jacob having ſaid, that William Budeus died in the year 1540, adds, that the place of Library-Keeper to the King was given to Peter du Chatel (Caſtellanus) by Francis I, who gave him afterwards the Biſhoprick of Tulle (74). This is altering the order of time, for we have ſeen that he was made Biſhop of Tulle in 1539. The ſame Author ſays, that Caſtellanus died, when he was preaching, in 1558 (75), he ſhould have ſaid, in 1552. Catherinot has ſaid erroneouſly, that Caſtellanus was Profeſſor at Bourges (76). Mezerai was not better informed, when he ſaid, that he fell under the King's diſpleaſure (77).

(64) See his Life, pag. 41. Theſe words of Gallandius, pag. 46. Primum omnium inter Scribas & Miniſtros cubiculatios Regis cooptatus, ſignifies, if I am not miſtaken, that he was ſet down in the eſtabliſhment amongſt the Clerks of the Cloſet, and the Officers of the Bed-Chamber; that is to ſay, that the King's Reader was looked upon as one of theſe Officers.
(65) In the Dioceſe of Reims.
(66) In notis ad vitam Caſtell. pag. 149.
(67) In the Dioceſe of Limoges.
(68) In the Dioceſe of Montauban.
(69) Galland. in Vita Caſtell. pag. 48.
(70) See Du Peirat, Antiquit. de la Chapelle, pag. 383.
(71) Thuanus, lib. 3. pag. 57.
(72) Jacob. Severtius, in Tractatu de Epiſcop. Matiſconenſibus; Carolus Sauſſeius, lib. 14. Annal. Eccleſ. Aurelianenſis. Claudius Robertus, in Gallia Chriſtiana.
(73) Du Peirat, Antiq. de la Chapelle, pag. 455.
(74) Jacob, Traité des Bibliotheques, pag. pag. 468.
(75) Ibid. pag. 469.
(76) Catherinot, Annales Typographiques de Bourges, pag. 4. The whole book contains but 8 pages.
(77) Mezerai, Hiſt. de Franc. tom. 2. pag. 1059. in folio.
(78) Varillas, Hiſt. de François I. liv. 11. pag. m. 136, &c.

[X] We ſhall relate what Mr. Varillas obſerves concerning the Aſſembly of Melun.] He ſays (78), "I. That "the chief Divines of the Faculty of Paris were or- "dered to meet at Melun, to write down and com- "municate to his Majeſty their opinions ſupported by "the authority of the holy Scripture, of the Coun- "cils, of the Fathers, and even grounded upon "right reaſon, concerning the points, which the "heretics alledge as pretences for ſeparating from "Communion with the Catholics. II. That the "Doctors diſcharged this duty with ſo much accura- "cy as would be at this time the moſt valuable re- "cord of the Sorbonne, if their opinions had been "tranſmitted with the ſame fidelity as they were deli- "vered; but that the moſt judicious of them were "ſuppreſſed by Caſtellanus." III. That this man, who was perfectly well ſkilled in the Oriental Languages, and polite Literature, was not ſo well verſed in Divinity. IV. That he had a great mind to aſſiſt at the Council, with the character of Embaſſador from France; and that he had credit enough at Court, to obtain that important Commiſſion, becauſe on the one hand there was not a Sword-man learned enough to ſupport the dignity of ſuch a poſt, and on the other hand the Prelates durſt not pretend to it, for fear of being ridiculed, if they appeared as Miniſters of a temporal Prince in an aſſembly, in which they were to be judges. V. That he (Caſtellanus) thought, he wanted nothing, but ſome particular and extraordinary inſtructions, concerning the Difficulties, which might be propoſed in the Council, that he might have an opportunity of being admired for his learning as well as for his eloquence. And as he was too proud to borrow from others thoſe inſtructions he wanted, he reſolved to ſteal them ſo artfully, that he could not be charged with the theft. VI. That he kept the writings of the Doctors, in order to make uſe of them in his pretended negotiation . . . and made ſome abſtracts from them, which contained little more than the Decrees made by the ſame Faculty four years before againſt the Doctrines of Luther. VII. That "after this manner Caſtellanus, "unknowingly, and without any other motive, but "the deſign of gathering memoirs to ſignalize himſelf "in an employment which he never enjoyed, contribu- "ted towards the encreaſe of Calvin's hereſy in France; "becauſe if the opinions of the Doctors had been "printed, they would have confirmed the people in "the Religion of their anceſtors, and they would not "have been ſo eaſily perſuaded into new opinions." This is a very heavy charge; I cannot ſay poſitively, whether it be falſe or true; but if Caſtellanus was guilty of ſuch a fraud, he deſerves to be much leſs eſteemed, than he generally is. However, I ſhall obſerve, that the Hiſtorian has been miſtaken in two points; he ſuppoſes that Caſtellanus was not yet a Biſhop, when the Aſſembly of Melun was held, that is to ſay, in the year 1545; for he lays it down as a matter of fact, that no Prelate would have dared to make himſelf ſo ridiculous as to pretend to be ſent Embaſſador from France to the Council; he ſuppoſes therefore, that Caſtellanus, who deſired that poſt, was no Biſhop. He did not know then, that in 1539 he had been made Biſhop of Tulle, and in 1544 Biſhop of Macon. This is Mr. Varillas's firſt error, but ſuch an error as overthrows the chief foundation of his whole account. The ſecond is his ſuppoſing, that if the opinions of the Doctors had been printed, the people would not have embraced the Lutheran Religion. This is a very wild fancy. If the Prieſts and the Prelates loſt part of their flock, it was not for want of having publiſhed a great many Books as good as they were capable to write at that time. It would not have been more difficult for Calvin and Beza to anſwer theſe Doctors opinion than the other Books that were publiſhed.

Obſerve, that Mr. Varillas in his Hiſtory of Henry II (79) ſuppoſes, that the Deputies of the Sorbonne, who were ordered to complain of the Funeral Oration of Francis I, in which Caſtellanus had denied the Purgatory, were to lay three things to his charge, the ſecond of which was, his having ſuppreſſed theſe opinions of the Doctors.

(79) Pag. 69. of the Dutch edition.

Let us add to the paſſage of the remark [D], in which we mention the bad hand-writing of Eraſmus, that the manuſcript of his Lingua was ſo ill-written, that he could hardly read it himſelf, when he wanted to make uſe of that manuſcript to correct the errors, which had crept into the edition of 1525, which by conſequence is the firſt. Eraſmus himſelf owns this in the Preamble to the errata of that edition.

CASTELVETRO (LEWIS), a native of Modena, one of the moſt ſubtle Writers of the ſixteenth Century, is known chiefly by his Commentary upon the Poetics of Ariſtotle. Moreri, and Teiſſier (a) will fully inform thoſe, who conſult them, of the hiſtory of his Life. I ſhall only inſiſt upon one particular, which they have not unfolded, and which which relates to the proceedings of the inquiſition againſt him [A]. He had too ſtrong an inclination for criticiſing [B]. Thuanus places his death under the year 1571.

(a) Eloges tirez de Mr. de Thou, tom. 1. pag. 390.

If his too great fondneſs for criticiſing was blameable, his weakneſs in not bearing to be criticiſed himſelf, and the heat, which he is ſaid to have ſhewn againſt thoſe who attempted it, were much more ſo. It is affirmed, that he made uſe of violent means againſt them [C]. His manner of quoting is very exceptionable. I have mentioned it in the Preface to this Dictionary (b); but the reader will ſee a more particular account of it in the Continuation of the Menagiana (c). He will find there likewiſe, that Caſtelvetro's houſe being on fire at Lyons, he cried out al Poetica, ſave my Poetics; and that the beſt edition of that book is that of Vienna in Auſtria. It might have been added to this, that he had reaſon to ſhew by his exclamations during the fire, that he conſidered this work as the beſt of his performances. It was known by ſuch a circumſtance as this, what the picture was, which was moſt valued by a famous Painter of Antiquity. The other writings of Caſtelvetro are much inferior to his Poetics, which notwithſtanding is a work in which many defects have been found [D]. There are ſome Treatiſes of this Author, which as poſthumous [E], want the greateſt part of that perfection, which he would have given them, if he had publiſhed them himſelf.

(b) In the firſt edition § 3.

(c) Pag. 82. of the Dutch edition.

CASTILLE

[A] I ſhall only inſiſt upon one particular . . . . which relates to the proceedings of the Inquiſition againſt him.] To avoid the conſequences of thoſe proceedings, he retired into a Proteſtant country. He wanted to have appeared before the Council, in order that his cauſe might be tried there; but the Pope acquainted the Cardinal of Mantua his Legate, that ſince Caſtelvetro had been accuſed before the Inquiſition at Rome, it was neceſſary for him to appear there under the character of a perſon accuſed. The Pope aſſured him, that he would treat him in the moſt gentle manner poſſible; that if he found him innocent, he would not only acquit him, but likewiſe confer favours upon him; and if he proved guilty, he would only require him to make a private recantation. The confidence which Caſtelvetro placed in theſe promiſes of the Pope, did not laſt long, and was of no ſervice to him. He appeared before the Inquiſition, and was examined thrice (1); but finding himſelf embarraſſed by the queſtions put to him, and eſpecially with relation to a certain book of Melancthon, which he had tranſlated into Italian, he fled, and choſe rather to expoſe himſelf to the moſt infamous ſentence, which could be paſſed upon him on account of his contumacy, than to ſurrender himſelf to the mercy of his Judges by imploring their clemency. He retired to Baſil, where he died, repenting of his errors, as we are informed by a certain Author (2). Cardinal Pallavicini is of opinion, that out of regard to the excellent writings of Caſtelvetro, we ought readily to aſſent to that Author in this point. Quanquam adjumentum, quod ipſius ſtylus ſurpeditavit politioribus jucundioribuſque diſciplinis, obſervationum raritate, commentationum ſubtilitate promeretur, ut grati animi causâ fides benignè habeatur authori narranti, ipſum poſtremo reſipuiſſe (3).

(1) The 11th, 14th, and 17th of October 1560. Pallavacini, Hiſt. of the Council of Trent, lib. 15. cap. 10. num. 15.

(2) Idem, ibid.

(3) Idem, ibid.

[B] He had too ſtrong an inclination to criticiſing.] Mr. Teiſſier quotes a paſſage of Balzac relating to our Caſtelvetro (4). I ſhall cite another. " I am " deep in the quarrel of Annibal Caro, but I do not " change my inclination, and eſteem him ſtill a more " honeſt man than his antagoniſt, tho' perhaps the " latter is a greater ſcholar than he. I never ſaw a " Grammarian of equal force with this Modeneſe (5), " both here, and in his Commentaries upon Ariſtotle's " Poetics. However it muſt be acknowledged, that " he ſometimes miſtakes by too great ſubtilty, and " that he was likewiſe a public enemy, who could " not bear the merit and reputation of any other per- " ſon." This is what Balzac (6) wrote to Chapelain in the year 1640. Father Rapin (7) aſſures us, that Caſtelvetro was a man of a diſpoſition naturally peeviſh, who thro' a contradictory humour makes it a rule always to find ſomething to except againſt in the text of Ariſtotle. What a ſhocking character is it to be poſſeſſed of a ſpirit of contradiction! It leads one to overturn the moſt ſacred boundaries.

(4) Eloges tirez de Mr. de Thou, tom. 1. pag. 390. We may obſerve that in the 2d edition, which was publiſhed ſince the firſt impreſſion of this article, he has quoted part of the other paſſage of Balzac, cited here.

(5) Caſtelvetro was a native of Modena.

(6) Letter 5. book 5.

(7) Preface to his Reflex. ſur l'Art Poetique.

[C] He made uſe of violent means againſt them.] Read the following words of Mr. Chevreau; which are to be found in a letter, which he wrote to Monſr. de la Menardiere. " I have juſt read over your art " of Poetry, in which you treat Caſtelvetro after a " ſtrange manner; and perhaps formerly you would " not have found your account in it, if what Paſquin " reproached him with ſomewhere, be true, that he pro- " ceeded from the tongue to the hands, from the pen " to the ſword, from ink to blood; and that he pro- " cured a man of great merit to be aſſaſſinated, who " had taken the liberty to contradict him (8)."

(8) Chevreau, Oeuvres mêlées, pag. 330. Hague edit. 1697.

[D] His Poetics . . . a work, in which many defects have been found.] Conſult Monſr. de la Menardiere in the Preface to his Art of Poetry, or if you cannot meet with that work, read Mr. Teiſſier, who has given extracts from it (9). Mr. de Scudery having confuted Taſſo's opinion, that Morality is not the object of a Poet, who ought only to think of diverting the Reader, adds, " that Taſſo was not the only perſon, who " maintained this egregious error: Caſtelvetro tho' a " great man, has carried it to a greater pitch of ex- " travagance than he, and after having ſpent half his " life in labouring upon Ariſtotle's Poetics, and em- " ployed in that work all his Learning, tells us that Po- " etry was invented only, per dilettare, & per recre- " are gli animi della rozza moltitudine, & del commune " populo, i. e. to pleaſe and divert the minds of the " rude multitude, and of the common people. See " here an art indeed, which, if ſuch were the end of " it, would highly deſerve the labour of Ariſtotle in " giving us the rules of it; and Caſtelvetro himſelf " would have employed his time to excellent purpoſe, " if his performance was proper for nothing but to " divert the mob:

(9) Eloges tirez de Mr. de Thou, tom. 1. pag. 391.

" De meſme l'Araignée, en filant ſon ordure,
" Uſe toute ſa vie, & ne fait rien qui dure,
That is,
" Thus the ſpider
" His ordure ſpinning waſts his very life,
" But nothing laſting forms."

" ſaid one of our moſt famous Poets. But this is not " the only hereſy of that Author, who within a few " lines after ſays, that Empedocles, Lucretius, Ni- " cander, Heſiod, Virgil, and ſeveral others, whom " he names, are not Poets, becauſe the ſciences are " treated of in their Works. Homer ought there- " fore to be degraded as well as, or even more than " the reſt, ſince there is ſcarce any art or ſcience " known among mankind, which is not to be found " in the Iliad and Odyſſey (10)." I omit the other Remarks, which he makes againſt Caſtelvetro's maxim.

(10) Scudery, Preface to Alaric, pag. 6. of the Hague edition, 1685.

[E] There are ſome Treatiſes of this Author . . . poſthumous.] The Work, intitled Le Rime del Petrarca ſpoſte per Lodovico Caſtelvetro, was publiſhed by James Caſtelvetro, nephew to our Author; who acknowledges that his uncle did not put his laſt hand to it; avegna che non habbiano recevuto dal loro autore quella perfettione, che, vivendo egli, & riveggendogli, haurebbe loro date. He informs us in his Epiſtle Dedicatory dated from Modena February the 1ſt, 1552, that the late John Maria Caſtelvetro his father, had publiſhed " una operetta di Lodovico Caſtelvetro ſuo fratello . . . " da lui dettata ne gli ultimi giorni della vita ſuo, " per corregere alcuni falli da altri commeſſi in ma- " teria di lettere, & inſieme con eſſa una giunta fatta " dalla ſteſſo ſuo fratello ad uno de libri della lingua

CASTILE (ALFONSO X of that Name King of) more famous on account of his application to Aſtronomy than of his Crown, began to reign in the year 1252. The firſt difficulties he fell into were occaſioned by the unjuſt fancy which came into his head to divorce his wife (a) on pretence of ſterility, and to ſend to the Court of Denmark for another. The King of Aragon, his father-in-law, ſhewed ſome inclination to oppoſe the indignity deſigned to his daughter; but I know not whether he would have ſucceeded therein: the Queen's pregnancy, which was diſcovered at the time of the Princeſs of Denmark's arrival (b), was undoubtedly the true reaſon why the divorce did not take place. The Queen paſſed from one extreme to the other; ſhe had nine children, which were more than were requiſite for her huſband's happineſs and repoſe; ſo fruitful a wife was given him as a puniſhment for his ſins (c). However he was not contented with this fecundity; for he had ſome children in private by other women. As to the Princeſs of Denmark, ſhe returned not to her own country; the Archbiſhop of Sevil, brother to the King, quitted the Eccleſiaſtical habit for her ſake, and married her; but this expedient gave her no great ſatisfaction: vexation and reſentment of the injury put an end to her life in a very little time. Alfonſo was beloved neither by his ſubjects, nor by the neighbouring Kings; and yet his reputation was very glorious in diſtant countries. His learning, his knowledge, his eloquence, his policy, made a great noiſe there, and induced one part of the Electors to confer (d) the Imperial Crown on him [A], while the other part choſe Richard Earl of Cornwal, brother of Henry King of England. Alfonſo went not to ſupport by his preſence the party which had elected him, ſo that his title of Emperor had never any reality. They were weary of waiting for him, and as the ſuffrages could not be united in favour of his Competitor, (for he was dead), they proceeded to a new election. The Empire was given (e) to Rodolph Earl of Habſburgh, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of Alfonſo's Embaſſadors. The Pope acknowledged Rodolph for Emperor; and not being able to obtain of Alfonſo, who went to meet him at Beaucaire on the Rhone, the renunciation of his right, he obtained it at laſt by threatning him with Excommunication, and granted him ſome amends out of the Tythes belonging to the Church [B]. I have already ſaid that this Prince was not beloved by his ſubjects. He was ſeveral times expoſed to repeated Conſpiracies of the Grandees, who very well knew how to hold intelligence with the neighbouring Princes. At length, he ſaw his ſon Sancho at the head of a powerful faction, which rendered itſelf formidable by the people's diſcontent on account of the alteration of the Coin, and by reaſon of the unjuſt methods which he made uſe of to recruit his exhauſted Treaſury. This rebellion muſt have touched him the more ſenſibly, as it was accompanied with a great deal of ingratitude; for he had conſented (f), in favour of Sancho, to exclude the ſons of the deceaſed Prince Ferdinand, his eldeſt ſon (g), from the ſucceſſion. It is true he had done it only to avoid the troubles which were to be apprehended from Sancho, if the right of Ferdinand's children was not ſacrificed to him. This ſacrifice only kept off the civil wars a little longer. Sancho, being ſure of ſucceeding his Father, was not contented; he thought Alfonſo did not die ſoon enough: for which reaſon, being tired with having waited ſeveral years, he took arms, he ſtrengthened himſelf with the aſſiſtance of the King of Granada, he aſſembled the States of the Kingdom at Valladolid, he granted the Deputies whatever they demanded; and if he refuſed the Title of King, it was either becauſe he thought it enough to poſſeſs the ſubſtantial part of the regal authority, or elſe to raiſe the people's affections the more. In a word, Prince Emanuel, his Uncle, pronounced

(a) Iolante, or Violante, daughter to the King of Aragon.

(b) In 1255.

(c) Some of his children were like thoſe of whom Ovid, Metam. Book I, ſays Filius ante diem patriot inquirit in annos. i. e. "The Son "impatient waits "his Father's "death."

(d) In 1256, or, according to others, in 1258.

(e) In 1273.

(f) In 1276.

(g) Who died in the year 1275, and by his Marriage Contract with Blanche the daughter of St. Lewis, his children were to repreſent him, in caſe he died before his Father. Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. at the year 1269.

"di M. Pietro Bembo:" i. e. A little Treatiſe of Lewis Caſtelvetro his brother .... written by him in the latter part of his life, to correct ſome errors committed by others in point of Literature, and together with it an addition compoſed by his brother to one of Peter Bembo's Books concerning the Italian Language. This Expoſition of Petrarch was printed at Baſil in 4to the ſame year at the coſt of Peter Sedabuoni Bookſeller.

[A] One part of the Electors conferred the Imperial Crown on him.] Thoſe who ſay he refuſed it are deceived. Some have added to this miſtake a pretty odd remark; which is, that he contented himſelf with the ſimple title of Emperor of the Weſt. Imperium Germanicum oblatum recuſavit; Occidentalis titulo contentus (1). When a perſon refuſes a Kingdom, he does not give it a place among his titles; and beſides, the Empire of Germany, and the Empire of the Weſt, are not two different dignities. The truth is, Alfonſo accepted the Empire, and really deſigned to go and take poſſeſſion of it; but for having unſeaſonably been what Fabius was when it was neceſſary (2), he entirely ruined his affairs. Wherefore he did not content himſelf with the title, but againſt his will he got nothing elſe. I ſee no manner of foundation for what ſome aſſert, that after having refuſed the Empire he ſuffered himſelf to be perſuaded to accept it by the ſelf-intereſted artifices of Pope Alexander. Oblatum ab Electoribus imperium modeſtè deprecatus eſt, ſapientiæ ſuæ vim eo ipſo teſtatus. Poſtquam verò perſuaſionibus Pontificis Alexandri aures dedit qui ſui commodi .... cauſa eum inſtigavit ut oblatum imperii axioma à Germanis acciperet, & quem recuſarat titulum uſurparet ... multas ... moleſtias ... expertus eſt (3). They add that his ſon diſpoſſeſſed him of his Kingdom, and afterwards reſtored it to him again (4). The laſt of theſe two facts is falſe.

[B] The Pope granted him ſome amends out of the tythes belonging to the Church.] The Pope permitted him to appropriate to himſelf the third part of the tythes, which uſed to be applied to the building and repairing of ſacred edifices. Then did the Kings of Caſtile begin to lay their hands on the Eccleſiaſtical Revenues. This is what Mariana informs us (5). But Mezerai goes farther; and we muſt hear him. King Alfonſo, ſays he (6), yielded and reſigned his right to the diſpoſition of the Pope, in conſideration of his being allowed to levy the tenths on the Clergy of his Kingdom, to carry on a war againſt the Moors. So that indemnifications, whatever happens, are always raiſed on the people, who pay all. For this time however the people had no new burden laid on them; would they not have paid Tythes notwithſtanding? The Clergy were the only ſufferers by it; but they have able ſhoulders, and need not our pity. Mezerai meant perhaps that the Clergy are never at a loſs for inventions to make themſelves amends at the people's coſt: this is another affair.

(1) Hofman. Lexic. Univ. vol. 1. pag. 89.

(2) Mariana frequently calls him Cunctator. i. e. a Lingerer.

(3) Matthias, Theatr. Hiſt. pag. 964.

(4) Omnia conſilio & æquanimitate moderatus, priſtinos honores regios tandem recuperavit. Idem, ibid.

(5) Lib. 13. ſub fine.

(6) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. at the year 1274.

pronounced in a full Aſſembly of the States a ſentence of Depoſition againſt the King, who at the ſame time held another Aſſembly, much leſs numerous, at Toledo, where out of too great a deſire of keeping a certain medium, he ſhewed neither courage nor circumſpection enough. The ſuccours which he obtained from the King of Morocco ſtood him in little ſtead: and the curſe which he ſolemnly pronounced againſt Sancho raiſed no ſcruple in the rebel's breaſt [C]. That hardened Son cared not, either for the thunder of his temporal father, or that of his ſpiritual father; for he laughed at the Pope's excommunication [D]. But there were ſome towns which forſook him, on account of the interdict, which arrived from Rome, againſt thoſe who ſhould follow his party. Two of his brothers abandoned him likewiſe. The death of Alfonſo put an end to this civil war in the year 1284. He ordered his heart to be interred on Mount Calvary, but this order was not executed. His heart and bowels are at Murcia, and his body at Sevil. He was the firſt King of Caſtile who permitted the public Acts to be drawn up in the vulgar tongue [E]. He cauſed the Bible to be tranſlated into the ſame tongue (b). He was unhappy in his wife [F], in his children, and in his ſubjects. No body is ignorant of the great expence he was at in Aſtronomical Obſervations [G], and the cenſure of God's Works which (b) Ex Matianæ Hiſtoria.

[C] The curſe which he ſolemnly pronounced againſt Sancho, raiſed no ſcruple in the mind of that rebel.] I fancy my Reader will not be diſpleaſed to find here the words which Mariana has made uſe of. Ab Alphonſo Rege Hiſpali in publico conventu Sanctius furiali carmine devotus, & jure paterno diris execrationibus caput revinctus, regnique ſucceſſione ſpoliatus eſt, octavo menſis Novembris die . . . . (7). i. e. "Sancho was ſo-"lemnly curſed by King Alphonſo in a public aſſem-"bly at Sevil, was loaded with horrid imprecations, "and deprived of the right of ſucceſſion, on the eighth "day of November. . . ." Alfonſo gained nothing by this: his ſon felt not the leaſt remorſe on that account (8), and had even the fortune to reign as a good Prince; ſo that he gave the lie to that maxim of Salluſt, imperium facile iis artibus retinetur quibus initio partum eſt (9): i. e. "Power is eaſily preſerved "by the ſame arts by which it was at firſt obtained:" he exerciſed well an authority which he had criminally acquired. Spoliati ejectique patris nota ad poſteritatem infamis: alioqui in bonorum Principum numero: imperium enim flagitio partum bonis artibus exercuit (10). i. e. "The ſtripping and depoſing of his father ſet a "mark of infamy on him to poſterity: in other re-"ſpects he may be reckoned in the number of good "Princes; for he worthily adminiſtred that govern-"ment which he had wickedly obtained." This is ſomething: nay, it is a great deal.

(7) Mariana, lib. 14. cap. 5.

(8) Sanctius neque ea religione tactus. Idem.

(9) Salluſt. in Præf. Belli Catilin.

(10) Mariana, lib. 14. cap. 8.

[D] His ſon laughed at the Pope's Excommunication.] Let us again ſee the terms of Mariana. Novum, ſays he (11), ex Italia (ſubſidium petitum) religionis objecta ſpecie. Sanctius apud Martinum Pontificem Maximum per oratorem de impietate atque ingrati animi noxa poſtulatur, ſuperſtite patre in omnia regni jura invaſiſſe, neque præ ambitione regnandi ſenis obitum expectare. Ergo in impiorum loco haberi mandatum eſt quicumque relicto Alfonſo filii partes ſequerentur: dati etiam judices a Pontifice in cauſſa: urbes & oppida Sanctio addicta ex ritu Chriſtiano ſacrificiis interdixerunt. Itaque eodem tempore non eadem de cauſſa in Aragonia & Caſtella ſacrorum veluti juſtitium fuit, mœſta provincia, Sanctioque judicibus, ſi eos nanciſceretur, extrema quævis comminanti. i. e. "New aid was ſollicited from Italy, "under colour of religion. Sancho was accuſed to "Pope Martin by his father's Embaſſador, of impie-"ty and ingratitude, of having uſurped the whole "regal authority during his father's life, and through "an immoderate ambition of reigning, not waiting "the old man's death. Therefore whoever ſhould "abandon Alfonſo and follow his ſon's party were de-"clared excommunicate: the Pope alſo delegated "Judges in the affair; and the cities and towns which "adhered to Sancho were laid under an Interdict. So "that at the ſame time, tho' on different accounts, the "public exerciſe of Religion was ſuſpended both in "Aragon and in Caſtile; the province was afflicted at "it, and Sancho threatened the Subdelegates with the "moſt rigorous puniſhments, if they ſhould fall into "his hands." This was the regard he had to the thunder of the Vatican.

(11) Ibid. cap. 7.

[E] He was the firſt King of Caſtile who permitted the public Acts to be drawn up in the Vulgar Tongue.] I know not for what reaſon Mariana attributes the ignorance and barbarouſneſs which ſpread themſelves over Spain to this regulation; for they were no leſs in France, though the like regulation was not eſtabliſhed there till under the reign of Francis I: and it is even true that the ſtudy of elegant Latin was never more in faſhion in that Kingdom, than after all the public Acts were ordered to be written in French. Let us hear Mariana. Primus Hiſpaniæ Regum vendendi atque paciſcendi vulgari Hiſpanorum lingua poteſtatem conceſſit, eam linguam nimirum quæ rudior erat excolere locupletareque eo decreto cupiebat; ſacros Bibliorum libros in maternam linguam vertendos etiam curavit. Ex eo tempore in regiis diplomatibus ac publicis in tabulis Latina Lingua, cujus antea uſus erat, deſitt uſurpari, unde pudenda litterarum ignoratio in noſtram gentem atque utrumque ordinem invaſit (12). i. e. "He was the firſt of the "Kings of Spain who allowed contracts to be made "in the vulgar Spaniſh, deſigning thereby to poliſh and "inrich that tongue, which was then ſomewhat rude; "he alſo took care to have the holy Bible tranſlated "into his mother tongue. From that time the Latin "tongue ceaſed to be made uſe of in the Royal "Charters and the public Records, as it had been be-"fore; whence a ſhameful ignorance introduced itſelf "into our Nation, and infected the Clergy as well as "the Laity."

(12) Idem, ibid. cap. 8. Here is what he ſays in the 13th Book, chap. 12: Primus Hiſpaniæ Regum Latinæ linguæ uſu in publicis tabulis antiquato, Hiſpanicam linguam ſubſtituit.

[F] He was unhappy in his wife.] I find in a Chronicle of Aragon, inſerted in the third volume of the Hiſpania illuſtrata (13), that Jolante, the wife of Alfonſo, returned unwillingly to her huſband, after ſhe had eſcaped into Aragon with her two grandſons. This is not the principal fact. The Chronicler adds that ſhe paſſed for an immodeſt woman. Iolans ad virum ingratis decedit: quæ magnorum Regum filia, uxor, & parens ſummo dedecore impudicitiæ famam effugere non potuit.

(13) Pag. 113.

[G] No body is ignorant of the great expences he was at in Aſtronomical Obſervations.] He chiefly made uſe of the labour of certain ſkillful Jews, whom he ſent for to Toledo. Rabbi Iſaac Hazan (14) was the perſon who contributed the moſt to the conſtruction of the Aſtronomical Tables which are called Alphonſine, and which appeared in the year 1270: the Jews of Sevil maintain that Rabbi to be the Author of them (15). Alfonſo ſpent in that Work forty thouſand Ducats, according to Voſſius, quadraginta ducatorum millia: but in all likelihood he meant quadringenta, or elſe he made uſe of a Book wherein the Printers had put quadraginta inſtead of quadringenta: for if Alfonſo had expended no more on that Work than forty thouſand ducats, it would not be worth ſpeaking of, and we find in other Authors the ſum of four hundred thouſand ducats (16). But it was not herein that theſe Aſtronomical Tables coſt the King of Caſtile the moſt: their dearneſs conſiſted chiefly in that they were the occaſion of his loſing the Empire of Germany. This, without doubt, is what Mariana alluded to, when he ſaid that Alfonſo loſt the earth, by being too intent on the contemplation of the heavens. Erat Alfonſo ſublime ingenium, ſed incautum, ſuperbæ aures, lingua petulans, literis potius quàm civilibus actibus inſtructus, dumque cœlum conſiderat obſervatque aſtra, terram amiſit (17). i. e. "Alfonſo had a ſublime genius, but unheedy, proud "ears, and a petulant tongue; he was better verſed "in learning than in the arts of government, and "while

(14) That is, Chanter. He had this name, becauſe he was Chanter of the Synagogue of Toledo. Voſſius, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 180.

(15) Auguſt. Ricius, in Libro de Motu octavæ Sphæræ, apud Voſſium, ibid.

(16) Expendit in hanc rem ad quater centena millia aureorum. Sethus Calviſius, ad ann. 1252. Matthias, Theatr. Hiſtor. pag. 964. Moreri ſays four hundred thouſand crowns.

(17) Mariana, lib. 13. cap. 20.

which is attributed to him [H]. It is pretended that Aſtrological Predictions were the cauſe of the misfortunes which overwhelmed him [I]. It were to be wiſhed, for the honour of the Sciences, that a Prince ſo adorned by them [K], had governed his people with more ſucceſs and greater wiſdom. They had begun under his father's reign to form a Code or Body of Laws. This great Work was completed by his care. No regard was

" while he contemplated the heavens, and obſerved " the ſtars, he loſt the earth." He fixed the epoch of thoſe Tables on the firſt day of June 1252, which was that of his acceſſion to the crown; and he regulated the concurrence of that firſt day of June with the other epochs in ſuch a manner, that he made it fall on the 230th day of the year 2000 of the æra of Nabonaſſar, and ſo of the others, as may be ſeen in Moreri.

[H] . . . and the Cenſure of God's Works which is attributed to him.] Mariana ſays in general, that Alfonſo had dared to blame the Works of Providence, and the conſtruction of our bodies (18). Of this fact he produces no other proof than a vulgar tradition, which had been delivered down from hand to hand. It is a ſign that the contemporary Hiſtory had not recorded thoſe libertine diſcourſes of the King of Caſtile, nor put the ſeal to it, to prevent its being doubted in future ages. The ſaid Hiſtorian adds, that God very juſtly puniſhed Alfonſo's raſh tongue by the rebellion of Sancho. Emanuel ſanè patruus (Sanctii) ſuo & aliorum procerum nomine Alfonſum publica ſententia in conventu pronunciata regno privavit, ea calamitate dignum quod divinæ providentiæ opera, & humani corporis fabricam inſigni linguæ procacitate ingeniique confidentia accuſare auſus fuerit, uti vulgo hominum opinio eſt, ab antiquo ducta per manus. Vocis ſtoliditatem numen juſtiſſimè vindicavit. Tho' the ſilence of ſo wiſe an Hiſtorian with reſpect to the Ptolemaic Syſtem ought to be of ſome weight, I believe notwithſtanding that if Alfonſo paſſed his audacious cenſure on any part of the Univerſe, it was on the celeſtial Spheres. For beſides that this was his principal ſtudy, it is certain that Aſtronomers then explained the motion of the heavens by ſuch intricate and confuſed Hypotheſes, that they did no honour to God, and by no means anſwered the idea of a ſkilful Workman. It is probable therefore that it was on conſidering that multitude of Spheres of which the Syſtem of Ptolemy is compoſed, ſo many excentric circles, ſo many epicycles, ſo many librations, and ſo many deferents, that he let fall the expreſſion, that if God had called him to his council, when he made the world, he could have given him ſome good advice (19). Before we go any further, let us mention a lenitive ſuggeſted to us by a modern Author (20). If the King of Caſtile had ſpoken that conditionally, which it is pretended he ſaid abſolutely, he would have been very excuſable: inſtead of the words above mentioned, make uſe of the following, " That if God had " made the World ſuch as is ſuppoſed in the Ptolemaic " Syſtem, good advice might be given him for another " time, and you will greatly diminiſh the ſcandalous " audaciouſneſs of Alfonſo." Lipſius does not relate the affair as if it regarded the diſpoſition of the heavens in particular; he keeps to general terms. Mitior, ſays he (21), ALPHONSI X Hiſpaniæ Regis, ſed non melior vox aut ſenſus, qui ſolitus providentiam itidem culpare & dicere: ſi principio mundi ipſe Deo adfuiſſet, multa melius ordinatiuſque condenda fuiſſe. i. e. " More moderate, but not at all better, was the expreſſion or " meaning of Alfonſo X, King of Spain, who uſed " likewiſe to blame Providence, and to ſay, that if " he had been preſent with God at the creation, many " things would have been better and more regularly con- " trived." Lipſius cites no body; but Father Theophilus Raynaud (22), mentioning the ſame impertinent ſpeech, quotes Mariana, Rodericus Sanctius (23), and Alphonſus Spina (24). A modern Compiler adds, that the King had ſcarce uttered this blaſphemy, but the lightning fell into the bed where he lay, which conſumed his wife and two of his children to aſhes, that he fled through the chambers of his palace followed by the lightning which burned his ſhirt, and would in all likelihood have done the ſame by his perſon, if he had not proſtrated himſelf on the ground to aſk pardon of God for his crime (25). Our Compiler refers us to Rodericus Sanctius, to Mariana, and to Bzovius. But I am very ſure that Mariana ſays nothing of this, and that he would have ſpoken of it, if there had been any certain Tradition in Spain of ſo wonderful an accident. He knew, without doubt, what another Hiſtorian relates of it; wherefore ſince he has adopted no part of that relation it is to be believed that he ſuſpected it to be ſuppoſitious. However it be, here is the ſubſtance of Rodericus Sanctius's Narrative (26). The King often repeated his blaſphemy, that if he had aſſiſted at God's Council when man was created, certain things would have been in better order than they are. Si à principio creationis humanæ Dei altiſſimi conſilio interfuiſſet, nonnulla melius, ordinatiuſque condita fuiſſe. The Infant Emanuel's Governor ſaw, in a dream, an Angel, who informed him that it had been reſolved in the celeſtial Council that Alphonſo ſhould die dethroned, and even a cruel death, if he did not repent: the Governor aſking the reaſon, the Angel replied, that it was becauſe Alfonſo had been raſh enough to cenſure the Works of God; Blaſphemiam Alfonſi vanamque temeritatem divina opera corrigere molientis id maluiſſe; and commanded him to go and exhort that Prince to repentance. The Governor obeyed, but Alfonſo laughed at him, and repeated his blaſphemy. He was then at Burgos. Some days after, as he was at Segovia, a Hermit had a like viſion, and went to acquaint him with it, and exhorted him to a retractation: the King fell into a paſſion, called him madman, and returned to his old way of talking. The next night there were ſuch horrible ſtorms, accompanied with thunder and lightning, that one would have thought heaven and earth were coming together. Fire from heaven burned the King's and the Queen's clothes in Alfonſo's chamber: then that Prince being at the laſt extremity ſent for the Hermit, confeſſed his ſin to him, wept, humbled himſelf, and retracted his blaſphemy: the more he wept, the more was the ſtorm obſerved to abate, and at length it ceaſed. Rodericus Sanctius at the beginning of this relation quotes the Annals of Spain (27), and in this reſpect at leaſt there is no doubt but he is miſtaken; for if the Annals made mention of it, Mariana, who wrote after him, and was infinitely more able and judicious than he, would not have ſingly alledged the popular tradition, or have ſuppreſſed the dreams, the ſtorms, and the repentance. However the French Compiler does not relate this prodigy faithfully. A Lutheran Miniſter applies Alfonſo's blaſphemy to the celeſtial ſyſtem, and adds that that Prince's puniſhment was to die in exile in a ſtrange country (28). This is falſe; for he died at Sevil (29), one of the cities which had perſevered in their obedience.

[I] It is pretended that Aſtrological Predictions were the cauſe of the misfortunes which overwhelmed him.] They ſay, that knowing by means of Aſtrology that he ſhould be diſpoſſeſſed of his Kingdom, he became ſo ſuſpicious, ſo miſtruſtful, and ſo cruel, that he procured himſelf an infinite number of enemies; which thing ruined his affairs. It is very poſſible that a prediction, which in itſelf is no more than a chimæra, may become a moſt real evil by the conduct it inſpires. The examples which are brought of Predictions that have been accompliſhed, are almoſt all built on this foundation. But let us hear Mariana. Id fore aſtra memorant portendiſſe ejus artis non ignaro, ſi ars eſt & non potius inane mortalium ludibrium quod à prudentibus ſemper accuſabitur, & ſemper tamen patronos habebit. Ex eo ferunt ſuſpicacem eſſe redditum, atque ex metu ſuſceptæ crudelitate magnam ejus odii partem concitaſſe quæ illi calamitati fuit (30).

[K] The ſciences with which he was adorned.] He underſtood Aſtronomy, Philoſophy, and Hiſtory, as perfectly as if he had been only a man of ſtudy, and he compoſed Books on the motion of the heavens, and the Hiſtory of Spain, which are excellent. Quid admirabilius quam in caſtris educato armaque à prima ætate tractanti tantam fuiſſe aſtrorum, philoſophiæ, rerumque geſtarum cognitionem, quantam vix otioſi homines in umbra aſſequuntur? Exſtant de aſtrorum converſionibus, de Hiſpanica Hiſtoria ab Alfonſo edita volumina magno ingenio, incredibili ſtudio (31). i. e. " What " is

(18) Idem, lib. 14. cap. 5.

(19) I make uſe of the terms of the Author of the Plurality of Worlds. The intricacy of all theſe circles, ſays he, pag. 15 of the Dutch Edition, was ſo great, that at a time when nothing better was as yet known, a King of Aragon (which is a fault of the preſs, I believe, for a King of Caſtile) who was a great Mathematician, but not over devout, ſaid that if God &c.

(20) Nouvelles de la Republ. des Lettres, May 1686, pag. 488.

(21) Monit. & Exempl. Polit. cap. 4.

(22) Theophil. Raynaud. Tract. de Eunuchis, Præf. & pag. 81.

(23) Part. 4. Hiſtoriæ, cap. 5.

(24) In Fortalitio fidei, lib. 4. Conſ. 9. Bello 138.

(25) Father L'Enfant, in the Month of March, pag. 143.

(26) Hiſt. Hiſpan. Part 4. cap. 5.

(27) Ut tradunt Hiſpanorum Annalia.

(28) Spizelius, in Felice Litterato, pag. 218, 219.

(29) Mariana, lib. 15. cap. 7.

(30) Idem, lib. 14. cap. 9.

(31) Idem, lib. 13. cap. 9.

was had to his Will, by which he left his Kingdom to his grandſon Alfonſo [L], by intail to Ferdinand the brother of Alfonſo, and afterward to Philip King of France (i). Sancho maintained himſelf on the throne, while his two nephews found it difficult to enjoy their liberty. Iolante, their grandmother, had early taken refuge with them at the Court of the King of Aragon, to avoid the attempt which their Uncle would in all probability have formed againſt their lives, even during that of Alfonſo, if he had had them in his power. So true it is, that the luſt of reigning ſtifles all ſentiments of humanity, and ſubverts all juſtice! I am beholden for this Reflection to Mariana [M].

(i) Mariana, lib. 14. cap. 7.

" is more admirable than that one educated in a " camp, and handling arms from his childhood, ſhould " be maſter of ſuch knowledge in Aſtronomy, Philo- " ſophy, and Hiſtory, as men of leiſure even in a " retirement ſcarce attain? Some volumes of Alfonſo's " are extant, concerning the courſes of the ſtars, " and the Hiſtory of Spain, written with great under- " ſtanding, and incredible application." Rodericus Sanctius gives us to underſtand that Alfonſo did no more than order ſome able men to write thoſe Books. Idem Alfonſus rerum in orbe geſtarum librum accommodatiſſimum per ſapientes ſcribi fecit, quem generalem Hiſtoriam Hiſpani appellant . . . (32). Aſtrologus appellatus eſt. Cujus nomine, neſcio an ſapientia, tabulæ Alfonſinæ & aliæ Aſtrologicæ conſiderationes compilatæ ſunt, & ſub ejus regio nomine luſtrantur (33). i. e. " The ſame Alfonſo cauſed a moſt uſeful relation of " what had paſſed in the world to be compoſed by " wiſe men, which the Spaniards call a General Hi- " ſtory. . . He is called an Aſtrologer; and under his " royal name, bnt whether by his ſkill I know not, " the Alfonſine Tables and other Aſtrological ſpecu- " lations were compiled and publiſhed." They who can conſult Nicholas Antonio (34) will doubtleſs ſatisfy their curioſity on this head. I do not know where a Miniſter of Rotterdam (35) has read what he reports concerning Alfonſo's learning in the law. Legibus fuit deditiſſimus, omnium ferè populorum & gentium de Legibus volumina evolvit, ac ſeptem Libros pro æquitatis moderatione collegit, ut & hominibus & divino cultui neceſſaria ſingulis innoteſcerent. i. e. " He was " much addicted to the ſtudy of Law, he peruſed the " Law Books of almoſt all people and nations, and " collected ſeven Books for the regulation of Juſtice, " that things neceſſary for men and the ſervice of " God might be made known to every one." This, without doubt, has no other foundation than what has been ſaid above (36) concerning the Compilation of the Cuſtomary or Code of Caſtile, made under the reign of Alfonſo; which is no proof that this Prince underſtood Law: unleſs a man will maintain that Juſtinian was the moſt learned Lawyer of his age. Conſider well what I quote from Rodericus Sanctius, and you will no longer doubt that the words of the Miniſter of Rotterdam were taken thence: it is perhaps from the thirtieth hand. Alfonſus Legibus condendis deditiſſimus fuit. . . . Leges enim Romanas in regnis ſuis legi fecit licet minime eis ſubjiceretur. Demum ex omnibus ſumma moderatione & ratione ac æquitatis vibramine ſeptem Libros quos partitas vocant inſtituit & ſalubriter compilavit, in quibus ſacratiſſimæ Leges non ſolum ad cauſas hominum decidendas, ſed ad divinum cultum dirigendum augendumque continentur. i. e. " Al- " fonſo was much addicted to the framing of Laws, " . . . for he cauſed the Roman Law to be read in " his Kingdoms, though not ſubject to them. At " length he ſelected and compiled out of all, with the " utmoſt moderation, reaſon, and weighing of equity, " ſeven Books, called las Partidas, wherein are con- " tained the moſt Sacred Laws, not only for deciding " civil cauſes, but for directing and promoting the " worſhip of God." It would be to deceive ones ſelf groſly to ſuppoſe that Alfonſo was himſelf the Compiler of theſe Laws. He therein acted the ſame part that Theodoſius, Juſtinian, and Lewis XIV did in the Compilation of the Codes which bear their name. Mariana does not ſuffer us to doubt of it. They who ſay that Alfonſo read over the Bible fourteen times (37) attribute that to him which belongs only to another Alfonſo, King of Aragon and Naples, who lived in the XVth Century: I ſpeak of it in his Article (38). It is not the only thing which has been transferred from the latter to the former: Mr. Hofman has aſcribed to the King of Caſtile, beſides the reading of the Old and New Teſtament fourteen times, what Antonius Panormitanus relates concerning the inclination of the King of Naples for the Sciences, and the curing a diſtemper by the reading of Quintus Curtius. In return, Mr. Lloyd transfers to the King of Aragon the labour and expence of the Aſtronomical Tables of the King of Caſtile.

(32) Roderic. Sanctius, Hiſt. Hiſpan. Part. 4. cap. 1.

(33) Idem, ibid. cap. 5.

(34) In his Bibliotheca Hiſpana vetus. See the Journal des Savans of 1697, pag. 462. of the Dutch Edition.

(35) Ridderus de Erudit. cap. 3. pag. 147. apud Saldenum, de Libris, pag. 318.

(36) Towards the end of the Text.

(37) Moreri ſays it, and Matthias alſo, Theatr. Hiſt. pag. m. 694. where he calls him on that account Regem pium & religioſiſſimum.

(38) NAPLES (Alfonſo I, King of), Remark [C], towards the end.

[L] He left his Kingdom to Alfonſo his grandſon.] Conclude from hence that the honeſt Monk Dom Peter de St. Romuald had drawn from very muddy ſprings, when he wrote " that Alfonſo declared the youngeſt " of his ſons ſucceſſor to his Crown, preferring him " to Sancho his eldeſt, becauſe he had found by the " rules of Aſtrology that he would be the moſt fa- " voured by the ſtars; which was the cauſe of their " mutual hatred, and at length of the death of that " youngeſt ſon, and of his own likewiſe: for the " eldeſt, not able to bear his being thus diſinherited, " rebelled againſt him, made him die in priſon, and " put his brother to death, and then ſeized on the " Crown (39)." It is not poſſible to heap more lies one upon another than there are here; and yet this paſſage has ſerved (40) and will ſerve as an Original to many other Compilers.

(39) Abrégé du Threſor Chronolog. tom. 3. at the year 1282.

(40) Father L'Enfant has inſerted it in his Month of March, pag. 143.

[M] I am beholden for this reflection to Mariana.] Let us ſet down his words. Violantes Caſtellæ Regina nepotum ætatem in quos potiſſimum erat propenſa ludibrio eſſe dolens Sanctio prælato, neque ſatis ab ejus injuria tutam, uſque adeo omnia jura pervertit exitiabilis imperandi cupido, fugam meditata . . . . cum illis in Aragoniam abiit, Alfonſo nequicquam cum res eſſet indicata probibere conato dolenteque, adeo ut nulla ſui propria regnique clade moveri magis potuiſſet . . . (41). Gallo Regi curæ erat ne in patrui poteſtatem redacti ſalutis, libertatis certè, periculum adirent, non ignaro naturam mortalium ambitioſam & imperii cupiditate in crudelitatem pronam eſſe (42). i. e. " Violante Queen " of Caſtile, grieving that the age of her grandſons, " of whom ſhe was particularly fond, was deſpiſ- " ed, ſince Sancho had been preferred before them, " and fearing they would not be ſafe from his vio- " lence, to ſuch a degree does the pernicious luſt of " reigning pervert all right, meditating flight . . . . " went with them into Aragon; Alfonſo, ſo ſoon as " the thing was told him, in vain endeavouring to " prevent it, and afflicting himſelf in ſuch a manner " that he could not have been more moved by the " ſlaughter of himſelf and kingdom. . . . The French " King took care leſt, falling into their uncle's power, " they ſhould run the riſque of their lives, or at leaſt " of their liberty; well knowing the nature of men " to be ambitious, and prone to cruelty through luſt " of Empire." This picture is a very good one.

(41) Mariana, lib. 14. cap. 3.

(42) Idem, ibid. cap. 4.

CASTILLE (BLANCHE) Queen of France, and mother of St. Lewis, was a Lady of very great accompliſhments. She was daughter of Alfonſo IX King of Caſtile, and married to Lewis of France, eldeſt ſon of Philip Auguſtus (a), May 23d in the year 1200. She was crowned with her huſband Lewis VIII Auguſt the 6th 1223, and declared Regent by the laſt will of that Prince in November 1226. Lewis IX, their eldeſt ſon, was then juſt entered his twelfth year, and at that time the Kings of France were not of age till they were twenty one compleat; ſo that the Regency of this Lady was long enough to give her an opportunity of ſhewing her prudence and courage. She had occaſion

(a) At Purmont in Normandy.

caſion for both of theſe talents; for the young King was ſcarce crowned on the firſt of December 1226, but a dreadful civil war broke out. The Princes and great Men of the Kingdom confederated together, and alledged this for the ground of their League, that the Regency of the Kingdom was given to a woman who was a foreigner (b). Blanche was not at all confounded by ſo difficult and dangerous a conjuncture of affairs, but making uſe of all the methods which her prudence ſuggeſted to her, ſhe defeated that formidable party, as often as they renewed their plots. It is ſaid that her beauty was not uſeleſs to her [A] upon thoſe occaſions, and that ſhe made very great advantages of it without acting in the leaſt contrary to her honour. The laſt point is not univerſally agreed upon, and there never was a Queen who felt ſo much the malignity of calumny as ſhe did. She was accuſed of not only having intrigues herſelf (c), but likewiſe aſſiſting her ſon in his gallantries [B], with a view to divert him from taking upon him the adminiſtration of affairs, and to preſerve a more abſolute authority in her hands. The particular care which ſhe took of his education [C], and the ſucceſs with which ſhe diſpelled all the ſtorms which were formed during his minority, inſpired that young Prince with a great reſpect and affection for her. It may be affirmed, that he ſuffered her to aſſume too great a power over him: Hiſtory has preſerved ſome remarkable particulars with regard to this [D], which demonſtrate to us, that this Queen had brought from her own country a diſpoſition a little too haughty. It was not the way to correct it, to engage, as ſhe did, in (b) Joinville, Chronique du Roy Sainct Loys, cap. 14.

(c) See the Article of THIBAUT, Earl of Champagne.

[A] It is ſaid that her beauty was not uſeleſs to her.] A modern Hiſtorian ſpeaks of her beauty in the ſame manner as is proper for Clelia or ſome other Romance. There was no Lady, ſays he (1), who would preſume to diſpute the ſuperiority in point of beauty with Blanche, and all acknowledged, that ſhe ſurpaſſed them infinitely in a fine mein. . . . Her beauty was not altered by ſeaſons or years, and tho' ſhe had borne ten children, yet this did not leſſen the floridneſs or delicacy of her complection. But let us come to the point. Her chaſtity, continues he, was impenetrable; and yet it was a virtue, which was moſt called in queſtion during her life, and after her death. We read ſtill ſeveral ſatyrs, which attacked her in that tender point, and the worſt is that ſhe furniſhed a pretext for that calumny. She was perſuaded of one of the moſt dangerous maxims, which a Lady can be prepoſſeſſed with, that there are ſome conjunctures, very rare indeed, but yet poſſible, which allow them to neglect the outworks of honour, provided they maintain inviolably the fort itſelf; that is, Queen Blanche laid it down for a foundation in her Politics, that ſhe might in conſcience endeavour to inſpire thoſe Nobles with love, whom ſhe deſpaired of engaging in her intereſts any other way, when the point was to avoid or put an end to a civil war. We ſhall find but too many inſtances of this in the courſe of this Hiſtory. See the Article of THIBAUT, Earl of Champagne.

(1) Varillas, Minorité de Saint Loüis, pag. 8 and 9. It is only a fragment printed at the Hague in 1685.

[B] She was accuſed . . . of aſſiſting the King her ſon in his Gallantries.] St. Lewis ſhewed thro' the whole courſe of his life a great regard to virtue; but it was almoſt impoſſible for him to preſerve even the appearance of chaſtity, before he was married. Private men offend in this point much more than in any other of the duties of Chriſtianity; whether it is, that their conſtitution hurries them with greater force into incontinence, than into other vices; or whether the point of honour among men is incomparably more favourable to young perſons, who offend againſt chaſtity, than to thoſe who commit other crimes. If this be true with regard to private men, what will it be with regard to a young Monarch? However it is affirmed, that the King, whom we are ſpeaking of, never made any falſe ſtep in this ſlippery path. It is true, "it "did not pleaſe God, that he ſhould eſcape the ef- "fects of calumny. It could not be conceived, that as "he was not then above nineteen years old, he ſhould "be without blemiſh amidſt the dangers of a Court, "and in a ſituation where every thing tempts one's de- "ſires. Beſides this, the debauched Courtiers being "pleaſed that they could juſtify their own irregularities "by the example of their Prince, if they did not raiſe, "at leaſt encouraged the reports which were ſpread, "and which were attended with probability enough "to alarm thoſe, who were concerned for his virtue. "An honeſt Monk among others thought himſelf "obliged to inform the Queen of it, and this he did "in ſuch a manner as to perſuade her, that he was leſs "in doubt concerning it, than he wiſhed to be. He "even made her ſenſible, that ſhe was ſuſpected to "know as much of the affair as any perſon, and to "regard very little what her ſon did, if ſhe could but "govern. She could not have received a more ſen- "ſible ſhock. But conſidering the zeal of the Monk "more than the manner, in which he ſpoke to her, "ſhe juſtified the King, and herſelf likewiſe with ſo "much modeſty, that it was not poſſible to doubt "any longer, but that ſhe was aſſured of her ſon's "virtue, and on her part incapable of having any "hand in the faults, which he might commit. The "King himſelf was ſo averſe from ſuch a conduct "and all his actions ſhewed it ſo viſibly, that theſe "idle rumours vaniſhed ſoon, and were never revived "again. (2)."

(2) Hiſtoire de Saint Loüis, liv. 3. ad ann. 1233. pag. 134. of the Bruſſels edition, 1688. The Author quotes the 5th volume of the Hiſtorians of France publiſhed by Du Cheſne, pag. 446.

[C] The particular care, which ſhe took of his education.] She nurſed him herſelf, and would not ſuffer him to ſuck any other woman. There is related a very remarkable circumſtance, which will ſhew how extremely obſtinate ſhe was in that point. "One day "when ſhe had a violent fit of an ague upon her, "which laſted longer than uſual, a Lady of Quality, "who either to pleaſe her Majeſty, or after her ex- "ample nurſed her own ſon, ſeeing the infant Prince "cry for the breaſt, ventured to give him her own. The "Queen, when her fit was off, called for her child, and "offered him her breaſt; but he put it by, either be- "cauſe he was fully ſatisfied, or becauſe the freſh milk, "which he had lately taſted, made him more ſenſible "of the heat of that which his mother offered him. "It was not difficult to gueſs the reaſon, and the "Queen immediately ſuſpected what had happened. "She pretended an impatient deſire of returning her "thanks to the perſon, who had obliged her by be- "ing ſo kind to her child, during her indiſpoſition; "and the Lady upon this expecting to gain her fa- "vour, owned that ſhe had been ſo ſenſibly touched "by the infant's cries, that ſhe could not forbear to "give him relief. But the Queen inſtead of an- "ſwering, looked upon her with an air of diſdain, "and thruſting her finger into her ſon's mouth, for- "ced him to caſt up all that he had received from the "Lady's breaſt. This violent behaviour aſtoniſhed "all who ſaw it; and the Queen to remove their ſur- "prize, told them, that ſhe could not bear that any "other woman ſhould have a right to diſpute with "her the title of mother; ſo ſtrongly were people at "that time perſuaded, that the nurſing of children "was part of their education (3)."

(3) Varillas, ubi ſupra, pag. 10.

QUEEN Blanche nurſed her own ſon.

[D] Her ſon ſuffered her to aſſume too great a power over him: Hiſtory has preſerved ſome remarkable particulars with regard to this.] This imperious mother having conceived an hatred againſt her daughter-in-law, prevented her as far as was in her power, from lying with the King her huſband, and this Prince, contrary to his inclination, ſubmitted to this new kind of ſervitude; for when he ventured to go to his Conſort's bed, he took the utmoſt precautions not to be ſurprized. Can there be a more ſevere inſtance of oppreſſion, than when a married couple are debarred the liberty of performing the conjugal duty, whenever they pleaſe? Queen Blanche would not even ſuffer her ſon to viſit his wife, when ſhe was dangerouſly ſick. We ſhall prove theſe particulars by the teſtimony of a contemporary in a quarrel with the Queen, her daughter-in-law; on the contrary, that rivalſhip for the authority could not but render her paſſions ſtill more imperious. It is eaſy to imagine, that St. Lewis was not in a very quiet ſituation amidſt the conteſts between his mother and his wife; for out of apprehenſion of offending the former, he could not venture to careſs the latter (d). He carried (e) his wife with him to the Holy Land, when he engaged in the Croiſade, and left his mother Regent of his Kingdom. It muſt be acknowledged to the honour of the Queen-mother, that though ſhe undoubtedly expected to govern in her ſon's abſence, ſhe endeavoured to divert him from that unfortunate expedition (f). She did not live till the return of St. Lewis, for ſhe died in 1252 (g), having diſtinguiſhed her ſelf during this ſecond Regency by her prudent conduct amidſt ſeveral hazardous conjunctures of affairs. The Kingdom ſuffered extremely at that time through the madneſs of a great number of weak people (b), who were infatuated by certain viſionaries [E]. The oppreſſion of the Nation under the yoak of the Eccleſiaſtics was very ſhocking. The Queen did a bold action in order to redreſs this grievance in ſome meaſure [F]. The account of Blanche's death extremely afflicted the King her ſon: the Queen her daughter-in-law ſhed tears, but was ſincere enough to confeſs the true reaſon of her regret [G]. Some Authors relate (d) See the notes [D] and [G].

(e) In 1248.

(f) Hiſtoire de Saint Loüis, lvi. 6. num. 15. pag. m. 321.

(g) St. Lewis did not return to France till 1254.

(b) They were called Paſtoureaux. See Hiſt. de St. Loüis, liv. 10. pag. 113, & ſeq. under the year 1252.

porary Writer. "The reaſon why the Queen did not "love the King's mother, was on account of the ſe-"vere treatment, which ſhe received from her; for "the Queen mother would not ſuffer the King to fre-"quent the company of the Queen his wife, and hin-"dered him, as far as was in her power. And when "the King made a progreſs at any time thro' his "Kingdom, and had with him Queen Blanche his "mother, and Queen Margaret his conſort, the for-"mer commonly ſeparated them, and they never "lodged together. It happened one day, that being "at Pontoiſe, the King lodged over the chamber of "the Queen his wife, and he directed the Gentlemen "Uſhers belonging to the Palace, that when he ſhould "go to lodge with the Queen, and Queen Blanche "was coming to the King's or Queen's chamber, they "ſhould beat the dogs, in order to make them howl; "and when the King heard it, he concealed himſelf "from his mother. Queen Blanche one day found "the King in his wife's chamber, when he went to "viſit her, as ſhe was dangerouſly ill in childbirth, "and hid himſelf behind the Queen, for fear Blanche "ſhould ſee him; but ſhe diſcovered him, and ſeiz-"ing him by the hand, ſaid to him, Come away, "for you have nothing to do here, and made him leave "the chamber. When the Queen ſaw Blanche force "her huſband out of her company, ſhe cried out "aloud, Alas! Will not you let me ſee my Lord, nei-"ther while I live, nor when I die? and having ſaid thus "ſhe fell into a ſwoon, and it was thought that ſhe "was dead; and the King, who believed ſo, returned "immediately, and recovered her from her ſwoon (4)"

(4) Joinville, Chronique du Roi St. Loüis, cap. 76. pag. m. 262, 263.

[E] The Kingdom was extremely diſturbed at that time thro' the madneſs of a great number of weak people, who were infatuated by certain Viſionaries.] Queen Blanche did not at firſt diſcover the pernicious conſequences of their errors. A certain Author repreſents it "as a great point of merit in her, that ſhe owned "ſhe had been impoſed upon with regard to the Pa-"ſtoreaux, a very ſlight matter of commendation in "my opinion. For to have miſtaken a ſet of wicked "wretches for honeſt men, is only an human error, "which may ariſe from good nature, and which "ſelf-love takes a pleaſure in acknowledging: but if "the caſe had been with reſpect to perſons, who had "been extremely ſlander'd, and had only their inno-"cence to ſupport them, a confeſſion could not be too "much commended, but in ſuch a caſe it is not to be "expected (5)." This reflection of the late Author of the Hiſtory of St. Lewis is a very fine and judicious one.

(5) Hiſt. de St. Louis, lib. 10. pag. 125.

[F] The oppreſſion of the Nation under the yoke of the Eccleſiaſtics deſerved pity. The Queen did a bold action in order to redreſs this grievance in ſome meaſure.] The Chapter of Paris had committed to priſon all the inhabitants of Chatenai and ſeveral other places on account of divers things, of which they were accuſed, and which were prohibited to Vaſſals, for ſuch was the condition of the common people, and eſpecially thoſe, who lived in the country (6). They were ſold with their lands as a dependency belonging to them (7). "A conſiderable "number of theſe unhappy people languiſhed there-"fore in the priſons belonging to the Chapter, in "which they wanted even the neceſſaries of life, "and were in danger of dying of hunger and miſery. "Blanche touched with compaſſion of the complaints, "which ſhe received, ſent to demand that out of re-"gard to her they ſhould be ſet at liberty under ſe-"curity, declaring that ſhe would enquire into the af-"fair, and do juſtice fully. But the Chapter having "returned an anſwer, that no perſon had any authori-"ty over their ſubjects, and that they had a right to "ſtarve them to death, if they thought fit, ſent again "to ſeize the women and children, whom they ſpared "before. And afterwards out of indignation to ſee "them honoured with ſuch a protection, they treated "them in ſuch a manner, that a conſiderable number "died, either with hunger or the inconvenience, which "they ſuffered from the heat in a place ſcarce large "enough to contain them. Blanche reſenting an ac-"tion, which had no leſs inſolence than cruelty in it,.. "went with a ſtrong guard to the priſon of the Chap-"ter, and ordered the gates to be broke open, and as "her attendants might ſcruple to do it for fear of the "cenſures ſo common at that time, ſhe gave the firſt "blow with a ſtaff, which ſhe had in her hand. This "was ſo well ſeconded, that in an inſtant the gate "was broke open, and a great number of men, wo-"men, and children came out with countenances diſ-"figured, who threw themſelves at her feet, and de-"ſired her protection, without which the favour, "which ſhe had ſhewn them, would coſt them "very dear. She protected them ſo effectually, "that having ordered the revenues of the Chapter "to be ſeized, till they had paid a due ſub-"miſſion to the authority, intruſted with her, ſhe "obliged them even to ſet theſe inhabitants free for a "certain ſum to be paid every year. It was about "this time that theſe kinds of infranchiſements be-"gan, or at leaſt became very common." If ſome perſons ſhall think, I have cited too long a paſſage, it will be complaining, that in preſenting them with a fine piece of Hiſtory relating to our Blanche, I have exhibited to them two or three other facts, which are very remarkable. Their complaint therefore would be very groundleſs.

(6) Ibid. pag. 122, 123.

(7) This is what was antiently called Servos Glebæ, or Glebæ adſcititios.

[G] The Queen her daughter-in-law ſhed tears; but was ſincere enough to confeſs the true reaſon of her regret.] It would be a little ſurprizing, that a Queen ſo much reſtrained in her matrimonial rights as the wife of Lewis IX. ſhould be ſorry, that upon her return to France ſhe ſhould not find the cauſe of her reſtraint. The Sire de Joinville was ſurprized at the ſorrow of the young Queen; he knew how much and for what reaſon ſhe hated the deceaſed; but ſee that riddle unravelled here. "After I had left the King's chamber, "ſays he (8), Madam Mary de Bonnes-Vertus came "and deſired me to go to the Queen and comfort "her, and told me, that ſhe was extremely melan-"choly. When I came to her chamber, and ſaw her "weep ſo bitterly, I could not forbear ſaying to her, "that it was true that women's tears are not to be "regarded, ſince the ſorrow, which ſhe ſhewed, was "for a woman, whom ſhe hated above any thing in "the world. She then told me, that ſhe did not weep "for her, but on account of the King's exceſſive ſor-"row, relate concerning Queen Blanche a great many things, which prepare the way for canonization [H]. On the other hand we have ſtill remaining ſome memorials of the paſſion which the Earl of Champagne had for her, and which ſeem to ſhew that he did not always ſigh in vain. I ſhall ſpeak of this in the Article of that Earl. The late Author of the Hiſtory of St. Lewis takes her part with great zeal upon this point; but he does not deny that ſhe had ſome defects [I]. The manner in which he expreſſes himſelf, induces me to quote his own words.

(8) Chronique du Roi St. Loüis, cap. 76. pag. 262.

" row, and of her daughter, who was left under the " care of men. This daughter was afterwards Queen " of Navarre." He adds this cauſe of her hatred to Blanche, becauſe, ſays he, that Queen hindered, as much as lay in her power, the King her ſon from lying with his Conſort. " And the reaſon why the Queen " did not love the King's mother, was on account of " the ſevere treatment, which ſhe received from her, " for the Queen Mother would not ſuffer the King to " frequent the company of the Queen his wife, and " hindered him as far as was in her power (9).

(9) See the remainder of this paſſage in the note [D] quotation (4).

[H] Some Authors relate concerning Queen Blanche a great many of thoſe things, which prepare the way for canonization.] She was not content with being admitted into the third Order of St. Francis, according to the devotion of that time (10), but ſhe likewiſe made a profeſſion of the Order of the Ciſtercians (11) in the hands of the Abbeſs of Maubiſſon, a few days before her death. When her body was carried to that Abbey (12), where ſhe deſired to be interred, it was inveſted with the royal ornaments upon her Nun's habit (13). But this is no uncommon circumſtance, and I do not alledge it as a proof of the point in queſtion; I am only of opinion that this was not uſeleſs, in procuring her afterwards the title of Bleſſed, and a place in ſome Martyrologies, and that ſeveral miracles and apparitions have been aſcribed to her (14).

(10) Mezerai, Abrége Chronol. ad ann. 1252. tom. 2. pag. 731.

(11) Hiſtoire de Saint Loüis, tom. 10. pag. 124.

(12) She founded it about the year 1242. St. Lewis confirmed this foundation a little before his expedition to the Holy Land, Hiſt. de Saint Loüis, lib. 5. pag. 277.

(13) Ibid. lib. 10. pag. 124.

(14) Idem, pag. 125, 126.

[I] The late Author of the Hiſtory of St. Lewis takes her part . . . but he does not deny, that ſhe had ſome defects.] The Hiſtorian, whom I am ſpeaking of, is named Monſr. de la Chaiſe. I have heard that he was a Counſellor in the Preſidial of Poitiers, and that he was one of the friends of Meſſieurs de Port-Royal. " There ſcarce ever was a Princeſs, ſays he (15), who " had occaſion to be defended from ſo many calum- " nies, if this was a proper place for it. Not that ſhe " never committed any fault; for by what privilege " could ſhe be exempt from errors? She was a woman " and a Queen. But becauſe amongſt ſo many great " qualities there have been diſcovered ſome defects, " was that ground enough to expoſe her to the ill nature " of mankind, and that ſhe ſhould become the object " of thoſe fantaſtic judgments, in which people en- " deavour to do themſelves honour by depreciating " what they ſee univerſally eſteemed? She might ſhew " too much haughtineſs towards the Nobility during " her firſt regency; and perhaps ſhe went too far upon " ſome other occaſions. It is highly probable, that " ſhe treated the Queen her daughter-in-law with too " much ſeverity, out of jealouſy of her authority, which " is but too natural; and I would not venture to affirm, " that ſhe did not endeavour to maintain too long the " power, which her abilities and the character of a " mother had given her over Lewis during his younger " years."

(15) Ibid. pag. 126.

CASTOR, an antient Author. See the note [O] of the Article DEJOTARUS.

CASTRITIUS (MARCUS) was a Magiſtrate of Placentia in the year 669 of Rome [A], when the Conſul Cneius Carbo, endeavouring to engage all the Cities of Italy in Marius's party againſt Sylla, demanded hoſtages of them. Caſtritius not permitting the Citizens of Placentia to deliver any, Carbo endeavoured to intimidate him by telling him, that he had a great number of ſwords, And I have a great many years, replied Caſtritius; and the affair ſtopped there. Such a kind of an anſwer was made by Solon and ſome other perſons [B]. It ſignified, that they thought the ſhort term of life which they had remaining, was not worth purchaſing by a criminal action. This Caſtritius could not be the ſame with him who is mentioned by Cicero in his Oration for Lucius Flaccus; for it appears by the honours which the Citizens of Smyrna conferred upon the latter, that he did not live till he was very old (a). Add to this that Cicero expreſſes himſelf in ſuch a manner as would perſuade us, that they were not greatly convinced of his merit. The ſame Writer ſpeaks in another place of one Marcus Caſtritius (b), who was undoubtedly a different perſon from the two others; for he commends him highly, and tells us, that Verres, when he was Prætor in Sicily, made him preſents. Now the Magiſtrate of Placentia was very old, when Verres was only Quæſtor under Cneius Carbo in the year 669 of Rome.

(a) At Caſtritium quibus verbis, Dii immortales! decus patriæ, ornamentum pop. Rom. FLOREM JUVENTUTIS appellant. Cicero, pro L. Flacco.

(b) M. CASTRITIUM ſummo ſplendore, ingenio, gratiâ præditum. Cicer. in Verrem, Orat. 8.

[A] He was a Magiſtrate of Placentia in the year 669 of Rome.] The Variorum Commentary upon Valerius Maximus places this event under the year of Rome DCXXI, which is an egregious miſtake. But Monſr. Moret de la Fayolle, who places it under the year 667, and Father Cantel (1), who fixes it in 671, have their reaſons for doing ſo: they follow the Faſti Conſulares, which differ two years from the others. I cannot tell upon what ground Monſr. de la Fayolle gives Caſtritius the prænomen of Cneius, when he is ſtiled Marcus in Valerius Maximus, whom he quotes. See his Hiſtory of the Roman Republic (2). In the Supplement to Moreri this article is placed under the word Caſtratius. We ſhall obſerve below (3), that Charles Stephens has committed the ſame miſtake.

(1) In Valer. Maximum.

(2) Pag. 250 of the 2d Tome. This Hiſtory was printed at Paris in 1675.

(3) In the note [B] of the following Article.

[B] He gave Carbo an Anſwer like that of Solon and ſome other perſons.] I ſhall cite what we find in Cicero upon this ſubject: Hoc illud eſt, quod Piſiſtrato tyranno a Solone reſponſum eſt, cum illi quærenti qua tandem ſpe fretus, ſibi tam audaciter obſiſteret, reſpondiſſe dicitur, ſenectute (4). i. e. " This is what Solon anſwered to " Piſiſtratus the Tyrant, when the latter aſking him, " in what he confided, ſince he preſumed to oppoſe him " with ſuch vigour; Solon is ſaid to have replied, In " old age." Conſidius gave ſuch an Anſwer to Julius Cæſar (5), and Ceſellius to the Triumviri (6). See the Proſe chagrine of la Mothe le Vayer, p. 337 of the IXth tome of his work.

(4) Cicero in Catone majore, cap. 10. See likewiſe Plutarch and Diogenes Laertius in Vita Solonis.

(5) Plutarch. in Cæſare, pag. 714, C.

(6) Val. Maxim. lib. 6. cap. 2.

CASTRITIUS (TITUS) taught Rhetoric at Rome in the ſecond Century with greater reputation than any of his contemporaries. Aulus Gellius, who was his ſcholar, ſpeaks of him as a man of great gravity (a), and good judgment, and it is eaſy to perceive by his obſervation upon a period in an Oration of C. Gracchus (b), that he unfolded very ſubtilly thoſe falſe ſentiments which become almoſt imperceptible, when they are concealed under the harmonious cadence of a beautiful ſtyle. We ſee in another place (c) another mark

(a) Aulus Gellius, lib. 11. cap. 13. and lib. 13. cap. 20.

(b) Idem, lib. 1. cap. 13.

(c) Idem, lib. 1. cap. 6.

mark of his excellent judgment [A]. His manners contributed no leſs than his learning to procure him the eſteem of the Emperor Hadrian (d); and if we conſider a little in what manner he cenſured ſome Senators, whom he inſtructed (e), and who appeared one day before him dreſſed unſuitably to their rank [B], I mean in deſhabille, and as we ſay at preſent, in night-gown and ſlippers, we ſhall eaſily perceive, that he preſerved the gravity of antient Rome. It cannot well be determined whether he was the ſon or relation of that CASTRITIUS, who is cited by Pliny, as an Author who wrote upon Gardening (f) [C], nor whether theſe two were deſcended from a CASTRITIUS who diſcovered the conſpiracy of Murena to Auguſtus (g), and whom that Prince afterwards reſcued from a very dangerous circumſtance by his interceſſion only.

(d) Idem, lib. 13. cap. 20.
(e) Idem, ibid.
(f) In Indice lib. 19.
(g) Sueton. in Auguſt. cap. 56.

[A] We ſee . . . another mark of his excellent judgment.] It was when he confuted ſome Criticks, who objected againſt Metellus for acknowledging in his Oration to the people in recommendation of Marriage, that it was neceſſarily a troubleſome ſtate. Si ſine uxore, Quirites, poſſemus eſſe, omnes eâ moleſtiâ careremus. Sed quoniam ita natura tradidit, ut nec cum illis ſatis commode, nec ſine illis ullo modo vivi poſſit, ſaluti perpetuæ potius quam brevi voluptati conſulendum (1). i. e. "If we, Romans, could poſſibly live without "wives, we ſhould all avoid that troubleſome ſtate. "But ſince nature has ſo order'd it, that we cannot "live with them with the proper ſatisfaction, nor "live without them in any manner, we ought to re"gard our laſting ſafety rather than a ſhort pleaſure." This, they ſaid, would deter people from marrying, as much as perſuade them to it; and they ſhewed how Metellus ought to have ſtated the affair. It muſt be owned, they turned the ſentiment in a fine manner. But Caſtritius repreſented to them, that a man of Metellus's character, who at that time exerciſed the office of Cenſor, ought to ſpeak in a different way from a Rhetorician; that a Rhetorician is allowed to make uſe of falſe and captious reaſonings, and that it is a diſgrace for him in a bad cauſe not to prevent all objections; that this method ought not to be followed by a Magiſtrate venerable on account of the gravity of his manners and his dignity; for he ought not to ſay any thing in public, which himſelf and others are not convinced of, and eſpecially when it is upon a point open to daily experience, and the ſenſe of the Public (2); that Metellus therefore was obliged to grant what was manifeſt to the whole world, and by that means became more capable of convincing them of the important point, upon which he ſpoke (3): for his frank acknowledgment having covered him from all ſuſpicion of diſguiſe and artifice, diſpoſed his auditors to believe the reſt.

(1) Aulus Gellius, lib. 1. cap. 6.

(2) Præſertim cum ſuper eâ re diceret, quæ quotidianâ intelligentiâ & communi pervulgatoque vitæ uſu comprehenderetur. Idem, ibid.

(3) De moleſtiâ igitur cunctis hominibus eſt notiſſima confeſſus, eâque confeſſione fidem ſedulitatis veritatiſque commeritus &c. Idem, ibid.

[B] He cenſured ſome Senators . . . who appeared before him dreſs'd unſuitably to their rank.] One cannot gueſs what Moreri was thinking of, when he made Aulus Gellius ſay, that Caſtritius treated with great ſeverity two of his Auditors, who came dreſs'd too magnificently. I. Aulus Gellius does not reduce the Auditors, whom Caſtritius cenſured to two; he ſays diſcipulos quoſdam ſuos, i. e. "certain of his diſciples." II. He adds, that they were Senators; and this circumſtance Moreri ought not to have ſuppreſſed. III. He does not ſay, that they came dreſs'd too magnificently; but on the contrary, that Caſtritius ſaw them tunicis & lacernis indutos, & Gallicis calceatos. Theſe errors have been corrected in the Dutch Edition; but the 21ſt chapter of the 13th book of Aulus Gellius is quoted inſtead of the 20th, which Moreri was right in quoting (4); and they have overlooked his aſſertion, that Caſtritius is moſt commonly called Caſtroitius, for they have retained his words Caſtritius ſee Caſtroitus, and after his example give the article of this Rhetorician under the word Caſtroitius. We may obſerve, that it is no miſtake to quote chap. xxi; there are ſome editions, which thus give the chapter, which treats of Caſtritius; but as there are others, in which it is the xxth chapter, to correct him properly, it ſhould have been ſaid, See the XIIIth Book of Aulus Gellius, chap. XX. according to ſome editions, or chap. XXI, according to others. Charles Stephens gives the name of Caſtratius both to this Rhetorician, and to the Magiſtrate of Placentia; two articles, which have been omitted in Lloyd's Dictionary. Hofman, who has tranſcribed them from Charles Stephens, informs us in the article of the Rhetorician, that we ought to read Caſtricius, and added to his original by directing us to read in Aulus Gellius the cenſure of the two Auditors, who were too elegantly dreſſed, Severitatem ejus contra duos auditores nimium ornatos. See here, what it is to depend upon bad guides.

(4) There are ſome editions, and among the reſt that of Henry Stephens at Paris 1585 in 8vo, which place this in cap. 20. others in cap. 21. becauſe of chap. 14. they make chap. 14 and 15.

[C] It cannot well be determined, whether he was the ſon or relation of that Caſtritius, who is cited by Pliny, as an Author, who wrote upon Gardening.] Father Hardouin (5) has taken notice of an error of Simler, who relates (6), that Titus Caſtritius, mentioned by Aulus Gellius, wrote a Book intitled, Cepurica (7), from which Pliny has extracted a great many things. If people would conſult originals, they would not fall into ſuch miſtakes. Simler in that caſe would have ſeen, that Aulus Gellius ſpeaks of one Caſtritius, whoſe diſciple he was, and conſequently who could not have written Books quoted by Pliny.

(5) In Indice Auctorum Plinii.
(6) Epit. Bibliothec. Geſneri, pag. 805.
(7) In Greek κηπυρικὰ, that is, De re hortenſi.

CATALDUS, one of the Saints of the Church of Rome, and the particular Patron of the City of Tarentum, was Biſhop of that City (a). It is reported that about a thouſand years after his death he appeared to a Prieſt, and ſaid to him, Go, dig up a book, which I wrote, and concealed in ſuch a place, carry it immediately to the King: it is a work which contains the ſecrets of heaven. It was in a dream that he appeared to this Prieſt, and gave him this order; he appeared again ſeveral times, for the dream had not been regarded, nor his command obeyed. At laſt he ſhewed himſelf in another manner; the Prieſt being alone in his Church, and fully awake, ſaw St. Cataldus in his Epiſcopal Robes, who commanded him to go and dig up his book the next day in the place which he had directed him to in a dream, and to carry it immediately to the King. He threatned him with a ſevere puniſhment in caſe of diſobedience. The Prieſt was more ready to comply with the command now than he had been before; for the next day he went in proceſſion with the people to the place where the book was buried. It was found there in a leaden box (b), and contained an account of the miſeries, which were ſoon to overwhelm the Kingdom of Naples, and of which we have a particular detail in the Writer whom I quote (c). It is ſaid that this happened in April 1492 (d). We are aſſured by ſome, that this old prophetical book gave hopes, that the Kingdom of Naples would be guarded from the impending ruin, on condition the King would perform what St. Cataldus preſcribed [A]. This clauſe, of which Alexander ab Alexandro makes not the leaſt mention,

(a) Alexander ab Alexandro, Gen. Dier. lib. 3. cap. 15. pag. m. 734.

(b) Poſterâ luce ſolemni pompâ miniſtrum cum populi comitatu ad latebram, in qua longiſſimo ævo libellus latuerat, proceſſiſſe, eumque plumbeis tabellis obſignatum, & clavis obſeratum invemiſſe ſatis conſtat. Idem, ibid. pag. 735.

(c) Idem, pag. 734.
(d) Spondanus, Annal. Eccleſ. ad ann. 1492. num. 13. He quotes Infix. in Diar. Vit. S. Cataldi.

[A] He appeared to a Prieſt . . and directed him where to find a Book concerning the Miſeries, which the Kingdom of Naples would be guarded from, on condition the King would perform what St. Cataldus preſcribed.] This tion, would confirm the ſuſpicions of thoſe who take this for a pious fraud [B]. They would not reſt upon mere ſuſpicions, if they had read the paſſage which I ſhall quote from

This condition is mentioned by Spondanus. Nimirum menſe Aprili, ex revelatione prædicti Sancti, repertum fuiſſe librum tabellis plumbeis ab eo, dum viveret, juſſu divino ſcriptum obſeratumque; quo vaticinium continebatur de calamitatibus & miſeriis, quibus regnum vexandum eſſet, niſi rex, ad quem illicò librum mitti præcepit, ad amuſſim obſervaret, quæ in eo præcepta reperiret (1). i. e. "In the month of April, by the revelation of the abovementioned Saint, a Book was found written by him, whilſt he was alive, upon tables of lead, by the command of God, and lock'd up; in which was contained a propheſy concerning the Calamities and Miſeries, with which the Kingdom would be diſtreſſed, unleſs the King, to whom he ordered the Book to be immediately carried, performed exactly what was preſcribed in it." He adds, that Philip de Comines mentions this Book of St. Cataldus. But this cannot be aſſerted without taking too great a liberty; for Philip de Comines makes no manner of mention of this Saint. His words are as follow: King Ferrand . . . was extremely uneaſy to ſee this Army coming againſt him . . . and there was found a Book, as I have been informed by ſeveral of his neareſt dependants, in digging a chapel, upon which was written *, The Truth with its ſecret Counſel; and it is ſaid to have contained an account of all the misfortunes which have happened to him; and there were but three perſons, who ſaw it, and afterwards it was thrown into the fire (2).

[B] This clauſe . . . . would confirm the ſuſpicions of thoſe, who take this for a pious fraud.] It is certain, that Ferdinand King of Naples, and his eldeſt ſon, led a life, which ſcandalized the people, and oppreſſed them in a very tyrannical manner (3). There was the higheſt reaſon to fear the preparations and leagues, which were formed againſt the Kingdom of Naples. The people always dread ſuch wars, but eſpecially when they imagine, that the crimes of a Monarch, and his long impenitency, have expoſed him to the vengeance of God. It is then neceſſary to have recourſe to thoſe expedients, which are moſt capable of averting the public calamities. It is a very good expedient to invent a prophecy, which may touch the King, and lead him to ſuch a thorough reformation of his life, that his ſubjects may promiſe themſelves the aſſiſtance and protection of Heaven, its indignation being now appeaſed. It is therefore probable, that at this time ſome perſons zealous for the public good thought proper to employ a pious fraud. They made a box of lead, incloſed in it a Book, which contained what they thought neceſſary, buried it, produced a Prieſt, who affirmed that both in a dream and waking he had received from St. Cataldus a command of the utmoſt importance; the Book was certainly found in the place pointed out, and in it the threats and counſels neceſſary. Here we ſee therefore ſeveral circumſtances proper to convince us, that the diſcovery of this prophecy was an artful invention; but if we ſuppoſe that Cataldus only threatned, and did not preſcribe to Ferdinand an aſſured method of preventing the calamities, we ſhould not ſo eaſily conclude, that it was an artifice of religion and policy.

It is not neceſſary, I ſhould obſerve here, that there is no probability that Cataldus buried ſuch a Book, nor that ſeveral Ages after he diſcovered this treaſure, and ordered it to be preſented to King Ferdinand; but as it is probable that ſuch a thing was contrived, it will not be improper to touch here upon the reaſons, which might render it ſuſpicious. I ſay that the fact of this contrivance is probable; for beſides the advantage, which might be expected in the exigences of the State, and the diſcontent of the people, we have a contemporary Author, who affirms it as a thing certain (4), that this Book was dug up. He not only was living at that time, but likewiſe near the place, which was choſen for the ſcene of the event. He informs us, that the people attended in proceſſion the Prieſt, who diſcovered the prophecy. Beſides he was a man of learning. Could he be deceived in ſuch a fact? Would he have ventured to aſſert a falſity upon ſuch an occaſion? This is what leads one to believe that the prophecy of St. Cataldus was a forgery. But let us ſee what would incline us to doubt it. This Author with all his vaſt learning ſhews a great deal of credulity. Philip de Comines, when he ſpeaks of a prophetic writing ſhewn to King Ferdinand (5), does not mention Cataldus, nor any of the other circumſtances related by Alexander ab Alexandro. It may therefore be reaſonably believed, thoſe, who told him what regarded that writing, ſaid nothing of the Apparitions of that Saint, or of the Proceſſion, which is ſuppoſed to have been made for the diſcovery of the Book. It is therefore very probable, that there was no ſuch proceſſion; for if there had been one, it would have been the firſt thing mentioned to Philip de Comines. Now if Alexander ab Alexandro deceives us in this point, he is not worthy of credit in the reſt.

After having mention'd the reaſons to believe, and thoſe to doubt of this fact, I muſt add, that one of my friends maintained to the t'other day, that it is not poſſible to come to an abſolute certainty in this affair. We are at too great a diſtance from the time, ſaid he, and there is no verbal proceſs concerning this adventure, or, if there was, there would be nothing in it at preſent, which could exclude all ſuſpicions. I have obſerved in another article (6) the prodigious negligence of thoſe, who are fond of relating myſterious events; they do not take any precautions againſt thoſe, who are diſpoſed to believe nothing. They have no charity for thoſe, who have the moſt occaſion for it. Why do not they procure judicial informations, and draw up verbal proceſſes? For inſtance, the Tarentines ſhould have deſired the Magiſtrates to order it to be engraven upon a pillar, that on ſuch a day ſuch a Prieſt had dug up a book before all the people, and had taken his oath, that St. Cataldus had appeared to him &c (7). It would have been proper to have ſent to all the Regiſter-Offices of the Kingdom an authentick copy of the Act, which the Magiſtrates had drawn up; and to have requeſted the Embaſſadors of all foreign States to ſend ſuch a copy to their maſters. You will tell me, that the Legend of St. Cataldus cited by Spondanus gives teſtimony to this great event. I anſwer, that this is of uſe to thoſe only, who have no occaſion for it. Thoſe, who believe ſuch a thing upon the faith of a Legend-Writer, would believe it upon a mere hear-ſay; and thoſe, who are incredulous, and conſequently objects of charity with regard to the great promoters of extraordinary events, which are not well proved, are not at all moved by the teſtimony of the Legend. They are therefore cruelly deſerted, when you neglect to prepare for them the remedy which would cure them.

Let us not be ſurprized, that it is difficult to ſearch out the truth of things, which happened, it is ſaid, about the end of the XIth Century; for I do not think it poſſible for private men to diſcover certainly what relates to the Blackſmith of Salon (8). The affair is freſh: it is but two or three months (9) ſince he was ſent to Paris to execute the command which an apparition had given him, to go and declare certain things to the King. He was at Paris and at Court, and ſent home again. This is all that is certain; a thouſand other facts, which have been related in the public news-papers, are doubtful; for ſome perſons deny, and others affirm them; ſome maintain that he ſpoke with the King himſelf, others ſay only with a Secretary of State. The moſt indefatigable enquirers would loſe their patience, before they could diſcover the truth hid under an heap of oppoſite aſſertions and denials. What is moſt extraordinary and capable of impoſing upon poſterity, is, that an anonymous Writer has had the preſumption to publiſh a Letter (10), in which he gives an account of I know not how many converſations, which he, ſays he, had in confidence with the Blackſmith of Salon. He relates ſo many wonderful particularities, that one cannot be ſufficiently aſtoniſhed. Muſt the public be ſo ſoon deceived, and a ſnare prepared for poſterity ſo ſuddenly? Is it to be ſuffered, that any thing ſhould appear on this point, but what is confirmed by good atteſtations, and may paſs for an inconteſtable evidence? For our part, let us warn the public to reject theſe impoſtures. There is no better

(1) Annal. Eccleſ. ad an. 1492. num. 13. pag. m. 204.

* It might be in the Italian, Il Vero, or la Verita, i. e. The Truth.

(2) Lib. 7. cap. 11. pag. m. 465, 466.

(3) Idem, ibid.

(4) Satis conſtat, ſays he twice. In eo certum eſt. Alexander ab Alexandro, Genial. Dier. lib. 3. cap. 15. pag. 734.

(5) See the words of Philip de Comines in the preceding note.

(6) In the note [C] of the Article CATTHO.

(7) Obſerve, that this inſcription ſhould have been made while the event was freſh, for otherwiſe it would not be a good proof now.

(8) It is the country of Noſtradamus in Provence.

(9) I write this in the beginning of June 1697.

(10) It was printed in the Lettres Hiſtoriques, and in the Mercure Politique, for May 1697.

from a contemporary Author, in which we ſee the hiſtory and motives of this impoſture [C]. Writers are not generally agreed upon the country of Cataldus, nor the time when he lived. Some ſay that he was a native of Scotland, others of Ireland. Some affirm that he lived in the fourth Century, or in the beginning of the ſixth; but Johannes Juvenis relates that he converted the Tarentins in the year 160 (e), after the aſcenſion of our Saviour, or in the 166th of the Chriſtian Æra (f). Bartholomew Moron and Bonaventure Moron his brother, who have written his Life, one in proſe, and the other in verſe (g), follow almoſt the ſame Chronology, ſince they aſſure us that he came to Tarentum under the Pontificate of Anicetus, and the Empire of Marcus Aurelius, about the year

(e) Joh. Juvenis, in Præfat. Librorum de Antiquitate & varia Tarentinorum Fortuna, apud Uſſerium de Britan. Eccleſ. Primordiis, pag. 749. ed. Dublin 1639.

(f) Idem, lib. 8. cap. 2. apud eundem, ibid.

(g) It is a Poem in 6 books, intitled Cataldius: printed at Rome in 1604, with a Diſcourſe in Italian by the ſame Author in praiſe of St. Cataldus, and with the Life of this Saint by Bartholomew Moron.

ter way of puniſhing the boldneſs of theſe Writers, than by not paying any regard to their accounts. That News-Writer, who when he publiſhed the anonymous letter, declared that he believed it to be a forgery (11), deſerves highly to be commended. This will be of ſome uſe at a proper time and place.

(11) See the Mercure Hiſtorique, for May 1697.

I give you the ſubſtance of a long converſation, in which Mr. * maintained to me, that we could not be aſſured, that the pretended Book of St. Cataldus was diſcovered at Tarentum. We ſhall ſee preſently that he affirmed too much, and that it is a fact inconteſtable, that there was ſuch a proceſſion, with all its conſequences.

[C] I ſhall quote a paſſage . . . . in which we ſee the hiſtory and motives of this impoſture.] I deſire the reader to conſider the preceding note only as a repreſentation of the vanity of conjectures; I mean the moſt plauſible conjectures, which can be formed, when we know but imperfectly the circumſtances of an action, and judge of things without hearing both ſides. We ſhall hear but one in the queſtion before us, if we only conſult Alexander ab Alexandro, and thoſe, who have copied him. We expoſe ourſelves therefore to throw out deluſive conjectures, whatever care we take to conſult probability. To proceed prudently in this point, we ought to enquire, whether other Authors of equal credit have written in a different manner. I have met with one, who ſhews me, that the account of that Writer is the popular one, but that the learned men, who had breathed the air of the Court, would tell the ſtory after another manner. Jovian Pontanus informs me, that a Spaniſh Monk, who was ambitious and bold, took upon him the character of a Preacher, tho' he was entirely ignorant. He preached with ſuch confidence, that he boaſted of a private converſation with an Angel, in which, he ſaid, he learned all that he taught the people with regard to Religion. He aſſured them that this Angel had revealed to him what perſons were in heaven, and who were ſuffering the torments of hell (12). At laſt not being able to perſuade Ferdinand to baniſh all the Jews from his Kingdom of Naples, as his couſin Ferdinand King of Aragon had done from his dominions, he reſolved upon an artifice. He engraved upon a plate of lead what he thought proper, pretending St. Cataldus to be the Author of it, and then buried it near Tarentum under the wall of a Chapel half in ruins. Three years after having ſuborned a Prieſt, who declared that St. Cataldus appeared to him, &c. he cauſed this leaden plate to be dug up; in which were found ſeveral enigmatical expreſſions, which tended to ſhew the King the obligation he was under of extirpating Judaiſm. The pretended command of Cataldus, was, that Ferdinand ſhould read this letter only with that ſervant, whom he knew to be moſt virtuous and faithful. The Prince detected the forgery, and did not employ the Monk in decyphering the prophecy. The Monk was ſo exaſperated, that he declaimed againſt every body with the utmoſt violence. He ſcarce ſpared St. Cataldus himſelf, and grew ſo outrageous, that all the States of Italy, and eſpecially the Court of Rome, were alarmed at the diſcovery of this leaden plate. A great number of people, who underſtand Latin, have not the Books of Pontanus, and will therefore be glad to read here his account in the original language. Denique cum Ferdinando perſuadere arte nullâ aut ratione poſſet, ut univerſam Judæorum gentem omnino exterminaret è regni finibus, exemplo Ferdinandi patruelis Hiſpaniarum Regis, Tarenti cum ipſe ageret, commentum hoc iniit. E plumbo tabulam divi Cataldi nomine clanculum à ſe inſcriptam haud Tarento procul in ſacello ſemidiruto ſub parietem occuluit, quam triennio poſt eruendam curavit corrupto ſacerdote, qui diceret, in ſomnis aſtitiſſe ſibi Cataldum monſtrantem quo in loco tabella eſſet abdita, commonentemque uti cum populo ſupplice, collegioque Sacerdotum iret ad effodiendam illam, quam effoſſam curaret ad regem deferendam, communicandam ab eo uni tantum viro, quem è ſuis optimum noſceret, ac maximè fidum. Deum enim iratum illi futurum, clademque ac calamitatem immiſſurum, ni quod in tabulâ ſcriptum eſſet, & cautum, à rege præſtaretur. Scriptum verò ipſum per ambages quaſdam, ac latebricoſa verba eò ſpectabat, uti Judæorum exterminatio indicaretur. Rex acceptâ tabulâ deprehendit fraudem, quâ deprehensâ minimè Franciſcum ad eam legendam ſecum adhibuit, arbitratus eum interpretaturum verba in eam ſententiam, diſſimulavitque rem ipſam ſummâ cum taciturnitate ac prudentiâ. At Franciſcus re cognitâ, furore percitus, quod tantum commentum falſum eum habuiſſet, non populo, non regi, vix ipſi Cataldo publicis pepercit in prædicationibus, in tantumque incanduit, ut Italia ferè omnis, ipſeque in primis Romanus Pontifex de tabulæ hujus fuerit inventione ſolicitus atque anxius (13). We may obſerve, that Philip Camerarius cites the account of the Neapolitan Civilian as a true Hiſtory (14): it is in the ſecond volume of his Hiſtorical Meditations (15). He ſubjoins the words of Philip de Comines. Simon Goulart, the French Tranſlator of this Work of Camerarius, has frequently inſerted in it his own Collections in crochets: I am certain, that he would readily have inſerted Pontanus's account, if he had known it. He has introduced on this occaſion another fact, which it is proper to mention here. "John de la "Geſſée, Secretary of the Chamber to Francis de "Valois, Duke of Alençon and Anjou, publiſhed his "Poetical Works at Antwerp, printed by Plantin in "1583. In the VIth Book of his Miſcellanies, p. "678 and 679, he tranſlates a Prophecy in Latin of "Cataldus againſt the Apocalyptical Babylon, begin-"ning with theſe words, Heu, heu, plange, infelix Ba-"bylon. This is all that there is in Latin, the Poet "being content with giving us forty two French verſes, "which mention the wonderful exploit of a King of "France, his memorable victories, and his death up-"on mount Calvary, after a long courſe of years "ſpent in war. He promiſes then an entire reſtora-"tion of things, and ſpeaks of it as the end of the world. "This I have not thought proper to decypher more "particularly for ſeveral good reaſons (16)." We have here an inſtance of prophetical impoſtures. The pretended Book of St. Cataldus related only to the Kingdom of Naples, and it was ſcarce ſeen by any perſon. And yet here is a French Poet, who about a Century after tells us, that it contained threatnings againſt the Babylon in the Revelations of St. John, and the moſt glorious promiſes to a King of France. Thoſe, who employ ſuch machines, are glad to cover themſelves with ſome great name. That of Cataldus appeared to them proper for this deſign; upon which they heap'd forgery upon forgery.

(12) Frater Franciſcus Hiſpanus . . . quamvis rudis atque indoctus, tractus tamen audaciâ atque ambitione, pulpitum aſcendere eſt auſus, tantoque ſive faſtu, ſive temeritate, palàm ut aſſeveraret, prædicare ſe de religione Chriſtianiſque rebus, docente ac dictante angelo, cujus admonitu & futura quædam prædiceret, & qui cum divis in cœlo e mortuis agerent, qui rurſus apud inferos cruciarentur, ſciret ac proferret. Jov. Pontanus, de Sermone, lib. 2. cap. ult. p. m. 1623.

(13) Idem, ibid. pag. 1623, 1624.

(14) Alexander ab Alexandro.

(15) Book 1. cap. 11.

(16) Simon Goulart cap. 2. lib. 1. vol. 2. of the Meditations Hiſtoriques de Camerar. pag. m. 48.

We ought to reflect that Pontanus's account made no progreſs, nor ſtopped the courſe of theſe falſities. There are a great many Writers, who mention as an inconteſtable truth the diſcovery of Cataldus's Prophecy without taking any notice of the other repreſentation of the affair. Bartholomew Moron is one of theſe in his life of St. Cataldus: he alledges the Regiſters of the Church of Tarentum, he quotes the teſtimony of Alexander ab Alexandro, and what he might have read in the 1ſt Chapter of the VIIIth Book of Peter Galatin de Eccleſiâ deſtitutâ (17). Anthony Caraccioli publiſhed at Naples in 1626 an anonymous Annaliſt with four other antient Chronologers. This Annaliſt affirms, that in 1494 there were dug up plates of lead, upon year 170. Dempſter makes him flouriſh after the middle of the fourth Century (b). Alexander ab Alexandro places him about an hundred years lower. Conſult the learned Archbiſhop Uſher (i), who maintains that Cataldus was not in Scotland, as Dempſter affirms, but in Ireland, and cites a great number of Authors. I am ſurprized that he did not know the paſſage of Jovian Pontanus, which I have quoted in the Remark [C].

(17) See Uſſer. de Britann. Eccleſ. Primord. pag. 758.

(b) Dempſter, Hiſt. Eccleſ. Scotor. lib. 3. num. 278.

(i) De Britann. Eccleſ. Primord. pag. 751, & ſeq.

upon which St. Cataldus had engraved his Prophecies, and mentioned the ſudden death of the King; and that in ſhort, the King died as ſoon as this monument was preſented to him. Iſto anno MCCCCXCIII fuit repertus Tarenti liber Sancti Cataldi conſiſtens in tribus Laminis plumbeis, videlicet duabus extremis ſemi ſcriptis, & media ſcripta ex utroque latere; qui præſentatus fuit Domino Regi, loquens de dicti Regis repentinâ morte; & ſic fuit repente mortuus (18). i. e. "In "this year 1494 there was found at Tarentum a Book "of St. Cataldus conſiſting of three leaden plates, "the two outermoſt being half engraved upon, and "the middle plate engraved on both ſides; which "Book was preſented to the King, and mentioned "his ſudden death; and ſo he died ſuddenly." We have ſeen that the diſcovery is placed under the year 1492. This was not ſuitable to the views of our Annaliſt; he wanted the ſudden death of the King of Naples, and he found nothing of that kind at that time. He therefore pitched upon the year when Ferdinand died.

(18) See the ſame Uſher. Ibid.

CATIUS, an Epicurean Philoſopher mentioned by Cicero [A]. Horace ſpeaks alſo of him in one of his Satyrs, if we may believe the Commentators [B]. Mr. Le Fevre has alledged ſome arguments againſt them, which Mr. Dacier his ſon-in-law has confuted [C], making

[A] Cicero mentions him.] He ſays, that Catius called Spectra, what Democritus and Epicurus had named εἴδωλα, by which they meant the images, which repreſent to us the object of the ſenſes, and which the School-men call intentional Species. He alſo ſays, that it was not long ſince this Catius died, and gives him the ſirname of Inſuber. We meet with all this in a Letter (1), which Cicero wrote to Caius Caſſius, one of the conſpirators againſt Cæſar; who was very much addicted to the Epicurean Sect. This man imagining that Cicero had banter'd the Epicureans for Ruſticity, by mentioning theſe Spectres of Catius, anſwered him (2), that he would quote him ſo many ruſtical Stoics, that he would be forced to acknowledge, that Catius was of Athens. He adds, that Catius was one of thoſe, who put a very bad conſtruction upon Epicurus's words. And as this was ſaid on occaſion of a very grave ſentence of the Author of the ſect, namely (3), that a man cannot live with pleaſure, without doing what is honeſt and juſt, he hints, that as Catius explained very ill the doctrine of the Idola, by his Spectres, ſo he was one of thoſe unworthy Epicureans, who explained of the corporeal pleaſures, what their maſter meant only of thoſe of the mind. This is, no doubt, the chief argument of thoſe who pretend, that Horace choſe to explain, under the character of Catius, ſeveral rules and maxims relating to Cookery, and very proper to turn the Paraſites and voluptuous Epicureans into ridicule. Epicuri de grege porcos. (Swines of the herd of Epicurus.)

(1) The 17th of the 15th Book ad Familiares.

(2) This Anſwer is the 19th Letter of the ſame Book. Lambinus, in Hor. Sat. 4. ſhould not have aſcribed to Cicero, as he has done, the ſecond paſſage relating to Catius.

(3) Οὐκ ἐστιν ἀδύνατον ἡδέως ἄνευ τοῦ καλῶς καὶ δικαίως ζῆν.

[B] Horace . . . alſo . . . if we may believe the Commentators.] If it be a miſtake to think that the Catius mentioned by Cicero, and the Catius in Horace are the ſame perſon, it is a miſtake of a very long ſtanding. For we read in the antient Commentators of Horace, that this Poet, in order to turn the Epicureans into ridicule, had made uſe of the character of M. Catius, an Epicurean, and Author of four Books concerning the nature of things *, and the Summum bonum, or Supreme good. We alſo find there, that when the ſame Catius happened to treat in that work, of ſomething concerning paſtry, he uſed to boaſt that he had invented it (4), hæc primus invenit & cognovit Catius Miltiades, ſaid he, ſpeaking of himſelf. The author of theſe four Books is certainly the ſame with him, of whom Quintilian ſpeaks thus in the firſt Chapter of the fourth Book of his Inſtitutiones Oratoriæ. Catius the Epicurean is not an Author of very deep learning, but yet he is agreeable. In Epicureis levis quidem, ſed non injucundus tamen auctor eſt Catius. It is alſo certain that he is the ſame with the Catius Inſuber mentioned by Cicero. The ſirname of Miltiades might indeed occaſion ſome difficulty, and it perſuaded Cruquius that Catius Inſuber is not the perſon ſo much ridiculed in Horace. The other Commentators do not mind this difficulty. Lambinus, Chabot, Fabrini, &c. maintain that the Poet ſpeaks of Catius the Epicurean Philoſopher. Peter Victorius (5) and Gaſſendi are of the ſame opinion. In a word, it was the general opinion of the learned, when Mr. Le Fevre undertook to confute it.

* Or perhaps the Univerſum De Rerum Natura.

(4) Mr. Dacier, in the 7th vol. pag. 365. tranſlates the words of the antient Commentator (and perhaps he is in the right) as tho' he had ſaid, that Catius wrote a book upon Paſtry, in which, ſpeaking of a certain kind of Cakes, he uſed to ſay, I have invented this, I made it be in vogue. But the other explication ſeems to be more literal; for the Latin words according to Cruquius's edition, pag. 460 are, Irridet eum quod de opere piſtorio in libro ſcribit de ſe ipſo, hoc primum invenit & cognovit Catius Miltiades.

(5) In Cicer. Ep. 14. lib. 15. ad Famil.

[C] Mr. Le Fevre has alledged ſome arguments againſt them, which Mr. Dacier . . . has confuted.] Mr. Le Fevre's chief argument is (6), that ſince Catius died before Cicero, he could not be alive when Horace wrote the IVth Satire of the IId Book. Mr. Dacier pretends that this proof is very weak, and that we muſt follow the general opinion (7). He argues in the following manner. Does it follow, that Catius was dead, when Horace read this Satire, becauſe he was dead when Cicero wrote the XVIth Letter of the XVth Book? It is certain that Cicero's letter was written, when Auguſtus was Conſul the fourth time, in the year of Rome 723. Horace was then 36 years old. Why could he not have made this Satire before he was of that age? This will not afford the leaſt room for doubting. So that this paſſage of Cicero, inſtead of proving what Mr. Le Fevre pretended, informs us on the contrary, that this Satire is one of the pieces which Horace wrote in his younger years, and before he was twenty five.

(6) Tanaquillæ Faber, Ep. 57. lib. 2.

(7) Remarques ſur Horace, tom. 7. pag. m. 348.

This is one of thoſe paſſages, concerning which a man can hardly truſt his own eyes, and which would appear a wonder, if we had not daily experience of what may be occaſioned by an abſence of mind. It happens to many Mathematicians, that after they have toiled and ſweated for three or four hours together, in order to correct their accounts, and find out the cauſe of their miſreckoning, they diſcover at laſt, that in multiplying, they ſay, without perceiving it themſelves, three times ſeven is twenty two. It is by ſuch an abſence of mind that Mr. Dacier wrote in his copy, and left in the proof-ſheets, that Cicero wrote to Caſſius in the year of Rome 722, when Auguſtus was Conſul the fourth time *, and conſequently this is a miſtake, from which we ought not to infer any thing againſt his learning, of which he has given ſo many proofs in other places. Every body knew, that Cicero periſhed during the unhappy proſcription of the Triumvirate, A. U. 710. It is not therefore certain that the letter to Caſſius was written, when Auguſtus was Conſul the fourth time, A. U. 723. It was written in the fourth Conſulſhip of Julius Cæſar, as it is obſerved in the Summary of that Letter, and this has probably occaſioned Mr. Dacier's abſence of mind. However that be, Mr. Le Fevre's argument will have ſome ſtrength, if it be ſufficient to ſuppoſe, that Catius was dead, when Horace wrote the IVth Satire of the IId Book. For ſince Cæſar was Conſul the fourth time, A. U. 708, when Horace was about twenty, it follows that Catius was dead, when Horace was twenty years old. Now, it is not very probable, that he wrote this Satire at that age. There are, I own ſome inſtances of very young Poets, who wrote good Satire; it might alſo be ſaid, that Horace took care to correct this Satire before he publiſhed it, as we have it now. But after all, theſe arguments ſhould have been urged againſt Mr. Le Fevre.

* Mr. Dacier has corrected this miſtake in the edition of 1704. (Addit. of the Amſterd. edition.)

But there is another argument againſt him, which is much ſtronger, namely, that tho' Catius was dead, yet this could not hinder Horace from making uſe of a fiction, or writing by way of dialogue, as he has making uſe of that liberty, which the Republick of Letters enjoys [D]. Gaſſendi deſerves to be a little criticized upon in this place [E]. Coſtar deſerves it no leſs.

done. It is well known what liberties Poets take with regard to Chronology: An Anachroniſm is not a ſhameful error in them. So that if any Epicurean Philoſopher lay at Rome under the ill repute, as Montmaur did at Paris, there was no reaſon, why even after his death, he might not be introduced as acting his part in a Dramatic Poem, which was deſigned to expoſe the gluttony and paraſitical humour of the falſe Epicureans. I do not think, that they "would have ſcrupled in France to make uſe of Montmaur's name in a Satire fifteen or ſixteen years after his death, in the ſame manner as Horace did that of Catius. We may perhaps alſo ſuppoſe, that this Poet did not intend, his Satire ſhould be looked upon as a dialogue between Catius Inſuber and himſelf; but that he only pitched upon that name, becauſe he deſigned to expreſs ſome thoughts, which ſuited the character of that Philoſopher (8). This ſeems to me to be moſt probable; but tho' he had intended it as a dialogue between Catius and himſelf, yet I do not think he deſerves to be cenſured, as Plato has been, becauſe in his dialogues he makes dead perſons ſpeak with ſome who were ſtill living (9). The Poets have in this reſpect more privileges than the Philoſophers. Upon the whole the paſſage in Cicero does not ſeem to be a good argument, that Horace wrote this Satire in his youth. A man would be very much miſtaken, who ſhould pretend, that all thoſe whom Juvenal mentions in the preſent tenſe, were then alive (10). Boileau has lately mentioned Roberval in his Xth Satire, as a man ſtill living. If our deſcendants ſhould infer from thence that Roberval was not yet dead in the year 1694, they would be very much miſtaken. The other arguments which Mr. le Fevre alledges, ſhew, that he had not ſufficiently obſerved, that at the time of Catius, the Epicureans were, generally ſpeaking, ridiculed for their delicacy and daintineſs, without any regard to the temperance of Epicurus, nor to the innocence of the maxims he really maintained. The diſſolute life of a great many Epicureans caſt a blemiſh upon the whole ſect; nor ought we to imagine, that becauſe Horace and his friends were of that ſect, he would therefore ſpare thoſe, who diſgraced it, and loſe thus the opportunity of ſetting off his jeſts and witty ſayings; a Satyriſt is too covetous of ſuch opportunities, not to improve them. Do we not ſee even at this time, that the true Carteſians are the moſt forward to exclaim againſt thoſe, who build too many idle fancies upon the principles of Des Cartes, tho' theſe fancies be not prejudicial to virtue, as were the falſe comments upon Epicurus's doctrine, which for that very reaſon deſerved to be and really was expoſed to the ſevere ſtrokes of critical Writers? Who would believe that Mr. Boileau, if he really was a Carteſian, as he ſeems to be, would for that reaſon forbear ridiculing that Sect in a Satire, and would ſcruple to caſt his witty reflections at ſome of Des Cartes's followers, if he found an opportunity for it, and they were gone ſo far in the abuſe of that Philoſophy, as to employ the baſeſt and moſt infamous practices? Credat Judæus Apella. But if Mr. le Fevre has not proved, that the IVth Satire of the IId Book of Horace is not levelled at the Epicureans in general, nor at Catius the Philoſopher in particular, yet he ſhews by the paſſage in Cicero concerning the death of Catius, that the ancient and modern Commentators on Horace have not well underſtood in what manner Catius was brought in there. They thought, no doubt, that he was ſtill living, when the Satire was publiſhed, and that the Poet intended his account ſhould be taken for matter of fact, I mean for a real converſation, which paſſed between him and that Philopher. But ſince it is very probable that Catius was dead, when this Satire was written, it muſt not be thought that Horace intended it as a real dialogue with the deceaſed. He only imagined a character, and gave the name of Catius to the perſon repreſented under that character: and this was ſufficient for his deſign.

In what the Critic of Saumur has juſtly pointed out the miſtakes of the Commentators.

[D] .... Making uſe of that liberty, which the Republic of letters enjoys.] That Republic is a very free State. No other authority is there acknowledged but that of reaſon and truth; under their Auſpices men may make war innocently againſt any perſon whatſoever. The friends ought to beware of their friends, the father of their ſons; the fathers in-law, of their ſons in-law; it is here, as it was in the Iron age,

——— Non hoſpes ab hoſpite tutus,
Non Socer a genero (11).
That is,
"The gueſt, by him who harbour'd him is ſlain,
"The ſon-in-law purſues the father's life.
Dryden.

(11) Ovid. Metam. lib. 1. vet. 144.

Every one is there both ſovereign and accountable to every one. The laws of civil ſociety have not put the leaſt reſtraint upon the independency of the ſtate of nature, with regard to error and ignorance. Every private man has in that reſpect the right of the ſword, and may uſe it, without aſking leave of thoſe who govern. It is very eaſy to know, why the Sovereign was obliged to let every one enjoy the liberty of writing againſt Authors, who are miſtaken, and not that of publiſhing libels. It is becauſe libels tend to deprive a man of his reputation, which is a kind of civil murther (12), and is conſequently a kind of puniſhment, which ought not to be inflicted on any perſon but by the authority of the Magiſtrate. But the cenſuring of a Book tends only to ſhew, that an Author has not ſuch or ſuch a degree of knowledge; and ſince notwithſtanding this want of learning, he may enjoy all the rights and privileges of a member of civil ſociety, without the leaſt blemiſh on his reputation as an honeſt man and good ſubject, it is not incroaching upon the authority of the Sovereign, to acquaint the public with the faults or the errors, which are in a Book. This leſſens indeed the reputation of a learned man, which an Author had gained, and deprives him of the profits which his reputation procured him; but then if this be done by maintaining the rights of reaſon, only for the ſake of truth, and in a civil manner, nobody can juſtly complain of it (13). Such a critick is not in the leaſt like the Authors of Libels; he aſſerts nothing without good authorities; and if he be at the ſame time both the accuſer and the witneſs, he is alſo liable himſelf to a retaliation; he runs the ſame riſk to which he expoſes another. Whereas a writer of Libels hides himſelf, that he might not be called upon to prove his aſſertions; and that he might hurt without being anſwerable for it. It is therefore agreeable to natural juſtice, that every member of the Commonwealth ſhould be independent with regard to the conſutation of Authors, without any regard to the qualities of a father, a father-in-law, a huſband, a brother, &c. And this is alſo very often the cuſtom. Joſeph Scaliger and Iſaac Voſſius have not much regarded the opinions of their fathers; and we ſee that Monſr. Bernoulli Profeſſor at Baſil, and Mr. Bernoulli Profeſſor at Groningen, do not much ſpare one another, tho' they are brothers (14).

(12) See the Diſſertation upon Libels, printed at the end of Mr. Bayle's Dictionary in French.

(13) The Abbot of St. Real has made ſome objections againſt this Theſis in his book, intitled, De la Critique. But it would be an eaſy task to anſwer them.

(14) See the Journal des Savans, for the year 1698.

[E] Gaſſendi deſerves to be a little criticized upon in this place.] He has obſerved, as a thing very honourable to the memory of Catius Inſuber, that Horace ſtiles him learned (15). But if he had rightly conſider'd that paſſage, he would have ſeen that it is a mere raillery, and that Horace can ſo little be quoted in favour of Catius, that on the contrary, his teſtimony can only render that Philoſopher more ridiculous. It is not many years ſince a Carteſian, having ſaid in his conferences, that this propoſition two and two make four, cannot be denied, was ſoon after honoured with the title of Learned Man for that very thought. Two and two make four, ſaid one of the company, as Mr. ſuch an one has very learnedly obſerved. If they had publiſhed an account of this Conference, I ſhould rather quote them to prove that this Philoſopher had been ſtiled learned, than quote, with Gaſſendi, the Docte Cati of the Satire of Horace, in order to honour the memory of Catius Inſuber. Gaſſendi had done better, not to omit mentioning the four Books, which Catius wrote de Rerum Natura & Summo Bono.

(15) Gaſſendi, de vita & moribus Epicuri, lib. 2. cap. 6.

Let me beg leave to obſerve by the by, that there are ſo many quotations in Gaſſendi's writings, that we are

(8) Eſpecially if he be the ſame with Catius Miltiades, who boaſted, that he had adorned his writings with his own inventions in the Art of Paſtry. See above, quotation (1).

(9) Apud Athenæum, lib. 9. cap. 15. pag. m. 505, 506. See alſo lib. 5. cap. 16, and 18. and Macrob. Saturn. lib. 1. cap. 1.

(10) Alii vero de Agrippina Claudii uxore (in qua opinione & nos ſumus) intelligi volunt quæ, ut ſcribit Tranquillus, maritum medicato ſuſtulit boleto poſt adoptatum Neronem, nam Poëta ita plerumque de mortuis loquitur, ac ſi viverent præſentesque eſſent ut de Criſpino, Mario, Priſco, Matbone cauſidico. Britannicus, in Juven. Sat. 1. ver. 69. i. e. "Others, "(of whoſe opinion I am) "underſtand it "of Agrippina, "the wife of "Claudius, who "diſpatched her "huſband with "a poiſoned "muſhroom, "after he had "adopted Nero. "For the Poet "uſes to ſpeak "of the dead, as "tho' they were "alive, and preſent; thus he "mentions Criſpinus, Marius, "Priſcus, Ma-"tho the Law-"yer."

*Whether Horace being an Epicurean, could ridicule his brethren.

leſs [F]. Glandorpius alſo is miſtaken [G]; nor would I maintain, on Chabot's authority, that Catius taught Virgil the Epicurean Philoſophy [H]. A particular reaſon obliges me to mention in this Article a miſtake of Scaliger concerning the Coloſſus of Rhodes, which I have mentioned in the plan of this work [I].

CATO

are not to wonder, they are not all very juſt; ſince his chief deſign related to other things, namely the philoſophical opinions. It may be aſſerted, that he was the moſt eminent Philoſopher amongſt the Humaniſts, and the moſt learned Humaniſt amongſt the Philoſophers. Philoſophorum literatiſſimus; Literatorum maximè Philoſophus. They, who took care of the edition of his works after his death, had not patience enough; hence it is, that they have not placed the quotations right. For inſtance, in page the 15th of the firſt volume, they quote Terence in Andr. over againſt a paſſage from Perſius; whereas they ſhould have placed that quotation three or four lines higher, where the Author had alledged a ſentence of Terence.

* Sat. 4. lib. 2.

[F] Coſtar deſerves it no leſs.] Here follow his words. "Is not Catius a polite Author, and has he "any ways leſſened his reputation, tho' in Horace he "diſcourſes of Cookery with ſo much gravity and "ſeriouſneſs (16)?" The moſt ignorant ſchool-boy, who had read that paſſage in Horace with a little attention, would anſwer yes to this queſtion of Coſtar; ſince it is plain that the Catius in Horace is a man, who is turned into ridicule. I wonder Mr. Girac did not cenſure this error of his adverſary.

(16) Coſtar, Suite de la Defenſe de Voiture, pag. 423.

[G] Glandorpius is alſo miſtaken.] Having mentioned Catius Celſus the Prætor under the Conſulſhip of L. Cotta and L. Torquatus, that is, in the year of Rome 688, he adds, that there was another Catius more ancient than this (17), and means him who is the ſubject of this article. For Glandorpius aſcribes to him what Quintilian and Cicero ſay of Catius the Epicurean; he even pretends, that Horace mentions him in the fourth Satire of the ſecond Book. How then could he imagine, that he was more ancient than Catius Celſus? It is probable, that he did not call to mind the common opinion, that the Catius mentioned by (18) Horace was ſtill living when the Poet ſpoke of him, nor the paſſage of Cicero, which acquaints us, that Catius Inſuber died before the year 708 ſince the building of Rome.

(17) Glandorp. Onomaſt. pag. 211.

(18) In Horat. Sat. 4. lib. 2.

[H] I would not maintain on Chabot's authority, that Catius taught Virgil the Epicurean Philoſophy.] If I were aſked, where Chabot read (19) that Virgil took a liking to the Epicurean Philoſophy, by the care of our Catius, who was born at Milan, I think I might anſwer, without fearing to be miſtaken, that he had it from Joſeph Scaliger's Commentary upon Virgil's Catalecta. But yet I would not, for all that, be more perſuaded of the truth of this fact; for that great Critic does not alledge one good proof of his aſſertion. I find indeed in Servius, that Virgil and Varus ſtudied Philoſophy under Syron (20); but he does not ſay a word of Catius; and beſides all the Inſubri were not of Milan.

(19) In VI Eclog. Virgilii.

(20) Scaliger and Chabot call him Sciron, and ſay, that Virgil was his diſciple at Milan.

[I] Here follows a miſtake of Scaliger . . . which I have mentioned in the plan of this work.] I was determined to ſuppreſs this remark, ſince I might not inſert it in its natural place, which was the article of the Coloſſus of Rhodes, and which I do not publiſh in this edition. I was, I ſay, determined to this, when a particular reaſon obliged me to alter my deſign. I ſhall explain this; but firſt I ſhall tranſcribe my remark as it ſtands in the Sketch of this Dictionary.

A REMARK upon the effects of an abſence of mind; and Scaliger quoted as an inſtance.

The great Scaliger, who practiſed the Rules of Arithmetic oftener than any Banker or Treaſurer, laboured, no doubt, under ſuch an abſence of mind, when he reckoned how much the famous Coloſſus of Rhodes weighed. He found by his reckoning, that ſince the Merchant, who bought the pieces of the Coloſſus, loaded nine hundred Camels with them, they muſt have weighed ſeven hundred and twenty thouſand pounds, and one hundred and forty four quintals (21); for, ſays he, the load of a camel is twice that of a he-mule, and weighs eight hundred pounds. It is eaſy to find by the rules of Multiplication, that nine hundred camels, each of them loaded with eight hundred pounds, bear ſeven hundred and twenty thouſand pounds; but in order to find, that one hundred and forty four quintals are equal to ſeven hundred and twenty thouſand pounds, one muſt multiply the quintals by five thouſand inſtead of an hundred; that is, one muſt not remember that a quintal weighs but an hundred pounds, and think it to weigh five thouſand. A great genius will ſooner commit ſuch a blunder, than a man of an ordinary capacity, and does not therefore deſerve to be inſulted on that account. So that Leo Allatius's ſeverity, who has cenſured this blunder in a very abuſive manner, cannot be well excuſed. Mr. Chevreau cenſures it as he ſhould do (22), which deſerves to be acknowledged; but he muſt give me leave to obſerve, that ſince he thought, that Scaliger reckoned the load of a camel to be of nine hundred pounds, he ſhould not have granted him, that the loads of nine hundred camels comes only to ſeven hundred and twenty thouſand. After he had been ſo far miſtaken as to put nine hundred inſtead of eight hundred, he ought to have found an error in the ſum total of pounds, and not in the equality only which Scaliger ſuppoſes to be between that ſum and one hundred and forty four quintals. This would have been erring methodically, which is a kind of exactneſs not to be deſpiſed. Mr. Chevreau thinks, that this paſſage was ill printed, and therefore he would not employ it to the ſame purpoſe, as I do in this place; namely, as an inſtance of the effects, which an abſence of mind may have upon us.

(21) Scalig. Animadverſ. in Chron. Euſebii, pag. 138. edit. 1658.

(22) Hiſt. du Monde, tom. 4. pag. 290. Dutch edit. 1687, and pag. 329. Dutch edit. 1698.

This abſtract of the article of the Coloſſus is deſigned as an anſwer to thoſe, who might object to me, that I have no reaſon to ſuppoſe, that in multiplying, one may happen to ſay three times ſeven is twenty two. The manner in which I account for this ſmall miſtake of Scaliger, ſeems ſo much the more probable to me, that I do not find the leaſt ground for a conjecture, which may offer itſelf immediately; namely, that the quintal mentioned by Scaliger, and which is that of Guienne and Spain, weighed five thouſand pounds (23). But perſons, who are well acquainted with this matter, have aſſured me, that they know of no ſuch quintal neither in Guienne nor in Spain.

This is what I have ſaid in the Sketch or Project of this Dictionary; I would not have repeated it in this article, had not Mr. Chauvin, a Miniſter of Rotterdam, communicated to me a writing come from London, containing ſome remarks upon my Project *. They had been ſent to Mr. Chauvin, to be inſerted in his new Journal of the learned, drawn up at Rotterdam. I do not know whether he will inſert them; I have deſired him to do it, and to add my anſwers to them (24). One of theſe remarks contains a conjecture, much more probable than mine, concerning the cauſe of Scaliger's error. I am willing, that the Public ſhould reap the benefit of it, and I am not aſhamed to own, that another conjectured better than I. Here follows that remark: I think, we may gueſs, how Scaliger came to be miſtaken in his account of the weight of the Coloſſus of Rhodes, the pieces of which made up the loads of nine hundred camels. Scaliger reckons the load of a camel to be eight hundred pounds, which according to him is twice the load of a he-mule; the ſum total comes to ſeventy two thouſand weight, which by a monſtrous error he reduces to one hundred and forty four quintals only. Good Arithmeticians uſe, when they multiply, to leave out the cyphers, which are at the end of the number they will multiply, and of the multiplicator, and multiply the figures only, to ſave the trouble of writing uſeleſs cyphers: afterwards they add to the produce as many cyphers as there were at the end both of the multiplicator, and of the number to be multiplied. For inſtance; if I want to know the price of four hundred hogſheads of wine, at ninety livres a hogſhead, I only multiply nine by four, which are the only figures of my two numbers, and I find the produce thirty ſix, to which I add afterwards three cyphers, there being ſo many in my two numbers, the multiplied and the multiplicated, and I find thirty ſix thouſand livres, which was the price I wanted to know. Thus Scaliger having ſuppoſed the load of a camel to be equal to twice the load of a he-mule, or to eight hundred pounds, which are equivalent to eight quintals, and there being nine hundred camels, he multiplied eight by nine, which gave him ſeventy

(23) Vulgo ut mercatores noſtri & Magnarii in Aquitania & Hiſpania loquuntur, (ſeptingenta viginti millia pondo) eſſent centum quadraginta quatuor quintalia. Scaliger, Animadv. in Chron. Euſebii, pag. 138.

* Mr. Chauvin died at Berlin, April the 6th 1725, aged 85. (Add. of the Amſt. edit.)

(24) Having been choſen Profeſſor of Philoſophy at Berlin, ſince the firſt printing of this page, he continued his Journal there, and has inſerted this Writing, with my Anſwers in the Journals of March and April 1696.

CATO the Cenſor. See PORTIUS (MARCUS).

venty two. Now it happens very often, that thoſe, who reckon, are ſo full of a certain notion, that they ſometimes do not only what they did not intend, but even the contrary of what they intended. Scaliger thinking of the double load, which the he-mule can carry, and which is equivalent but to the ſingle load of the camel, inſtead of adding to ſeventy two, the two cyphers of the multiplied number, nine hundred, by which means he ſhould have found the number ſeven thouſand two hundred, which is the real number of the quintals, he doubled the produce ſeventy two, which made one hundred forty four, a number ſo different from ſeven thouſand two hundred, that it is impoſſible to conceive how he could by any other means commit ſuch a blunder: for there is not the leaſt ſhadow of probability, in the conjecture of the Author, who ſuppoſes, that Scaliger forgetting that a quintal is but an hundred weight, reckoned it as tho' it had been five thouſand.

What the author of this writing tells us appears to me to be ſo well grounded, that I do not in the leaſt queſtion, but he has diſcovered the true cauſe of Scaliger's miſtake; a miſtake, which even by this account is as great an inſtance of the effects of an abſence of mind, as it is in the manner, in which I have accounted for it.

CATTHO (ANGELO) Archbiſhop of Vienne * in the fifteenth Century was of Tarento. He followed the party of the Houſe of Anjou in the Kingdom of Naples; wherefore the Dukes John and Nicholas of Calabria (a), who one after another pretended to marry the only daughter of Charles Duke of Burgundy ... left him with that Duke, to manage that match for them. But this negotiation did not ſucceed; they both died in a very little time. After their death, the Duke of Burgundy, who was well acquainted with Angelo Cattho's great judgment and virtue, kept him in his ſervice and gave him a penſion. Cattho took his leave of him in a very civil manner after the battle of Morat, and went to the Court of Lewis XI (b). He was very kindly received, and made Almoner to the King, and afterwards Archbiſhop of Vienne. Some Authors relate, that he was a Phyſician and Aſtrologer to Lewis XI [A]. He was a man of a regular life, of great learning and humility, and very well ſkilled in Mathematicks ... (c) he died after a holy and auſtere life, and lies buried in his Church of Vienne (d). There was a great friendſhip between him and Philip de Comines, when they were at the Court of the Duke of Burgundy; nor were they leſs friends when in the ſervice of King Lewis XI (e). It was at Angelo Cattho's perſuaſion, that Philip de Comines wrote his Memoirs, which are ſtill extant. He declares it in the very beginning, and directs his diſcourſe to him in ſeveral paſſages of his work. It is ſometimes in order to commend him for having foretold events a great while before they happened [B]. They relate very ſurpriſing inſtances of this man's prophetical gift [C], and which might afford a large field for reflections. I have ſome things

* In Dauphiné.

(a) They were heirs to the Houſe of Anjou, and had a right to the Crown of Naples.

(b) Taken from a Diſcourſe prefixed to the Proofs and Illuſtration of the Memoirs of Philip de Comines.

(c) Ibid. pag. 3.

(d) Ibid. pag. 9.

(e) Ibid. pag. 3.

[A] Some Authors relate that he was Phyſician and Aſtrologer to Lewis XI.] Peter Matthieu having ſaid, that this Prince being in a fainting fit (1), the Sieur de Bouchage, who was his Phyſician, and afterwards promoted to the Archbiſhoprick of Vienne, came with ſo much ſpeed to his aſſiſtance, that he made him come to himſelf again, after he had made him take a gliſter, tells us in the Index, that inſtead of Du Bouchage, we ought to read Angelo Cattho. And where he mentions the Aſtrologers, to whom Lewis XI gave ſome employments, and whom he eſteemed; he expreſſes himſelf thus (2): But he had a particular eſteem for Angelo Cattho, who came to France with the Prince of Tarento, and had foretold the Duke of Burgundy and the Duke of Gelderland the misfortunes which happened to them. The King gave him the Archbiſhoprick of Vienne, but he could not reſide upon it, becauſe of the great vexations which thoſe of Dauphiné gave him, and was obliged to retire to Rome (3). Naude ſays the ſame (4), and quotes the Life of Angelo Cattho written by Sleidan (5). I ſhall quote below Claudius Robertus, who aſſerts, that our Cattho was Phyſician to King Lewis XI. This therefore is a matter of fact; for Philip de Comines alſo obſerves it. You came immediately to him, ſays he (6), ſpeaking of a ſickneſs of Lewis XI, My Lord of Vienne, for you was then his Phyſician. I believe, that Peter Matthieu is miſtaken, when he ſays, that Cattho came to France with the Prince of Tarento; for it appears from Philip de Comines's account (7), that this Prince left the Duke de Burgundy, and went to meet Lewis, the day before the battle of Morat, and that Angelo Cattho was ſtill with the Duke after the loſs of that battle. For does not the Hiſtorian, when he had mentioned the affliction of the Duke of Burgundy after that unhappy day; add the following words? You knew this better than I, My Lord of Vienne, ſince you comforted him in that affliction, and prevailed upon him to be ſhaved, for he ſuffered his beard to grow (8). I don't know what we muſt think of Don Juan Vitrian's aſſertion, that Angelo Cattho took ſhelter in France, with John of Anjou Duke of Calabria, and that after the Duke's death, and that of Nicholas of Anjou his ſon, he entered into the ſervice of the Duke of Burgundy (9).

(1) Pierre Matthieu, Hiſt. de Louis XI, liv. 10. towards the beginning, pag. m. 522. under the year 1480.

(2) Ibid. liv. 11. pag. 729.

(3) See the Remark [D] towards the end.

(4) Naude, Add. à l'Hiſt. de Louis XI, pag. 119.

(5) He has prefixed it to his Latin Tranſlation of Philip de Comines.

(6) Philip de Comines, lib. 6. chap. 7. pag. m. 377. under the year 1480.

(7) Ibid. liv. 5. chap. 3. pag. 268.

(8) Ibid. chap. 5. pag. 275.

[B] Comines ... commends him ſometimes for having foretold events, &c.] He relates, that Don Frederic of Arragon Prince of Tarento (10), who had already been above a year with the Duke of Burgundy, in hopes of marrying his daughter, was at laſt tired with his delays, and took his leave of the ſaid Duke the evening before the battle of Morat. ... And indeed, continues he, ſome perſons ſay, that he followed your advice, My Lord of Vienne; for when he was come to the King, I heard him, the Duke of Aſcoli, called Count Julio, and ſeveral others ſay it: and alſo that you had wrote into Italy, and ſaid, what would be the event of the firſt and ſecond battle, ſeveral days before they happened (11). In another place he ſpeaks to him thus: "King Alfonſus "had a ſon called Don Ferrand (Ferdinand), a very "pretty young man, twenty two or twenty three "years old, who bore arms, and was exceedingly be-"loved in the Kingdom. He had a brother, called "Don Federic (Frederic), who was King after "Ferrand, in our time; he was a man of great pru-"dence and conduct, who commanded the naval Ar-"mies. He was educated for a long while on this "ſide of the Alpes, and you, my Lord of Vienne, "have often told me, by your Aſtrology, that he "would be King; and he promiſed me at that time, "that if this happened he would give me a yearly "penſion of four thouſand livres in his Kingdom. "Now this promiſe was made twenty years before the "thing happened (12)."

(9) Juan Vitrian, Notes préliminaires ſur Philip de Comines.

(10) He was the ſon of Ferdinand King of Naples.

(11) Philip. de Comines, liv. 5. chap. 3. pag. m. 266. ad ann. 1476.

(12) Ibid. liv. 7. chap. 4. pag. 437. under the year 1494.

[C] They relate very ſurprizing inſtances of this man's prophetical gift.] There is a ſhort account of Angelo Cattho's Life prefixed to the pieces which ſerve as proofs and illuſtrations of Philip de Comines's Memoirs. This account was found amongſt the papers of an old ſtudious man and a lover of Hiſtory. The Author, who wrote that account, declares, that he related what he had collected and heard concerning him (13) from three perſons of great credit, prudence and authority (14). You will find there the following words (15): "When "he (Cattho) was in the ſaid King Lewis's ſervice... "the

(13) That is to ſay, Angelo Cattho.

(14) They are 1. John Francis de Cardonne, Lord of La Foleyne, and Lord Steward to the King. 2. John Briçonnet, ſecond Preſident of the Court of Accounts at Paris. 3. Renaldo d'Albiano, a Neopolitan Nobleman.

(15) Sommaire, de la Vie d'Angelo Cattho, pag. 14.

" the third battle was fought at Nancy, in which the " Duke (of Burgundy) was killed on the Eve of the " Twelfth-Day (16). King Lewis was then hearing " Maſs in St. Martin's Church at Tours, which is at " leaſt ten long days journey diſtant from Nancy. " The Archbiſhop of Vienne aſſiſted at Maſs as Al- " moner; and when he preſented the Pax * (a) to " him, he told him theſe words: Sir, God grant you " peace and a quiet reign: You may enjoy them if you " pleaſe, Quia conſummatum eſt (It is finiſhed). Your " enemy the Duke of Burgundy is dead; he has been juſt " now killed, and his army routed. The hour of the " day having been ſet down, it was found upon in- " quiry, that the Duke had really been killed that " ſame hour. The King, hearing the Archbiſhop's " words was greatly ſurprized, and aſked him, whe- " ther what he ſaid, was true, and how he knew it. " The Prelate anſwered, that he knew it, as he knew " all the other things, which the Lord had granted " him to foretel both to him, the King, and to the " Duke of Burgundy. Whereupon the King made a " ſolemn promiſe to God and to St. Martin, that if " what the Archbiſhop told him, was true (as indeed " it was ſoon after found to be true) he would cauſe " the grate, which encompaſſed St. Martin's Shrine, " and which was but of iron, to be made of ſilver. " He performed his promiſe ſince, having cauſed a " grate to be made, which coſt an hundred thouſand " livres, or very near." Here follow two other pre- dictions. One day early in the morning Angelo Cattho met William Brigonnet . . . . General of Languedoc, who was going to wait upon Lewis XI at Pleſſis near Tours. Cattho having been ſilent for ſome time, looking up to heaven, and then on the General, he told him at laſt: Sir, I have often told you, that it was dangerous for you to go by water; and that one time or other you will be in great danger, and perhaps find your death there. I come from Pleſſis, whither you are going. The water is very high at Pont-Sainte-Anne, the bridge is broke, and the boat almoſt leaky. Do not go thi- ther, if you will believe me. The General would not be perſuaded; he was ſoon in very great danger of being drowned; for he fell into the water, and would have been loſt, had he not taken hold of a beam which happened to be there. He was brought home again, and was ill for a long time, his ſickneſs being occaſioned both by his fright, and by the great quantity of water which he ſwallowed (17). Angelo Cattho viſited him during his ſickneſs, and told him once, you will become a great man in the Church, and be very near being choſen Pope. Briçonnet was married to Raoullette de Beaune, a young woman, who had already bore him ſome children, and who was not well pleaſed with the prediction; for it was intimating to her, that ſhe would march off firſt (which the women do not much care to do). However ſhe lived a great many years after, and had ſeveral children, ſo that ſhe, and ſeveral other per- ſons uſed to ſay, that the good Archbiſhop did not always tell the truth. Yet ſhe died firſt, and the General her huſband ſurvived her, and continued a widower a long while, without ſhewing the leaſt deſign of entering into Orders (18). But at laſt, having followed Charles VIII in the Conqueſt of Naples, he was ordained at Rome, made Biſhop of St. Malo, and Abbot of St. Germain in the Fields; then Cardinal, and afterwards Archbiſhop of Rheims and of Narbonne; and he had ſome votes at the Election of a Pope after the death of Alexander VI (19). Some Authors relate, that Angelo Cattho fore- told to Bajazet's brother, that " one of the greateſt " Kings in Chriſtendom would endeavour to reſtore " him, but that his deſign would miſcarry; and that " he was in much greater danger from his hidden " enemies, than from thoſe, who declared openly a- " gainſt him, that he had no occaſion to fear the ſword " nor the bow-ſtring, that his fate was hidden, and his " death ſecret (20)." This brother of Bajazet took ſhelter firſt in the Iſland of Rhodes, whence he retired into France, and continued there ſome years; they ſent him afterwards to Rome to be under the protection of Pope Innocent VIII, he lived till the year 1494, when he was poiſoned by Alexander VI, whilſt the King of France deſigned to reſtore him (21).

Theſe are things at which a Philoſopher is extremely puzzled. For it is impoſſible to invent any good Sy- ſtem of Philophy, that will account for them. This obliges moſt of the Philoſophers flatly to deny all the facts of this nature, which are ſo often mentioned in books, and eſpecially in converſation. But it muſt be confeſſed, that this manner of proceeding is not free from inconveniencies, and thoſe cannot reſt ſatisfied with it, who love to examine ſtrictly both ſides of a queſtion. A Chriſtian Philoſopher may eaſily admit, that God endows ſome perſons with the gift of Prophe- cy, when he propoſes to eſtabliſh or to confirm ſome important truths, which concern the Salvation of Men, or to put a ſtop to the exceſſive depravation of manners, or in general to execute ſome extraordinary deſign very neceſſary for the good of the Church. If this or ſome thing of this nature had been the caſe of Angelo Cat- tho, one might believe, that God raiſed him as a Pro- phet. But he was a Courtier, who minded nothing but to conclude a match, which was of temporal ad- vantage, to his principals, or to procure a good em- ployment for himſelf; and beſides, he was a man who ſet up for an Aſtrologer. Now, nothing ſeems more unworthy of God, than to reveal future events to an Aſtrologer, that is to ſay, to reward by ſo great a fa- vour the moſt impertinent and ſilly ſcience, and which is grounded on the moſt abſurd fancies. If a Devil or an evil ſpirit ſhould reveal future events to thoſe men, who calculate nativities, and make figures of geoman- cy (22), we might account for it. For ſince he is a wicked being, he may be capricious, have ridiculous fancies, and direct his actions by trifling motives, in order the better to caſt a ridicule upon every thing. But then, is it poſſible for a created being to know be- fore hand, that twenty years hence, the huſband of a young woman will be made a Cardinal? Is it not ne- ceſſary, in order to foretel this, that a being ſhould know the whole ſeries of almoſt an infinite number of corporeal and ſpiritual motions? Can the knowledge of a creature extend to ſo many things at once? If it does, then there can be no free-will; all the thoughts of men are linked together in a natural and indiſſolu- ble chain. Here then are mazes, in which the reaſon of Philoſophers muſt of neceſſity be loſt and bewildered, They chooſe therefore rather to deny whatever is aſſert- ed concerning Predictions. But even this does not re- move all difficulties; for who would dare to think, that Philip de Comines impoſed upon us, when he aſſerted, that Angelo Cattho foretold him ſeveral times, that Ferdinand of Arragon would be King, twenty years before this happened?

I don't deny, that moſt of the ſtories, which are told concerning Predictions, juſtly deſerve to be conſidered as ſo many impoſtures: for it muſt be owned, that they, who cry them up with the greateſt confidence, are too careleſs in taking the neceſſary precautions a- gainſt an incredulous adverſary; they ſeldom mention the Prediction but after the event; they do not take care to have an account of it inſerted in an authentic Inſtrument drawn up according to the forms of Law, they don't ſupport it by the unqueſtionable authority of a public monument; and ſince they neglect to do all this on thoſe occaſions, in which it would be very eaſy to oppoſe an impenetrable ſhield againſt all the at- tacks of incredulity, they ought not to be ſurprized, that their accounts ſhould be called into queſtion. One of theſe occaſions is the Maſs, during which they pre- tend that Angelo Cattho acquainted the King with the death of the Duke of Burgundy. They ought to have preſented a petition to that Prince, humbly praying, that he would be pleaſed to declare to his whole Coun- cil, what Angelo Cattho had told him, and to order his Chancellor to draw an authentic Inſtrument of it, to be lodged in the Archives amongſt the Records of the Crown, and amongſt the Regiſters of all the ſupreme Courts of the Kingdom: They ought to have per- ſuaded him to cauſe ſeveral columns to be erected with inſcriptions containing an account of the whole fact, or at leaſt, to have it engraved on the grate of St. Martin's ſhrine, ſince this prophecy was the occaſion of his vowing a ſilver grate for that ſhrine, and he had performed his vow. What could the incredulous have ſaid in ſuch a caſe? What could they have ob- jected to ſuch monuments, as were contemporary, and ſo authentic? But even without all theſe precautions, if the ſtory had been true, it would have daily been more and more ſupported, and confirmed by itſelf; Lewis XI would have related it a thouſand times at his table, before the Embaſſadors of foreign Princes; and there would have been ſeveral Books extant, in which the ſtory would be told, and in which the Au- thors would declare, they had it from the King's own mouth;

(16) Peter Mat- thieu ſays, (Hiſt. de Louis XII, liv. 7. pag. m. 392) that it was the day after the battle that Cattho acquainted the King with it, when he preſented the Pax to him.

* See the addition at the end of this remark.

(17) Sommaire de la vie d'Angelo Cattho, pag. 5, 6.

(18) Ibid. pag. 7.

(19) Ibid. pag. 8.

(20) Rocolles, Vie du Sultan Gemes, pag. 112.

(21) Extracted from the ſame Life, pag. 176, &c.

(22) I have obſerved in the Remark [D] of the Article RUGGIERI, that if Aſtrology be a means of knowing future events, it muſt be a part of Magic.

Some Reflections concerning the difficulty there is to explain what is related of predictions, and concerning the careleſneſs of men, in not ſupporting ſuch accounts with juridical formalities.

things to cenſure in Moreri [D], in Dr. Nicolo Toppi [E], and in Mr. Varillas [F].

mouth; and I am ſure, there would be an authentic Act amongſt the Regiſters of the Church of St. Martin's, if it were true, that the King cauſed a ſilver grate to be made in performance of his vow. Since therefore this ſtory is not ſupported, but by the authority of an anonymous Writer (23), who declares, that he relates nothing concerning Angelo Cattho, but what he had from three perſons, we may juſtly explode it. But finding alſo, that Philip de Comines does not mention it, we have a right to aſſert that it is a mere forgery. It is impoſſible he ſhould have been ignorant of his friend's converſation with Lewis XI, and that knowing it, he ſhould have omitted to mention it in his Memoirs, in which he mentions ſome other predictions of Angelo much leſs conſiderable than this. His ſilence is a negative argument, which in this caſe comes up to a full demonſtration, or at leaſt is of quite another weight than that aſſertion of the three perſons mentioned by the anonymous Author. It muſt be obſerved, that he does not ſay, that all the three perſons aſſerted the truth of the converſation of Angelo Cattho with the King; we may therefore ſuppoſe, that this Author heard but one of theſe perſons mention that converſation. Now ſince the chief of the three predictions is a mere invention, the two others may alſo be rejected; and therefore the Author of the ſhort account of Cattho's Life, is not proper to cure any body of his incredulous ſpirit.

(23) The Author of the Sommaire de la Vie de Cattho, quoted above.

Obſerve that Monſr. Amyraut quotes theſe three facts, in order to prove, that a man may foretel things to come, without being a Prophet (24); he deſigns thereby to anſwer the following argument of the Roman Catholicks. There have been Doctors in the Church of Rome who have foretold future events; therefore ſhe is the true Church, ſince God continues there the gift of Prophecy.

(24) Amyraut, de l'Elevation de la Foy, et de l'abaiſſement de la Raiſon, pag. 258, 259.

* (a) He preſented the Pax to him.] The Pax is that, which the Roman Catholics kiſs out of devotion, either at the Offertory, or when they wiſh one another peace after Conſecration. When a Prelate officiates he gives his ring to kiſs. A curate gives the Patten to kiſs, after the Pax Domini or Bleſſing. The Clergy kiſs the Images, or the Shrines. All theſe things, which are given to kiſs out of devotion, are called the Pax †. ADD. REM.]

† Furetiere, French edition, under the word PAIX.

[D] I have ſomething to cenſure in Moreri.] He ſays, I, that Angelo Cattho was born at Benevento; but they who ſhould be well acquainted with his native place, ſay it was Tarento. II. He makes him Great Almoner of France; but he ſhould have known that this title did not begin, but with the Cardinal de Meudon in the reign of Francis I (25). Before that time, the only title in uſe, was that of Great Almoner of the King; and even this title was ſtill unknown in the reign of Lewis XI. The firſt, who had it, was Geoffry de Pompadour Biſhop of Perigueux under Charles VIII (26). III. Claudius Robertus tells us, that Angelo Cattho was buried in his Metropolitan Church: His words are, Angelus Cato Tarentinus, ex Medico & Eleemoſynario Ludovici XI, cujus ſuaſu ſcripſit Commentarios rerum Francicarum Philippus Comineus, jacet in ſua Metropoli. Erat ejus Symbolum, ingenium ſupra vires (27). i. e. "Angelo Cattho of Tarento, "who had been Phyſician and Almoner to King Lewis "XI, and at whoſe perſuaſion Philip de Comines "wrote his Memoirs, lies buried in his Metropolitan "Church; his Motto was, Wiſdom prevails over "power." This makes me queſtion what Moreri aſſerts, namely, that in 1492 he went to Benevento, and died there in 1497. We have ſeen above that another Author ſays (28), that he was obliged to retire to Rome. This is not certain. As to Moreri's omiſſions, the reader may obſerve them, by comparing his article with mine.

(25) See Du Peirat, Antiquitez de la Chapelle du Roy, liv. 1. chap. 61.

(26) Ibid.

(27) Claudius Robertus in Gallia Chriſtiana, pag. 182. in Catal. Præſul. Viennenſ. num. 96. apud Dionyſ. Gothofred. In the proofs and the caſtrations of Philip. de Comines's Hiſtory, pag. m. 10.

(28) Matthieu above, Remark [A], Quotation (1).

[E] .... In Dr. Nicolo Toppi.] He mentions one Angelo Catone of Benevento, and another Angelo Catone of Tarento. The firſt ſays he had a great knowledge in all the ſciences, and for that reaſon, was very much beloved by Charles VIII: his own merit, and that King's favour raiſed him to be Archbiſhop of Vienne. The ſecond was Phyſician and Almoner to Lewis XI, who prevailed upon him to write li Commentarii delle Coſe di Francia. "Memoirs of the affairs of France," as we learn from Philip de Comines, quoted by Claudius Robertus, page 182 of his Gallia Chriſtiana (29). It is certain, that the Author of the Bibliotheca Napoletana has divided one Author in two: for the ſame Angelo Catto, who was Phyſician and Almoner to Lewis XI, was alſo Archbiſhop of Vienne, even before Charles VIII came to the throne. It is not true, that he wrote a Book at Lewis the XI's perſuaſion, nor that Philip de Comines mentions this, nor that Claudius Robertus quotes him for it. How are circumſtances altered, when a man miſunderſtands the words of an Author? Yet thoſe of Claudius Robertus are very plain. Nicodemo has not cenſured Nicolo Toppi for this.

(29) Nicolo Toppi, Bibliot. Napolet. pag. 170.

[F] And in Mr. Varillas.] Here follows what he tells us (30). "The favourers of judicial Aſtrology "exult here on the authority of Philip de Comines, "who relates, that the famous Angelo Cattho follow-"ed the party of the Duke of Burgundy, either be-"cauſe he had at firſt preferred that Prince before "the King of France, or becauſe he would imitate "the other learned men of his time, who uſed to go "and ſeek their fortune in the Low-Countries only be-"cauſe they could eaſier ſucceed there, than any "where elſe. He continued in that Duke's ſervice "till he foreſaw, by an accurate calculation of that "Prince's nativity, that he would be killed in battle. "He began then to look for a proper opportunity, "that he might leave the Duke with all poſſible de-"cency; and having met with ſuch an opportunity "after the battle of Morat, he took hold of it as a "man of ſenſe. He firſt ſtipulated ſome articles with "Lewis XI, who not only favoured him with his "intimate friendſhip, but alſo preferred him to the "Archbiſhoprick of Vienne, and yet kept him at "Court. Angelo Cattho was ſaying Maſs before the "King, when the battle of Nancy was fought, and "when he gave the King the Patten to kiſs, he "told him, Sir, God grant you peace, &c. (31)." There are ſeveral miſtakes in this account. I. The favourers of judicial Aſtrology cannot reap any benefit from what Cattho told King Lewis XI during Maſs, the very moment Duke Charles was killed, for it is plain, that it was not by the means of Aſtrology that he knew what paſſed at Nancy. II. It is not true, that the Aſtrologers lay any ſtreſs on this upon the credit of Philip de Comines. For how could they do it, ſince he does not ſay a word of this prediction? III. It is not true, that the learned men in Italy or in any other places, uſed to go into the Low-Countries to ſeek their fortune. IV. Nor that they could eaſier ſucceed there than any where elſe. Could he quote a great many inſtances of this? Had it not been better to ſay, that Angelo Cattho was left with the Duke to negotiate the marriage of his maſter the Duke of Calabria. This is the reaſon which firſt obliged him to go to that Court. V. We do not read in the ſhort account of his life, that by calculating the Duke's nativity, he foreſaw that the Duke would be killed in battle. We only find there, that after the battle of Morat, Angelo Cattho, knowing how obſtinate the Duke was (and perhaps alſo) the misfortunes which were to befall him and his family, he took his leave of him in a civil manner (32). How different is this account from what Mr. Varillas relates! The worſt is, that Philip de Comines, whom he quotes, does not even mention the conjecture, which the Reader has ſeen juſt now. VI. It is not true, that Angelo Cattho was Archbiſhop of Vienne, when Duke Charles was killed.

(30) Varillas, Hiſt. de Louis XI, liv. 7. pag. 150 of the Dutch edition.

(31) The Author relates here the whole converſation. See the Remark [C], Quotation (15) towards the middle.

(32) Sommaire de la vie d'Angelo Cattho, pag. 4.

The Spaniſh Author (33), who has wrote a Commentary upon Philip de Comines's Memoirs ſays, that Angelo Cattho having conjectured or gueſſed, that the Duke of Burgundy would be killed, went into the ſervice of the King of France, a little before that Duke's death, and foretold to the King that the Duke would loſe the battles. This is not accurate; for the Duke loſt but one battle after the Aſtrologer was with Lewis XI. I omit obſerving, that this Author is too modern to deſerve any credit when he ſpeaks without quoting his Vouchers.

(33) Juan Vitrian.

CATULLUS (CAIUS (a) VALERIUS) a Latin Poet was born at Verona,

(a) Quintus, according to Pliny, lib. 37. cap. 6.

Verona [A], in the year 666 from the building of Rome (b). The beauty of his verſes gained him the friendſhip and eſteem of all the men of wit and learning, who were then very numerous at Rome. As the ancient Romans had no notion of thoſe rules of politeneſs, which now expoſe a man to ſhame and public hatred, who writes ſmutty verſes, in which lewd actions are deſcribed without any veil (c), Catullus did not much hurt his reputation by the groſs obſcenities and horrid laſciviouſneſs, with which he has poiſoned ſeveral of his Poems. It is thought (d) that he called the moſt celebrated of his miſtreſſes Leſbia, for the ſake of Sappho, who was of the Iſland of Leſbos, and with whoſe verſes he was exceedingly delighted, ſome of which he has tranſlated or imitated. The true name of his miſtreſs was Clodia (e). He is very far from following the method of our Poets, who are continually complaining of the cruelty and inſenſibility of the Fair. For his part he repreſents his Leſbia as a woman who uſed to aſk him how many kiſſes would ſatisfy him [B], and what is worſe, as a woman who yielded to the firſt who aſked her the queſtion. He wrote ſatyrical verſes againſt Cæſar (f), but they ſerved only to give the perſon offended a new opportunity of ſhewing his moderation [C]. Indeed Cæſar was not unconcerned at the grievous injury he had received, but he contented himſelf with obliging the Poet to make him ſatisfaction, and that very day he invited him to ſupper. Suetonius adds, he continued ſtill to lodge at the houſe of Catullus's father (g); but there are ſome very learned men who think, that the Hiſtorian did not well diſtinguiſh the different times [D]. All our Poet's verſes are not of dangerous conſequence; there are ſome (h), in which he diſcovers ſo great an affliction for the death of his brother, that one cannot but be extremely moved at it. He did not grow rich, either by his verſes, or by his journey into Bithynia, whither he accompanied Memmius (i), who had obtained the government of that Province, when the time of his Prætorſhip was out. It is eaſy to know that he was poor (k). They who ſuppoſe that he was intimate with Furius and Aurelius, join here together three miſerable wretches [E], for theſe

(b) The 2d year of the 173d Olympiad, in which St. Jerom places his birth, is A. U. 666. according to Calviſius.

(c) See Nouv. de la Rep. des Let. June 1684. Art. 4. pag. 367.

(d) Iſ. Voſſius, in Catul. pag. 189.

(e) Apulcius, Apolog.

(f) Epigram. 30. 58.

(g) Sueton. in Cæſare, cap. 73.

(h) Epig. 67, 69, 102.

(i) See how he complains of him in the 28th Epigram, which ought to be but one with the 29th.

(k) Epigram. 13, 27.

[A] He was born at Verona.] St. Jerom does not ſay as Moreri pretends, that our Poet was born in the Peninſula of Sirmion; (he does not in the leaſt mention this; and expreſly names Verona,) nor does he place Catullus's birth in the CLXIIId Olympiad. Moreri has been miſled by the following words of Giraldi (1). Natus quidem in peninſula Sirmione lacus Benaci in agro Veronenſi, ut ipſemet ad ipſam Sirmionem cecinit, Olympiade circiter CLXX, ut Hieronymus ex Chronicis Euſebii obſervat. i. e. "He was born in "the Peninſula of Sirmion ſituated in the lake of "Benacus in the territory of Verona, as he himſelf "has ſung near Sirmion, and about the 170th Olym"piad, as St. Jerom obſerves from Euſebius's Chro"nicon." It was not difficult to diſcover here two different quotations, and to ſee that St. Jerom was not quoted for the native place of Catullus.

(1) De Poetic. Dial. 10.

[B] He repreſents his Leſbia as a woman, who uſed to aſk him how many kiſſes would ſatisfy him.] It is in the ſeventh Epigram.

Quæris, quot mihi baſiationes
Tuæ, Leſbia, ſint ſatis ſuperque?

And he anſwers her, that he wanted as many, as there are grains of ſand in the deſarts of Libya, or ſtars in heaven. And as to the diſſolute life of this miſtreſs, he ſpeaks of it in the following manner.

Cœli, Leſbia noſtra, Leſbia illa,
Illa Leſbia quam Catullus unam
Pluſquam ſe atque ſuos amavit omnes,
Nunc in quadriviis & angiportis
Glubit magnanimos Remi Nepotes (2).

(2) Catull. Epig. 59.

That is,

"O Cælius, my dear Leſbia, that ſame Leſbia,
"whom Catullus loved entirely, and more than him"ſelf and all his friends, Leſbia is now a common "proſtitute."

Some Authors pretend, that this diſſolute woman was the ſiſter of the infamous Clodius, Cicero's great enemy. See the Article of METELLUS CELER, Remark [A], Quotation (3).

[C] His ſatyrical verſes againſt Cæſar . . . . ſerved only to give the latter a new opportunity of ſhewing his moderation.] I ſhall tranſcribe here all that Suetonius ſays of this, by which it will appear, that Moreri gives but a very lame and imperfect account of it. Valerium Catullum, a quo ſibi verſiculis de Mamurra perpetua ſtigmata impoſita non diſſimulaverat, ſatisfacientem eadem die cœnæ adhibuit, hoſpitioque patris ejus, ſicut conſueverat, uti perſeveravit (3). i. e. "Tho' his re"putation had been branded for ever by Catullus's
"verſes concerning Mamurra, yet the Poet having "made him ſatisfaction, he admitted him to ſup that "very day at his table, and continued to lodge at the "Poet's father's, as he uſed to do." Crinitus has ſtrangely miſtaken theſe laſt words; for inſtead of ſaying, that Cæſar continued to lodge at Catullus's father's; he ſays, that Catullus was ſuffered to lodge at Cæſar's houſe, as he uſed to do, or to claim the right of hoſpitality, which ſubſiſted between their families (4). He was in the right to infer from this right of hoſpitality between Cæſar and Catullus's father, that our Poet was not of a mean extraction. But he ſhould not have made Suetonius ſay, that Catullus's father lodged familiarly at Cæſar's houſe. Suetonius does not ſay this, and Catullus's father was perhaps never at Rome. Father Briet has tranſcribed all theſe blunders of Crinitus (5).

(3) Sueton. in Jul. Cæſ. cap. 73.

(4) Crinitus, de Poetis Latinis, lib. 2. cap. 27.

(5) Briet. de Poet. Lat. pag. 14, 15.

[D] Suetonius did not well diſtinguiſh the different times.] Scaliger pretended to find him guilty of a miſtake, and fell himſelf into a very great error (6). He aſſerts that Catullus's reconciliation with Cæſar happened after all the triumphs of the latter, and to ſupport this aſſertion, he obſerves, that Catullus's ſatyrical verſes mention the ſpoils of Pontus, and thoſe of Spain, and were conſequently poſterior to the victory of Munda gained over the ſons of Pompey. Now Cæſar did not return into Gaul after this laſt triumph, and did not therefore lodge any more at Catullus's father's, who lived on the other ſide of the river Po. All this is unqueſtionable, and Scaliger had done well to ſtop here, as Caſaubon had done, when he made uſe of this obſervation (7). But Scaliger goes farther; and ſays, that Cæſar did not return into Gaul, after he had once paſſed the Rubicon. Cæſar non potuit uti ejus (Catulli) patris hoſpitio, niſi ante bellum civile, quum proconſulari imperio obtineret Gallias Ciſalpinam & Tranſalpinam. . . . Poſt tranſitum Rubiconis Cæſar nunquam poſtea in Gallias ſuas reverſus eſt (8). This is evidently falſe. For he returned into Gaul, when he went to Spain, firſt to drive Pompey's ſons from thence, before the battle of Pharſalia (9), and then again to drive the ſame ſons of Pompey from thence after the defeat of Cato and Scipio in Africa. We ſhall ſhew in the Remark [I] (10), that it is not very certain, Cæſar never lodged with his friend of Verona, ſince his reconciliation with Catullus.

(6) Scaliger, Animadv. in Euſeb. num. 1960. pag. m. 155.

(7) Caſaub. in Sueton. Cæſ. cap. 73.

(8) Scalig. in Animadv. in Euſeb. num. 1690, pag. 155.

(9) Cæſar infectis iis quæ agere deſtinaverat ab urbe proficiſcitur atque in ulteriorem Galliam pervenit. Cæſar. lib. 1. de Bell. Civil. cap. 33. fin.

(10) Towards the end of the ſecond a-linea.

[E] Furius, Aurelius and he, are three miſerable wretches joined together.] Theſe were according to Crinitus (11) Catullus's intimate friends. And indeed, he repreſents them in his Epigrams, as perſons ready

(11) Inter cæteros amicos Furium & Aurelium magnopere dilexit. Crinitus, de Poetis, lib. 2. cap. 27.

theſe two were ſtarving. We have not all his works [F]; thoſe, that are extant, have been printed and commented upon ſeveral times (g). The Pervilium Veneris ought not to be aſcribed to him (l). St. Jerom ſhould not have placed his death under the laſt year of the 180th Olympiad [H], that is, according to Calviſius, A. U. 696; at this rate he would have lived but thirty years, and he lived longer, but not ſo long as Joſeph Scaliger has aſſerted [I], who makes him live above threeſcore and eleven years; this is paſſing to follow him to the extremities of the world, and into the moſt ſavage countries; but in other places he ſays ſo many diſobliging things of them, that it is hardly poſſible to believe that their friendſhip laſted long. I deſcribe them as ravenous beaſts, who for want of a livelihood are ready to ſtarve.

(l) See Lipſius, Elect. lib. 1, cap. 5.

Aureli pater eſuritionum,
Non harum modo, ſed quot aut fuerunt,
Aut ſunt, aut aliis erunt in annis (12).

(12) Catul. Epigr. 21.

He could not have deſcribed a beggar otherwiſe than he has done them (13). On the other hand, he repreſents them as greedy of ſodomy (14) as of bread, and threatens them with a terrible puniſhment (15), if they venture to ſlander him, or to debauch the darling object of his love. This is going beyond the bounds of raillery; no man would write ſuch verſes againſt his beſt friends; and if it were true, that men wanted the neceſſaries of life, it would have been more diſobliging to ridicule them for it. It is therefore probable, that Catullus's friendſhip was changed into an exceſſive hatred againſt theſe two perſons, on account of ſome ſhameful intrigue. Cum horum utroque graves poſtea inimicitias geſſit, eoſque acerbiſſimis verſibus inſectatus eſt, tum quod ipſum mollem notaſſent, tum quod puerum ipſi carum Aurelius quidem tentaſſet, Furius vero etiam conſtupraſſet (16). i. e. "But he "became afterwards a bitter enemy of them both, "and treated them very ſeverely in his verſes, both "becauſe they had expoſed him as an effeminate man, "and becauſe Aurelius had attempted to raviſh a boy "whom he loved, and Furius had really raviſhed him." How ſtrangely are Poets infatuated in favour of their own writings? They chuſe rather to acquaint the public with the praiſes they have beſtowed on perſons, whom they have ſince ſlandered, than to ſuppreſs the verſes which contain thoſe praiſes. We meet with ſuch inſtances in the Poems, and even in the letters of ſome Moderns. When an Author falls out with any perſon after the firſt edition of ſome book, he uſes to blot out of the ſecond edition the encomiums he had beſtowed upon ſuch a perſon. The Poets therefore, and the Letter-writers, who do not act in this manner, or who, after the example of Catullus, inſert in the firſt edition of their Poems both the praiſes they have beſtowed on a perſon, and ſatyrs they have wrote againſt him, muſt do it, becauſe they are exceedingly pleaſed with the turn they have given their thoughts. They prefer the reputation which they expect to gain by their verſes, before the blame they deſerve for praiſing and cenſuring the ſame perſon in a breath. When I ſaid, after the example of Catullus, it was, becauſe he publiſhed himſelf the collection of his Poems, as appears from his dedication to Cornelius Nepos. Let us obſerve here, that Voſſius durſt not venture to affirm, that the Aurelius, mentioned by Catullus, is the ſame with L. Aurelius Cotta, as ſome Authors think: But he aſſerts, that the Furius of the Poet is Furius Bibaculus, who, ſays he, was nothing leſs than a ſtarveling; for Horace acquaints us, that he was a fat and luſty man, and a great eater. Iſte nihil minus fuit quam eſuritor, erat quippe obeſus & vorax ut ex Horatio conſtat (17). The paſſage in Horace, at which Voſſius hinted, is in the Vth Satire of the IId Book.

(13) Ibid. Ep. 23.
(14) Verum a te metuo tuoque pene Infeſto pueris bonis maliſque. Catul. Ep. 15.
(15) Pædicabo ego vos, & irrumabo,
Aureli pathice,
& cinæde Furi.
Catull. Epigr. 26. See alſo 21.
(16) Muretus, in Epigr. 11. Catulli.
(17) If. Voſſius, in Catull. pag. 32.

——— Seu pingui tentus omaſo
Furius hibernas cana nive conſpuet Alpes.

Tentus pingui omaſo ſignifies, according to ſome Commentators (18), that Furius had eat ſo many tripes, that they had made him ſwell, as tho' Horace intended to hint, that Furius lived upon no other meat but that. But others maintain, the ſenſe of Horace is, that Furius had a very big paunch. Voſſius admits both theſe ſignifications. He would not come off ſo eaſily with Catullus, as with Horace, for the Furius of the former was ſo far from being paunch-bellied, that on the contrary, he was ſo lean and dry, that he wanted even ſpittle; I cannot expreſs in Engliſh how deſtitute he was of all kind of moiſture.

(18) See Dacier, on Horace tom. 6. pag. 411. Dutch edition.

Atqui corpora ſicciora cornu
Aut ſi quid magis aridum eſt, habetis,
Sole, & frigore, & eſuritione.
Quare non tibi ſit benè ac beatè?
A te ſudor abeſt, abeſt ſaliva,
Mucuſque & mala pituita naſi.
Hanc ad munditiem adde mundiorem,
Quod culus tibi purior ſalillo eſt,
Nec toto decies cacas in anno:
Atque id durius eſt faba & lapillis,
Quod ſi tu manibus teras, friceſque;
Non unquam digitum inquinare poſſet (19).

(19) Catull. Epigr. 23.

Whether Eſuritor and Vorax be words of ſuch a contrary ſignification, as Voſſius pretends, I ſubmit to the judgment of thoſe, who wrote ſo many ſatyrs againſt the Paraſite Montmaur. However that be, Voſſius's miſtaking the Furius mentioned by Catullus, for a fat and luſty man, cannot be excuſed.

[F] We have not all his works.] Crinitus obſerves, that Terentianus Maurus mentions an Ithyphallic Poem of Catullus, and that Pliny (20) aſcribes to him a Poem concerning inchantments by Philters or Love-potions, a ſubject, of which Theocritus had already treated before him, and upon which Virgil wrote after Catullus. As for the Ithyphallic Verſes, or the Poem concerning that obſcene Divinity, called Priapus, Crinitus ſhould not have ſaid, that they are loſt.

(20) Plin. lib. 28. cap. 2. Crinitus, and Geſner after him, quote lib. 38.

[G] .... Thoſe that are extant, have been printed and commented upon ſeveral times.] The moſt conſiderable editions are thoſe of Scaliger, and of Paſſerat. The former of theſe two critics corrected a great number of paſſages with a very great ſagacity and learning. The moſt ancient edition, if I am not miſtaken, is that of Venice, publiſhed in 1488, with the Commentary of Anthony Parthenius. The Commentaries of Muretus and Achilles Statius, and the various readings of Titius are uſeful. Grævius, to whom the public is obliged for the many good Editions he has procured, publiſhed one of Catullus at Utrecht, in the year 1680, in which he has inſerted intire all the notes of a great many Commentators. Iſaac Voſſius's Edition, printed at Leyden (21) in 1684, contains a very learned Commentary. See upon this, and concerning the Edition in uſum Delphini the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres for the year 1684. A Florentine named Tuſcanella has made a very large Index to Catullus, which was printed by John Gebhard in his Edition Variorum at Francfort, in 1621.

(21) They have put in the title page, Proſtant apud Iſaacum Littlebury, Bibliopolam Londinenſem.

[H] St. Jerom ſhould not have placed his death under the laſt year of the 180*th Olympiad.*] Catullus, in his verſes againſt Cæſar mentions that Emperor's expedition in Britain; and he made his firſt expedition in the year 698 from the building of Rome; it is therefore certain, that Catullus did not die in the year 696.

[I] He did not live ſo long as Scaliger has aſſerted.] Let us examine his four arguments for that opinion. He ſays (22), I. That Catullus was ſtill alive when Virgil wrote his Æneid, and to prove this, he quotes the following verſes from Martial.

(22) Scalig. Animad. in Euſeb. num. 1960.

Sic forſan tener auſus eſſet Catullus
Magno mittere paſſerem Maroni (23).

(23) Martial. Epig. 14. lib. 4.

That is,

"Thus has the tender Catullus ventured perhaps "to ſend his Poems to the great Virgil." Now Virgil did not write his Æneid till a great while after Julius Cæſar's death. 2. That Catullus mentions in his passing to another extreme, and we shall prove by several arguments, that this great Critic his Satire Cæsar's four triumphs, this Emperor's death must then have happened soon after his reconciliation with the Poet. For Cæsar died a year after his triumphs. 3. That Cornelius Nepos seems to have written under Augustus; now Catullus mentions Cornelius Nepos's Chronicles. 4. Lastly, that Catullus being threescore and eleven years old was present at the secular games, which were celebrated in the year of Rome 737: this appears plainly by his Carmen Sæculare; for why should he have written that Poem, if he had not lived when these games were solemnized?

I. They object commonly against the first of these arguments, that Martial made use of a poetical licence or fiction (24), and that he was sensible he told a downright falsity (25): but that he thought this lie would be acceptable to Silius Italicus, who was a great admirer of Virgil, to whom Catullus compared him: It is added, that the word forsan (perhaps) lessons the boldness of the fiction (26). But these are very frivolous reasons: for, to begin with the latter; Martial, notwithstanding his forsan, evidently supposes, that Catullus was still living, when Virgil was writing his Æneid. But tho' they had been contemporaries, it could not be inferred from thence absolutely, that Catullus shewed his Poems to Virgil; and this is the reason of the forsan (perhaps). But if the one shewed perhaps his Poems to the other, they must have been Contemporaries. So that notwithstanding this perhaps, the fact in dispute is clearly supposed and asserted by Martial with the utmost confidence. Now, it is not probable, that he would knowingly assert a falsity: he could not but know, that the Chronological errors, which Poets are allowed to commit, are not of this kind. How would Mr. Boileau escape censure, if he should say, that Marot shewed perhaps his manuscript to Cardinal du Perron? We must therefore answer to Scaliger, that Martial supposed a thing which was false; and that we are not to wonder at it, since Joseph Scaliger himself and Monsieur Menage have made false suppositions concerning the time when Daurat or Ronsard lived (27). I shall observe by the by, that the Passer of Catullus signifies in Martial the whole collection of Catullus's Poems, as the Arma Virumque signifies in Ovid and Martial the whole Æneis, and the Æneadum Genetrix in Ovid, the whole Poem of Lucretius. Scaliger complains (28) that a certain Author stole that observation from him: Quæ a nobis accepta stellio in suas Varias transtulit. Isaac Vossius observes upon this, that Carrion is here hinted at, and that Parthenius had made this observation long before Scaliger.

II. The second argument is of no weight; for it is not certain that Catullus mentioned Cæsar's last triumphs; his words are,

Paterna prima lancinata sunt bona
Secunda præda Pontica, inde tertia
Ibera, quam scit amnis aurifer Tagus,
Hunc Galliæ timent, timent Britanniæ (30).

That is,

" He first spent his patrimony, then the riches he " got from Pontus, then those he gathered in Portugal. " They know it but too well, thro' whose country " the Tagus runs carrying gold in his streams. Him " the Gauls, him the Britains dread." I wonder, Vossius did not mind the last verse of those we have just now quoted, since it adds a great deal of strength to his conjectures. The Præda Pontica signifies according to him (31), not the spoils of King Pharnaces, whom Cæsar had vanquished after the death of Pompey, but the money which Cæsar got from Bithynia by his correspondence with King Nicomedes (32). And as for the Præda Ibera, the same Vossius explains it of the booty which Cæsar made in the war of Portugal in the year 693, and laughs at those who understand it of the victory of Munda; for Munda, says he, is above two hundred miles distant from the Tagus. All this is wonderfully confirmed by the following words, Hunc Galliæ timent, timent Britanniæ; here we have the fourth booty; the Gauls and the Britains plundered by Cæsar. The spoils from Spain must therefore have been got before those from the Gauls, and cannot relate to a triumph, which happened several years after the conquest of the Gauls, as was the triumph for the victory of Munda. Why did not Vossius add, that if Catullus had spoken of the spoils of King Pharnaces, he would not have omitted those of Egypt, nor those of Africa; since it is certain that Cæsar triumphed three days successively, first for his victories in Egypt, then for the Kingdom of Pontus, and then for Africa (33), and all this after the defeat of Cato. The next year he triumphed over the sons of Pompey for the victory of Munda. How could Catullus break off short, after he had mentioned Cæsar's plundering the Gauls, if he had spoken before of the triumphs, which followed the civil war? Or how could he forget the spoils of Egypt and of Africa, if he had intended to mention those of Pontus and of Munda. All this inclines me to think, that he wrote his Satire soon after the invasion of Britain. For Isaac Vossius (34) proves very well, that these last words, Socer generque perdidisti omnia, " Father-in-law, son-in-law, you have ruined " the State," must not be understood of Cæsar and Pompey, but of Cæsar and Mumurra; and though Vossius were mistaken in this, it must be observed, that the quarrels of Cæsar and Pompey were come to such a height, that all the world might easily know, they would soon end in the total overthrow of the Commonwealth (35). After all this, it is not at all probable, that Catullus would have dared to write such abusive verses against Cæsar, after the party of Pompey had been entirely ruined by the loss of the battle of Munda. Cæsar's power was then too dreadful. I could easily believe, that this Satire was written before Cæsar passed the Rubicon, and that Suetonius therefore is not mistaken, that Cæsar continued his intercourse of hospitality with Catullus's father after his reconciliation with the son. The title of Imperator unice, which Catullus gives Cæsar, might be thought an objection against this, because it seems to hint at a decree of the Senate, by which that title was conferred on Cæsar (36). But since Scaliger does not insist upon this argument, it ought to be considered as being of no weight. He owns, that unicus may signify eximius (eminent) in this place; but I think, it may also be explained in another sense.

Eone nomine Imperator unice
Fuisti in ultima Occidentis insula,
Ut ista vostra diffututa mentula
Ducenties comesset aut trecenties (37)?

That is to say: Are you therefore the only General, who has been been in Britain? Is it only in order to, &c. I shall confute, in the Article of MUMURRA (38), those, who assert, that Cæsar, on his return from his last journey into Spain, heard at Cicero's house the news of Catullus's Satire.

III. The third argument is of no weight at all. For tho' Cornelius Nepos flourished, according to St. Jerom, in the year of Rome 714, yet we ought not to infer from it, as Scaliger does, that he was then writing the Chronicle, which Catullus mentions. Scaliger lays it down as a maxim, That a man is said to flourish, or to become famous, when he publishes a work. But this cannot he proved, by the authorities he quotes (39), if we consider, at what age different Authors publish the Books, which raise them a reputation. Some Authors publish their first Book, when they are still very young, and write afterwards other Books much better than the first; and the time when they publish these, is the true epocha of their reputation. Others do not become Authors, till they are very much advanced in years. How shall we know, which was Cornelius Nepos's case? He wrote several Letters; and I grant that he may have published many of them under Augustus; must we believe therefore, that his Chronicle was not published under Julius Cæsar, and before he passed the Rubicon. Did not Henry Valesius flourish under Lewis XIV? Who would say, that this phrase is not accurate? And yet he published some excellent Books under Lewis XIII.

IV. The fourth argument must have appeared very strong to Vossius (40), since in order to answer it, he supposes, without the authority of any Writer whatsoever;

(24) Voss. De Poet. Lat. p. 18.

(25) Ramirez de Prado, in Martialem, lib. 4. Ep. 14.

(26) Nisi forte confugiat ad hanc vocem forsan, quæ vox dubitantis est, non asserentis. Briet. de Poet. Lat. pag. 15. See also Vossius, de Poet. Lat. pag. 18.

(27) See the Remarks [E] and [R] of the Article DAURAT.

(28) Animadv. in Euseb. pag. 155. edit. 1658.

(29) In Catul. pag. 5.

(30) Catul. Epig. 30.

(31) In Catul. pag. 72.

(32) See Sueton. in Cæs. cap. 2.

(33) Plutarch. in Cæs. pag. 733. Dion. lib. 43. ad ann. 708, says that Cæsar triumphed four days successively. 1. For the Gauls. 2. For Egypt. 3. For Pontus. 4. For Africa.

(34) In Catul. pag. 73.

(35) Fortunatus illius Hortensii exitus, qui ea non vidit quæ providit futura, sæpe enim inter nos impendentes casus deflevimus, cum belli civilis causas in privatorum cupiditatibus inclusas, pacis spem à publico consilio esse exclusam videremus. Cicero, in Bruto, sub fin.

(36) Concerning this decree, Scaliger refers us to num. 1972, under the 4th year of the 183d Olympiad, A. U. 709. But neither he, nor St. Jerom say any thing in that numero. See Dion. lib. 43.

(37) Catul. Epig. 30.

(38) Remark [B].

(39) Diodorus, Eusebius, Diogenes Laertius.

(40) In Catul. pag. 81.

tic has been very much in the wrong to maintain an opinion which differs ſo much from that of all the other Critics.

Some learned men think that Cicero pleaded for Catullus; but in my opinion they don't bring ſufficient proofs of it [K].

CAVALCANTE

ſoever: that the ſecular games were celebrated in the beginning of the eighth Century of Rome, and before Catullus died. For my part, I would rather ſay, that the Poet, conſidering that the laſt ſecular Games had been celebrated A. U. 604 (41), thought that they would be again celebrated in the year 704, and prepared his Carmen ſæculare beforehand, and publiſhed it, though the games had not been celebrated. How many poems do we meet with, which were originally deſigned for ſome ſolemn day, or ceremony, the celebration of which appeared certain, and which yet were not celebrated? I do not aſk, whether Catullus really wrote the title prefixed to that Poem, or whether the praiſes he beſtows on Diana might have no relation at all to the ſecular games, as it is generally believed, the 21ſt Ode of the 1ſt Book of Horace has none. I am willing to grant, what Mr. Dacier obſerves upon that Ode, that it is only a preparation for the ſecular Hymn, which is at the end of that Book, and an exhortation directed to the two Chorus's, the one of young girls, the other of young boys (42). If then Horace made an Ode which was only preparatory, might not Catullus alſo write ſome verſes with the ſame view? I may obſerve by the by, that theſe verſes of Catullus are againſt the rule laid down by Monſieur Dacier. In the ſecular Hymns, which were ſung to Apollo and Diana, there uſed to be two Chorus's, the one of young boys, the other of young girls. They ſung alternately; the former the praiſes of Apollo, the latter thoſe of Diana. But Catullus makes the boys as well as the girls ſing the praiſes of Diana (43). However that be, and whatever objections may be ſtarted concerning this Carmen ſæculare of Catullus, I think the ſuppoſition I have made is liable to fewer difficulties, than Voſſius's opinion; namely, that the ſecular games were celebrated in the beginning of the eighth Century of Rome; or than Scaliger's, who aſſerts, that Catullus was ſtill alive A. U. 737. Voſſius's opinion is not only unſupported, but even contrary to Dion's aſſertion (44). This Hiſtorian tells us, that the ſecular games were celebrated in 737 for the fifth time. Now we know, that they were celebrated the fourth time a long while before the end of the ſeventh Century of Rome. Scaliger's opinion is attended with a thouſand difficulties. How can it be ſuppoſed, that Catullus lived above thirty years without writing one ſingle verſe; and that the reign of Auguſtus, in which there happened ſo many remarkable things, and which was ſo favourable to the Poets, ſhould have left Catullus's poetical vein dry and barren? How came it to paſs, that not one Poet of Auguſtus's Court mentioned Catullus as living then? Why did not Ovid name him amongſt the Poets, with whom he deſired to be acquainted in his youth? Laſtly, would Cornelius Nepos have had ſuch a bad taſte, as to ſuppoſe, that Virgil, Horace, and all the other Poets of the ſame rank, were inferior to Catullus? And yet, it is plain, that he ſuppoſed this, if Scaliger's opinion be true. Here follow Cornelius Nepos's words. L. Julium Calidium, quem poſt Lucretii Catullique mortem multo elegantiſſimum Poetam, noſtram tuliſſe ætatem, vere videor poſſe contendere, . . . expedivit (45). i. e. "He ſaved L. Julius Calidius, whom I think I may call the moſt elegant "Poet of our time, ſince the death of Lucretius and "Catullus, &c." It is ſomewhat ſtrange that Lucretius and Catullus ſhould be thus mentioned together, if it were true, that the latter lived till after the year 737, for it is certain, that the former died towards the beginning of the eighth Century of Rome. But without inſiſting upon this, let us but conſider the following difficulty. Is it poſſible that Cornelius Nepos, who, in Scaliger's opinion lived ſome years after the ſecular Games of the year 737, and who conſequently ſaw Virgil and Horace in the height of their reputation, ſhould have thought, that they could not diſpute the firſt rank with Julius Calidius; this firſt rank, I ſay, at which he did not arrive till after the death of Lucretius and Catullus (40)? Voſſius has but too much reaſon to ſay, that this long controverſy of Scaliger concerning Catullus's Age, contains nothing but what deſerves to be exploded. Hæc ſi attendiſſet Scaliger, profecto non inſtituiſſet longam iſtam diſputationem, de ætate Catulli, in qua nihil omnino eſt, quod non melius ſit tacuiſſe; certe ne ſemel quidem ſcopum attigit (47). So true it is, that the greateſt Wits fall ſometimes aſleep (48).

[K] Some learned men think, that Cicero pleaded for Catullus, but in my opinion they don't bring ſufficient proofs for it.] Balzac followed the opinion, which ſeems ill-grounded to me. I ſhall tranſcribe what he ſays upon this ſubject, beginning with the Latin verſes in which he had ſpoken of Catullus, without naming him.

——— Peſtem tamen ille minorem
Scaligeri, Tullique Cliens, & Cæſare læſo
Conſpicuus ſæclis, nigro devovit Averno.
Non tales Verona tulit ſine vindice chartas (49).

That is;

"The Client of Scaliger and Tully, he who is famous "thro' all Ages by his inſulting Cæſar, doomed to "hell a leſs abominable man than this; Verona would "not have ſuffered ſuch writings to paſs unpuniſhed."

There was a Critic, who did not underſtand who was meant in thoſe verſes; and Balzac's reflection upon the pretended obſcurity with which he was charged, is as follows: "They who quote this ancient Poet, without "naming him, think, that he will be ſufficiently "known, if they but call him the Poet of Verona, "witneſs theſe words, Veronenſis ait Poeta quondam. "But to make him ſtill better known, and to make "my deſcription of him clearer, I add to the name of "his native place, the two circumſtances of his life, "which are the moſt remarkable, and generally "known. And I maintain, that a man who has "ſome knowledge of antiquity, and is not unacquainted with the preſent ſtate of our Republic of Letters, "is obliged to know that Catullus offended Cæſar by "a ſatyrical Epigram, that in his life-time he was "defended by Cicero's eloquence, and that ſince his "death, he has been reſtored by Scaliger's ſagacity; "that he owes to the one the carrying of his cauſe, "and to the other the preſervation of his reputation, "that is of his writings; a ſecond life better and "more glorious than the firſt (50)." You ſee that Balzac ſuppoſes as a matter of fact and generally known, that Cicero pleaded for Catullus; he is not the only Author who aſſerts it. Achilles Statius ſays the ſame (51), and Peter Crinitus had ſaid it before him, and endeavours to prove it by Catullus giving thanks to Cicero, in the Epigram. Diſertiſſime Romuli Nepotum, &c (52). His words are, Ingenii facilitate & doctrina adeo Romæ acceptus, atque civibus gratus fuit Catullus, ut Marci Tullii patrocinium meruit; quod ipſum eleganti epigrammate ingenue teſtatus eſt, quo gratias Ciceroni patrono egit (53). i. e. "Catullus was "ſo much beloved at Rome by all the Citizens for "his quick genius and great learning, that he deſerved to have an Orator like him to plead his cauſe; "which he owns in a very elegant Epigram, in which "he thanks Cicero his Patron for that favour." But it is entirely falſe, that in that Epigram Catullus thanks Cicero for the favour he had done him by pleading his cauſe. He thanks him in general, without mentioning any particular favour. Muretus owns, that the reaſon of Catullus's thanks cannot be diſcovered by conjectures. Agit gratiam M. Tullio, quod ob beneficium ab eo acceptum, divinare non poſſumus. Nam qui ad fundum Tiburtem hoc loco confugiunt, nihil aliud, quam inſcitiam patefaciunt ſuam (54); i. e. "He thanks Cicero, but for what favour, I cannot gueſs; they who "pretend to explain it of a piece of ground near Tibur, "do only betray their ignorance."

(41) According to Zoſimus, for Cenſorinus places the celebration of them in the year 627.

(42) Dacier, Remarques ſur Horace, tom. 1. pag. 664. Dutch edition.

(43) Diana ſumus in fide Puellæ & pueri integri: Dianam pueri integri, Puellæque canamus. Catull. Epig. 35.

(44) Lib. 54.

(45) Corn. Nepos, in Vita Pomponii Attici. cap. 12.

(46) This might ſerve to prove, that this Life of Pomponius Atticus was written before Virgil and Horace had gained a great reputation.

(47) Iſaac Voſſius, in Catull. pag. 73.

(48) Quandoque bonus dormitat Homerus. Horat. de Arte Poet. ver. 359.

(49) Balzac, Entret. 17. pag. m. 201.

(50) Ibid.

(51) Achillet Statius in Catullum, initio.

(52) Epig. 50.

(53) Petrus Crinitus, lib. 2. cap. 27. pag. m. 671.

(54) Muretus in Catull. Epig. 50.

CAVALCANTE (GUIDO) a Nobleman of Florence [A] in the thirteenth Century. I ſhall add nothing to Moreri's account of him, but that he was a man of very great meditation, and that it was ſaid, his deep ſpeculations tended only to find out that there was no God [B].

(a) By Mr. Veyſſiere la Croize.

I have been told (a) that the paſſage in Balzac which I have quoted (b) is taken from Boccace's Decameron, and that if I ſhould give it more at length, I ſhould oblige a great many readers; for which reaſon I ſhall tranſcribe more of it below [C]. I have alſo been adviſed to make ſome additions to Moreri's account. I ſhall therefore obſerve that our Guido, the ſon of Cavalcante di Cavalcanti having followed the party of the Guelfes, experienced the changeableneſs of fortune. He was baniſhed, and afterwards reſtored to his own country again. He ſhewed great courage and ſtrength of mind in his misfortunes, and never neglected to improve his mind. He was not only an able Philoſopher, but alſo a very good Poet. He wrote a Treatiſe in Italian concerning the rules for writing in a good ſtyle; and there are ſome verſes of his extant, which are very much eſteemed. His Song upon the Love of this World has been commented upon by ſeveral learned men [D].

(b) In the remark [B].

He

[A] A Nobleman of Florence.] We read in a Letter from Rome, dated April the 14th, 1581, and written by Alfonſo Ceccarelli da (1) Bevagna, that the family of the Cavalcanti was repreſented as very ancient, in a Chronicle written about two hundred years ago. Le dico che le poſſo moſtrare . . . una Cronica manoſcritta di un Giovanni, Figliuolo del Conte Nicolo de Barbiano, ſcritta circa a 200 anni ſono, dove ſi tratta a pieno delle Famiglie di Firenze ſecondo l'Iſtoria ſcritta da Piero Canigiano nel 1103, e della Famiglia de Cavalcanti dice che hebbe la ſua prima origine della nobiliſſima ſtirpe Steeleſia de' Gotti, da Ariberto Cavalcante Steeleſio, e che furono Padroni di Peſcia, con titolo di Conte (2). The ſame Chronicle relates, that Anſaldo, who is of the ſtock of the Family de Medicis, ſettled at Florence in the year 806, and that he was married with Irinia Cavalcante. The Letter, which I have quoted, mentions another Chronicle (3), which relates but a few things of that Family. Di Caſa Cavalcanti dice molto poco, e tocca l'origine di queſta imperfettamente e' con poche parole (4). Obſerve, that Michael Pocciantius does not make our Guido Cavalcante to be of an ancient family, but he relates a circumſtance which ſhews that he was a conſiderable man. The Heads of the Tradeſmen baniſhed him, becauſe he was of the Faction of the White. He was at laſt called home again, and died in the year 1300 (5).

(1) It is inſerted in the volume intitled, Lettere Storiche, Politiche, ed Erudite, raccolte da Antonio Bulifon, printed in 1685.

(2) Lettere Storiche, &c. pag. 183, 184.

(3) It is that which Antonio Manetri has written.

(4) Lettere Storiche, &c. pag. 183.

(5) Ex Michaele Pocciantio de Scriptis Florentinis, pag. 77. Obſerve that he calls him Calvacanthius, and pag. 26. ſpeaking of Bartholomew, he ſays Cavalcanthius.

[B] It is ſaid, his deep ſpeculations tended only to find out that there was no God.] I frankly own, that I borrow the following paſſage only from Balzac (6). Percioche alcuna volta ſpeculando molto aſtratto da gli huomini deveniva, ſi diceva tra la gente volgare, che queſte ſue ſpeculationi erano ſolo en cercare ſe trovar ſi poteſſe che Iddio non foſſe.

(6) Balzac, Let. 57. du VI Livre, pag. 256. of the firſt volume of the folio edition.

[C] I ſhall tranſcribe it below more at length.] Boccace relates, that there were at Florence ſeveral Clubs of ſubſtantial perſons, who treated one another by turns; and that the club of Meſſire Bette Bruneleſqui had often endeavoured to perſuade Guido Cavalcante to be one of them, and not without reaſon: "For he was "not only one of the beſt Logicians in the world, "and a very great Natural Philoſopher; (for which "the company did not much care) but he was alſo a "very civil and pretty Gentleman, a fine Speaker, "and ſo complaiſant, that he was always ready to "do any thing becoming a Gentleman, and did it "with a better grace than any other perſon; and be-"ſides, he was very rich, and could ſhew a great re-"ſpect for thoſe, who he thought deſerved it. But "Meſſire Bette could never draw him into their com-"pany: ſo that they thought his refuſal was owing "to his love of meditation, which was ſuch, that he "daily retired more and more from company; and "as he held ſome of Epicurus's opinions *, the com-"mon people uſed to ſay, that all his contemplations "tended only to find out, that there is no God (7)." It happened one day, that Meſſire Bette and his company paſſing on horſe-back thro' the Church-yard of St. Repand, and ſeeing Guido amongſt the marble tombs, which were in that place, they ſaid, "Let us go and "diſturb him; whereupon ſpurring their horſes, "as tho' they intended to aſſault him, they came up "to him, before he was aware of it: They told him, "Guido, you will not come into our company: But "when you ſhall have found out that there is no God, "what will you be the better for it? Guido, finding "himſelf ſurrounded by them, ſaid, You may do with "me what you pleaſe in your own houſe, and putting "his hand upon one of the tombs, which was very "high, he jumped over it very nimbly, and having thus "diſengaged himſelf from them, he went away. They "were all aſtoniſhed, and ſtared at one another, and then "ſaid, that he muſt be mad; that what he had anſwered "them was nothing to the purpoſe; for that they had no "more buſineſs in that place, than any of the other Ci-"tizens, and than Meſſire Guido himſelf. But Meſſire "Bette told them, You are fools your ſelves, if you did "not underſtand him. He has in a few words, and in a "very civil manner offer'd us a very great affront. For if "you will obſerve it, theſe tombs are the houſes of the "dead, for they are put there, and remain in them; "he ſays this is our houſe, to give us to underſtand, "that we, and the other ignorant men, are worſe than "dead, if compared with him, and other learned "men; ſo that being here amongſt theſe tombs, we "are at home. Then they all underſtood what was "Guido's meaning, were aſhamed, and never ven-"tured to diſturb him any more; and they held Meſ-"ſire Bette for a witty and underſtanding Gentle-"man (8)."

* Balzac has omitted theſe words of Boccace. E percio che che egli aliquanto teneva della opinione de gli Epicurii.

(7) Boccace, Decameron, Nouv. IX de la VI Journée, fol. m. 203. I make uſe of Anthony le Maçon's Tranſlation.

(8) Boccace, Decameron, Nouvel. IX de la VI Journée, fol. m. 103.

We find Balzac guilty here of a fault, like that, which we have obſerved in another place (9). If he had quoted the Decameron of Boccace, he would not have given the reader a very great notion of his learning: but as he did not tell whence he had this paſſage, he hoped, 1. that the world would think he had found it in ſome hidden and unknown Author. 2. That they, who had occaſion to mention the character of Guido, would quote him (Balzac) for it; for amongſt a thouſand perſons, who read the Decameron, there are hardly two or three who remember any thing of it beſides love-tales and railleries. Now the novel, in which Cavalcante is mentioned, is not of that kind.

(9) Towards the end of the Remark [I] of the Article GONTAUT (Charles de).

[D] His Song upon the love of this world (10) has been commented upon by ſeveral learned men.] The famous Gilles of Rome, who was General of the Order of St. Auguſtin, Archbiſhop of Bourges, and one of the moſt learned Schoolmen of his time (11), wrote a Commentary upon this Song (12), Some perſons think that this was the firſt time, that a Commentary had been wrote by a man upon other verſes, compoſed in a modern language (13). To this Commentary are added in the edition of Sienna, in 1602, 8vo, ſome obſervations of Celſo Cittadini upon the ſame Song (14). Dino del Garbo of Florence, a great Philoſopher, and Phyſician to Pope John XXII, followed the example of Gilles of Rome, with whom he was almoſt contemporary, and wrote alſo a Commentary upon Cavalcante's Song. Fra Paol del Roſſo, James Mini, Plinius Tomacelli, and laſtly Jerom Frachetta, a Philoſopher of Rovigo (15), have alſo commented upon it (16). All theſe Commentaries have been printed (17). The Author, from whom I borrow this, obſerves, that the Italian Poetry has been very much improved by Cavalcante, who gave it ſtrength and beauty. La prole che l'à reſo immortale, ſono i ſuoi nobiliſſimi Componimenti, a i quali molto e tenuta la volgar Poeſia per cioché da eſſi ricevute non poca robuſtezza e ſplendore (18). Compare this, if you pleaſe, with the words of a Commentator on Dante, Cavalcante di Cavalcanti . . . had a ſon named Guido Cavalcanti, a very learned man, a great Philoſopher, and a pretty good Poet;

(10) It begins with theſe words, Donna mi prega perche voglio dire.

(11) He died December the 22d 1316, aged 69 years. Elſſius, in Encomiaſtico Auguſtin. pag. 15.

(12) Creſcimbeni, Hiſt. della volgar Poeſia, pag. 85, 296.

(13) Ibid.

(14) Ibid.

(15) He lived in the 16th Century.

(16) Creſcimbeni, ubi ſupra.

(17) Ibid. pag. 296.

(18) Ibid. pag. 85.

He married the daughter of Farinata de gli Uberti (c) [E]. The famous Poet Dante boasts of having had a ſhare in his friendſhip (d), but makes him to be the ſon of a man, whom he places in hell, with the followers of Epicurus; who denied the immortality of the ſoul (e), ſo that our Guido was an unbeliever by inheritance. I believe I may ſafely aſſert it, that ANDREW CAVALCANTE (f), a man of wit who flouriſhed in the ſeventeenth Century, was of this family. Thuanus affirms it with regard to BARTHOLOMEW CAVALCANTE, a man famous for his writings and for his negotiations; he was born at Florence in the year 1503, and died at Padua December the 9th 1562 (g). See his Article in Moreri, but take care not to believe what Thuanus aſſerts (h), namely, that Guido (i) lived at the ſame time with Petrarch, and that we have ſtill the verſes which Petrarch addreſſed to him; for Guido died before the other was born.

(f) See his Elogium in Mr. Rilli, Notizie intorno a gli Huomini Illuſtri dell' Academia Fiorentina, Part 1. pag. 351.
(g) Thuanus, lib. 34. pag. m. 684.
(h) Idem, ibid.
(i) He means, no doubt, the GUIDO CAVALCANTE of this Article.

(c) Taken from Giovanni Mario de' Creſcimbeni, Iſtoria della volgar Poeſia, pag. 85.
(d) Dante ſi gloriava d'aver goduta l'amicizia di lui, e nella Vita Nuova ſua primiero amico lo chiama. Idem, ibid.
(e) See the Inferno of Dante, Cant. 10.

Poet; but as he had not read the Greek and Latin Poets, he wanted that delicacy, which is neceſſary to make a perfect Poet (19). Let us obſerve, that there is a work of Marſilius Ficinus (20), which contains an explication of our Cavalcante's opinions concerning the Nature of the Soul. Cavalcante is there very much commended.

[E] He married the daughter of Farinata de gli Uberti.] He is a man, whom Dante places in Hell in the ſame place with Cavalcante di Cavalcanti. He had put himſelf at the head of the Gibeline Faction, who by his directions gained a great victory over the Guelphes of Florence (21). Our Guido was ſtill living, when Dante compoſed the tenth Canto of his Poem on Hell.

(19) Grangier, Comment. ſur l'Enfer de Dante, Ch. x. pag. 103.
(20) It is the Commentary in Convivium Platonis, among Plato's Works, pag. m. 1167.
(21) See the 10th Canto of Dante's Poem on Hell, and Grangier's Notes.

CAVALIERI (BONAVENTURE), an eminent Mathematician in the ſeventeenth Century, was a native of Milan, and a Fryar of the Order of the Jeſuati of St. Jerom (a), which Mr. Collier in the firſt volume of his Dictionary has miſtaken for the Order of the Jeſuits, of which he erroneouſly aſſerts our Author was one. He was chief Profeſſor of the Mathematics in the College at Bologna, where he publiſhed ſeveral works, the moſt remarkable of which are his Geometria Indiviſibilibus Continuorum nova quadam ratione promota, printed at Bologna 1635 in 4to, wherein he exhibits the Method of Indiviſibles [A]; and his Exercitationes Geometriæ

(a) He ſtiles himſelf in his Latin Works Ordinis Jeſuatorum S. Hieronymi; and in his Italian Treatiſes, Gieſuato di S. Girolamo.

[A] His Geometria indiviſibilibus continuorum nova quadam ratione promota, ... wherein he exhibits the Method of Indiviſibles.] Frederic Commandinus in the year 1565 had publiſhed at Bologna in 4to his Treatiſe in Latin de Centro Gravitatis; but he having been guilty of ſome miſtakes with regard to the Parabolic Conoid, Lucas Valerius, Mathematicæ & Civilis Philoſophiæ in Gymnaſio Romano Profeſſor, was induced (1) to publiſh at Rome in 1604 in 4to, his Treatiſe de Centro Gravitatis Solidorum, in three Books, which Mr. Benjamin Robins, F. R. S. in his Diſcourſe concerning the Nature and Certainty of Sir Iſaac Newton's Methods of Fluxions, and of Prime and Ultimate Ratio's (2), ſtiles a moſt excellent Treatiſe, and tells us, that in it "he demonſtrates with brevity and elegance his propoſitions "concerning the Menſuration and Center of Gravity "of the Sphere, Spheroid, parabolical and hyperbolical Conoids. This Author, continues Mr. Robins, "wrote before the Doctrine of Indiviſibles was pro"poſed to the World." And ſince, Andrew Tacquet, "in his Treatiſe on the Cylindrical and Annular Solids, "has made the ſame propoſition, though ſomething "differently expreſſed, the Baſis of his Demonſtrati"ons at the ſame time very judiciouſly expoſing the "Inconcluſiveneſs of the Reaſonings from Indiviſi"bles." The manner wherein the ancients demonſtrated what relates to the Menſuration of Curvilinear Spaces not giving any diſtinct notion of the principles, upon which they built their Analyſis of ſuch Problems (3), in 1635, about thirty years before Sir Iſaac Newton invented his Method of Fluxions, Cavalieri propoſed in theſe Problems a new form of Reaſoning in his Geometria Indiviſibilibus continuorum promota. In this book he ſuppoſes, that all ſurfaces might be filled up with parallel lines, and all ſolids by parallel planes; and then lays down this fundamental propoſition, That different planes are in the ſame proportion to each other as all the lines contained in each; and diſferent ſolids in the ſame proportion as all the planes contained in them. At this is a manner of expreſſion hardly accompanied with any ideas; ſince it is not at all intelligible to ſpeak of the collective number of lines or planes, where their number is wholly undetermined and infinite; this Method was from the beginning oppoſed, as ungeometrical, and in no meaſure agreeable to that clearneſs of conception and expreſſion, for which the mathematical Sciences had ever been celebrated. But however, as by proper cautions error in the concluſion might be avoided, and this Method promiſed great aſſiſtance in the analyſis of a ſubject, wherein the ancients had made the leaſt progreſs, it was warmly eſpouſed by Torricellius, and others of the moſt illuſtrious Geometers. Our countryman Dr. Wallis, and many after him, thought it an improvement of this Method to ſubſtitute, in the room of lines, parallelograms, whoſe breadth was to be called infinitely ſmall; and for the planes, whereby ſolids were ſuppoſed to be filled up, priſms and cylinders of an infinitely ſmall altitude; ſo that the Method of Indiviſibles at length ſuppoſed all geometrical magnitudes, whether lines, ſurfaces, or ſolids, to be compoſed of an infinite number of homogeneous magnitudes, each infinitely ſmall. But this is a mode of expreſſion no way more intelligible than the other. Sir Iſaac Newton therefore inſtituted a manner of conception upon quite different principles. He obſerving (to uſe his own words) that Indiviſibles have no being either in Geometry or in Nature *; inſtead of this infinite and inconceivable ſubdiviſion of magnitude already formed, he conſidered them as produced before the imagination by ſome motion. And thus &c. (4). Cavalieri's Book was oppoſed by Paulus Guldinus Sancto-Gallenſis in his Centro-Baryca, ſive de Centro Gravitatis, printed at Vienna in 1635; by Marius Bettinus in his Apiaria univerſæ Philoſophiæ Mathematicæ, printed in three tomes at Bologna 1642; and by Andrew Tacquet in his Cylindrica & Annularia, printed at Antwerp 1651 in 4to. Theſe three Writers were Jeſuits. The laſt of them, Tacquet, writes concerning Cavalieri's Method of Indiviſibles as follows (5). Methodum demonſtrandi per Indiviſibilia, vel (ut ego appellare ſoleo) per Heterogeneas, quam nobilis Geometra Bonaventura Cavallerius in lucem prodidit, pro legitimâ ac geometricâ admittendam non exiſtimo. Procedit illa a lineis ad ſuperficies, a ſuperficiebus ad corpora, atque æqualitatem vel proportionem in lineis repertam concludit de ſuperficie; repertam in ſuperficiebus traducit ad ſolida, quâ ratiocinandi formâ, niſi ad homogenea revocetur, conficitur omnino nihil. . . . Abſit tamen ut invento pulcherrimo debitam laudem cupiam detrahere. Hoc ſolum dico, demonſtrationes per heterogeneas inſtitutas ad aſſenſum non cogere, niſi, quod fieri plerumque poteſt, ad homogeneas reducantur. Stephanus de Angelis, a Venetian, and Scholar of Cavalieri, wrote in defence of him with prodigious zeal, and in the Preface of his Book de infinitis Parabolis &c. printed at Venice 1659 in 4to, tells us, that Guldinus, Bettinus, and Tacquet, were the only perſons, who diſliked Cavalieri's Method; and that it was approved of by Torricellius, Franciſcus a Schooten, Richard Albius an Engliſhman in his Hemiſpherium diſſectum, and Iſmael Bullialdus

(1) See the beginning of his firſt book.
(2) Pag. 58. edit. London 1735, in 8vo.
(3) See Mr. Robins's Account of his Diſcourſe above quoted, in the Preſent State of the Republick of Letters for October 1735, vol. 16. Art. 15. pag. 246.

* Philoſ. Tranſact. num. 342. pag. 205.
(4) Mr. Robins, in the Preſent State of the Republick of Letters, ubi ſupra, pag. 246, 247.
(5) In the Scholium, pag 23, 24.

triæ ſex [B], printed in the ſame City in 1647, in 4to. We ſhall mention his other works in the note [C]. He died in 1647, as we are informed by Stephanus de Angelis, who had been his ſcholar, in his Problemata Geometrica ſexaginta (b), printed at Venice 1658 in 4to. We ſhall give his character as it was communicated to us by a very learned and ingenious Gentleman (d). "This ſcholar of Galileo may juſtly be eſteemed a "Mathematician of the firſt rank. He was a perſon of quick genius and exquiſite "judgment, as all his works ſufficiently teſtify, being full of fine improvements upon "Archimedes and the antient Geometers, with many noble diſcoveries and uſeful "applications of them to the various parts of the Mathematics; ſo that Fermat, Barrow, Wallis, and Newton, have each of them very ſucceſsfully illuſtrated his method, "and in ſome things improved his principles. His Directorium generale Uranometricum contains great variety of moſt uſeful practices in Trigonometry and Aſtronomy; many of them new and elegant. The famous Keplerian Problem is there ſo "well performed, that all the induſtry of later Aſtronomers has not been able to make "any conſiderable improvements in it with regard to the practice thereof. His Trigonometrical Tables in this work are excellent, and contain the Natural Sines to the Radius 10,000,000,000, the Logarithm-Sines, Tangents, Secants, and Logarithm-Verſed "Sines to eight places of Figures; and the firſt and laſt five minutes of the Quadrant "are computed to every ſecond; the next five minutes to every five ſeconds, and the "next ten minutes to every ten ſeconds. This is the original Table of Logarithm-Verſed "Sines, whence all others ſince have been copied."

(b) Pag. 295.

(d) William Jones, Eſq; Author of the Synopſis Palmariorum Matheſeos, printed at London 1706 in 8vo; to which Gentleman we are obliged for ſome particulars of this Article; as we are for others to the learned Joſeph Leatherland, M. D.

Bullialdus in his Treatiſe de Lineis Spiralibus, printed in 1657, who only diſlikes the name Indiviſibles. De Angelis likewiſe in the Preface to his Infinitorum Spiralium Spatiorum menſura obſerves, that Vincentius Vivianus in his firſt Book de Maximis & Minimis, Geometrica Divinatio in quintum Librum Conicorum Apollonii Pergæi, printed at Florence 1659, approves of our Author's Method, ſo that it be uſed rightly and carefully, rectè tamen cautéque uſurpata. Monſ. De Chales likewiſe aſſerts that if it be well underſtood and explained in a manner ſomewhat better than it was exhibited by Cavalieri, it opens a way for the eaſy ſolution of a great number of difficulties. Si tamen hæc doctrina benè intelligatur, & explicetur paulo melius, quam ab ipſo Authore propoſita fuit, viam ad multas difficultates nullo negotio ſolvendas aperit. And he ſtiles it one of the nobleſt inventions of the Age.

[B] His Exercitationes Geometricæ ſex.] The whole title is as follows: Exercitationes Geometricæ ſex: I. De priori Methodo Indiviſibilium. II. De poſteriori Methodo Indiviſibilium. III. In Paulum Guldinum è Societate Jeſu dicta Indiviſibilia oppugnantem. IV. De uſu eorundem Indiviſibilium in Poteſtatibus Coſſicis (6). V. De uſu dictorum Indiviſibilium in uniformiter difformiter Gravibus. VI. De Propoſitionibus miſcellaneis, viz. 1. De modo facili deſcribendi Sectiones Conicas, & in omnibus uniformi. 2. De mirabili quadam vi Parabolicâ. 3. De Perſpicillorum Focis. 4. De deſcriptione Parabolæ per quatuor puncta in angulis Quadrilateri, cujus duo ſaltem oppoſita latera ſint extra concurrentia. 5. De inveniendo puncto, quod à tribus datis quibuſvis diſtet ſecundum minimam quantitatem. 6. De inveniendis Lateribus Trianguli æquicruris ex datâ areâ & perimetro ejuſdem. 7. De Magnitudinum Incommenſurabilitate. 8. De Motu Puncti in Circulo. 9. De Foco Speculi Sphærici Concavi. 10. De Solido infinitè longo æquali finito. 11. De Hydracontiſterio, hoc eſt, Vaſe Aquarum ejaculatoria. Auctore F. Bonaventura Cavalerio Mediolanenſi, Ordinis Jeſuitarum S. Hieronymi Priore, & in Almo Bononienſi Archigymnaſio primario Mathematicarum Profeſſore. Bologna 1647 in 4to.

(6) i. e. Algebraic Powers.

[C] We ſhall mention his other Works in the Note.] I. Lo Specchio Uſtorio, overo Trattato delle Settioni Coniche e alcuni loro mirabili Effetti intorno al Lume, Caldo, Freddo, Suono, e Moto ancora. Da F. Bonaventura Cavalieri Milaneſe, Gieſuato di S. Girolamo, Autore, e Matematico Primario nell' inclito Studio dell Citta Bologna. Bologna 1631 in 4to. II. Directorium Generale Uranometricum. In quo Trigonometriæ Logarithmicæ fundamenta ac regulæ demonſtrantur, Aſtronomicæque Supputationes ad ſolam ferè vulgarem Additionem reducuntur. Opus utiliſſimum Aſtronomicis, Geometris, Arithmeticis, Perſpectivis, Architectis, præcipuè Militaribus, Mechanicis, Geographis, necnon ipſis Philoſophis Naturalibus. Authore Fr. Bonaventura Cavalerio, Mediolanenſi, Ordinis Jeſuitarum S. Hieronymi, Priori Titulari, ac in almo Bononienſi Gymnaſio Primario Mathematicarum Profeſſore. Bologna 1632 in 4to. III. Tabula Trigonometrica Logarithmica (7). IV. Centuria di varii Problemi per dimoſtrare l'uſa e la Facilita de Logarithmi, nella Gnomonica, Aſtronomia, Geograffia, Altimetria, Pianimetria, Stereometria, e Aritmetica Prattica; toccandoſi anco qualche caſa nella Meccanica nell' Arte Militare, e nella Muſica. Bologna 1639 in 12mo. V. Trigonometria Plana & Sphærica, Linearis & Logarithmica, hoc eſt, tam per Sinuum, Tangentium, & Secantium multiplicationem, ac diviſionem juxta Veteres, quam per Logarithmorum ſimplicem ferè Additionem juxta Recentiores, ad Triangulorum dimetiendos Angulos & Latera procedens. Cum Canone duplici Trigonometrico & Chiliade Numerorum abſolutorum ab 1 uſque ad 1000, eorumque Logarithmis ac differentiis. Opuſculum univerſæ Matheſi utiliſſimum, omniumque Terreſtrium ac Cæleſtium Dimenſionum Promptuarium. Auctore Fr. Bonaventura Cavelerio, Mediolanenſi &c. Bologna 1643 in 4to.

(7) See Dr. Thomas Hyde's Catalogus Impreſſor. Libror. Bibliotb. Bodleianæ, pag. 151. edit. Oxon. 1674, in fol.

T.

☞ CAVENDISH, a noble family, like other families of the greateſt antiquities, derived its name from their place of habitation. A younger branch of the Gernons, famous in Norfolk and Eſſex, ſettled at Cavendiſh in Suffolk, and from that ſeat and eſtate were ſoon diſtinguiſhed by that ſurname (a) [A]. JOHN DE CAVENDISH was conſtituted one of the Juſtices of the King's Bench 1366, 39. Edward III, and made chief Juſtice of the

(a) Memoirs of the family of Cavendiſh printed at the end of the Funeral Sermon on William Duke of Devonſhire in the Church of All-Hallows in Derby on Friday Sept. the 5th 1707. By White Kennet, D. D. pag. 59. edit. London 1708 in 8vo.

[A] A younger branch of the Gernons, famous in Norfolk and Eſſex, ſettled at Cavendiſh in Suffolk, and from that ſeat and eſtate were ſoon diſtinguiſhed by that ſurname.] The Gernons, who took their name from Gernon, a Caſtle in Normandy, were of great note in the counties of Norfolk and Eſſex, being lineally deſcended from ROBERT DE GERNON, a famous Norman, who aſſiſted William the Conqueror in his invaſion of this Realm, and in reward of his ſervices, had grants of ſeveral Lordſhips. This ROBERT DE GERNON gave the Church of St. Peter in Glouceſter, the Church of Winterbourne, the Church of Laverſtoke, and half the lands thereto belonging to the Abbey of Glouceſter, which was confirmed by King Henry I, in the time of Peter the Abbot. His ſon and heir MATTHEW DE GERNON married Hodierna, daughter and co-heir to Sir William Sackville, lineal anceſtor to Lionel now Duke of Dorſet, and by her had iſſue RALPH DE GERNON, who by his wife, the ſiſter of Sir William Brews Knt, had a ſon of his name, the founder of Lee's Priory in Eſſex, and died in 1248, the 32d of Henry III, leaving iſſue WILLIAM his ſon and heir, who died in the 43d of that reign, and left iſſue by Eleanor his wife two ſons, Sir the ſame Court by Clauſ. Writ, 15 Jul. 46 Ed. III. 1373 (b). In the next reign he was continued in that honourable office, and had the grant of one hundred marks per ann. by Letters Patents 26 Jun. 1 Ric. II. 1378, and had his ſummons to Parliament by expreſs writ from 46 Ed. III. to 5 Ric. II. when upon the inſurrection raiſed in Kent under Straw and Tyler, the mob was animated to riſe in other parts, and particularly in Suffolk, a body of fifty thouſand made it their triumph to plunder and murder the Lawyers, and attacking the Houſe of the Lord Chief Juſtice Cavendiſh, they brought him out, and beheaded him, as their accomplices had done to the Lord Chancellor, Lord Treaſurer, and other chief Miniſters (d). Of the ſame family was the famous Captain THOMAS CAVENDISH, born in Suffolk, who finiſhed his noble expedition round the world in September 1588, and making another like attempt in 1591, died in his return (e).

(b) Dugdale's Chronica Series.

(c) Idem, Summa Parl.

(d) Thom. Walſingh. ſub ann. 1381.

(e) Heroologica Anglica Autore H. H. pag. 90.

Ralph de Gernon, and GEOFFREY, lineal anceſtor to this noble family. This Geoffrey, in the reign of Edward I, was ſtiled of More-Hall in the Peak in the county of Derby, and was ſucceeded by ROGER his ſon and heir, who was ſeated at Grimſton-Hall in Suffolk, and died in 1318, the 11th of Edward II, having had to wife the daughter and heir of John Potton, Lord of Cavendiſh, by whom he left iſſue John, Roger, Stephen, and Richard, who all took the name of Cavendiſh. Of theſe ſons, Roger the ſecond, married Alice daughter of Geoffrey Stratton, with whom he had the Manor of Stratton, and from whom deſcended Sir Richard Cavendiſh, Captain and Governour of Blackneſs, who was Knighted in Scotland by the Earl of Hertford Sept. the 23d 1546, the 37th of Henry VIII, and by inquiſition the 6th of February 1552, the 6th of Edward VI, after the death of Henry Duke of Suffolk, (who died without iſſue July the 14th, the 5th of Edward VI) was found to be ſixty years of age, and was one of his co-heirs, viz. Son of Richard Cavendiſh, ſon of Auguſtine Cavendiſh, who married Elizabeth, eldeſt daughter of Sir William Brandon Knt. grandfather of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk. This Sir Richard Cavendiſh had iſſue William Cavendiſh of Trimely St. Martin in the county of Suffolk, who died in 1572, poſſeſſed of the ancient inheritance of his anceſtors, viz. Grimſton, Stratton, and other Manors, leaving Thomas his ſon and heir under age, who married Mary, daughter to Thomas Lord Wentworth of Nettleſted, and had iſſue ſeveral ſons and daughters, viz. William, Auguſtine, Thomas, Mary, Margaret, and Anne. This Thomas was the famous Navigator mentioned by our Hiſtorians. But to return to JOHN DE CAVENDISH, mentioned in the text of the article, eldeſt ſon of Roger de Gernon, by his two wives, Roſe and Alice, he left iſſue two ſons and a daughter named Margaret. Of theſe ſons Andrew the eldeſt in 1376, 50 Edward III, was Knight of the Shire for the county of Suffolk, and in 1385, 8 of Richard II. was Sheriff of the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, and dying without iſſue in 1395, 18 Richard II, was buried in the Abbey, called the New Abbey near the Tower of London, being ſucceeded by Sir JOHN CAVENDISH his brother. This Sir JOHN was one of the Eſquires of the body to King Richard II; and our Hiſtorians relate that it was he who killed Wat Tyler, after Sir William Walworth, Mayor of London, had arreſted him; for which ſervices he was Knighted by the King in Smithfield, who likewiſe gave 40 l. per annum to him and his heirs forever. This Sir John Cavendiſh, or another of his name, ſerved under King Henry V, in his wars in France, and on the 24th of October 1415 was in the famous battle of Agencourt. When he died, we do not find; but by his wife Joan, daughter of Sir William Clapton, he had three ſons, WILLIAM, Robert, and Walter, of which the eldeſt married Joan daughter to * Staverton, and dying in 1433, 11 Henry VI, left a ſon named Thomas, whoſe wife was Catherine, daughter and heir to * Scudamore, and by her he had a ſon THOMAS, who in the reign of Henry the VIIIth was Clerk of the Pipe in the Exchequer. This Thomas married to his firſt wife Alice, daughter and heir to John Smith of Padbrook-Hall in the county of Suffolk, and by her had three ſons, George, William, and Thomas, and a daughter named Mary, and dying in 1524, 15 Henry VIII, was ſucceeded by George his eldeſt ſon, who was ſeated at Glemsford in Suffolk, and was father of William Cavendiſh of the ſame place Eſq; who had two ſons William and Ralph, but they dying without iſſue, we return to WILLIAM, next brother to the ſaid George; which William became chief heir-male, and was Gentleman-Uſher of the Chamber to Cardinal Wolſey (1), as we ſhall ſhew in the following article.

(1) Peerage of England, by Arthur Collins Eſq; vol. 1. pag. 120, 121, 122. edit. London 1735, in 8vo.

☞ CAVENDISH (Sir WILLIAM), was Gentleman-Uſher to Cardinal Wolſey [A], and admitted to a very great ſhare of his confidence, of whoſe Life he wrote an account [B]. His fidelity to that unhappy Prelate in all his diſtreſſes recommended him to the favour of King Henry VIII, who immediately after the Cardinal's death ſent for him to Court, and in the thirty firſt year of his reign made him one of the Auditors of the Court of Augmentation, and in the thirty ſeventh year Treaſurer of his Chamber, and one of his Privy-Council (a). He bore the ſame relation to King Edward VI and Queen Mary (b), receiving the honour of Knighthood (c), and a large acceſſion of eſtate by grant of lands belonging to ſeveral diſſolved Priories and Abbies in exchange for his Manors of Northal in Hertfordſhire, and Northawbery in Lincolnſhire, &c. (d). But the greateſt addition to his fortunes was made by a marriage with Elizabeth, daughter and coheir of John Hardwick of Hardwich in Derbyſhire Eſq; and widow of Robert Barley of Barley in the ſame county Eſq; (e), whoſe large eſtate ſhe procured to be ſettled upon her and her heirs, having no iſſue by him (f). By this Lady Sir William Cavendiſh had

(a) Dr. Kennet's Memoirs of the Family of Cavendiſh, pag. 64.

(b) Life of William Cavendiſh Duke of Newcaſtle; written by Margaret Ducheſs of Newcaſtle, his wife, Book I. pag. 2. edit. London 1667, in fol.

(c) Kennet, ubi ſupra.

(d) Thoroton's Nottinghamſhire, pag. 186.

(e) Dugdale, Baron. tom. 2. pag. 420. Thoroton, pag. 187.

(f) Kennet, ubi ſupra.

[A] Was Gentleman-Uſher to Cardinal Wolſey.] It ſeems probable, that the Cardinal born in Suffolk, took this Gentleman out of the ſame country into his ſplendid family, wherein, as the Lord Burleigh told Queen Elizabeth in his Memorial to her Majeſty, he had one Earl, nine Barons, and about one thouſand Knights, Gentlemen, and inferior officers (1).

(1) Dr. White Kennet's Memoirs of the Family of Cavendiſh, pag. 61.

[B] Of whoſe life he wrote an account.] Dr. Kennet informs us (2), that the oldeſt copy of it is in the hands of the noble family of Pierpoint, into which the Author's daughter was married (3). Biſhop Nicholſon in the ſecond part of his Engliſh Hiſtorical Library (4), having obſerved, that Cardinal Wolſey's purple will give him a rank with the greateſt of our Prelates, how mean ſoever the circumſtances of his birth and parentage may have been; and that the figure that he made in the State as well as in the Church during his Rule and Government (rather than Miniſtry) in the reign of King Henry the VIII, very juſtly challenged the pains of a ſpecial Hiſtorian; tells us, that "ſuch was Cavendiſh, his menial ſervant, who was "alſo in good eſteem with the King, and that he "has left us an impartial account of his maſter's "life, which has had ſeveral editions (5)." Dr. Burnet (6) quotes a manuſcript copy different from what we have in print; and ſo does the Lord Herbert (7); but whether this be not the ſame with the former, Biſhop Nicholſon obſerves that he cannot tell.

(2) Pag. 63.

(3) See the following note.

(4) Pag. 166. edit. London 1697 in 8vo.

(5) London 1590, &c. in 4to.

(6) Hiſtory of the Reformation, Part 1. pag. 8.

(7) Hiſtory of Henry VIII. pag. 121, 122. in the Complete Hiſtory of England, vol. 1. Lord Herbert by miſtake calls him George.

had ſeveral children [C]; and after his death ſhe married firſt Sir William St. Lo, Captain of the Guard to Queen Elizabeth, and then George Earl of Shrewſbury (g). She built three of the moſt elegant Seats, that were ever raiſed by one hand within the ſame county, Chatſworth, Hardwick, and Oldcotes (b). She died February 13th 1607, and was buried in the South-ſide of All-Hallows Church in Derby (i).

(g) Idem, pag. 66, 67.

(b) Idem, pag. 68.

(i) Idem, pag. 71.

[C] By this Lady Sir William Cavendiſh had ſeveral children.] I. Henry, ſeated at Tutbury in the county of Suffolk. He married Grace, the younger daughter of George Earl of Shrewſbury, and died without iſſue October the 12th, 1616. II. WILLIAM, heir to the whole eſtate, and firſt Earl of Devonſhire. III. CHARLES, ſettled at Wellbeck in the county of Nottingham, and father of William Baron Ogle, Lord Cavendiſh of Boleſover, Viſcount Mansfield, Earl, Marquis, and Duke of Newcaſtle, whoſe life written by Margaret his ſecond Ducheſs was printed at London 1667 in fol. He died Dec. the 25th, 1676, in the 84th year of his age, and was buried in Weſtminſter-Abbey leaving iſſue by his firſt wife Elizabeth, daughter and ſole heir to William Baſſet of Blore in the county of Stafford Eſq; HENRY, his ſucceſſor, and three daughters, Jane married to Charles Cheyney of Cheſham-boys in the county of Bucks Eſq; Elizabeth to John Egerton, Earl of Bridgewater, anceſtor to the preſent Duke of that name; and Frances to Oliver St. John Eſq; afterwards Earl of Bolingbroke. HENRY, Duke of Newcaſtle, married Frances, eldeſt daughter to William Pierpoint of Thoreſby, Eſq; ſecond ſon to Robert Earl of Kingſton; and by her had Henry his only ſon, who was ſtiled Earl of Ogle, and married Elizabeth, ſole daughter and heir to Joſceline Piercy, Earl of Northumberland, but died in his father's lifetime on the 1ſt of November 1680, without iſſue; and his Grace dying July the 26th, 1691, without iſſue-male, his honours became extinct, and his five daughters became his co-heirs. Elizabeth, the eldeſt, was firſt married to Chriſtopher Monk, Duke of Albemarle, and afterwards to Ralph Lord Mountagu, created Duke of Mountagu; Frances to John Campbel, ſecond ſon to the Earl of Brodalbin in Scotland; Margaret to John Holles, Earl of Clare, afterwards created Duke of Newcaſtle; Catherine to Thomas Tufton, Earl of Thanet; and Arabella to Charles Spencer, Earl of Sunderland (8). IV. FRANCES, married to Sir Henry Pierpoint of Holm-Pierpoint in the county of Nottingham. V. ELIZABETH, married to Charles Stuart, Earl of Lenox, younger brother to the father of King James I; by whom ſhe was the mother of that incomparable Lady Arabella, ſo nearly related to the Crown, that State jealouſy, ſays Dr. Kennet (8), confined her, and ſacrificed her in the Tower. VI. MARY, married to Gilbert Earl of Shrewſbury. The Writer abovementioned obſerves (10), that we have here a rare example of two brothers founding two ſeveral Dukedoms, and the ſiſters matched, one into the moſt noble family of England, and the other into a direct branch of the Royal Family of Great Britain.

(8) Peerage of England, by Arthur Collins Eſq; vol. 1. pag. 125.

(9) Memoirs, pag. 66.

(10) Ibid.

☞CAVENDISH (WILLIAM) the firſt Earl of Devonſhire ſecond ſon to Sir William Cavendiſh, was created Baron Cavendiſh of Hardwick May the 4th 1605, in the third year of the reign of James I, and Earl of Devonſhire Auguſt the 7th 1618, in the 16th year of that King (a). He was twice married, and had ſeveral children [A]. He died March the 3d 1625, and was interred at Endſor near Chatſworth (b).

(a) Dugdale, Baronage, vol. 1.

(b) Kennet, Memoirs, pag. 72.

[A] He was twice married, and had ſeveral children.] His firſt wife was Anne daughter and heir of Henry Kighley of Kighley in the county of York Eſq; by whom he had three ſons and three daughters. I. GILBERT, who died a young man, of incomparable parts and left a very ingenious Book intitled, Horæ Subſecivæ, Obſervations and Diſcourſes, &c. printed at London 1620 in 8vo. (1). II. WILLIAM, his heir and ſucceſſor. III. JAMES, who died in his infancy. IV. FRANCES, married to Sir William Maynard, afterwards created Lord Maynard. V. MARY, and VI. ELIZABETH, who both died young. His ſecond wife was Elizabeth, daughter of Edward Boughton of Cauſton in the county of Warwick Eſq; and widow of Sir Richard Wortley of Wortley in the county of York Knt. by whom he had iſſue Sir JOHN CAVENDISH, who was made Knight of the Bath in 1616, at at the Coronation of Prince Charles, and died without iſſue January the 18th, the year following (2).

(1) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 635. 2d edit. London 1721.

(2) Collins's Peerage of England, vol. 1. pag. 127.

☞CAVENDISH (WILLIAM) the ſecond Earl of Devonſhire, ſecond ſon of the firſt Earl, having travelled into France and Italy under the tuition of Mr. Thomas Hobbes, married Chriſtian daughter of Edward Lord Bruce of Kinloſſe in Scotland, the great favourite of King James I, by which Lady, who died June the 16th 1674, he had iſſue, I. WILLIAM, his heir. II. CHARLES, a Colonel in the army of King Charles I. III. HENRY, who died young. IV. ANNE, married to Robert Lord Rich, ſon and heir to Robert Earl of Warwick. This noble Earl was beloved and admired in both Houſes of Parliament, and a great Speaker in them (a); and Mr. Hobbes gives a noble character of him [A]. He contracted a vaſt debt by his magnificent manner of living, and died at his houſe without Biſhopſ-gate in London (where Devonſhire-ſquare

(a) Kennet's Memoirs, pag. 74.

[A] Mr. Hobbes gives a noble character of him.] He writes thus in an Epiſtle to the Earl's ſon. By the experience of many years I had the honour to ſerve him, I know this, there was not any, who more really, and leſs for glory's ſake favoured thoſe that ſtudied the liberal arts liberally than my Lord your father did, nor in whoſe houſe a man ſhould leſs need the Univerſity than his. For his own ſtudy it was beſtowed for the moſt part in that kind of learning, which beſt deſerveth the pains and hours of great perſons, Hiſtory and civil Knowledge, and directed not to the oſtentation of his reading, but to the government of his life and the public good; for he ſo read, that the learning that he took in by ſtudy, by judgment he digeſted and converted into wiſdom and ability to benefit his country; to which he alſo applied himſelf with zeal, but ſuch as took no ſtir either from faction or ambition. "And as he "was a moſt able man for ſoundneſs of advice and "clear expreſſion of himſelf in matters of difficulty "and conſequence both in public and private, ſo alſo "was he one, whom no man was able either to draw "or juſtle out of the ſtrait path of juſtice; of which "virtue I know not whether he deſerved more by "his ſeverity in impoſing it (as he did to his laſt "breath) on himſelf, or by his magnanimity in not "exacting it to himſelf from others. No man "better diſcerned of men, and therefore was he con-"ſtant in his friendſhips, becauſe he regarded not "the fortune nor adherence, but the men; with "whom alſo he converſed with an openneſs of heart, "that had no other guard than his own integrity, "and that Nil conſcire. To his equals he carried "himſelf equally; and to his inferiors familiarly, "but maintaining his reſpect fully, and only with "the native ſplendor of his worth. In ſum, he was "one, in whom might plainly be perceived that ho-"nour and honeſty are but the ſame thing in the "different degrees of perſons."

Square is now built) June the 20th 1628, and was interred at All-Hallows Church in Derby (b).

(b) Idem, ibid. pag. 77.

☞CAVENDISH (WILLIAM) the third Earl of Devonſhire, being nine years of age at his father's deceaſe, was left under the care of his mother the Counteſs Dowager, who in 1631 committed him to his father's tutor Mr. Hobbes, who inſtructed him in the family for three years, and then about 1634 travelled with him as his Governor to France and Italy. The Earl returned in 1637. He married Elizabeth ſecond daughter of William Cecil Earl of Saliſbury, by whom he had iſſue, I. William, afterwards Duke of Devonſhire; II. Charles born October the 5th 1655, who died unmarried March the 3d 1670, and was interred at Derby (a); and III. Anne, firſt married to Charles Lord Rich, only ſon of Charles Earl of Warwick, and then to John Lord Burghley, afterwards Earl of Exeter. She died June the 18th 1703 (b). He adhered firmly to King Charles I [A]. Dr. Kennet ſays (c) that he was virtuous in his whole life, and prudent in all his affairs; and that he improved his large inheritance, and took care to let it deſcend entire to poſterity. He died at his Seat at Roehampton in Surrey November the 3d 1684, and was interred with his Anceſtors at Derby (d).

(a) Collins's Peerage of England, vol. 1. pag. 128.

(b) Kennet's Memoirs, pag. 77, 78, 79, and Collins, ubi ſupra.

(c) Pag. 104.

(d) Idem, pag. 105.

[A] He adhered firmly to King Charles I.] He follows his Majeſty to the North, and at York in June 1642 he was one of thoſe Peers, who ſubſcribed a declaration of their bearing teſtimony of the King's frequent and earneſt declarations and profeſſions of his abhorring all deſigns of making war upon the Parliament (1). He ſupplied the King with money, attended him in his Parliament at Oxford, and afterwards retired beyond ſea to wait for peace at home. This receſs could afford him no repoſe; he was put into the number of delinquents; his great eſtate was ſequeſtered; and when by the mediation of his friends an ordinance was depending for his compoſition in October 1645, order was given for his return by ſuch a day (2).

(1) Kennet's Memoirs, pag. 80, 81.

(2) Idem, pag. 81.

☞CAVENDISH (CHARLES) ſon of the ſecond and brother to the third Earl of Devonſhire, and eminent for his valour and uncommon ſkill in the Sciences, was born at London May the 20th 1620, and at eighteen years of age was ſent to travel into France and Italy; from whence he embarked for Conſtantinople, "dropping his Gover- "nor and Engliſh Servants, as knowing that a traveller may learn moſt from ſtran- "gers (a)." After a long circuit by land through Natolia, he went by ſea to Alexandria, thence to Cairo, and was brought by way of Malta to Spain, and back to Paris, and after ſome converſation with the Court returned to England about the end of May 1641. The ſame year he went over to Holland, where he paſſed one campaign in the Prince of Orange's army, the moſt eminent ſchool of war, and came over to England again about the end of November following. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his valour and conduct in ſeveral engagements in defence of King Charles I [A], being made Colonel of

(a) Kennet's Memoirs, pag. 83, 84.

[A] He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his valour and conduct in ſeveral engagements in defence of King Charles I.] When the King retired to York upon the Heats in the Houſes of Parliament, Mr. Cavendiſh went thither with his brother, the Earl of Devonſhire, and enter'd himſelf among the Noblemen and Gentlemen Volunteers, who deſired to be put under command for his Majeſty's ſervice; and made it his choice to ride in the King's own Troop, commanded by the Lord Bernard Stuart his kinſman, brother to the Duke of Richmond, among ſo many conſiderable perſons for quality and fortunes, that the King was heard to ſay, that "the "revenues of thoſe in that ſingle Troop would buy "the eſtates of my Lord of Eſſex, and of all the Of- "ficers in his Army (1)." He march'd in this Troop till the battle of Edge-Hill 23d Octob. 1642, when the King, in reſpect and tenderneſs to theſe gallant men, would not expoſe them to equal hazard with the reſt of the Cavalry, but reſerved them for a guard to his own perſon. Mr. Cavendiſh ſuppoſing this to be no poſt of danger, and therefore not of honour, prevailed with the Lord Bernard Stuart, that they ſhould wait upon the King, and intreat his leave to be drawn up on the right hand of the right wing of the Horſe, as the moſt open and moſt honourable place in the battle; to which his Majeſty upon their importunity conſented. This proved to be the poſt of hotteſt ſervice and of greateſt ſucceſs; wherein Mr. Cavendiſh ſo diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his perſonal valour, that the Lord Aubigny, who commanded the Duke of York's Troop, being ſlain, he was preferred to that charge before many other pretenders of eminent birth and merit. This Troop was ſoon after put into the Prince of Wales's Regiment, wherein the ſuperior Officer put ſomething upon Captain Cavendiſh, which he thought an indignity, and therefore deſired his Majeſty to aſſign him a thouſand pounds, (which his own brother the Earl of Devonſhire had preſented to the King,) promiſing, that if his Majeſty would but let him have the Duke of York's Troop out of the Prince of Wales's Regiment, he would go into the North, and raiſe the Duke a compleat Regiment of Horſe, before the Army could take the field; to which the King conſented, aſſuring him the honour of being Colonel of his new Regiment. In order to compleat it, he accepted of Thomas Markham Eſq; to be his Lieutenant Colonel, and Mr. Tuke for the Captain of his firſt Troop; and took his head-quarters at Newark, and kept under many of the Parliament's Garriſons at Nottingham, and in other neighbouring parts, and by degrees became maſter of the whole Country, ſo that the King's Commiſſioners for Lincolnſhire and Nottinghamſhire deſired his leave to petition the King, that he might have the command of all the forces of their two counties, in quality of Colonel General, which he complied with and the King granted (2). In this command he beat the enemy from Grantham (3), and gained a compleat victory near Stamford, and reduced ſeveral of their Garriſon-Towns by the aſſiſtance of Colonel Welby and other brave Officers. After many glorious actions, he had the honour to receive the Queen in her march to Newark, who immediately took notice that ſhe ſaw him laſt in Holland, and was very glad now to meet him again in England. The Counteſs of Derby ſitting at the end of the Queen's coach entertained her Majeſty with great commendations of the Colonel; and when the Queen was to give the word to Major Tuke, ſhe gave that of Cavendiſh. He waited on the Queen with a noble Guard toward Oxford, and in his way, by her Majeſty's conſent, took Burton upon Trent by ſtorm, encouraging his ſoldiers to ſwim over the river, and ſcale the works, and enter in the midſt of deaths and utmoſt dangers. The royal cauſe declining, made him the more daring and deſperate (4). In his laſt action he is ſaid to have been murthered in cold blood after quarter given him by Colonel Bury, who made himſelf dear to Cromwell by this and ſome other acts of cruelty (5). Another

(1) Kennet's Memoirs, pag. 85, 86, 87.

(2) Idem, pag. 88, 89.

(3) See Clarendon. Hiſtory of the Rebellion, vol. 2. Part 1. Book 6. pag. 144. edit. Oxford 1707, in 8vo.

(4) Life of Chriſtian Counteſs Dowager of Devonſhire, pag. 52. and Kennet's Memoirs, pag. 94.

(5) Life of Chriſtian Counteſs Dowager of Devonſhire, pag. 53.

of a Regiment, but was at laſt killed near Gainſborough in 1643. He was a Gentleman of great merit and learning [B], and univerſally beloved and admired.

(6) Lloyd in his Memoirs of the Lives, Actions, Sufferings, and Deaths of thoſe noble, reverend, and excellent Perſons that ſuffered Death, &c. in our late inteſtine Wars, &c. pag. 673. edit. London 1668, in fol.

Another Writer (6) tells us, that his horſe ſticking in the mud, he died magnanimouſly refuſing quarter, and throwing the blood, which ran from his wounds, in the faces of thoſe, who ſhed it. Cromwell himſelf was in this action, and valued himſelf ſo much upon the ſucceſs of it, that he gave a particular account to the Committee for Aſſociation ſitting at Cambridge in a Letter dated July 31ſt 1643. "Gentlemen, It "hath pleaſed the Lord to give your ſervant and ſol- "diers a notable victory now at Gainſborow... In the "laſt reſerve unbroken ſtood General Cavendiſh, who "one while faced me, another while faced four of the "Lincoln Troops, which was all of ours, that ſtood "upon the place, the reſt being engaged in the chaſe. At "laſt General Cavendiſh charged the Lincolneers, and "routed them. Immediately I fell upon his rear "with my three troops, which did ſo aſtoniſh him, "that he gave over the chaſe, and would fain have "delivered himſelf from me; but I preſſing on, forc- "ed down a hill having a good execution of them, "and below the hill drove the General with ſome of "his ſoldiers into a quagmire, where my Captain Lieu- "tenant ſlew him with a thruſt under his ſhort ribs. "The reſt of his body was wholly routed, not one "man ſtaying upon the place (7)." When his body was brought to Newark to be interred, the whole Town were ſo fond of it even dead, that they would not ſuffer it for ſome days to be interred, but wept over it, and admired it. Nay and about thirty years after, when his body was removed to be interred at Derby with his mother, freſh lamentations were made by thoſe, who knew, and others who heard his fame, and the whole people of Newark expreſſed the moſt ſorrowful reluctance to part with the reliques of ſo dear a perſon, who had been when alive, the ornament and defence of that place (8).

(7) Ruſhworth, Part 3. vol. 2. pag. 278.

[B] He was a Gentleman of great learning and merit.] He was well ſkilled in Mathematics, as appears from ſome of his papers in the Library of Dr. John Moore, Biſhop of Ely, given by K. George I to the Univerſity of Cambridge. In ſhort he was a Gentleman ſo furniſhed with all the interior and politer parts of learning, (obtained at home and abroad, both by reading books and men) as well as courage, that he was prepared to defend his Prince with his head and hand, by the ſtrongeſt reaſon and moſt generous valour (9).

(8) Life of Chriſtian, Counteſs Dowager of Devonſhire, pag. 52.

(9) Ibid.

T

☞CAVENDISH (WILLIAM), the firſt Duke of Devonſhire, was born January the 25th 1640, and attended in his travels [A] by Dr. Killegrew, afterwards Maſter of the Savoy, who gave him a true reliſh in Poetry, and all the refinements of ſenſe and wit. Under the ſtyle of William Lord Cavendiſh, ſon to the Earl of Devonſhire, he was created September the 28th 1663 Maſter of Arts in the Univerſity of Oxford by the ſpecial command of the Chancellor (a). Soon after he married Mary, ſecond daughter of James Butler Duke of Ormond, and by her, who died July the 31ſt 1710 (b), had three ſons and one daughter [B]. In 1665 he went a volunteer into the Fleet, and was in the midſt of that dangerous ſea-fight in attendance on the Duke of York. He ſerved as Knight of the Shire for the county of Derby in ſeveral Parliaments [C]. In 1679 he was choſen one of the King's new Privy-Council, which was to conſiſt of a number not exceeding

(a) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 154. 2d edit. London 1721.

(b) Collins's Peerage of England, vol. 1. pag. 124.

[A] In his travels.] While he was at Paris he was moſt rudely affronted at an Opera by three Officers of the King's Guard, who came full of wine upon the ſtage. One of them coming up to him with a very inſulting queſtion, my Lord Cavendiſh gave him a ſevere blow on the face, upon which they all drew, and puſhed hard upon him. He got his back againſt one of the ſcreens, and made a ſtout defence, receiving ſeveral wounds, till a ſturdy Swiſs of my Lord Embaſſador Montague caught him up in his arms, and threw him over the ſtage into the pit. In his fall one of his arms was caught upon an iron ſpike, which tore out the fleſh, and left a ſcar very viſible to his dying day. He lay for ſome weeks in danger of his life. The three aſſailants were committed to priſon by the King's command, and not releaſed till my Lord himſelf interceded for them (1).

(1) Kennet's Memoirs, pag. 117, 118.

[B] By whom he had three ſons and one daughter.] I. WILLIAM Marquis of Hartington, afterwards Duke of Devonſhire, and father of the preſent Duke. II. Lord HENRY CAVENDISH, a Gentleman of extraordinary parts and hopes, who died extremely lamented May 10th, 1700, leaving one daughter named Mary, by Rhoda, only ſurviving daughter of William Cartwright of Aynho Eſq; by Urſula his ſecond wife, daughter of Ferdinando, Lord Fairfax of Cameron in Scotland. III. Lord JAMES CAVENDISH, who was elected Member of Parliament for the Town of Derby in 12 Will. III, and ſerved for the ſame Borough in the reigns of Queen Anne and King George I, as he does in the preſent Parliament. His Lordſhip is a Fellow of the Royal Society. He married Anne, daughter of Elihu Yale Eſq; Governor of Fort St. George in the Eaſt-Indies, and by her, who died June 27th 1734, has a ſon named William, married to a daughter of Dr. Edward Chandler Biſhop of Durham, and a daughter, Elizabeth, married to Richard Chandler Eſq; ſon to the ſaid Biſhop. IV. The Lady ELIZABETH, married to Sir John Wentworth of Broadſworth in the County of York, Bart. (2).

(2) Collins's Peerage of England, vol. 1. pag. 125.

[C] He ſerved as Knight of the Shire for the County of Derby in ſeveral Parliaments.] In 1677 when his Majeſty was offended with the Houſe of Commons for addreſſing him to make a league offenſive and defenſive with the States of Holland, and for a mark of diſpleaſure had commanded the Speaker to adjourn the Houſe to Monday July 16th, the Lord Cavendiſh was at the head of thoſe Members, who objected againſt that abrupt diſmiſſion of them, and preſſed it upon the Speaker, "that he would not leave the Chair, but by "a queſtion and the voice of the Houſe;" and offered to ſhew a precedent of the Commons ſitting after an unexpected meſſage to adjourn. And when upon the ſaid 16th of July the two Houſes met, only in order to be adjourned by his Majeſty's pleaſure, this Lord was in the number of thoſe, who would not comply with the Speaker's report of a Royal Command to that effect; but he mov'd, that their laſt order about Adjournment might be read, to the end that they might take notice of the Authority, by which they met here now; and this he ſaid was uſual and regular to be done. This motion was ſeconded; and had been carried, if the Speaker had not left the Chair, and run away from the hard words, which followed him (3). In the ſame Seſſions, when a vote of great conſequence was depending, and the Houſe divided, and the Tellers were appointed, and the numbers returned equal on both ſides, by which means he and his friends would have loſt their neceſſary point; he charged a miſtake upon the Tellers againſt him, and would not ſuffer it to paſs, but inſiſted on it, till with great difficulty he gained the proof of it; by which, ſays Dr. Kennet (4), he exaſperated a Court-party to the laſt degree. In the next Parliament in 1678 he was one in the firſt Committee appointed for Privileges and Elections; and in the ſecond for drawing up an humble Addreſs to be preſented to his Majeſty for removing all Popiſh Recuſants from within ten miles of the city of London; and in a third for examining into the murther of Sir Edmund Bury Godfrey, and other particulars of the Popiſh Plot. And again for deſiring the Lords to join with them in providing remedies for preſervation of his Majeſty's Perſon and Government and the Proteſtant Religion. He was ſent to attend the King with the Vote of the Houſe relating to the Information given againſt Mr. Mountague December

(3) Private Debates in the Houſe of Commons, 1677, pag. 95. in 12mo, and Kennet's Memoirs, pag. 121, 122, 123.

(4) Ubi ſupra, pag. 122.

exceeding thirty; but January the 31ſt following he, together with his inſeparable friend, William Lord Ruſſel, Sir Henry Capel, and Mr. Powle, deſired leave to retire from the Council-Board; which was granted them. He vigorouſly promoted the Bill of Excluſion [D], and carried up to the Houſe of Lords the impeachment againſt Sir William Scroggs, Lord Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench (c), and continued to oppoſe the meaſures of the Court [E]. At the Lord Ruſſel's tryal he appeared as a witneſs for him, and afterwards ſent him a meſſage by Sir James Forbes, that he would come and change clothes with him in the priſon, and ſtay there to repreſent him, if in ſuch diſguiſe he could make his eſcape †. Upon the aſſaſſination of his friend Mr. Thynne he charged Count Koningſmark, who had been acquitted at his tryal with the guilt of blood, and offered to prove it upon him in the open field [F]. He ſucceeded to his father's honours and eſtate in November 1684, "and in the reign of King James he was the ſame man, in "greater honour, and in greater concern for his country (d)." He ſaw Popery and arbitrary power breaking in upon the Nation; and being firmly attach'd to the intereſts of England and the Proteſtant Religion, blamed, and to the utmoſt of his power, oppoſed every illegal ſtep. Some attempts were made to terrify him, and one witneſs of rebellion was prepared againſt him, whoſe mouth he ſtopt only by deſiring to confront him (e). In 1686 he had an exorbitant fine of thirty thouſand pounds laid upon him for ſtriking Colonel Culpepper within the verge of the Court [G]. He was one of the earlieſt in inviting (c) Echard's Hiſtory of England, vol. 2. Book 2. cap. 3. pag. 604.

† Burnet's Hiſtory of his own Time, vol. 1. pag. 560. and Kennet's Memoirs, pag. 134.

(d) Kennet's Memoirs, pag. 136.

(e) Idem, Funeral Sermon for the Duke, pag. 48, 49.

19th; and was appointed the ſame day to aſſiſt in preparing and drawing up Articles againſt the Earl of Danby. In another Parliament, which met March the 6th 167$\frac{8}{9}$, he was among the chief Members appointed to attend his Majeſty with the Vote concerning the Election of a new Speaker March 8th, and of the Committee for drawing up a Bill to ſecure the King and Kingdom againſt the growth and fear of Popery, April 16th 1679. He was likewiſe diſtinguiſhed in carrying up the Addreſs for declaring to revenge upon the Papiſts any violence offered by them to the King's Perſon May 14th. Upon theſe occaſions he ſpoke often with that weight and freedom, that ſome of his Speeches got abroad in imperfect copies, and were much applauded. One of them had ſuch ſevere things in it, that it produced this Order of the Houſe: "The Houſe being informed that there is a "falſe and ſcandalous Pamphlet diſperſed abroad un"der the name of The Speech of the Lord Cavendiſh; "Reſolved, it be referred to a Committee to enquire "into the Authors and Publiſhers of that Pamphlet."

[D] He vigorouſly promoted the Bill of Excluſion.] When this Bill was carried up to the Houſe of Lords November 15th 1680 by William Lord Ruſſel, he was attended by the Lord Cavendiſh, and others. But the King declaring his reſolution of not conſenting to a Bill of Excluſion, the great point was to ſecure the Kingdom againſt Popery; and while the Houſe was in a grand Committee upon this Queſtion, and Mr. Powle in the Chair, my Lord Cavendiſh made a ſpeech (4) deploring the loſs of that Bill, and concluding with a motion, "that a Bill might be brought in for the "Aſſociation of all his Majeſty's ſubjects;" which after full debate ended in a Reſolve, "That it is the opi"nion of this Committee, that the Houſe be moved, "that a Bill be brought in for an Aſſociation of all "his Majeſty's Proteſtant Subjects, for the ſafety of his "Majeſty's Perſon, the Defence of the Proteſtant Reli"gion, and the Preſervation of his Majeſty's Proteſtant "Subjects, againſt all invaſions and oppoſitions; and for "preventing the Duke of York, or any other Papiſt "from ſucceeding to the Crown." My Lord Cavendiſh proceeded to argue in the Houſe, as he had done in the Committee, by the following Speech, which he made January 7th 168$\frac{8}{1}$. "Mr. Speaker, Sir, I am "perſuaded that we cannot be ſecure neither of our "Religion, nor Peace and Quietneſs without this "Bill. Yet ſeeing we are not like to have it at this "time, I am for going on with thoſe other Bills, that "are afoot, that we may try if we can get them. See"ing we cannot do all the good we would, let us en"deavour to do all the good we can. But I am ready "to agree in the Vote that was propoſed, that it is the "opinion of this Houſe, that neither the King's Per"ſon, nor Proteſtant Religion, can be ſecured any "other way, provided it be not intended to bind the "Houſe from trying what may be done by other laws; "leſt advantage ſhould be taken thereof to break this "Parliament; which I tremble to think of, becauſe "it will be attended with a great ruin to our affairs "both abroad and at home."

(4) See Dr. Kennet's Appendix to his Memoirs, num. 5.

[E] And continued to oppoſe the meaſures of the Court.] In the Parliament of 168$\frac{9}{1}$ he was one of thoſe, who openly named the evil Counſellors, and promoted the Addreſs to the King to remove them from all Offices of honour and profit, and from his Majeſty's Councils and preſence for ever. Upon this the King prorogued the Parliament January 10th, and diſſolved them by Proclamation in January 18th, and called another to meet at Oxford on March 11th; wherein the Lord Cavendiſh began again to ſtem the tide; but his undaunted efforts were again ſtop'd by a diſſolution of that Parliament after it had ſate but ſeven days. After this, when the King and his Miniſters governed without a Parliament, and began to call the chief Members of the late Houſes into queſtion for their liberties and even lives, particularly the Duke of Monmouth, the Earls of Shaftſbury and Eſſex, Lord Ruſſel, Colonel Algernoon Sidney, and others; the Lord Cavendiſh was thought as obnoxious as any, "and did not decline, "ſays Dr. Kennet (5), the meeting with theſe Patriots, "while nothing was propoſed, but what was honour"able and juſt. But in ſome Aſſignation he is ſaid "to have condemned a bold overture that was then "made, and to have declared with great earneſtneſs, "when he came back, that he would never more go "amongſt them. Not that he deſerted what he "thought the public cauſe, or any in it, whom he "eſteemed his friends."

(5) Memoirs, pag. 132.

[F] Upon the aſſaſſination of his friend, Tho. Thynne Eſq; he charged Count Koningſmark, who had been acquitted at his trial, with the guilt of blood, and offered to prove it upon him in the open field.] Lord Cavendiſh had purſued a legal vengeance on the murtherers of Mr. Thynne, and brought the immediate actors to condign puniſhment, and the great abettor of it, Count Koningſmark, to his trial, "who happened to be ac"quitted by a Jury poſſeſſed, or rather prepared in "favour of him (6)." Lord Cavendiſh had great indignation at the diſcharge of the Count, which he thought owing to corruption, and knowing that an Appeal to ſingle combat was antiently the laſt reſort in Law for convicting a murtherer, he obtained the favour of a noble Peer to go in his name to the Count, to charge the guilt of blood upon him; and offer to prove it in the open field. But Dr. Kennet tells us (7), that what is commonly ſaid of an Aſſignation made upon Calais-Sands, is more than he finds atteſted; and that it may be rather preſumed, that the meſſage or the anſwer was dropt, becauſe the Count was in haſte to fly from any ſecond trial.

(6) Kennet's Memoirs, pag. 135.

(7) Ibid. pag. 136.

[G] In 1686 he had an exorbitant fine of thirty thouſand pounds laid upon him for ſtriking Colonel Culpeper within the Verge of the Court.] He had been very rudely inſulted within the Verge of the Court by the Colonel, for which he reſtrained himſelf, and only work'd out the ſatisfaction of giving him his pardon, upon condition that he ſhould never more appear at Whitehall. But immediately after the defeat of the Duke of Monmouth, the Colonel was encouraged to ſhew himſelf at Court, and was riſing into a creature of it. The Earl of Devonſhire meeting him in the King's inviting over the Prince of Orange [H]; and King James II, upon the firſt alarm from Holland, being jealous of him, above any other Peer, endeavoured to draw him to Court; which the Earl evaded (f). Upon the Prince's landing he appeared in arms for him [I], and was afterwards received by him with the higheſt marks of affection and eſteem. In the debates of the Houſe of Lords concerning the vacancy of the Throne, he was very zealous for declaring the Prince and Princeſs of Orange King and Queen of England. In February 168$\frac{8}{9}$ he was admitted one of the Privy-Council (g), and appointed Lord Steward of their Majeſty's Houſhold (b), and April the 3d 1689 inſtalled Knight of the Order of the Garter (i). At the Coronation April the 11th he was made Lord High Steward of England for that day, and carried the Regal Crown next to the Bible and the King's perſon, his daughter aſſiſting in holding up her Majeſty's train. In January 169$\frac{0}{1}$ he attended the King to the Congreſs at the Hague, and outſhone moſt of the Princes there, and invited ſeveral of the ſovereign Princes to dinner, and the King incognito among them. April the 30th 1694 he was created Marquis of Hartington, and Duke of Devonſhire, (f) Kennet, pag. 146, 147.

(g) Kennet's Memoirs, pag. 158.

(b) Idem, ibid. and Burnet's Hiſtory of his own Time, vol. 2. pag. 5. edit. London 1734, in fol.

(i) Mr. Collins in his Peerage of England, vol. 1. pag. 128. ſays he was inſtalled May 14th.

King's Preſence-chamber, and receiving from him, as he thought, an inſulting look, he took him by the noſe, led him out of the room, and gave him ſome contemptuous blow with the head of his cane. For this bold act the Earl was proſecuted in the King's Bench upon an information; and had a fine of thirty thouſand pounds impoſed upon him, and was committed, tho' a Peer, to the King's Bench priſon, till he ſhould make payment of it. He was never able to bear any confinement, which he could break from, and therefore eſcaped, only to go home to his ſeat at Chatſworth. Upon the news of his being there the Sheriff of Derbyſhire had a precept to apprehend him, and bring him with the Poſſe to town. But he invited the Sheriff, and kept him a priſoner of honour, till he had compounded for his own liberty, by giving bond to pay the full ſum of thirty thouſand pounds, which bond had this diſcharge, that it was found among the papers of King James, and given up by King William. We are informed that the Counteſs Dowager, his Mother, being uneaſy to ſee him under ſo great a hardſhip, waited on the King to beg her ſon's pardon, and for diſcharge of the fine humbly deſired, that his Majeſty would accept of her delivering up bonds and other acknowledgments for above ſixty thouſand pounds, lent by her huſband and his mother to his Royal Father and Brother in their greateſt extremities. But this was refuſed. It was under this load of difficulties that he firſt projected the new glorious Pile at Chatſworth; for he now contracted with workmen to pull down the South-ſide of that good old ſeat, and to rebuild it in a plan, which he gave to them for a front to his gardens. When he had finiſh'd this part he intended to go no farther, till ſeeing public affairs in an happy ſettlement for a teſtimony of eaſe and joy, he undertook the Eaſt-ſide of the new quadrangle, and raiſed it entirely new, in conformity to the South, and ſeemed then content to ſay, that he had gone half-way through, and would leave the reſt for his heir. In this reſolution he ſtopt about ſeven years, and then re-aſſumed courage, and began to lay the foundations for two other ſides to complete the ſquare. After the Revolution his Lordſhip complained of the grievance of his fine to the Houſe of Lords, who order'd Sir Robert Wright, the late Chief Juſtice, Sir Richard Holloway and Mr. Juſtice Powell to attend; where they all begg'd the Earl's pardon, and ſubmitted to their Lordſhips, who reſolved May 6th 1689, that "the Court of King's Bench in over-ruling the "Earl of Devonſhire's Plea of Privilege of Parliament, and forcing him to plead over in chief, it "being the uſual time of Privilege, did thereby commit a manifeſt breach of the Privilege of Parliament; "and that the fine of thirty thouſand pound impoſed "by the Court of King's Bench upon the Earl of Devonſhire was exceſſive exorbitant, againſt Magna "Charta, the common right of the ſubject, and the "Law of the Land (8)."

(8) Kennet's Memoirs, pag. 136, 137, 138, 139, and 160-166.

[H] He was one of the earlieſt in inviting over the Prince of Orange.] Biſhop Burnet in the Hiſtory of his own Time (9) tells us, that the Earls of Danby and Devonſhire, and the Lord Lumley undertook for the North in favour of that Prince. And Dr. Kennet (10) obſerves, that he had no view of Safety but from the Prince; and therefore helped to draw the eyes of the Nobility and Gentry the ſame way. He wrote his mind freely to an Engliſh friend in the Court at the Hague, that their laſt and only hope was from thence; and therefore he was very much in thoſe prudent and ſecret meaſures to invite over the Prince.

(9) Vol. 1. pag. 764, 766.

(10) Memoirs, pag. 146.

